Forest. Palestine was more wooded very anciently than afterwards; the celebrated oaks and terebinths here and there were perhaps relics of a primeval forest on the highlands. But in the Bible the woods appear in the valleys and defiles leading from the high to the low lands, so they were not extensive. "The wood of Ephraim" clothed the sides of the hills which descend to the plain of Jezreel and the plain itself near Bethshan (Josh. xvii. 15-18), and extended once to Tabor which still has many forest trees. That "of Bethel" lay in the ravine going down to the plain of Jericho. That "of Hareth" on the border of the Philistine plain in the S. of Judah (1 Sam. xxii. 5). That "of Kirjath Jearim" (1 Sam. viii. 2, Ps. cxxxii. 6), meaning town of the woods, on the confines of Judah and Benjamin; "the fields of the wood" from which David brought up the ark to Zion mean this forest town. That "of Ziph-wilderness," where David hid, S.E. of Hebron (1 Sam. xiii. 15, etc.). [See also ENHRIM WOODS, a portion of the region E. of Jordan near Mahanaim, where the battle with Abimelech took place (2 Sam. xviii. 6, 23), on the high lands, a little way from the valley of the Jordan.]

"The house of the forest of Lebanon" (1 Kings vii. 2) was so called as being fitted up with cedar, and probably with forest-like rows of cedar pillars. "Forest" often symbolises pride doomed to destruction; (Isa. x. 18, xxxiii. 19) the Assyrian host dense and lifted up as the trees of the forest; (xxxvii. 24) "the forest of his Carmel," i.e., its most luxuriant forest, image for their proud army. Forest also symbolises unfruitfulness as opposed to cultivated lands (Isa. xxix. 17, xxxii. 15).

Besides ya'or, implying abundance of trees, there is another Heb. term, chorez from a root "to cut down," implying a wood diminished by cutting (1 Sam. xxiii. 15, 2 Chron. xxvii. 4). In Isa. xvii. 9 for "bough" transl. "his strong cities shall be as the leavings of woods," what the axeman leaves when he cuts down the grove (ver. 6). In Ezek. xxxi. 3, "with a shadowing shroud," explain with an overshadowing thick.

A third term is pardes, akin to paradise (Neh. ii. 8), "forest," a park, a plantation under a "keeper." The Persian kings preserved the forests throughout the empire with care, having wardens of the several forests, without whose sanction no tree could be felled.

Form. (Phil. ii. 6-8.) "Who (Christ Jesus) subsisting (hyparchôn) in the form (the self manifesting characteristics shining forth from the essence) of God, esteemed His being on an equality with God (to einai isa Theo) no robbery (harpagmon, not harpagma, which Ellicott's transl., 'a thing to be grasped at,' would require), but took upon Him the form of a servant." He never emptied Himself of His being on an equality with God in essence, but only of the form of God for the time of His humiliation. The antithesis is between His being in the form of God and His assuming the form of a servant. "Image" implies His being the exact essential inner likeness and perfect representative of God. "Image" (eikōn) supposes a prototype of which it is the exact counterpart, as the child is the living image of the parent. "Likeness" (homōiosis), mere resemblance, is nowhere applied to the Son, as "image" is (1 Cor. xi. 7; John i. 18, xiv. 9; 2 Cor. iv. 4; Heb. i. 3; 1 Tim. iii. 16, vi. 16; Col. i. 15), "the Image of the invisible God." "Found (by His fellow men's outward cognisance) in fashion (schemata) as a man" signifies His outward presentation, habit, style, manner, dress, action (Phil. ii. 8).

Fornication. Used for a hultery (Matt. v. 32). Also spiritual unfaithfulness to the Lord, Israel's and the church's husband (Ezek. xvi, Jer. ii., Hos. i., Rev. xvii. 4).

Fortunatus (1 Cor. xvi. 17). Of Stephanas' household probably (6. 16), which Paul himself baptized. At Ephesus with Stephanas and Achaïus when Paul wrote 1 Corinthians.

Fountain. Ain, or en, in many names, "the eye" of the landscape as distinguished from the artificially sunk and enclosed well. [See EXGEDI, EYEGALIM.] Also mayan, etc. The natural bursting of waters from the ground, which draught of the rain of heaven (Deut. viii. 7, xi. 11), would on Israel's entrance into Canaan form a striking contrast to Egypt watered from below "with the foot," i.e. either by treadwheels working pumps, or by artificial rills led in ducts from the Nile, the petty embankments being removed with the foot to let in the stream. Canaan as a mountainous country depended for its crops on the rain from above, without which in the late autumn to quicken the newly sown seed, and in the spring to swell the grain, the harvest would fail. The configuration of the country did not favour much irrigation. "The eyes of the Lord, Israel's God, were always upon the land from the beginning of the year even unto the end," so long as Israel was faithful (Deut. xi. 11, 12). Egypt symbolises spiritually the world drawing all its resources, material, intellectual, and moral, from beneath. The Holy Land answers to the church, all whose supplies are continually from above (Ps. lxxxvii. 7, John viii. 23). When the country was more wooded its brooks were more filled than now, and though short lived now are remarkable still for their beauty. Thus to Palestine peculiarly of eastern lands the psalmist's language is appropriate, "He sendeth the springs into the valleys which run among the hills" (Ps. cix. 10). Deut. viii. 7: "a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills." Hot springs of volcanic origin are found near the sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. Philip built Tiberias at the sulphureous hot springs S. of the sea of Galilee. Besides the main supply of eastern rain water Jerusalem had at least one perennial spring issuing by more than one outlet (Tacitus, Hist., v. 12, "fons perennis aque"). Jerusalem evidently possessed public fountains (Neh. ii. 13, 14), "the dragon well . . . the gate of the fountain" (2 Sam. xvii. 17), ENROGEL [see].

Fowl. Used for birds of prey: ait (Gen. xv. 11, Job xxviii. 7, Isa. xviii. 6). The Assyrian host, type of the antichristian hosts (Rev. xix. 17, 18, ta ornea; Ezek. xxxix. 17-20), "shall be left to the fowls of the mountains . . . and the fowls shall summer upon them." In the sense "poultry," see Neh. v. 18, 1 Kings iv. 23; "fatted fowl," barburim from barar, "to be pure," Gesenius transl. "geese." Birds in general (ta petei-na) (Luke xii. 24).

Fox: shual, from sha'al "to burrow" (Neh. iv. 3, Lam. v. 18, Matt. viii. 20). In Heb. including also the jackal which preys on unburied carcases; "they shall be a portion for jackals" (Ps. lxxii. 9, 10), fulfilled on "the seekers after David's soul" (2 Sam. xlviii. 7-17). So Samson's 300 jackals (Jud. xv.); for jackals are gregarious, the fox is solitary. The Arab shikah, jackal, is akin to the Heb. shual. That jackals were common in Palestine appears from the names of places compounded with shual, as Hagar-shual, Shalbim; (comp. Foxhays, etc., in our own land;) being gregarious they would naturally run in couples, tied together by a cord of two or three yards length; Samson probably had men to help him, and caught and let them loose from different places to consume the greater quantity of the Philistines' corn. Fond of grapes; (S. of Sol. ii. 15) "take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines." The bride after awaking from her past inwatchfulness is the more jealous of subtle (foxlike) sins (Ps. cxxxix. 23). In spiritual winter evil weeds as well as good plants are frozen up; in the spring of revivals these start up unperceived, crafty false teachers, spiritual pride, uncharitableness (Ps. xix. 12, Matt. xiii. 26, Heb. xii. 15). Little sins beget the greatest (Eccles. x. 1, 1 Cor. v. 6). Ezek. xiii. 4: "thy prophets are like the foxes in the deserts," where the foxes from having nothing to eat become doubly ravenous and crafty to get food. So in Israel, once a vineyard now a moral desert, the prophets whose duty was to guard the church from being spoiled themselves spoil it, through crafty greed of gain. So Jesus calls Herod "that fox." The Lord had withdrawn from His plotting foes in Judaea to the retired region beyond Jordan, Perea. The Pharisees came to expedite His departure by pretending "Herod was seeking to kill Him." Herod was wishing Him to depart, feeling embarrassed how to treat Him whether to honour or persecute Him (Luke ix. 7-9, xiii. 32). It was the Pharisees themselves who wished to kill Him. But Herod lent himself to their design and so played the "fox." Tell that fox that "to-day and to-morrow" I remain doing works of mercy in the borders of his province, "on the third day" I begin that journey which ends in My about to be consummated sacrifice. The common jackal of Palestine is the Canis aureus which may be heard nightly; also the Vulpes vulgaris.

Frankincense: lebanaq, from laban "to be white." A vegetable resin, brittle, glittering, bitter, used for fumigation at sacrifices (Exod. xxx. 7, 8, 34-36), got by incisions in the bark of the Arbor thuris; the first flow is white and transparent, the after yield is yellowish. It was imported from Arabia (Isa. ix. 6; Jer. vi. 20). Arabian frankincense now is inferior to that of the Indian archipelago; the latter frankincense is yielded by the Boswellia serrata or thurifera, growing 40 ft. high in Amboyna and the mountains of India. Arabia may have anciently, as now, imported the best kind. The papyrifera grows on the E. of Africa. The Indian is called loban in Hindoo temples, akin to libanos and lebanaq.

Frankincense, with its sweet perfume, symbolises prayer accepted before God (Ps. cxli. 2; Rev. v. 8, viii. 3, 4). The angel does not provide the incense; it is "given" to him by Christ, whose meritorious obedience and death and intercession are the incense rendering the saints' prayers well pleasing to God. They do not pray to the angel; he is but the king's messenger, and durst not appropriate what is the king's alone (Mal. i. 11). The time of offering the incense, morning and evening, was the chosen time for prayer (Luke i. 10). Frankincense was among the offerings of the wise men to the infant Saviour (Matt. ii. 11).

S. of Sol. iii. 6, "Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness, like pillars of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense?" Israel, with Jehovah's pillar of smoke by day and fire by night, and smoke from the altars of incense and atonement, was the type. Jesus, ascending to heaven with the clouds whilst the question is asked "Who is this King of glory?" (Ps. xxiv. 8, 10) is the antitype. So Isa. lxiii. 1, 2, "Who is this?" etc. The bride too comes up with Him from the wilderness, exhaling frankincense-like graces, faith, love, joy, peace, prayer, praise; of her too it is asked, "Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness, leaning upon her Beloved?" (S. of Sol. viii. 5; Rev. vii. 13-17.)

Fringes: zizith. Num. xv. 38 transl. "that they add to the fringes of the borders (corners) a thread of blue, . . . that ye may look upon it and remember all the commandments of the Lord and do them" (Deut. xxii. 12). The ordinary outer garment was a quadrangle of cloth, to the four corners of which a tassel was attached. Each tassel had a thread of deep blue, marking the heavenly origin of the commandments of which it was to remind them. The Pharisees "enlarged" the fringes to gain note for piety (Matt. xxiii. 5). Latterly the Jews have worn the fringed talith of a smaller size, as an under dress, especially at the synagogue morning prayer. The zizith on the sky-blue thread would be constantly before the Israelites' eyes, in order that, reminded thereby continually of God's commandments, they might not turn their feet to the seductions of the world (Prov. iv. 25, 26, iii. 3; Rev. xix. 8). The woman with the issue of blood touched Christ's hem, as the sacred part (Matt. ix. 20).

Frogs [see EGYPT and EXODUS]. Zeparda: only found in Exodus and the psalms copied from it. The word is Egyptian; an undesigned coincidence confirming the authenticity of Exodus. The magicians, though permitted to increase the plague of frogs, could neither remove it or any of the other plagues.

The three unclean spirits like frogs (Rev. xvi. 13) symbolise (1) proud infidelity, opposing Christ and God, "out of the dragon's mouth"; (2) the spirit of the world, whether lawless socialistic democracy or despotism, setting man above God, "out of the beast's mouth"; (3) lying spiritualism, superseding the harlot and proceeding "out of the false prophet's mouth." Awful parody of the Trinity! As frogs croak by night in marshes, so already in our days these unclean spirits in dark error teach lies amidst the mire of filthy lusts. But though the frogs croak at the surface, it does not follow there are not many good fish beneath, an elect remnant.

Frontlets, or Phylacteries. Thrice mentioned in O. T.: totaphoth (Exod. xiii. 16; Deut. vi. 8, xi. 18). What Moses meant figuratively and in a spiritual sense, "a memorial," "that the Lord's law may be in thy mouth," the Hebrews (excepting the Karaites) take literally (Exod. xiii. 9). Chariots consisting of words written on papyrus rolls, tightly sewed up in linen, were found at Thebes (Wilkinson). It is not likely God, by Moses, would sanction the Egyptian superstition of amulets. The key is in Prov. iii. 3, vi. 20-22, vii. 3; S. of Sol. viii. 6. The FRINGES [see] were merely mnemonics; the phylacteries (which the Jews now call tephillin, i.e. prayers, for they were worn at prayer to typify sincerity, but others explain ligaments) were parcament strips, inscribed with Exod. xiii. 2-10, 11-17, Deut. vi. 4-9, 13-22 (by no means the most important passages in the pentateuch, which fact is against the Jewish literalism), in prepared ink, rolled in a case of black calfskin, attached to a stiffer leather, having a thong one finger broad and one cubit and a half long. Placed at the bend of the left arm, and the thong after making a knot was wound about the arm in a spiral line, ending at the top of the middle finger. Those on the forehead were written on four cowhide parchment strips, and put into four little cells within a square one, on which Ψ was written. The square had two thongs passing round the head, and after a knot going over the breast.

Phylactery is from a Greek root, to keep or guard; being professedly to keep them in continual remembrance of God's law; practically it was used by many as an amulet to keep the wearer from misfortune. [See EARRINGS.] "They make broad their phylacteries" (Matt. xxiii. 5) refers not to the phylactery, which was of a prescribed size, but to its case, which the Pharisees made as ostentatious as possible. They wore them always, the common people only at prayers; and as Jehovah occurs in the tephillin 23 times, but on the highpriest's golden plate but once (Exod. xxviii. 36), the tephillin were thought the more sacred. The Sadducees wore them on the palm, the Pharisees above the elbow. The Jews probably learnt the use of such amulets from the Babylonians during the captivity, for no mention of the phylacteries occurs previously, nor indeed in the O. T. at all. The carnal heart gladly substitutes an external formalism for an inward spiritual remembrance and observance of God's law, such as God required, with the whole inner and outward man. The Karaites, women, and slaves alone did not wear them. Boys at 13 years and a day become "sons of the commandments" and wear them. The rabbinical treatise Rosh Hashanah contains many of the puerile superstitions regarding them; comp. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb.: "they must be read standing in the morning, when blue can be distinguished from green, sitting in the evening from sunset; both hands must be used in writing them; the leather must have no hole; the wearer must not approach within four cubits of a cemetery," etc., etc. Rablins quoted Isa. xlix. 16, lxii. 8. Deut. xxxiii. 2, to prove that even God wore them! and Isa. xxxviii. 16 to show that the wearer thereby prolonged his days, but he who did not wear them should go to perdition. Jerome remarks the same superstition virtually crept in among weak Christian women "with diminutive Gospels, pieces of wood in the form of a cross [women in our day should take warning], and things of that sort, showing a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge."

Fuller: kobees, from kabus "to tread." The fuller's chief work was cleansing and whitening garments for festive and religious occasions. The white garment typifies Christ's spotless righteousness, put on the saints. Rev. iii. 4, 5, 18; vi. 11; vii. 9, 14. Eccles. ix. 8, "let thy garments be always white"; the present, even if gloomy, should never rob saints of the festive joyousness of spirit which faith bestows, in consciousness of peace with God now, and in the prospect of glory for ever. Fulling or cleansing cloth was effected by stamping on the garments with the feet or bats in tubs of water containing some alkali dissolved. The alkali substances mentioned are "scap" and "nitre" (Prov. xxv. 20, Jer. ii. 22), a potash which mixed with oil was used as soap. Mal. iii. 2, "fullers' soap." Job ix. 30, "if I make my hands never so clean," transl., "if I cleanse my hands with lye." Carbonate of potash is obtained impure from burning plants, especially the kali (whence, with the Arabic al the article, comes the word "alkali") of Egypt and Arabia. "Nitre" is not used in our sense, viz. sulphate, but native carbonate of soda. Natron is found abundant in the soda lakes of Egypt (Pliny, xxxi. 10), in the valley Bahr-belo-na (the waterless sea), 50 miles E. of Cairo, during the nine months of the year that the lakes are dry. The Mishna mentions also urine and chalk used in fullers' cleansing. This may have suggested the indecate filthy sneer of Rabshakeh to Hezekiah's messengers in "the highway of the fullers' field" (2 Kings xviii. 27). The trade was relegated to the outside of Jerusalem, to avoid the offensive smells [see ENROGEL]. Chalk, or earth of some kind, was used to whiten garments.

Christ's garments at the transfiguration became "shining" white "as no fuller on earth could whiten them" (Mark ix. 3). Christ's mission, including both the first and second advents, is compared to "fuller's soap" in respect to the judicial process now secretly going on, hereafter to be publicly consummated at the second advent, whereby the unclean are separated from the clean.

Fullers' field. Isa. vii. 3, xxxvi. 2. The "conduit of the upper pool was in the highway (the raised causeway) of the fullers' field," which would be in a position near water for washing, previous to drying and bleaching the cloth. The Assyrian army advanced on Jerusalem from the N. (Isa. x. 28-32), the only accessible side for a host; Enrogel was on the S.E. But Rabshakeh and his companions probably left the army, and advanced along the E. of mount Moriah to Enrogel, to a convenient place under the temple walls for speaking.

Furnace. Neh. iii. 11, xii. 38, "the tower of the furnaces," i.e. of the (bakers') ovens. Hos. vii. 7. There were also the smelting furnace, the refining furnace, the type of affliction and testing probation (Deut. iv. 20; Prov. xvii. 3, xxvii. 21), the limekiln. The brickkiln furnace had an opening at the top to cast in the materials, and a door at the bottom to extract the metal. The Babylonians used it to inflict their cruel capital punishments (Dan. iii. 22-25; Jer. xxix. 22).

G

Gaal. Ebel's son. Emboldened the Shechemites to rebel against Abimelech (Jud. ix. 25). "G. came with his brethren and went over to Shechem, and the lords of Shechem (Heb.) put their confidence in him." He apparently was captain of a band of freebooters; and the Shechemites who were dissatisfied with Abimelech's rule hoped G. would help them against him. Already they had "set liers in wait for Abimelech in the tops of the mountains" (Ebal and Gerizim, between which Shechem was situated), who robbed all passers by. By organized robbery they brought Abimelech's government into discredit, and probably sought to waylay and kill himself. G. developed their brigandage into open revolt. At the vintage ingathering feast "they made praise offerings" (hillulim, A.V. made mercy, merr, songs; comp. Isa. xv. 9, 10) of their fruits, which newly planted vineyards bore in the fourth year, eating and drinking in the house of their god Baal-berith (Baal in covenant), answering to Jehovah's feast (Lev. xix. 23-35). At the feast G. said, "Who is Abimelech and who is Shechem that we should serve him? is not he son of Jerubbaal?" i.e., he is son of the man who pulled down Baal's altar at Shechem and restored Jehovah's worship, for which the Shechemites themselves had tried to slay him (Jud. vi. 27-32). Who is "Zebul his officer"? explains the previous "who is Shechem?" The might of Shechem does not consist in the might of Zebul its prefect, Abimelech's officer. To the one officer of Abimelech G. opposes, "serve the men of Hamor the father of Shechem," the patriarchs of the ancient line whom the Shechemites should serve; Hamor was the Hivite prince who founded Shechem (Gen. xxxiii. 19, xxxiv. 2; Josh. xxiv. 32). The rebellion sought to combine the aboriginal Shechemites with the idolatrous Israelites against the anti-Baalite family of Gilead. Heated with wine G. vaunted that he, if made leader of the Shechemites, would soon overcome and "remove Abimelech." Zebul, jealous of G., privately (lipnith berith, i.e. feigning assent to G. whilst planning his overthrow) sent information to Abimelech, who (marg. Jud. ix. 37) came "by way of the wizarls' terebinths," and "chased G." in battle; and "Zebul thrust out him and his brethren that they should not dwell in Shechem." In ver. 32 transl. "G. went out in the sight of the lords of Shechem," not at their head, but leading his own men; not till the "morrow" did the Shechemites go out. [For the issue see ABIMELECH.] We know no more of G. For charity's sake, which he failed to make good in action, was his fault.

Gaash. On the N. of G. hill or mount was Timnath Serach, the city given by Israel to Joshua at his request, in the region "mount Ephraim," where also he was buried (Josh. xiv. 49, 50; Josh. 30; Jud. ii. 9). Gaba = Gaba, Josh. xviii. 24, etc.

Gabbai. Neh. xi. 8.

Gabbatha. John xix. 13. Pilate came out of his own hall to his judgment seat on the "Pavement" (Chaldee Gabbatha). Josephus (Ant. xv. 8, § 5) implies that the temple was near the castle of Antonia, and (xv. 11, § 5) that Herod's palace was near the castle. Therefore Pilate's hall, which was part of the palace, was near the castle. From vi. 1, § 8 it appears a pavement was near the castle; therefore it was near Pilate's hall. Thus Josephus circumstantially confirms St. John that near Pilate's residence there was a pavement. It was outside the judgment hall (praetorium), for Pilate brought forth Jesus from the hall to it. Pilate's "judgment seat" (bema) was on it, whereon he sentenced our Lord to crucifixion. G. is akin to gibeah, a bare round hill, implying height and roundness; a rounded elevation with tessellated mosaic.

Gabriel = hero of God (Dan. viii. 16, ix. 21; Luke i. 19, 26). As Michael represents the angels in their might in conflict with evil, so G. in ministering comfort and sympathy to man in dark times. Thus G. explains to Daniel the appalling prophecy concerning the ram and hegoat, and cheers him with the prophecy of Messiah's advent within the "70 weeks," in answer to his prayer; and in N. T. announces to Zacharias the glad tidings of the birth of John the forerunner, and of Messiah Himself to the Virgin (Luke i. 19, 26). There is in his manifestations a simplicity and absence of terror, corresponding to his character as a comforter.

Gad. Jacob's seventh son; Leah's maid Zilpah's firstborn; Asher's brother. Gen. xxx. 11-13, for "a troop cometh," transl. "good fortune cometh," answering to Asher, "blessedness," the name of the next son; xvi. 16, 18. In xlix. 19 transl. "G., troops shall troop upon him (Gad, gad ye-guddenu), but he shall troop upon (yagud) their rear" in retreat; alluding to the Arab tumultuous tribes near, who would invade G., then retire, G. pressing on them in retreat. Gadul implies not merely a numerous "troop," but a fiere turbulent band. The tribe's position on march was S. of the tabernacle (Num. ii. 14). Eliasaph, Reuel's son, was their leader.

In Num. ii. 10, 14, we find G. united to Reuben on the S. side of the sanctuary. Companionship in arms and hardships in the wilderness naturally led them to desire neighbourhood in their possessions; also similarity of pursuits in tending flocks and herds led G. to alliance with Reuben. And their respective numbers were nearly the same; at the first census, Gad 45,650, Reuben 49,500; at the last, Gad 40,500, and Reuben 43,330. These undesigned coincidences confirm the truth of the narrative. Like Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, of the tribes they two alone remained shepherds still after the intervening centuries since Jacob left Canaan for Egypt. They therefore received the pasture lands E. of Jordan for their possession (Num. xxvii.), as suited for their "multitude of cattle," but accompanied the nine tribes and a half across Jordan to war with the Canaanites; and only after their conquest and the apportionment of the whole land to their brethren "at the doorway of the tabernacle of the congregation in Shiloh, before Jehovah" (Josh. xix. 51, xxii. 1-8), were they dismissed "to their tents (for still they led a half nomad life) and the land of their possession." G.'s allotment lay chiefly about the centre of the land E. of Jordan, comprising the high land on the general level, stopping short at the Jabbok, and also the sunk valley of the Jordan itself, the whole eastern side up to the sea of Chinnereth or Gennesaret. The farthest landmark eastward is Aroer facing Rabbah, now Amman (Josh. xiii. 25). Half Gilead (Deut. iii. 12), and half of the land of Ammon, the mountainous district intersected by Jabbok. [See GILEAD.] Manasseh lay N. and E. (reaching S. as far as Mahanaim), Reuben S., of G. Mahanaim the ancient sanctuary was on G.'s northern border; Heshbon lay somewhat S. of its southern border.

From western Palestine the territory of Gad looks like a wall of purple mountain with a marked horizontal outline. On a nearer approach picturesque undulating downs are seen on every side clothed with rich grass; and three rivers, the Yarmuk, Jabbok, and Arnon flow down into the Jordan and Dead Sea by deep ravines which scum the horizontal line of hills. Not the flat sheepwalks of Reuben and Moab, but well wooded, especially in the N., with sycamore, beech, terebinth, ilex, cedar, arbutus, and enormous fig-trees.

In the official record in the days of Jotham king of Judah, and Jeroboam king of Israel, G. had extended its possessions to Saleh in Bashan (1 Chron. v. 11, 16, 17). E. of the Hauran plain, whilst Manasseh was pushed farther N. to mount Hermon (23). Thus Gad and Gilead became synonymous (Jud. v. 17). Jephthah is called "the Gileadite," being a native of Mizpah of Gad (Jud. xi. 31, 34; Josh. xiii. 26).

In Dent. xxxiii. 20, 21, Moses said of G., "Blessed is He that enlargeth (i.e. God who gives a large territory to) G.; he lieth down as a lioness, and teacheth the arm, yea (aph, not with) the crown of the head (of his foes); and he provided the first part (the firstfruit portion of the land conquered by Israel) for himself, because there was the leader's (G.'s) portion reserved (saphen, G. at the head of the tribes asked Moses for the conquered land E. of Jordan (Num. xxxii. 2, 6, 25, 34, etc.), even as they took the lead above Reuben in fortifying the cities Dibon, etc. Their name accordingly is prominent on the Pithos stone (see); and he came with the heads of the people (i.e., he according to his stipulation to Moses went at the head of the tribes to conquer Canaan W. of Jordan, along with them: Num. xxxii. 17, 21, 32; Josh. i. 14, iv. 12), he executed the justice of Jehovah (Mo. es prophetically foresees G. will do what Jehovah required of His people as righteousness) and His judgments (in fellowship) with (the rest of) Israel."

Their prowess is vividly portrayed in 1 Chron. xii. 8, "men of might and of war, fit for the battle, that could handle shield and buckler, whose faces were the faces of lions, and as swift as the roes upon the mountains"; "one of the least was a match for a hundred, and the greatest for a thousand." In spite of the Jordan's overflow in the first month, and of the opposition of "all them of the valleys toward the E. and toward the W.," they joined David at Ziklag.

Their war, in concert with Reuben, against the Hagarites, with Jetur, Naphtali, and Nodab, resulted in the defeat and utter spoiling of the Hagarites, and the dispossessing them of "their steeds." "The war was of God," and the victory was because the Gathites, etc., "cried to God in the battle and He was entreated of them, because they put their trust in Him" (1 Chron. v. 18-22).

Other famous men of Gilead or G. were the loyal, generous, and unambitious Barzillai (2 Sam. xvii. 27-29, xix. 31-49) and the prophet Elijah. The land of G. was the battlefield for long between Syria and Israel (2 Kings x. 33). G. finally was carried captive by Tiglath Pileser, and Ammon seized their land and cities (2 Kings xv. 29, 1 Chron. v. 25, Jer. xlix. 1).

Gad. The "seer" of king David (1 Chron. xxix. 29). "The acts of David" were recorded "in the book of G. the seer." He joined David whilst in "the hold," having probably first become acquainted with David in the latter's visits to Samuel and the schools of the prophets, and by his advice David left it for the forest of Hareth (1 Sam. xxii. 5). At the numbering of the people G. was Jehovah's monitor to David (2 Sam. xxiv. 11-19, 1 Chron. xxi. 9). He also took part in arranging the musical services of the temple (2 Chron. xxix. 25). Jerome compares G. to Elijah in the abruptness of his introduction; this concentrates all attention on his work and message, none on himself.

Gad. Marg. Isa. lxx. 11, "that troop," rather "that prepare a (sacrificial) table for the God," i.e. the deity of fortune, a Babylonian idol worshipped by the Jews, answering to either the moon or Jupiter, akin to Syriac gadu, and Arab jul, "good fortune." The star of luck, for which a couch was laid out and a banquetting "table." Meni ("that number," marg. ver. 11) was the lesser good fortune, G. the greater.

Gadara. "The country of the Gadarenes" (Mark v. 1, Luke viii. 26, 37, in Alex. MS.; and Matt. viii. 28, Vat. MS. But Sin. "Gazarenes" in Matt., "Gerasesenes" in Mark, and in Luke "Gerasesenes." Vat. has "Gerasesen" in Mark and Luke. [See GERASA.] Alex. MS. has "Gerasesenes" Matt. viii. Probably Matthew, writing for those intimately acquainted with the topography, names the obscure but exact locality; Mark and Luke, writing for those at a distance, name G. the wellknown capital of the place. The one name is probably more specific, the other more general. G. was the most strongly fortified city in Peraea. It was near the river Hieromax (now the bed Sheriat el Mandhur), E. of the sea of Galilee over against Tiberias, at 16 miles Roman distance, on a hill beneath which were warm springs called Amatha. Its ruins are identified with Um Keis on an isolated hill N.W. of the mountains of Gilead. Christ coming across the lake from Capernaum landed at the S.E. corner, where the steep bank descends from the eastern highlands into the Jordan valley. There is only the one place where the swine could have rushed down a steep into the water. Gergesa was probably under the jurisdiction of G. Two demoniacs met Him near the shore. A "great herd of swine" were feeding on the adjoining slope. Upon the demons entering them they rushed down the "steep" into the lake and were drowned. Josephus (Ant. xvii. 13, § 4) explains the difficulty of swine being there though forbidden by the Jewish law, "G. was a Grecian city." On the keepers informing the people of what had happened, "the whole city came out to meet Jesus," and "besought Him to depart out of their coasts" (Job xxi. 14, 15, xxii. 17). Men ignore God's word (Hos. ix. 12), "woe to them when I depart from them" (Deut. xxxi. 17); and the awful doom, Matt. xxv. 41. Contrast the cured demoniac, Mark v. 15, 16, 18. G. was reduced to ashes by Vespasian in the beginning of the Roman war which ended in the overthrow of Jerusalem.

It is an interesting coincidence that tombs still abound in the cliffs round the city, excavated in the limestone rock, some as large as 20 feet square, with side recesses for bodies. Stone slabs form the doors. Like the demoniacs, the people of Um Keis still dwell in the tombs. The ruins of Um Keis attest the greatness of G. anciently; from the gate a straight street, with a colonnade on each side, passed through the city; the pavement is almost perfect, marked here and there by chariot wheels; the columns are prostrate.

ROCK TOMBS.

Gaddi. The spy who represented Manasseh (Num. xiii. 11).

Gaddiel. The spy representing Zebulun (Num. xiii. 10); son of Sodi.

Gadi. Father of MENAHEM [see].

Gaham. Gen. xxii. 24, meaning sunburnt.

Gahar, the children of. Ezra ii. 47, Neh. vii. 49.

Gaius. Paul's host at Corinth when Paul wrote (Rom. xvi. 23), "mine host and of the whole church." Baptized by that apostle (1 Cor. i. 14). The third epistle of John is addressed to "the well beloved" G. or Caius; probably the same, for he evidently had the means to do kindness "to the brethren and to strangers." He was converted through John (ver. 4, 5). A G. of Macedonia is mentioned in Acts xix. 29, and a G. of Derbe (xx. 4); probably distinct men.

Galal. 1. 1 Chron. ix. 15. 2. 1 Chron. ix. 16. 3. Neh. xi. 17.

Galatia. Galatia is the same as Celts, of the Kymrie not Gaelic branch. These poured into Greece and pillaged Delphi 280 B.C. Some passed into Asia at the invitation of Nicomedes I., king of Bithynia, to help him in a civil war. There they settled, viz. the Troceni, Tolistoboi, and Teutosages (from Toulouse), and made inroads far and wide, but were checked by Antiochus I. of Syria, hence called Soter (Saviour), and Attalus I. of Pergamus, hence designating himself "king." Then they hired themselves out as mercenary soldiers.

G. lay in the centre of Asia Minor, the province "Asia" on the W., Cappadocia on the E., Pamphylia and Cilicia on the S., and Bithynia and Pontus N. Ancyra (now Angora) was their capital; Tavium and Pessinus were leading cities. Their language was partly Gallic, partly Greek, hence they were called Gallio-Graeci. The inscriptions at Ancyra are Greek, and St. Paul's epistle is in Greek.

St. Paul founded several "churches" in the Galatian region, not residing for long in one place and forming a central church, as at Ephesus and Corinth (Gal. i. 2, 1 Cor. xvi. 1, Acts xvi. 6). His first visit was about A.D. 51, during his second missionary journey. Sickness detained him among them, and he turned it to good account by becoming the first preacher of the gospel to them (Acts xvi. 6; Gal. i. 8, iv. 13). "On account of infirmity of flesh I preached unto you at the first" (so the Greek is). At his subsequent visit (Acts xviii. 23) he "strengthened" them in the faith.

Galatians, Epistle to. Written by St. Paul, as the style proves. The heading and allusions to the apostle of the Gentiles in the first person throughout confirm his authorship (i. 1, 13-24, ii. 1-14). Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. iii. 7, § 2, referring to Gal. iii. 19), Polycarp (Phil. iii., quoting Gal. iv. 26, vi. 7), Justin Martyr (Orat. ad Graecos, alluding to Gal. iv. 12, v. 20), Tertullian (De Praescr., ix.), uphold his authorship. The character of the Gallic Celts given by Caesar (B. G., iv. 5) accords with that described in this epistle: "the infirmity of the Gauls is, they are fickle in their resolves, fond of change, and not to be trusted." So Thierry: "frank, impetuous, impressive, eminently intelligent, but extremely inconstant, fond of show, perpetually quarrelling, the fruit of excessive vanity." This description is not altogether inapplicable to their descendants in France and Ireland. They received Paul at first with all affection, but soon wavered in their allegiance to the gospel, and hearkened as eagerly to Judaizing teachers as they had before to him (iv. 14-16).

Many Jews resided in Ancyra (Josephus, Ant. xvi. 62); among these probably, as elsewhere, he began his ministry, and from them perhaps emanated the Judaizers who almost induced the Gentile Christians (iv. 8, 9), who constituted the majority of the Galatian church, to undergo circumcision (i. 6; iii. 1, 3; v. 2, 3; vi. 12, 13). Accustomed, when heathen, to the mystic worship of Cybele prevalent in the neighbouring Phrygia, they the more readily were led to believe that the full privileges of Christianity could only be attained by submitting to elaborate ceremonial symbolism (iv. 9-11, v. 7-12). They even gave ear to the insinuation that Paul himself observed the law among the Jews though he persuaded the Gentiles to renounce it, and that he wished to keep his converts in a lower state of privileges, excluded from the high Christian standing enjoyed by the circumcised (iv. 16, v. 11; comp. ii. 17), and that in "becoming all things to all men" he was but a menpleaser, seeking to form a party for himself; moreover that he was not, as he represented, an apostle divinely commissioned by Christ, but a mere messenger of the twelve and the Jerusalem church, and that his teaching now did not accord with that of Peter and James, the acknowledged "pillars" of the church, and ought therefore to be rejected.

His design in writing then was: (1) To maintain his apostolic authority (i. 11-19, ii. 1-14). (2) To counteract the Judaizers (iii., iv.), and to show that their teaching undermined Christianity itself by lowering its spirituality to external ceremonialism. (3) To strengthen Galatian believers in faith towards Christ and in the fruit of the Spirit (v., vi.); already he had testified against the Judaizers to their face (i. 9, iv. 16, Acts xviii. 23), and now that he has heard of the increase of the evil he writes to check it, "with his own hand" (vi. 11), a labour which he usually committed to an amanuensis. His sketch of his apostolic call and course confirms the history in Acts, and proves his independence of human authority however exalted. His protest against Peter's judaizing dissimulation disproves the pope's, and even Peter's, supremacy, and shows that Peter, except when specially inspired, was fallible as other men (ii. 14-21). There is much in common between this epistle and that to the Romans; but the epistle to the Romans discusses justification by faith only, not by the law, in a didactic, logical mode; the epistle to the Galatians controversially, and with special reference to the Judaizers.

The style combines sternness (i., iii. 1-5) with tenderness (iv. 19, 20), betraying his strong emotions, and well adapted to move an impressionable people such as the Galatians. He begins abruptly, as is suitable to the urgency of the subject and the seriousness of the evil. A tone of sadness too appears, such as is natural in an affectionate teacher who has just learned that his loved disciples are abandoning his teachings for those of others who pervert the truth and calumniate himself.

The time of writing was after the visit to Jerusalem recorded in Acts xv. 1 (i.e. A.D. 50), if that visit be identical, as is probable, with that in chap. ii. 1. Moreover, as allusion seems to be made to his second visit to the Galatians (in autumn A.D. 54) in i. 9, "as we said before," and iv. 16, "have I become your enemy?" the epistle must have been later than A.D. 54. Acts xviii. 23 implies that at his second visit the Galatians were well established in the faith, which made their speedy declaration the stranger. Chap. iv. 13, "ye know how I preached at the first" (Gr. at the former time), implies that Paul at the time of writing had been twice in Galatia; and chap. i. 6, "I marvel that ye are so soon removed," implies that he wrote not long after having left Galatia the second time, possibly (Alford) soon after he began his residence at Ephesus (Acts xviii. 23, xix. 1), which lasted from autumn A.D. 54 to pentecost A.D. 57. However, the resemblance of this epistle to the epistle to the Romans favours the view (Conybeare and Howson) that it was not written till his stay at Corinth (Acts xx. 2, 3, during the winter 57-58), whence he wrote the epistle to the Romans. It seems unlikely that 1 and 2 Cor., so dissimilar, should intervene between those so much alike as Gal. and Romans, or that Gal. should intervene between 2 Thess. and 1 Cor. Even three years would be "soon" for their apostasy, they having betrayed no symptoms at his second visit (Acts xviii. 23). A sudden exigency (tidings of Galatian judaizing having reached him at Corinth from Ephesus) apparently called forth this epistle, for it maintains Christian liberty from carnal ceremonialism, and justification by faith only, in an admonitory and controversial tone. That to Romans, written subsequently, more systematically and deliberately sets forth the same truths for a church which as yet he did not personally know. The manner suits his relations to the two churches respectively; in writing to the Galatian church, which he had founded, he rests upon his authority; to the Roman church, whom he did not know personally, wholly upon argument; an undesigned coincidence and propriety confirming the authenticity. Reproof in Gal. predominates over praise and thanksgiving.

Division. There are two controversial parts and a closing hortatory one. I. He defends (i., ii.) his apostolic authority and independence of the twelve. II. He polemically by argument (iii.), appeal (iv. 12-20), and allegorical illustration (iv. 1-7, 21-30), maintains justification by faith and not by the deeds of the law. III. He warns (iv. 31-v. 12), illustrates the true fulfilment of the law by the walk in the Spirit, in contrast to the flesh (v. 13-26), practically instructs, and recapitulates (vi.).

Galbanum. An ingredient of the sacred incense, for perfume (Exod. xxx. 34). The odour is disagreeable, but its gum resin enables the perfume to retain its fragrance longer. An exudation from the Galbanum officinale of the eastern coast of Africa. A similar gum is yielded by the Opōidia galbanifera of Durrood in Khorassan (Lindley).

Galeed = a witness heap, AlHeb. name given by Jacob to the heap which he and Laban reared on mount Gilead, a memorial of their brotherly covenant (Gen. xxxi. 47, 48). Laban called it in Aramaic (Chaldee or Syriac) JEGAR-SAHADUTHA [see]. Apparently Nahor's family originally spoke Syriac, and Abraham and his family acquired Hebrew in Canaan, where the Hebrew was indigenous when he first settled there, the Hamitic Canaanites having learned it from an earlier Semitic race. The memorial heap marked the crisis in Jacob's life when he became severed from his Syrian kindred, and henceforth a sojourner in, and heir of, Canaan.

Galilee: from galil. "A circle" or "circuit" around Kedesh Naphthali, in which lay the 20 towns given by Solomon to Hiram, king of Tyre, in payment for his having conveyed timber from Lebanon to Jerusalem (Josh. xx. 7, 1 Kings ix. 11). The northern part of Naphtali (which lay N. of Zebulun) was inhabited by a mixed race of Jews and Gentiles of the bordering Phœnician race (Jud. i. 30, 1 Kings ix. 11). Tiglath Pileser carried away captive its Israelite population to Assyria; then Esarhaddon colonized it with heathen (2 Kings xv. 29, xvii. 24; Ezra iv. 2, 10). Hence called (Isa. ix. 1) "G. of the nations," or "Gentiles" (Matt. iv. 13, 15, 16). During and after the captivity the Gentile element became the preponderating population, and spread widely; and the province included in our Lord's days all the ancient Issachar, Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali. The most northerly of the three provinces of Palestine, viz. G., Samaria, Judaea (John iv. 3, 4; Luke xvii. 11; Acts ix. 31). G.'s Gentile character caused the southern Jews of purer blood to despise it (John i. 46, vii. 52); but its very darkness was the Lord's reason for vouchsafing to it more of the light of His presence and ministry than to self-satisfied and privileged Judaea. There He first publicly preached, in Nazareth synagogue. From it came His apostles (Acts i. 11, ii. 7); foretold in Deut. xxxiii. 18, 19, 23. Comp. on pentecost Acts ii. 7, Ps. lxxviii. 27, 28. Jerusalem, the theocratic capital, might readily have known Messiah; to compensate less favoured G. He ministered mostly there. G.'s debasement made its people feel their need of the Saviour, a feeling unknown to the self-righteous Jews (Matt. ix. 13). "The Light to lighten the Gentiles, and the Glory of His people Israel," appropriately ministered on the border land between Israel and the Gentiles, still on Israel's territory, to which He was primarily sent (Matt. xv. 24). Places and persons despised of men are honoured of God. The region the first to be darkened by the Assyrian invasion was cheered by the prophet's assurance that it should be the first enlightened by Immanuel (1 Cor. i. 27-29). Its population being the densest of any part of Palestine, and its freedom from priestly and pharisaical prejudice, were additional grounds for its receiving the larger share of His ministry.

It was bounded on the W. by the region of Ptolemais (Acre), viz. the plain of Akko to the foot of Carmel. The Jordan, the sea of G., lake Huleh, and the spring at Dan, was the eastern border. The northern boundary reached from Dan westward to Phœnicia (Luke viii. 25). The southern border ran along the base of Carmel and the Samaritan hills to mount Gilboa, then along the valley of Jezreel by Seythopolis (Bethshean) to Jordan. Probably the cleansing of the ten lepers took place near Jenin, the border town of G. towards Samaria, near the S. of the sea of G. Jebel Jermuk is the highest mountain, 4000 ft. above the sea. There were two divisions: I. Lower G. was the whole region from the plain of Akko on the W. to the lake of G. on the E., including the rich plain of Esdraelon, the heritage of Issachar, who submitted to servitude, to "tribute," for the sake of the rich plenty that accompanied it (Gen. xlix. 14, 15; Deut. xxxiii. 18). "Rejoice Zebulun in thy going out (thy mercantile enterprises by sea and fishing in the lake of G.), and Issachar in thy tents (in thy inland prosperity, agriculture and home comforts) . . . they shall suck of the abundance of the seas (the riches of the sea in general, and the purple dye extracted from the murex here) and of treasures hid in the sand" (the sand of these coasts being specially valuable for manufacturing glass, a precious thing anciently: Job xxviii. 17). "They shall call the people unto the mountain," etc.: Zebulun and Issachar shall offer their wealth at the Lord's appointed mount, and invite Gentile nations to join them (Ps. xxii. 27, 28, etc.). The conversion of the Gentiles, brought in to Israel and Israel's Saviour, is herein prophetically typified (comp. Isa. lx. 5, 6, 16; lxvi. 11, 12). Asher "dips his feet in oil," i.e. abounds in olive groves. "Fat bread" and "royal dainties" are his, corn, wine, milk, butter, from his uplands and valleys (Gen. xlix. 20; Deut. xxxiii. 24, 25). "Thy shoes . . . iron and brass," i.e. thy hills shall yield these metals (viii. 9). "As thy days (so shall) thy strength (be)," i.e., as thy several days come (throughout life) strength will be given thee." Comp. 1 Kings viii. 59 marg.

II. Upper G. extended from Bersabe on the S. to the village of Bœza, bordering on Tyre, and from Meloth on the W. to Thella, near Jordan (Josephus, B. J., iii. 3, § 1); in fact, the whole mountain range between the upper Jordan and Phœnicia. Its southern border extended from the N.W. of the sea of G. to the plain of Akko. This upper G. is chiefly meant by "G. of the Gentiles." The ravine of the Leontes separates the mountain range of upper G. from Lebanon, of which it is a southern prolongation. Safed is the chief town. The scenery is bolder and richer than that of southern Palestine. On the table land of upper G. lie the ruins of Kedesh Naphtali (Josh. xx. 7). Bochart, altering the vowel points, transl. Gen. xlix. 21, "Naphtali is a spreading terebinth, which puts forth goodly branches"; for the country of Kedesh Naphtali is a natural park of oaks and terebinths.

As Nazareth was the scene of our Lord's childhood, so CAPERNAUM [see] in G. was for long the home of His manhood (Matt. iv. 13, ix. 1). The three former, or the synoptic, Gospels chiefly present our Lord's ministry in G.; the Gospel of John His ministry in Judæa. His parables in John and in the three synoptists correspond to the features of Judæa and G. respectively. The vineyard, figtree, shepherd, and desert where the man fell among thieves, were appropriate in Judæa; the cornfields (Mark iv. 28), the merchants and fisheries (Matt. xiii. 45, 47), and the flowers (Matt. vi. 28), suited G. The Galilean accent and dialect were peculiar, owing to Gentile admixture (Matt. xxvi. 73). After Herod the Great's death Herod Antipas governed G. till six years after Christ's crucifixion. Herod Agrippa, with the title of "king," succeeded. On his death (Acts xii. 23) G. was joined to the Roman province of Syria. After the fall of Jerusalem G. became famed for its rabbins and schools of Jewish learning; and the sanhedrim or great council was removed to Sepphoris, and then to Tiberias. Rabbi Judah Hakkodesh here compiled the Mishna, to which the Gemara was subsequently added. The remains of splendid synagogues in G. still attest the prosperity of the Jews from the second to the seventh century.

Galilee, Sea of. (Matt. iv. 18, Mark vii. 31, John vi. 1). So called from its washing the E. side of G. In Luke v. 1 "the sea of Gennesaret," called so from the fertile plain of Gennesaret at its N.W. angle, three and a half miles long by two and a half broad (Matt. xiv. 34). In O. T. "the sea of Chinnereth" or Cinneroth, from the town so named on its shore (Josh. xix. 35), of which Gennesaret is probably the corruption, though others derive it from gannah, a "garden," and Saron, a plain between Tabor and the lake. "The sea of Tiberias" is another designation, from the city (John vi. 1). All its names were drawn from places on the western side. Now Bahr Tubariyeh (Tiberias, S.W. of the lake). Close to it was "His own city" Capernaum (Matt. iv. 13). Nine cities stood on the shores of the lake, of which only two are now inhabited, viz. Magdala, consisting of a few mud huts, and Tiberias, sadly changed from its ancient prosperity. Silence now reigns where formerly the din of industry was heard. On its shore Jesus called His first disciples (Matt. iv. 18, ix. 9; Luke v. 1-11; John i. 43, etc.).

The bed of the lake is but a lower section of the great Jordan valley. Its depression is 653 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean, according to Lient. Lynch. Its length is about 13 miles, its breadth is about five or six. The view from the Nazareth road to Tiberias is beautiful. The hills from the eastern side rise apparently out of the water with a uniform slope, to the height of 2000 ft., destitute of verdure, and shut in the lake; whilst far to the N. is seen snowy Hermon. The eastern hills, which are flat along the summit, are the wall that supports the table land of Bashan; from which on the N. there is a gradual descent to the valley of the Jordan, and then a rise to a plateau skirting the mountains of upper Galilee. The hills on the W., except at Khan Minych, where there is a small cliff, are recessed from the shore. On a western recess stands Tiberias. The whole basin betrays its volcanic origin, which also accounts for the warm spring at Tiberias. The cliffs are hard porous basalt. The vegetation is tropical; the lotus thorn, palms, indigo, etc. The water is sweet, sparkling and transparent; the fish abundant as of old, many species being those of the Nile, the silurus, mulga, and sparus Galilaus. Dr. Tristram says: "the shoals of fishes were marvellous, black masses of many hundred yards long, with the black fins projecting out of the water, as thickly as they could pack. There are the European loach, barbel, blenny and cyprinodont; the African chromis, hemichromis, and eel-like clarias; and the Asiatic discognathus. The cyprinodonts are viviparous, and the sexual differences marked; they can live in cold water, or hot springs up to 90°, fresh, brackish, or briny water. This marks a former connection between these waters and those of N.E. and S.E. Africa, the Nile, the Zambesi, and the great lakes in the interior. The papyrus also, no longer found in the Nile, is found on the shores of the sea of G. As Asia, Africa, and Europe respectively were represented at Christ's cross by the Jews, Simon of Cyrene, and the Romans respectively, so the Asiatic, African, and European fishes in the sea of G. represent the various races of mankind gathered by the spiritual fishermen into the one gospel net. Only one little boat represents the fleets of fishing vessels that once covered the lake. The fish are now taken with a hand net jerked round the fish by the fisher, usually naked, along the shore (John xxi. 7); or else crumbs of bread mixed with bichloride of mercury are scattered to poison the fish, and the floating dead bodies are picked up for the Tiberias market. (Porter, Handbook, p. 432.) Sudden and violent storms agitate the waters, sweeping down the ravines and gorges converging to the head of the lake, from the vast naked plateau of the Janlan and the Hauran and mount Hermon in the background. It was such a storm that Jesus stilled by a word, as He had a few hours before rebuked and cast out demons. Mark iv. 39, "Peace, be still," Gr. "Be silent, be muzzled"; addressing the sea and warring elements as rebel forces; comp. Rev. xxi. 1. The apostles were trying to reach Bethsaida on the western coast, when the gale from the S.W. that brought vessels from Tiberias to the N.E. coast (John vi. 23) delayed the vessel of the former, until at the fourth watch Jesus came walking over the tempest tossed waves; then followed Peter's temporary walking through faith and sinking through unbelief in the same waters, and his rescue by Jesus; then they immediately reach their desired haven for which they had set out the evening before (Matt. xiv. 28, 29, 33; John vi. 17, 21; Mark vi. 45). So impressed were the disciples that "they worshipped Him, saying, Of a truth Thou art the Son of God." Bethsaida Julias, the city of Andrew and Peter, lay on the E. bank of the Jordan where it enters the sea of G. on the N. Close by, and on the E. of the river and N.E. of the lake, stretched the "green grass" (Mark vi. 39) plain of Batihah, the scene of feeding the 5000. Gergesa (now Kersa) lay E. of the lake. The Jordan's outlet is at Kenk, the S.W. extremity of the lake. The lake, mirroring heaven in its union of rest and energy, represents Him who best combined the calm repose which reflected His Father's image with energetic labours for God and man.

FISH OF THE LAKE OF GALILEE.

Gall. 1. Merevah=bitterness. Secreted in an animal's gall bladder. Poetically used for a vital part, Job xvi. 13, xx. 25; ver. 14, "the gall of asps," i.e. their poison, contained in a sac in the mouth; Scripture uses popular language when no moral truth is thereby endangered. 2. Rosh: a bitter and poisonous herb: the poppy (Gonolons). Rosh means head, so we speak of poppy heads. Jer. viii. 14, "water of gall," i.e. opium, ix. 15, xxi. 15. Others suggest one of the Euphorbiae, distasteful and deadly; the "grapes of gall" answering to the rounded three berried fruit (Imperial Bible Dict.). Dent. xxix. 18 (to which Heb. xii. 15, "root of bitterness," refers; a root whose essence is bitterness), xxii. 32. Opium water would suit well for stupefying criminals in the agony of execution (Ps. lxix. 21, Matt. xxvii. 34, Acts viii. 23). The vinegar offered to our Lord was mingled with "gall" according to Matthew, with "myrrh" according to Mark (xv. 23). The myrrh was the usual seasoning of Roman wine; the gall was added to stupefy, but our Lord would meet His agony in full consciousness. Bengel supposes the gall was added in wantonness. Matthew designated the drink according to the prophetic aspect, Ps. lxix. 21; Mark according to its outward appearance.

Galleries. S. of Sol. i. 17, "rafters (galleries marg.) of fir"; the cross-beams, the carved ceiling, fretted work: rachit. The keri, or Heb. marg. has rahit, an ambulatory; not probable. In vii. 5 transl. "the king is held bound with the flowing ringlets"; comp. vi. 5. In Ezek. xli. 15, xlii. 3, "the galleries" are terrace buildings. Smith's Bible Dict. identifies the "pillars" and "galleries," xlii. 3, 5, 6; "the reason of the upper chambers being shorter is ascribed to the absence of supporting pillars which allowed an extra length to the chambers of the lower storey; the space included within the pillars would form an open gallery."

Gallim=heaps, or else springs. 1 Sam. xxv. 44, Isa. x. 30, "daughter of G.," i.e. G. and her sons, i.e. inhabitants. It is enumerated amidst towns of Benjamin; Laish is one. Possibly "Phaltis the son of Laish who was from G.," was a native of Laish the town, and this a dependency only. Now the hill Khirbet el Jisr, S. of Gibeah of Saul (Valentiner).

Gallio. Junius Annaeus G., Roman proconsul (Gr., A. V., "deputy") of Achaia when Paul was at Corinth A.D. 53, under the emperor Claudius. Brother of L. Annaeus Seneca, the philosopher. Adopted into the family, and so took the name, of the rhetorician L. Junius Gallio. His birth name was Marcus Annaeus Novatus (Pliny II. N., xxxi. 33; Tacitus Ann., xv. 73, xvi. 17). He left Achaia "when he began in a fever, often exclaiming that it was not his body, but the place, that had the disease" (Seneca, Ep. civ.). "No mortal was ever so sweet to one as G. was to all," says his brother, adding: "there is none who does not love G. a little, even if he cannot love him more"; "there is such an amount of innate good in him without any savour of art or dissimulation"; "a person proof against plottings." How exactly and undesignedly this independent testimony coincides with Acts xviii. 12-17! The Jews plotted to destroy Paul by bringing him before G.'s judgment seat. But he was not to be entrapped into persecuting Christians by the Jews' spiteful manoeuvre: "if it were a matter of wrong or wicked lewdness, O ye Jews," said he without waiting even to hear Paul's defence, just as the apostle was about to open his mouth, "reason would that I should bear with you; but since it is (Gr.) a question of word and names (viz. whether Jesus is the Christ) and your law, look ye to it; for I will be no judge of such matters. And he drave them from the judgment seat." So the Greeks, sympathizing with the deputy's disgust at the Jews' intolerance, beat Sosthenes the chief ruler of the Jews' synagogue "before the judgment seat." And G. winked at it, as the Jewish persecutor was only getting himself what he had intended for Paul. Thus God fulfilled His promise (ver. 10), "Be not afraid, but speak, for I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee, for I have much people in this city." "G. cared for none of these things" does not mean he was careless about the things of God (that probably he was from his easy epicurean-like temper), but with characteristic indifference to an outbreak provoked by the spite of the Jews he took no notice of the assault. Sosthenes himself seems, by Paul's sympathy in trouble, to have been won to Christ, like Crispus (1 Cor. i. 1). Seneca's execution by Nero made G. a trembling suppliant for his own life (Tacitus Ann., xv. 73). Jerome says he committed suicide A.D. 65. Seneca dedicated to him his treatises On Anger and On a Happy Life. The accuracy of Scripture appears in the title "proconsul" (deputy), for Achaia was made a senatorial province by Claudius seven or eight years before Paul's visit, having been previously an imperial province governed by a legate; and the senatorial provinces alone had "proconsuls."

Gamaliel. 1. Num. i. 10, ii. 20, vii. 54, 59, x. 23. 2. A Pharisee and eminent doctor of the law, who advised the council wisely to let the apostles alone (Acts v. 34, etc.). "for if this counsel or work be of men it will come to nought; but if it be of God ye cannot overthrow it, lest haply ye be found even to fight against God." He was Paul's teacher, "at whose feet he was brought up and taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers" (Acts xxii. 3). The Jews celebrated him as "the glory of the law," the first designated Rabban "our master." Son of rabbi Simeon, and grandson of Hillel; president of the sanhedrim under Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius; he died 18 years before the fall of Jerusalem. His counsel as to the apostles was not from any leaning to Christianity, but from opposition to sadduceism in a case where the resurrection was the point at issue, and from seeing the folly of unreasoning bigotry (Acts xxiii. 6-9). Saul his pupil was a leading persecutor when Stephen opposed pharisaism; and probably G. would not altogether disapprove of his zeal in such a cause, though his own tendency was to leave the claims of Christianity to be tested by time.

Games. Of children, Zech. viii. 5. Imitating marriages and funerals, Matt. xi. 16, 17. The earnestness of the Hebrew character indisposed adults to games. Public games they had none, the great feasts of religion supplying them with their anniversary occasions of national gatherings.

Jason's introduction of Greek games and a gymnasium was among the corrupting influences which broke down the fence of Judaism, and threw it open to the assaults of the O. T. antichrist, Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. i. 14; 2 Macc. iv. 12-14). Herod erected a theatre and amphitheatre, with quinquennial contests in gymnastics, chariot races, music, and wild beasts, at Jerusalem and Caesarea, to the annoyance of the faithful Jews (Josephus, Ant. xv. 8, §1; 9, §6).

The "chief of Asia" (Asiarchs) superintended the games in honour of Diana at Ephesus (Acts xix. 31). In 1 Cor. xv. 32 Paul alludes to "fights with beasts" (though his fights were with beastlike men, Demetrius and his craftsmen, not with beasts, from which his Roman citizenship exempted him), at Ephesus. The "fighters with beasts" were kept to the "last" of the "spectacle"; this he alludes to, 1 Cor. iv. 9: "God hath set forth (exhibited previous to execution) as the apostles last, as it were appointed to death, for we are made a spectacle unto the world," etc., a "gazing stock" as in an amphitheatre (Heb. x. 33). The Asiarchs' friendliness was probably due to their having been interested in his teaching during his long stay at Ephesus. Nero used to clothe the Christians in beast skins when he exposed them to wild beasts; comp. 2 Tim. iv. 17, "I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion" (viz. from Satan's snare, 1 Pet. v. 8). In 2 Tim. iv. 7, "I have striven the good strife," not merely a fight, any competitive contest as the racecourse. 1 Tim. vi. 12 which was written from Corinth [see TIMOTHY], where national games recurred at stated seasons, which accounts for the allusion: "strive" with such earnestness in "the good strife" as to "lay hold" on the prize, the crown or garland of the winner, "eternal life." Jas. i. 12; Rev. ii. 10. Phil. iii. 12-14: "not as though I had attained," viz. the prize, "or am already perfected" (Gr.), i.e., my course completed and I crowned with the garland of perfect victory: "I follow after," i.e. I press on, "if that I may apprehend (grasp) that for which I am apprehended of (grasped by) Christ," i.e., if so be that I may lay hold on the prize for obtaining which I was laid hold on by Christ at conversion (S. of Sol. i. 4, 1 Cor. xiii. 12). "Forgetting those things behind (the space already past, contrast 2 Tim. iii. 7, 2 Pet. i. 9) and reaching forth unto those things before," like a race runner with body bent forward, the eye reaching before and drawing on the hand, the hand reaching before and drawing on the foot. The "crown (garland) of righteousness," "of life," "of glory," is "the prize of the high calling (the calling that is above, coming from, and leading to, heaven) of God in Christ Jesus" (1 Thess. ii. 12), given by "the righteous Judge" (2 Tim. iv. 8, 1 Pet. v. 4). The false teacher, as a self-constituted umpire, would "defraud you of your prize" (kata-brabeneto), by drawing you away from Christ to angel worship (Col. ii. 18). Therefore "let the peace of God as umpire rule (brabeneto) in your hearts" and restrain wrong passions, that so you may attain the prize "to the which ye are called" (iii. 15).

In 1 Cor. ix. 24 the Isthmian games, celebrated on the isthmus of Corinth, are vividly alluded to. They were a subject of patriotic pride to the Corinthians, a passion rather than a pastime; so a suitable image of Christian earnestness. Paul wrote 1 Cor. at Ephesus, and in addressing the Ephesian elders he uses naturally the same image, an undesigned coincidence (Acts xx. 24). "So (with the determined earnestness of the one earthly winner) run, that ye may obtain" is such language as instructors in the gymnasia and spectators on the racecourse would urge on the runners with. The competitor had to "strive lawfully" (2 Tim. ii. 5), i.e. observing the conditions of the contest, keeping to the bounds of the course, and stripped of clothes, and previously training himself with chastity, abstemious diet, anointing, enduring cold, heat, and severe exercise. As a soldier the believer is one of many; as an athlete he has to wage an individual struggle continually, as if (which is the case in a race) one alone could win; "they who run in the stadium (racecourse, oblong, at one end semicircular, where the tiers of spectators sat), run all, but one receiveth the prize."

Paul further urges Christians, run so as not only to receive salvation but a full reward (comp. 1 Cor. iii. 14, 15; 2 John 8). Pugilism is the allusion in "I keep under (Gr. I brutise under the eyes, so as to disable) my body (the old flesh, whereas the games competitor boxed another I box myself), and bring it into subjection as a slave, lest that by any means, when I have preached (heralded, as the heralds summoned the candidates to the race) to others, I myself should be a castaway" (Gr. rejected), viz. not as to his personal salvation of which he had no doubts (Gal. i. 15; Eph. i. 4, 7; Phil. i. 6; Tit. i. 2; 2 Tim. i. 12), but as to the special reward of those who "turn many to righteousness" (Dan. xii. 3, 1 Thess. ii. 19). So Paul denied himself, in not claiming sustenance, in view of "reward," viz. "to gain the more" (1 Cor. ix. 18-23). Ver. 25: "striveth for the mastery," viz. in wrestling, more severe than the footrace. The "crown" (garland, not a king's diamond) is termed "corruptible," being made of the soon withering fir leaves from the groves round the Isthmian racecourse. Our crown is "incorruptible" (1 Pet. v. 4). "I run not as uncertainly," i.e. not without a definite goal, in "becoming all things to all men" I aim at "gaining the more." To gain no end, he implies to the Corinthians, in your eating idol meats. He who knows what to aim at, and how to aim, looks straight to the goal, and casts away every encumbrance (1 Heb. xii. 1). So the believer must cast aside not only sinful lusts, but even harmless and otherwise useful things which would retard him (Mark ix. 42-45, x. 50; Eph. iv. 22; Col. iii. 9). "He must run with enduring perseverance the race set before him." "Not as one that beateth the air," in a sciamachia, or sparring in shamfight, striking the air as if an adversary. Satan is a real adversary, acting through the flesh.

The "so great a cloud of witnesses" (Heb. xii. 1, 2) that "we are compassed about with" attest by their own case God's faithfulness to His people (1 Heb. vi. 12). A second sense is nowhere positively sustained by Scripture, viz. that, as the crowd of surrounding spectators gave fresh spirit to the combatants, so the deceased saints who once were in the same contest, and who now are witnessing our struggle of faith, ought to increase our earnestness, testifying as they do to God's faithfulness; but see Job xiv. 21, Eccles. ix. 5, Isa. lxiii. 16, which seemingly deny to disembodied spirits consciousness of earthly affairs. "Looking off unto Jesus (aphorizontes, with eye fixed on the distant goal) the Princelader and Finisher (the Starting point and the Goal, as in the diavlos race, wherein they doubled back to the starting point) of our faith" (2 Tim. iii. 7).

Gammadims. Ezek. xxvii. 11. Rather, from a Syrian root (for the Tyrians were Syro-Phœnicians), "men of daring." Foreigners would hardly be entrusted to watch "in the Tyrian towers." Others from Heb. gomed, a cubit, "short swordsmen"; Ehud carried a sword a cubit long (Jud. iii. 16). Or else an arm, "men strong of arm."

Gatul. 1 Chron. xxiv. 17.

Garden. An enclosure in the suburbs, fenced with a hedge or wall (Isa. v. 5, Prov. xxi. 31), planted with flowers, shrubs, and trees, guarded (whence comes "garden") by watchmen in a lodge or tower (Isa. i. 8 [when the lodge is forsaken by the keeper, the bare poles leaning every way and the green boughs of the roof scattered, there could scarcely be a more vivid picture of Zion's desolation], Mark xii. 1) to drive away wild beasts and robbers (Job xxvii. 18). The quince, citron, almond, and other fruits, also herbs (1 Kings xxi. 2), cucumbers, lettuce, mustard, are mentioned as in gardens. The balsam, according to Pliny, grew only in two royal gardens of Judaea, not elsewhere. Syria was so famed for gardens that the Greeks had a proverb, "the many garden herbs of the Syrians." The rose garden W. of the temple was peculiar in being within the walls; the smell from weeds and manure was the cause of gardens being usually forbidden within the walls. A reservoir, cistern, or still better a fountain of water, was essential to a good garden. Comp. S. of Sol. iv. 15, "a fountain of gardens," ain-gannim [see EN-GANNIM, Jenin now], i.e. a fountain sufficient to water many "gardens," "a well of living waters."

Spiritually the believer is the garden, the Holy Spirit the living water (Jer. ii. 13, xvii. 8; John iv. 13, 14, vii. 37-39). "A well watered garden" expresses abundant happiness and prosperity (Isa. lviii. 11, Jer. xvii. 8, xxxi. 12), as "a garden that hath no water" (Isa. i. 30) expresses spiritual, national, and individual barrenness and misery. Ps. i. 3, the righteous "shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of waters (lit. the divisions of waters, the water being divided into rivulets to run along the rows of trees for irrigation) that bringeth forth his fruit in his season." Not only are his fruits (the tree's proper fruit, Rev. xxii. 2) good in themselves, but are in season (Eccles. iii. 1-11; contrast Matt. xxi. 19). "His leaf" also has its beauty and use and is "unwithering" (Ezek. xlvii. 12); even his minor fruits of character are good after their kind, and his smallest undertakings blessed because done unto the Lord, and so shall abide.

The law against mixing diverse seeds was observed by separating the various productions by light fences of reed. The "orchards" (Heb. paradeses) were specially for fruit trees, dates, figs, sycamores, etc. The occurrence of no less than 250 botanical terms in O. T. shows the Israelite predilection for flowers, fruits, and pleasure grounds. The vine wound round the trellis or outer staircase, the emblem of the loving and fruitful wife and the happy home (Ps. cxxviii. 5). The house court or area generally had its shady terebinth. Under the shadowing figleaves Nathanael communed with his God (John i. 48). The ripe grain in harvest joy was decorated with lilies; S. of Sol. vii. 2, "thy bulice (of amber colour) is a heap of wheat set about with lilies" (white or scarlet, answering to her scarf round her person).

The Hebrews used gardens also as burial places (John xix. 41). Here Jesus' sacred body was entombed in Joseph's new sepulchre. Manasseh and Amon were buried in Uzza's garden (2 Kings xxi. 18, 26). Machpelah's field, Abraham's burial ground, was a garden with "trees in it," and in all the borders round about it" (Gen. xxiii. 17). The garden of Gethsemane was Jesus' favourite resort for devotion (Matt. xxvi. 36, John xviii. 1). Gardens were in idolatrous periods made the scene of superstition and image worship, the awful counterpart of the primitive Eden (Isa. i. 29, lxx. 3, lxxi. 17).

S. domon's gardens and orchards with all kinds of fruits and pools of water for irrigation (Eccles. ii. 4-6) doubtless suggested the imagery S. of Sol. iv. 12-15. It was in a garden of light Adam fell; in a garden of darkness, Gethsemane, the Second Adam overcame the tempter and retrieved us. The "streams from Lebanon" imply that the fountain is lowly, the source lofty. Christ (and so Christ's church) springs up on the earth, but has His source in heaven; no longer "sealed" but "open" streams (Rev. xxii. 10, 17). The site near Bethlehem assigned to Solomon's garden is probably correct. It is a suitable retreat near the capital, and the names of localities about confirm the tradition: Urtas, "the valley of the garden"; geb-el-Fureidis, "the hill of the little paradise"; "fig vale"; "peach hill"; "walnut walk"; "garden of nuts." The "king's garden" (2 Kings xxv. 4; Neh. iii. 15; Jer. xxxix. 4, lii. 7) was near the pool of Siloam, at the Tyropoeon valley, where the valleys of Jehoshaphat and Hinnom met.

Gareb. 1. 2 Sam. xiii. 38, 1 Chron. ii. 53. 2. The hill near Jerusalem (Jer. xxi. 39). From Heb. garab "to scrape," Syr. leprosy, the locality outside the city to which lepers were removed, on the N.W. side of the city, W. of the valley of Gihon. Even the localities whose name implies they are now outside shall at last be taken within the new Jerusalem (Matt. viii. 1-4, Luke xvii. 11-19).

Garlick. Num. xi. 5. Abounding in Egypt. The Allium sativum (Linnaeus). A fixed allowance of it and other vegetables was appointed to the workmen on the pyramids and publicly inscribed (Herod., ii. 125). It stimulates the circulation and the system generally.

Garmite. Descended from GEREM (1 Chron. iv. 19).

Garrison. Put in military posts to keep possession of a conquered country, as the Philistines held the land of Israel at the beginning of Saul's reign (1 Sam. x. 5, xiii. 3); David, Syria (2 Sam. viii. 6, 14). In Ezek. xvi. 11, "thy strong garrisons" (matzetz both 'azzeek) lit. the statues of thy strength, i.e. the forts. Or rather (Maurer), the obelisks in honour of the tutelary gods of Tyre (as Melecarte, the Tyrian Hercules whose temple stood in Old Tyre) shall go down to the ground before Nebuchadnezzar, the conqueror, just as he treated Egypt's idol statues (Jer. xliii. 11).

Gashmu=Geshem. Neh. vi. 1, 2. 6. Gatam. Gen. xxxvi. 11, 16; 1 Chron. i. 36.

Gate. The oriental resort for business, converse, bargaining, and news (Gen. xix. 1, xxiii. 10; Ps. lxx. 12), for addresses and reading the law (2 Chron. xxxii. 6, Neh. viii. 1, 3, Prov. i. 21, Jer. xvii. 19), or administering justice (Josh. xx. 4, Ruth iv. 1, Dent. xvi. 18, xxi. 19). Prov. xxii. 22, "neither oppress the afflicted in the gate," i.e. in the place of justice, in law-suits. Ps. lxx. 12, "they that sit in the gate speak against Me (Messiah), and I was the song of the drunkards," i.e. not only among drunken revellers, but in the grave deliberations of the judges in the place of justice I was an object of obloquy. Amos v. 12, "they turn aside the poor in the gate," i.e. they refuse them their right in the place of justice; (10) "they hate him that rebuketh in the gate," viz. the judge who condemns them (Zech. viii. 16). Isa. xxix. 21, "they lay a snare for him that reproveth in the gate," i.e., they try by bribes and misrepresentations to ensnare into a false decision the judge who would in public court reprove them for their iniquity, or to ensnare the prophet who publicly reproves them (Jer. vii. 2). "The Sublime Porte," the title for the Sultan of Turkey, is derived from the eastern usage of dispensing law in the gateway. The king's or chief's place of audience (1 Kings xxii. 10, 2 Sam. xix. 8, Job xxix. 7, Lam. v. 14). The object of a foe's attack and therefore strengthened especially (Jud. v. 8, Ps. cxlvii. 15), shut at nightfall (Dent. iii. 5, Josh. ii. 5, 7, 1 Sam. xxiii. 7). The market place for country produce (2 Kings vii. 1, Neh. xiii. 16-19). The open spaces near the gates were used for heathen sacrifices (Acts xiv. 13, 2 Kings xxiii. 8). Josiah defiled "the high places of the gates . . . in the entering in of the gate."

The larger gates had two valves, and were plated with metal and secured with locks and bars. Those without iron plating were easily set on fire (Jud. ix. 52). Sentences of the law were inscribed on and above them, to which allusion occurs Dent. vi. 9; an usage followed by Mahometans in modern times. Some gates were of solid stones (Rev. xxi. 21, Isa. liv. 12). Massive stone doors are found in ancient houses of Syria, single slabs, several inches thick, 10 ft. high, turning on stone pivots above and below. The king's principal gate at Ispahan afforded sanctuary to criminals (Chardin, vii. 368). In Esther's time "none might enter into the king's gate clothed with sackcloth" (Esth. iv. 2).

"The Beautiful Gate" of Herod's temple (Acts iii. 2) was the outer one, made of Corinthian brass, surpassing in costliness even nine others of the outer court, which were covered with gold and silver. It was so heavy that twenty men were required to close it, but it was found open unexpectedly shortly before the overthrow of Jerusalem (Josephus, B. J., v. 5, § 3; vi. 5, § 3; c. Ap., ii. 9). The doorway consisted of lintel, threshold, and sideposts (Exod. xii. 7, 22).

In Gen. xxii. 17, "thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies," the sense is, shall sit in judgment on them, as in the Assyrian sculptures the king is represented sitting in judgment upon prisoners. Thus the Persian satrap in the Lyeian Xanthus monument sits at the gate dictating terms to the Greek ambassadors, and Sennacherib, at his tent door, gives judgment on the Jews taken at Lachish (British Museum, 59). In front of the larger edifices in the remains at Persepolis and Nineveh (Khorsabad) are propylæa, or "porches," like that "for Solomon's throne where he might judge, even the porch of judgment, covered with cedar from one side of the floor to the other" (1 Kings vii. 7). The threshold in the Assyrian palaces is one slab of gypsum with cuneatic inscriptions; human-headed bulls with eagles' wings guard the portals, like and probably borrowed from the cherubim which guarded the gate of Eden; besides there are holes 12 in. square, lined round with tiles, with a brick to cover them above and containing small baked clay idols with lynx head and human body, or human head and lion's body, probably like the TERAPHIM [see], from Arabic tarf "a boundary," and akin to the Persian "terifin" talismans. Thus the place of going out and coming in was guarded, as especially sacred, from all evil by the inscriptions, the compound figured gods outside, and the hidden teraphim. Daniel "sat in" such a "gate" before the palace of Babylon as "ruler over the whole province of Babylon" (Dan. ii. 48, 49). The courtiers of Ahasuerus attended him "in the gate" similarly (Esth. iii. 2).

SENNACHERIB ON HIS THRONE.

Gath = a winepress, G. being in a vine-abounding country. One of the five great Philistine cities (Josh. xiii. 3, 1 Sam. vi. 17). Goliath's abode (1 Sam. xvii.). Its people were the "Gittites," of whom was David's devotedly loyal friend Ittai (2 Sam. xv. 19-22). In undesigned coincidence with the presence of giants in G., according to 1 Sam. xvii., 2 Sam. xxi. 19-22, is Josh. xi. 22: "only in Gaza, in G., and in Ashdod there remained Anakims." G. was one of the five cities to which the Philistines carried about the ark of God (the five formed one political unity), and thereby brought on the people God's heavy visitation with emeralds. It was represented by one of the five golden emeralds and five golden mice sent to propitiate Jehovah (1 Sam. v. 9; vi. 4, 5, 10-18). David there feigned madness to save his life; a second time he visited king Achish, and had Ziklag assigned to him as a residence (1 Sam. xxi. 10-15, xxvii. 28). Thence he attached and drew after him 600 Gittite followers, with Ittai their chief (2 Sam. xv. 18); probably some at the time of his sojourn in G., and most when he smote and subdued the Philistines (2 Sam. viii. 1). Though tributary to Israel, G. still retained its own king (1 Kings ii. 39). Hazael fought against it and took it (2 Kings xii. 17). Uzziah gave a heavy blow to G., breaking down its wall (2 Chron. xxvi. 6, Amos vi. 2). "Hamath . . . Gath, . . . be they better than these kingdoms?" G., once "better (stronger) than" Israel and Judah, fell; how vain then is your confidence in the strength of mounts Zion and Samaria! In Amos i. 6, etc., Zeph. ii. 4, 5, Zech. ix. 5, 6, G. is omitted; probably it had lost by that time its place among the five primary cities. Hezekiah, after Uzziah, conquered Philistia (2 Kings xviii. 8, Isa. xiv. 29-31).

Tell es Safieh occupies the site of G., which lay on the border between Judah and Philistia, between Shocoh and Ekron (1 Sam. xvii. 1, 52). Saul came down from the hills by the road from Jerusalem to Gaza, which passes near Shocoh, and encountered the Philistines near the bend in the valley. Saul was on the E. of the valley, the Philistines on the W., as they came from the W. G. was from its strength often alternately in the hands of Judah and of Philistia (2 Chron. xi. 8). It lay on a hill at the foot of Judah's mountains, ten miles E. of Ashdod, and ten S.E. of Ekron.

Gath-hepher = the winepress of the well. Josh. xix. 12, 13. On Zebulun's border, near Japhia (Yafa). Jonah's birthplace (2 Kings xiv. 25). Now El Meshhad, where his tomb is still shown, two miles E. of Sefurich (Sepphoris).

Gath-rimmon = winepress of the pomegranates. 1. A city of Dan, given to the Levites (Josh. xix. 45, xxi. 24; 1 Chron. vi. 69). On the Philistine plain. 2. A town of Manasseh, W. of Jordan, assigned to the Levites (Josh. xxi. 25). But Bileam (i.e. Ibleam, xvii. 11) in 1 Chron. vi. 70, which is probably the true reading in Joshua, the copyist's eye catching "Gath-rimmon" in the previous verse.

Gaza = fortified. One of the five Philistine cities. Mentioned in the first and latest books of Scripture, and even now exceeding Jerusalem in size. It is the most southwesterly town towards Egypt, and lay on the great route between Syria and that country, being in position and strength (as its name means) the key of the line of communication. It withstood Alexander's siege with all his resources for five months. It is called Azzah Gen. x. 19 marg., Deut. ii. 23, Jer. xxv. 20. G. was assigned by Joshua to Judah (Josh. xv. 47), but not occupied till afterwards (Jud. i. 18; comp. Josh. x. 41), the Anakims occupying it still (xi. 22, xiii. 3). The Philistines soon recovered it (Jud. xiii. 1, xvi. 1, 21), and there Samson perished whilst destroying his captors. Solomon ruled over it (1 Kings iv. 24). Hezekiah gave the decisive blow to the Philistines, "even unto G. and the borders thereof, from the tower of the watchmen to the fenced city" (2 Kings xviii. 8). Amos (i. 6) threatened from God, "for three transgressions of G. and for four (i.e. for sin multiplied on sin, Exod. xx. 5, Prov. xxx. 15. Three and four make seven, the number implying completion of the measure of guilt) I will not turn away the punishment thereof, because they carried away captive the whole captivity (i.e. they carried all away and left none; see 2 Chron. xxi. 17, xxviii. 18) to deliver them up to Edom (the Philistines of G., instead of hospitably sheltering the Jewish refugees fleeing before Sennacherib and other Assyrian invaders, sold them as captives to their bitter foes, the Edomites; comp. Isa. xvi. 4). But I will send a fire on the wall of G., which shall devour the palaces thereof." "Pharaoh" Necho fulfilled the prophecy on returning from slaying Josiah at Megiddo (2 Chron. xxxv. 20) (Grot.). Or "Pharaoh" Hophra, on his return from the unavailing attempt to save Jerusalem from Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxxvii. 5, 7, xlvii. 1). (Calvin.)

In Zeph. ii. 4 there is a play on like sounds; Gath gazubah, "G. shall be forsaken." In Zech. ix. 5 "the king shall perish from G.," i.e., its Persian satrap, or petty "king," subordinate to the great king of Persia, shall perish, and it shall cease to have one. Alexander having taken the city, and slain 10,000 of its inhabitants, and sold the rest as slaves, bound Betis the satrap to a chariot by thongs thrust through his soles, and dragged him round the city, as Achilles did to Hector.

In Acts viii. 26, "go toward the S. unto the way that goeth down from Jerusalem unto G. which (not G., but which way) is desert," refers to the portion of the road between Eleutheropolis and G., which is without villages and exposed to Bedonin marauders of the desert. The words "which is desert" are the angel's (not Luke's), to inform Philip, then in Samaria, on what route he would find the eunuch, viz. on the S. route, thinly peopled, but favourable for chariots. Robinson (ii. 748) found an ancient road direct from Jerusalem to G. through the wady Musur, now certainly without villages. The water in wady el Hasy was probably the scene of the eunuch's baptism.

Once G. was the seat of a Christian church and bishop; but now of its 15,000 inhabitants only a few hundreds are Christians, the rest Mahometans. The great mosque was formerly the church of St. John when Gaza was a Christian city.

An extensive olive grove lies N. of the modern Ghuzzel, whence arises its manufacture and export of soap. Its trade in corn is considerable, and still is heard the "grinding" of corn with millstones such as Samson was forced to work with in his prison house at G. The Tel el Muntar or "hill of the watchman," east of G., is the hill to which Samson carried up the gates. It commands a lovely and striking view on every side.

Gazer. [See GEZER.] 2 Sam. v. 25.

Gazez. 1. 1 Chron. ii. 46. 2. Son of Haran, Ephah's son.

Gazzam, children of. Ezra ii. 48.

Geba = the hill. A town of Benjamin, on its northern boundary, whence "from G. to Beersheba" expresses all Judah from N. to S. as "from Dan to Beersheba" expresses all Israel and Judah from N. to S. (2 Kings xxiii. 8.) Close to Ramah (Neh. vii. 30). As an eastern limit it stands opposed to Gazer (2 Sam. v. 25); Gibeon in 1 Chron. xiv. 16. G. was garrisoned by the Philistines at the beginning of Saul's reign (1 Sam. xiii. 3). Jonathan dislodged them in a gallant assault with his armour-bearer alone (xiv.). G. was on the S. and Michmash on the N. of the ravine. Now the village Jebel, crowning the steep hill on the edge of the Wady Suweinit, facing Mukmas on the N. side. So in Isa. x. 28-32, "he (Sennacherib) hath laid up his carriages at Michmash," i.e., the "carriages" (i.e. heavy baggage) could not be got across the Wady at Michmash. Then "they are gone over the passage," i.e., the lighter part of the army pass the ravine which might have been easily guarded against them, and "lodge" (palan, "rest for the night," bivouac) at G. on the S. side. Asa fortified it, as commanding the pass (1 Kings xv. 22, 2 Chron. xvi. 6). A. V. has rendered "G." into "Gibeah" rightly Jud. xx. 10, 33, 1 Sam. xiii. 16.

Gebal [see SEIR, MOUNT]=a line, viz. of mountain boundary (Ps. lxxiii. 7). An Idumean clan, on the right of Ammon, as Amalek was on the left; for in the psalm it is coupled with Moab, Ammon, Amalek, and Edom. Probably the modern Djebel, mountainous region S. of the Dead Sea; the Gabalene of the Romans, the Gobolitis of Josephus. A portion of the range of Edom. The psalm, probably by Jahaziel of the sons of Asaph, is a thanksgiving for the victory anticipated by faith over the hordes of invaders who sought to root Israel out of his inheritance, and who, marching S. round the Dead Sea, let no tidings reach Jehoshaphat till he heard that a great multitude was within his territory at Engedi (2 Chron. xx. 2, 7-11, 14, 18, 19). Smith's Bible Dict. identifies the G. of Ps. lxxiii. with G. in Ezek. xxvii. 9, "the ancients of G. and the wise men thereof were in these thy calkers" (stoppers of chinks in ships), evidently the Phœnician city and region between Beyrût and Tripoli, famed for skilled workmen, "the Giblites" (stone carriers) (1 Kings v. 18 marg.). So "the inhabitants of Phœnician Tyre" are numbered with the invaders (Ps. lxxiii. 7). But the collocation of G. between the "Hagarenes" and "Ammon" favours the men of G. being Luwians. "The Giblites" in Josh. xiii. 5 were from the region of Lebanon; the LXX. term them Biblinas, viz. of Biblus, on the Phœnician borders, N. of the river Adonis, afterwards a Christian see.

Geber, son of. 1. 1 Kings iv. 13. 2. 1 Kings iv. 19. Having as his commissariat district the part of Gilead forming Sihon's and Og's kingdom, now Beika, the great pasture E. of Jordan. Transl. not "he was the only officer in the land," for there were two others (13, 14), but "and one (superior) officer (netzib achar) who was in the land," viz. to superintend the three subordinate officers (comp. Heb. 2 Chron. viii. 10).

Gebim=the ditches. Isa. x. 31. Between Anathoth and Nob.

Gedaliah. 1. Son of Ahikam, who saved Jeremiah from death (Jer. xvi. 24); grandson of Shaphan, Josiah's secretary, whom the king sent to inquire concerning the book of Jehoiach's law recently found (2 Kings xxii. 12, 14). G. thus inherited from father and grandfather a legacy of the fear of God. Left by Nebuchadnezzar, after the destruction of the temple (588 B.C.), to govern the cities of Judah and the husbandmen and vine-dressers, who were allowed to remain in the land (Jer. xxxix. 10, 14; xl. 5, 6, 11; lli. 16). He was stationed at the stronghold Mizpah, six miles N. of Jerusalem, with a Chaldean guard (xli.). Jeremiah, when given his choice by Nebuzaradan where he should dwell, attached himself to G., who was joined also by a promiscuous multitude of "men, women, and children, and of the poor of the land"; also by Ishmael of the blood royal, Johanan and Jonathan, Seraiah, the sons of Ephai, Jezeaniah, and their men; also by the Jews who had been driven to Moab, Ammon, and Edom, but who now with reassured confidence began to gather, as formerly, "wine and summer fruits." This indicates his deserved popularity, whilst his words imply his loyalty to the supreme monarch to whom God by express prophecy had assigned the world kingdoms, and at the same time his gentleness as a ruler. "Fear not to be servants of the Chaldees; dwell in the land, and serve the king of Babylon, and it shall be well with you." Even reverence for the temple, though in ruins, revived under him; and men from Shechem, Shiloh, and Samaria came with their offerings and badges of mourning for the destruction of the Lord's house and the holycity (Jer. xli. 5). Johanan warned G. that Baalis (called from the idol Baal) king of Ammon had sent Ishmael to assassinate him and his retinue. With unsuspecting generosity G. refused to credit it. So Ishmael, in violation of the sacred rights of hospitality and taking advantage of the opportunity, whilst eating G.'s "bread" at Mizpah, smote him two months after his appointment (comp. Ps. xli. 9). Jealousy of G.'s presidency was Ishmael's motive; his royal descent leading him to regard himself as the rightful ruler. Ammon, Israel's ancient foe, gladly used such a tool. A mystery of providence that God should permit the righteous, in spite of warning, to rush in unsuspecting honesty of purpose into the trap laid for them; Isa. lvii. 1 suggests a solution. An enemy's presence appears in such anomalies. Faith, in spite of them, believes God is ordering all things for the ultimate good of His people, and at the judgment will vindicate His ways and clear up all that is now dark. All suffering nature and disorganized society as well as believers yearn for the advent of Him who shall reign in righteousness (Isa. xi., Ezek. xxi. 27). His death is commemorated in the Jewish calendar as a national calamity; and many Jews under Johanan, fearing Babylon's vengeance, fled to Egypt, forcing Jeremiah with them (xli. 18).

2. 1 Chron. xxv. 3, 9. 3. Ezra x. 18. 4. Zeph. i. 1. 5. Son of Pashur; one of the princes who caused Jeremiah's imprisonment (Jer. xxxviii. 1, etc.).

Geder. One of the 31 kings defeated by Joshua W. of Jordan (Josh. xii. 13). In the extreme S. Possibly the Simeonite GEDOR (1 Chron. iv. 39).

Gederah=the sheepcote. A town of Judah in the shephelah, or hills between the mountains and plain (Josh. xv. 36). Near the "valley of the terebinth" [Elahe, see], near Azekah and Socoh. GEDEROTH=two sheepcotes, and GEDEROTHAIM=two sheepcotes, were in the same region (41).

Gedor. 1. Josh. xv. 58. A few miles N. of Hebron. Perhaps now Jedur between Bethlehem and Hebron, two miles W. of the road. 2. A town of Benjamin, to which belonged Jeroham, father of Joelah and Zebadiah, who "of Saul's brethren of Benjamin" joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 7). 3. Ancestor of Saul (viii. 31, ix. 37). 4. Among Judah's posterity (1 Chron. iv. 4, 18). 5. See GEDER. (1 Chron. iv. 39.) Simeonite chiefs in Hezekiah's reign "went to the entrance of (rather as Keil, 'westward from') G. unto the eastern side of the valley to seek pasture for their flocks," and they dislodged the Hamites "dwelling there of old, and dwelt in their room." On the way between southern Judah and mount Seir. LXX. read "Gerar" (but Simeon's dwellings did not extend westward from Gerar, but were all E. of Gerar).

Gehazi. Elisha's servant. His messenger to the Shunammite woman (2 Kings iv.); suggested the obtaining of a son from the Lord for her, as a meet reward for her kindness to the prophet. Trusted by Elisha with his staff to lay on the face of the lifeless youth. But reanimation was not effected till Elisha himself came: typifying that Moses the messenger, with his rod and the law, could not quicken dead souls, that is reserved for Jesus with His gospel. G. proved himself lying and greedy of filthy lucre, and with his great spiritual privileges a sad contrast to Naaman's servants, who had none (2 Kings v.). They by wise counsel induced their master to subdue pride, and humbly to wash in the Jordan, according to the prophet's word. G. presumptuously stifled conscience with the plea that a "Syrian" heathen ought not to have been "spared," as his master had "spared this Naaman," and even dared to invoke Jehovah's name, as though his obtaining money by false pretences from him would be a meritorious act: "as the Lord liveth, I will take somewhat of him." In his master's name, under pretence of charity (!), as if wanting presents for "two sons of the prophets from mount Ephraim," he obtained from Naaman two talents of silver and two changes of raiment. Coveting, lying, taking, and hiding, followed in the order of sin's normal and awful development; as in Adam's and Achan's cases (Gen. iii., Josh. vii.). Then God's detection: Elisha said.

"Whence comest thou?" The liar was at no loss for a reply: "Thy servant went no whither." Elisha sternly answered, "Went not mine heart with thee, when the man turned again, . . . (comp. Ps. cxxxix.)? Is it a time to receive money," etc.? Comp. as to our times 1 Pet. iv. 3. Naaman from being a leper became newborn as "a little child" by believing obedience; G. from being clean, by unbelieving disobedience, became a leper: if he must have Naaman's lucre, he must have Naaman's leprosy: "the leprosy of Naaman shall cleave unto thee for ever." Still in 2 Kings viii. 4 G. appears as "servant of the man of God," narrating to king Joram the great acts of Elisha and the restoration to life of the Shunammite's son, when lo! she herself appeared. Doubtless affliction brought G. to sincere repentance, and repentance brought removal of the leprosy, which otherwise would have been "for ever." Comp. Hezekiah's divinely foretold death averted by penitent prayer (xx. 1-5). This seems a more likely solution than supposing that this incident occurred before G.'s leprosy and has been transposed.

Geliloth. Josh. xviii. 17. One of the southern bounds of Benjamin, "over against the going up (ascent) of Adummim." Gilgal occupied the same position "before the going up of Adummim" (xv. 7) on the northern bound of Judah, which is the southern bound of Benjamin; therefore Grove would substitute "Gilgal" for "Geliloth." Its derivation is galal "to roll"; like the Scotch "links," meaning both the windings of the stream (G. is near the Jordan) and the coasts; whereas Ciccar is the circle of vegetation or dwellings round the bends of the water. Couder connects G. with the "tells" or mounds of Palestine, which he thinks to be the accumulated refuse of sun-dried bricks, which served as a platform on which others were baked, as at the present day in India and Egypt. They are found in the Jordan valley, and in the plain of Esdraelon. They always occur near water, and in alluvial clay plains, as in the clay lands between Succoth and Zarthan, where Solomon cast his temple brass-work.

Gemalli. Num. xiii. 12.

Gemariah. 1. Shaphan the scribe's son, Micahiah's father. From his chamber in the Lord's house Baruch read Jeremiah's threatening prophecy in the people's hearing (Jer. xxxvi.). Micahiah reported it, and Baruch being summoned read it again before the princes seated in council in the scribe's chamber in the king's house. G., as the other princes, was "afraid" thereof, and said, "We will surely tell the king of all these words" (not a threat, but implying that so momentous a prophecy ought to be told the king). G. had some fear of God and moral courage, for he, with Elnathan and Delaiah, interceded with king Jehoiakim not to burn the roll; but he would not hear them. 2. Son of Hilkiah, the highpriest who found the book of the law in the Lord's house, and showed it to Shaphan (2 Kings xxii. 8); sent by king Zedekiah on an embassy to Nebuchadnezzar; entrusted by Jeremiah with a letter to the captives in Babylon. Inheriting from his father, like the former G., some regard for sacred things (Jer. xxix. 1-3).

Genealogy. Heb. "the book of the GENERATIONS," sepher toledoth [see ADOPTION and GENERATION]. Fuller (Pisgah Sight of Palestine, 1650) says on Acts xvii. 26: "we may see Divinity, the queen, waited on by three of her principal ladies of honour, namely (1) skill in GENEALOGIES, 'of one blood all nations,' (2) CHRONOLOGY, in the exact computation of 'the times appointed,' (3) GEOGRAPHY, measuring out to the nations 'the bounds of their habitation.'" History anciently being based on genealogies, the phrase became a title for a history; so Gen. ii. 4, "these are the generations of the heavens and of the earth"; as the history of a man's family is "the book of his generations," so that of the world's productions is "the generations (not the creation, which had been previously described) of the heavens and the earth." "Generations" is the heading of every chief section of Genesis (probably they were original family memoirs preserved and used by Moses under inspiration in writing Genesis). So v. 1, "the book of the generations of Adam," wherein his descendants are traced down to Noah; vi. 9, "the generations of Noah," the history of Noah and his sons; x. 1, "the generations of the sons of Noah," Shem, Ham, and Japhet, the oldest and most precious existing ethnological record; xi. 10-26 "the generations of Shem," 27 "the generations of Terah," Abram's father; xxv. 12 "the generations of Ishmael," 19 "the generations of Isaac"; xxxvi. 1, "the generations of Esau"; xxxvii. 2, "the generations of Jacob"; xxxv. 22-26, "the sons of Jacob," etc., repeated Exod. i. 1-5; also xvi. 8, a genealogical census of Israel when Jacob came down to Egypt; repeated in Exod. vi. 16, etc., probably transcribed from a document, for the first part concerning Reuben and Simeon is quoted though Levi is the only tribe in question. The promise of Canaan, Israel's separation from the Gentiles, the prophecy of Messiah's descent from Judah, the hereditary priesthood in Aaron's family, and the limitation of ministerial offices to Levi, the promises to David's seed, and the division of Canaan by tribes and families, all combined to make Israel more careful of genealogies than any other nation. Israel's census was taken early in the wilderness 40 years sojourn, the second month of the second year, "by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers" (Num. i. 2, 20, etc., ii., iii.). Again, 38 years later, in the plains of Moab, the names of the families being added (xxvi.). According to their genealogical divisions they encamped, marched, made offerings, and selected the spies; hereby Achan was detected, and Saul chosen as king; hereby Canaan was allotted.

At the same time we must remember many became incorporated in a tribe or family by marriage, service, or friendship, besides those belonging to it by birth. See BECHER, CALEB, and 1 Chron. iii. 21, for instances. The genealogies refer often to political and territorial divisions, and not strictly to natural descent, so that "sons" of a patriarch are not necessarily restricted to those so by birth. So Manasseh and Ephraim were numbered among Jacob's "sons," though only grandsons (Gen. xlviii. 5). See BELA (whose two sons Naaman and Ard are called "sons of Benjamin," Num. xxvi. 40, 41) and BENJAMIN respecting Gen. xlvii, Num. xxvi.; Exod. vi. 24 enumerates Assir's son and grandson as heads, with their father, of the Korrites. In the list (Gen. xlvii.) grandsons (e.g. all Benjamin's ten sons) and great grandsons of Jacob (Hezron and Hamul, grandsons of Judah) are named, born afterwards in Egypt and who came into that country in the loins of their fathers, and who there became founders of mishpachoth, i.e. independent families, and were therefore counted grandsons of Jacob as regards the national organization. By comprising Jacob himself with all the founders of tribes and families, the significant number 70 results; seven (expressing God's covenant relation to Israel, made up of three the Divine number and four the worldwide extension number) multiplied by ten the seal of completeness; implying that these 70 comprised the whole nation of God (Exod. i. 5, Deut. x. 22). Levi alone was free from foreign admixture. Iddo the seer wrote a book "concerning genealogies" (2 Chron. xii. 15). Hezekiah took a census of priests and Levites according to genealogies, and apparently from 1 Chron. iv. 41, ix. 1, a census also of the nation by genealogies; he had a staff of scribes for such purposes (Prov. xxv. 1). Genealogies were used in reckoning Reuben and Gad, "in the days of Jotham king of Judah [perhaps in connection with his wars against Ammon, 2 Chron. xxvii. 5], and of Jeroboam king of Israel" (1 Chron. v. 17). Zerubbabel, on the return from Babylon, made it a first care to settle the people according to genealogy. Nehemiah did the same as an essential to his great work, the restoration of the national polity (1 Chron. iii. 19, 21-24, ix.; comp. Neh. vii. 5, xi., xii. 1-26), which shows that the genealogical system was continued afterwards. Ezra ii. contains an abstract of the post-captivity census.

In N. T. times, when Augustus ordered the registration for taxing, the Jews went severally to the town of their tribe, family, and father; and so Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem, the town of their forefather David (Luke ii.). Further traces of genealogies being preserved still appear in the mention of Zacharias as of "the course of Abia," Elizabeth as "of the daughters of Aaron," Anna, daughter of Phannol, as "of the tribe of Aser." Josephus traces his own descent to the first of the 24 courses of priests, adding "as I have found it recorded in the public tables." He says (c. Apion, i. 7) the priests had to verify the descent of their intended wives from the archives at Jerusalem, and to make new genealogical tables after every war, in order to ascertain what women had been made captives, as such were excluded from marrying priests; the list of highpriests for 2000 years backward was preserved in the archives in his day. The destruction of Jerusalem by Rome must have involved the loss of these registers, except such partial records of genealogy as remained in a few of the priestly families after the last dispersion. Benjamin of Tudela says that the princes still professed to trace their descent up to David. The present impossibility of verifying the genealogies of the Jews' tribes and families is a Divine indication that Christ the antitypical Highpriest and the Heir of David's throne having come supersedes the polity of typical priests and kings, which anciently required the careful preservation of pedigrees. Paul therefore condemns the study of "endless genealogies" (1 Tim. i. 4), though probably he aims also at gnostic genealogies of spirits.

In interpreting a genealogy it is to be remembered that the list may represent the succession to an inheritance or headship of tribe or family, rather than natural descent. In an Assyrian inscription similarly "Jehu," successor of Omri's race, is called "son of Omri." Again pedigrees are abbreviated so as to specify the generations alone which show from what leading houses the person sprang. The register of Levi in Exod. vi. 16-20 gives only two links between Levi and Moses, viz. Kohath and Amram; which has been made an argument for Israel's sojourn in Egypt only half the 430 years specified (Exod. xii. 40). But the Kohathites (Num. iii. 27) in Moses' time were divided into four families, Amramites, Jehozarites, Hebronites, and Ussielites, 8700 men and boys independent of women; the fourth would be Amramites. Now Moses had only two sons; therefore if Amram his father were the Amram Kohath's father, Moses must have had 2147 brothers and brothers' sons, which is impossible; therefore between the two Amrams a number of generations must have dropped out. So in Ezra's genealogy (Ezra vii. 1-5, comp. 1 Chron. vi. 4-15) five descents are omitted between Azariah Moraioth's son and Azariah Johanan's son; and several between Ezra himself and Seraiah, put to death 150 years before Ezra by Nebuchadnezzar. In Exo. i. vi. the sons of three of Kohath's sons are given, but not of Hebron (though in 2 Chron. xxiii. four sons are assigned to him), probably because no family sprang from him as the head. The object of genealogies was not chronology, but to mark ramifications of tribal and family relationship. Thus the genealogy of Ruth iv. 18-22 makes but four intervening links between Nahshon at the exodus (Num. i. 7) and David, viz. Salmon, Boaz, Obed, Jesse; whereas the genealogy of Levi has double that number in the same period, seven between Phinehas and Zadok, and more in Gershon's line (1 Chron. vi.). Therefore some names must have been omitted of David's genealogy. Genealogies are clear measures of time only when complete; and the marks of completeness are, when the mother as well as the father is named, or when historical facts define the relationship, or when a genealogy is confirmed by one or more besides, giving the same number of generations within the same bounds. Early marriage will in the case of some, as princes, make 30 years too long for a generation. In the descending form of genealogy, when direct heirs failed collateral ones were inserted, and the heir would put his name next after his predecessor though not his father (Ruth iv. 18, 1 Chron. iii.). The ascending form appears 1 Chron. vi. 33-43, Ezra vii. 1-5. Females were reckoned when rights or possessions were transmitted through them. Corruptions of the text are frequent in genealogies. Christ's descent through David, from Abraham and Adam, is given in an unbroken line of genealogy.

Genealogy of Jesus Christ.

Needed, to show that redemption was no afterthought, but designed from the first. Abraham and David in Matthew's Gospel are singled out to prove the fulfilment in Christ of the promises made to Abraham 2000 years previously, and to David 1000. The O. T. begins with "Genesis" (generation); so also the N. T. begins with the genesis ("generation," Matt. i. 1) of Jesus Christ. Matthew's Gospel contains, not Joseph's direct ancestors, but the succession of heirs to David's and Solomon's throne. The tracing of Christ's descent through Judah's royal line harmonizes with the kingly aspect of Jesus Christ in Matthew's Gospel. The steps of Joseph's direct parentage did not coincide with those of the succession to the throne. Solomon's line failed, and Nathan's and Neri's succeeded as legal heirs. Hence the need of two genealogies, one (Matthew) of the succession, the other (Luke) of the parentage. Jeremiah (xxii. 30) declares Jeconiah, Coniah, or Jehoiachin was to be childless. He cannot therefore have been lineal progenitor of Jesus Christ. It is at this point in the genealogy, i.e. after Jehoiachin, the same names occur in both lists, Salathiel and Zerubbabel taken (in Matthew) from the line of Nathan (Luke) to supply the failure of Jehoiachin's issue. The promise was, Messiah was to be "of the fruit of the loins of David" (Acts ii. 30), but to Solomon only that "his throne should be established evermore" (1 Chron. xvi. 14). So a double genealogy of Jair is given, one of the inheritance, the other of birth (1 Chron. ii. 4, 5, 22, 22; Num. xxxii. 41). Matthew appropriately, as writing for Jews, gives Christ's legal descent; Luke, for Gentiles, the natural descent. Matthew downwards, from Abraham the father of the Jews (naturally, but of the Gentiles also spiritually: Gen. xvii. 5, Rom. iv. 16, 17); Luke upwards, to Adam, "who was the son of God" and the father of Gentiles and Jews alike.

The words "as was supposed" (Luke iii. 23) imply that Christ's sonship to Joseph was only a reputed not a real one. Yet He was God's extraordinary gift to Joseph through his proper wife Mary, and the fruit of his marriage to her, not as natural offspring of his body but as supernatural fruit. Hence attention is drawn to Joseph's being "son of David" (Matt. i. 20), "of the house and lineage of David" (Luke ii. 4, comp. i. 32).

Matthew omits three links of the pedigree. "Joram begat Ozias," i.e. Uzziah. But Joram really begat Ahaziah, Ahaziah Jehoash, Jehoash Uzziah. If the two genealogies contained anything false or mutually contradictory, Christ's enemies would have convicted them from the public documents. Clearly men in that day saw nothing irreconcilable in them. From Abraham to David both agree, thenceforward the names differ. Luke has 42 from David, Matthew only 27. The less number in Matthew is intelligible, if he be only tracing the heirs to the throne; for "the heir of my heir is my heir." So intermediate heirs are omitted without risk of misconception, for spiritual reasons; e.g., Simeon is omitted in Moses' blessing (Deut. xxxiii.) on account of his cruelty, Dan in Rev. vii. for his idolatry. The full number is given in Luke, as naming the natural line.

Mary must have been of the same tribe and family as Joseph, according to the law (Num. xxxvi. 8). Isa. xi. 1 implies that Messiah was the seed of David by natural as well as legal descent. Probably Matthew of Matthew is the Matthat of Luke, and Jacob and Heli were brothers; and Heli's son Joseph, and Jacob's daughter Mary, first cousins. Joseph, as male heir of his uncle Jacob, who had only one child, Mary, would marry her according to the law (Num. xxxvi. 8). Thus the genealogy of the inheritance (Matthew's) and that of natural descent (Luke's) would be primarily Joseph's, then Mary's also. The number 14 has some mystic significance (comp. Num. xxix. 13, 1 Kings viii. 65). It is the double of seven, the number for completeness; the periods of 14 in Matthew are the sacred three. The period from Abraham to David is that of patriarchs; from David to the Babylonian captivity that of kings; from the captivity to Christ private individuals. The first and second tessaradecade have an illustrious beginning; the third not so, that its ending in Messiah might stand forth pre-eminent above all that went before. The first is that of promise, beginning with Abraham and ending with David, the receivers of the promise; the second adumbrates Christ's eternal kingdom through the temporary kingdom of David's line; the third period is that of expectation.

[On CAINAN, in Luke's Gospel, see.] The name Jehoikam seemingly has dropped out, Josiah's son and Jecooniah's father; otherwise David would have to be counted twice to make up the second 14. Five females are in Matthew's Gospel: incestuous Tamar, Rahab the Moabitess and a harlot, Ruth, Uriah's wife Bathsheba the object of David's adulterous love, and above all Mary; all extraordinary monuments of God's grace, that chooses out of the vilest to make vessels unto honour, for the bringing forth of the promised Seed, who was to save sinners of every type and race.

Generation. Heb. dor, "revolution," period of time; 100 years in the patriarchal age (Gen. xv. 13, 16; Exod. xii. 40), afterwards 30 or 40 years (Job xlii. 16, Luke i. 50). On the plural GENERATIONS, Heb. toloth, see GENEALOGY. Mankind is ethnologically ranged under three heads in Gen. x. 3, 6, 22, "the sons of Japheth, Ham, Shem." Modern science by independent research arrives at a similar threefold division into Semitic, Aryan, and Turanian (Allophylian). Genesis, in accordance with modern ethnology, classifies together the Cymry or Celts (Gomer), the Medes (Madai), and the Ionians or Greeks (Javan); thus anticipating the Indo-European theory, which makes the European races (represented by the Celts and the Ionians) akin to the Aryans (represented by the Asiatic Madai or Medes). Also Scripture, in agreement with ethnology, groups together as "children of Shem" (i.e. Semitics) Asshur (Assyrians), Aram (Syrians), Eber (Hebrews), and Jektan (the Jektanian Arabs). Also it rightly classifies under the "sons of Ham" Cush (Ethiopians), Mizraim (Egyptians), Sheba and Dedan (certain southern Arabs), and Nimrod (i.e. the oldest Babylonians). [See BABEL.] Sir H. Rawlinson truly terms "the generations (genealogy) of the sons of Noah" "the most authentic record we possess for the affiliation of nations" (Jour. Asiat. Soc., xv. 230).

Generation means also the men of an age: as Isa. liii. 8, "who shall declare His generation?" i.e. their wickedness, in parallelism to their oppressive "judgment." In Jer. vii. 29, "generation of His wrath," i.e. with whom He is wroth. Also generation is used with reference to the characteristic disposition of the age, "adulterous," "unbelieving," "outward" (Matt. xi. 16, xii. 39, xvii. 17; Acts ii. 40). In Luke xvi. 8, "the children of this world are in respect to their own (so the Gr.) generation (i.e. in relation to men of their own kind, men of this world) wiser than the children of light," are in respect to their generation (men of their kind, godly, men of the world to come). In Matt. iii. 7 generation means "brood of vipers."

In Matt. xxiv. 34 "this generation shall not pass (viz. the Jewish race, of which the generation in Christ's days was a sample in character; comp. Christ's address to the generation, xxiii. 35, 36, in proof that generation means at times the whole Jewish race) till all these things be fulfilled," a prophecy that the Jews shall be a distinct people still when He shall come again.

Genesis. The Heb. name is Bereeshith, from its opening word "in the beginning." LXX. Genesis means generation, i.e. creation and birth of the universe, man, and history. It is a religious history, therefore it omits accounts in detail of other nations, and concentrates attention on the origin of that one from whom the promised Redeemer of man from the deadly consequences of the fall (which is detailed at the beginning) sprang. Whilst a bare catalogue is given of whole genealogies of nations, minute details are given of the godly patriarchs in the line of the promised Saviour, for these details are of more everlasting moment to us than the rise and fall of the mightiest empires. Again, the details in the patriarchs' history selected for narration are not the merely personal facts, but those illustrating religious principles and furthering God's gracious purpose of redemption. Thus Adam's history before and in the fall is minutely given, as affecting the whole race whom he represented; but after the fall only a few brief notices, but these of important bearing on mankind's spiritual prospects (Gen. iii. 20-24, iv. 1, v. 1-5). So the early development of the enmity between the serpent's seed and the seed of the woman, and the separation of the church from the world (iv. 1-16, 25, 26). The Divine prophetic germs in G. are the foundation of all the subsequent prophecies throughout the Bible, and receive their consummation in the restored tree of life, waters of life, communion with God face to face in the world delivered from the curse, at the close of Revelation.

Astruc, a Belgian physician (A.D. 1753), inferred from the varying use of the names of God, Elohim and Jehovah, the existence of 12 documents or memoirs used by Moses in compiling G. Probably Moses under inspiration used such ancient memoirs, e.g. genealogies; but he certainly has composed no loosely joined chronicle, but a history with unity of plan throughout, and using the names of God not arbitrarily but with the most accurate propriety.

The oldest part of the Hindoo Vedas is hardly as old as the time of Moses, and his work embodies genealogical and other memoirs, probably handed down from the earliest period of man's history. G. is the first of the five parts of the pentateuch, the grand subject of which is the setting up of the theocratic kingdom, Israel, amidst the nations as the repository of the Divine promise until its fulfilment in Messiah, who should be a "light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of His people Israel." G. begins with creation, then proceeds to show that the Elohim of creation is the Jehovah in covenant with His people in redemption. So in Col. i. 16, 17, Christ the Head of creation, by whom and to whom as the Divine Word carrying in Himself the archetype of all existences, and for whom the universe of things have their being, is also the Head and Originator of the new creation. Appropriately therefore ELOHIM (the name for Divine might, from alah "mighty") occurs throughout the first general account of creation (i. 1-ii. 3); but Jehovah, the faithful covenant-keeping I AM, in the special account of creation affecting His covenant with man. The organic unity of G. appears from its structure: (I) introduction (i. 1-ii. 3), wherein the moral superiority of the Bible cosmogony stands pre-eminent. Heathen cosmogonies abound in crude poetical and philosophical speculations, either representing God and matter as co-eternal, or pantheistically confounding God and matter, making Him its pervading spirit. G. alone recognises God's personality and God's unity.

Another marked distinction between the oldest heathen compositions and G. is they are palpably mythical in substance and poetical in form, history not arising till a later stage of national development. But G. is thoroughly historical in matter and prose in its form; Hebrew developed poetry not appearing until a later age, when the mythical element could have no place; a powerful confirmation of the historical trustworthiness of Scripture. Its sublime simplicity stamps G. as history, not poetical myth or subtle speculation.

G. moreover alone describes creation out of nothing, as distinguished from creation out of preexisting materials. G. alone recognises the law of progress in creation: first light, then order, then life, vegetable, grass, herb, fruit tree; then animal life. Again (1) the waters, (2) the dry land, (3) the heavenly bodies. Also progressive advance in life: (1) aquatic animals and fishes; (2) fowl; (3) terrestrial animals; (4) man, the apex of creation. The advance is orderly, from the lower to the higher organizations. G. is distinguished from the world's cosmogonies in connecting the Creator with His work in a relation of love; God contemplating "everything that He had made, and behold it was very good" (i. 31).

Traditions of widely separated nations over the earth retain fragments of the account of the fall, the tree, the serpent, the first pair, the flood. The Bible version of the story is simplest, purest, and the one that presents the only common ground from which all the others are likely to have emanated; it represents the facts in a universal worldwide aspect, and the groans of suffering creation and the sighing of every heart confirm its literal truth. The universality of the deluge over the area then occupied by man is attested by the traditions of widely scattered nations, preserved from the times when as yet the forefathers of mankind were undispersed. Philology and ethnology remarkably confirm the oldest extant genealogy of races in Gen. x. Egyptology similarly confirms the abundant notices of Egypt in G. and Exodus.

After the introduction, G. consists of successive genealogical histories (to-ledoth [see GENEALOGY]. The larger sections have subdivisions carefully marked (the Jewish perashim or sections of the pentateuch, as our chapters, often obscure the true divisions). In each successive genealogical portion the history is carried down to the close of the period, and generally at the commencement of the succeeding one the previous account is, so far as necessary, summarily repeated with a note of time. Thus ii. 4 refers back summarily to the previous record of creation: so v. 1; vi. 9; xi. 10, 27; xiv. 12, 19; xxxvi. 1; xxxvii. 1, 2, 3, where Jacob's position is stated and we are taken back to the time, 12 years before Isaac's death previously recorded, when Joseph was 17 years old, that so a new starting point for the history might be presented.

The names of God occurring are EL, the shortened form of ELOHIM; ELION, "Most High" (in G. only in xiv. 18 EL ELION, but in Psalms found alone, and with ELOHIM and JEHOVAH); and SHADDAI, "Almighty," in the pentateuch generally with EL. The plural is that of excellence and majesty; Elohim combining in Himself the several attributes assigned to distinct gods by the heathen. Hence Elohim is applied to false gods as well as to the true God; and is the word used where heathen people, as the Egyptians, or foreigners, as Hagar, Eliezer of Damascus, the Egyptians, etc., are introduced. But Jehovah is a proper name restricted to the one God in covenant with His people, and therefore is the predominant name in those sections which concern them.

From Exod. vi. 2, 3, "I am JEHOVAH; I appeared unto Abraham, . . . by the name of God Almighty (El Shaddai), but by My name Jehovah was I not known to them," rationalists infer that the passages in G. (e.g. chap. ii.) containing "JEHOVAH" were a later insertion. But the JAN occurs in the composition of "Jochelbed," "Joshua," "Moriah." Moreover JEHOVAH is from havah, the form of "to be" existing only in the oldest Heb. previous to its separation from Syriac and Chaldee; for after the separation these two dialects have it, but the Heb. has hayah not havah. The sense of Exod. vi. 2, 3 must be, "I was manifested to Abraham . . . as the almighty One, able to do all I promised; but in My character of Jehovah, the unchanging I AM (Exod. iii. 14), the fulfiller of My covenanted promises, I was not in act made known, as I am now about to make Myself known to My people." In Gen. ii. 4 to the end of iii. JEHOVAH ELOHIM are combined, marking that the mighty Creator is the same JEHOVAH who revealed Himself to Adam as subsequently to Moses. The tone of deliberation, "Let us make man" (i. 26, in the so-called Elohistic portion) accords with that of iii. 22, "behold the man is become as one of us" (in the so-called Jehovistic portion); also xi. 6. Eve's exclamation (iv. 1), "I have gotten a man by the help of" (Gesenius) JEHOVAH," marks her hope of her first-born proving one link towards the birth of the Messiah covenanted by God to His people. Again, in v. 29, a so-called Elohistic portion, JEHOVAH occurs in connection with Noah, marking him as a second depository of the covenanted promise. Again, in xiv. Melchizedek, the king-priest of the Canaanite Salem, worships EL ELION, "God most high," and Abram identifies Him with JEHOVAH the Hebrews' God of the covenant, "I have lift up my hand to JEHOVAH, EL ELION, possessor of heaven and earth." Bp. H. Browne truly says, "it is doubtful whether an author in the time of Samuel could have written the history of the forefathers of his race with all the truthfulness, simplicity, and accuracy of detail to be found in the book called the first book of Moses."

The objections drawn from man's antiquity are met by the consideration that G. gives no sure data for fixing the time of his first appearance. The genealogies probably present us only with the names of representative men; links probably have been omitted; and the text in respect to numbers and genealogies was open to transcribers' errors in the transmission. Moreover the conclusions of science are hardly yet fixed. We can afford to wait in faith; God in His own time will show the perfect harmony between true science and revelation.

Gennesaret, Sea of. [See CERNEROTH and GALILEE, SEA OF.] At the N. W.

angle was the fertile plain "Gennesaret," Crescent in shape, extending from Khan Minyeh on the N. to the steep hill behind Mejdol on the S., called el Ghuweir, "the little ghor," watered by the spring Capharnaum (B. J., iii. 10, § 8). It is also called "the Sea of Tiberias." All its names are drawn from places on the W. side. "The land of Gennesaret" was close to CAPERNAUM [see] on the opposite side to the N. E. of the lake, where the feeding of the 5000 took place (John vi. 1, 17, 24, 25). In the land of Gennesaret was spoken the parable of the sower. There was the cornfield descending to the water's edge, the trodden path through its midst, without fence to prevent the seed from falling on either side or on it, itself hardened with treading; there was the rich soil of the plain, the rocky hillside protruding here and there, the stony soil, and the thorn bushes springing up in the midst of the grain.

Gentiles. Heb. Goy, "the nations" (or "heathen," derived from the Gr. ethnē), as opposed to Israel (Neh. v. 8). In Gen. x. 5, "isles of the Gentiles," the term is used geographically in no invidious sense. In xiv. 1, Tidal, "king of nations" was probably chief of several nomad wandering tribes of western Asia. In Josh. xii. 23 we read, "the king of the nations (the gentile foreigners) of Gilgal," the modern Moslem village Jiljule, six Roman miles N. of Antipatris. Goyim is peculiarly used of GALILEE [see], bordering on and, even in Israelite times, much peopled with the G. (Jud. iv. 2, Isa. ix. 1.)

"Greeks" in N. T. is used for G. (Acts xiv. 1, xvii. 4; Rom. i. 16, x. 12, ii. 9, 10; 1 Cor. x. 32 marg.) With all the superiority of the gentile great world kingdoms, in military prowess, commerce, luxury, and the fine arts, Israel stood on an immense moral elevation above them, in the one point, nearness to God, and possession of His revealed will and word (Exod. xix. 5, 6; Ps. cxlvii. 19, 20, cxlviii. 14; Rom. iii. 1, 2). But this superiority was in order that Israel, as priests unto God, might be mediator of blessings unto all nations (Isa. lxi. 6). The covenant from the first with Abraham contemplated that "in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed" (Gen. xxii. 18). The Jews in national pride failed to see this, and despised the G. Rejecting Messiah, they were "broken off" from the olive, that the G. might be "grafted in" (Rom. xi. 11-35). "The times of the G." began with Judah's depression and captivity under Nebuchadnezzar, to whom God delegated the world empire (Jer. xxvii. 6, 7), whence Jeremiah's counsel to the Jews to submit to him was true patriotism, not cowardice. Jerusalem has more or less been ever since "trodden down of the G.," and shall be so "until the times of the G. be fulfilled" (Luke xxi. 24). Then shall the times of Israel begin with a glory eclipsing her past glory. "All Israel shall be saved." "The receiving of them shall be life from the dead" to the whole world (Mic. v. 7; Isa. ii. 2-4; Rev. xi. 2-15). The theocracy shall be restored with unparalleled splendour at the coming of Him "whose right it is" (Ezek. xxi. 27). The times of the gentile monarchies answer to Israel's seven times punishment (Lev. xxvi. 18, 21, 24).

Genubath. Son of Hladad, an Edomite of the king's seed, by an Egyptian princess, sister of Tahpenes, queen of the Pharaoh who ruled Egypt in David's reign (1 Kings xi. 14-20). Born and weaned by the queen in the palace, and reckoned in the household among Pharaoh's sons.

Gera. Son, i.e. descendant, of Benjamin; enumerated in the list when Jacob went into Egypt (Gen. xlvii. 21); son of Bela (1 Chron. viii. 3, where probably but one G. is genuine); in the loins of his grandfather Benjamin then, but not actually born until after the going to Egypt and before Jacob's death. Num. xxvi. omits G. as not being head of a family but being one of the Belaites; his mention in Genesis implies that ultimately he became head of a family. G., Ehud's ancestor, and G., Shimei's ancestor, is the same person (Jud. iii. 15, 2 Sam. xvi. 5).

Gerar. Chief city of the Philistines in Abraham's and Isaac's time; now Khribet el Gerar. The fertile region between the two deserts of Kadesh and Shur; resorted to therefore by Abraham and Isaac in time of famine. On the southern border of Canaan, near Gaza and Beersheba (Gen. x. 19, xx. 1, xxvi. 1, 26). Near the deep wady Jurf el Gerar, "the rapid of G." (2 Chron. xiv. 13, 14.) The people were pastoral in the times of Abraham, but warlike, with a regular "chief captain of the army," Phicol ("the mouth of all," implying a commanding voice as commander-in-chief). Abimelech ("father of kings," implying an hereditary not an elective monarchy) was the common royal title (Ps. xxxiv. title, comp. marg.). Conder (Pal. Exp., Aug. 1875) identifies it rather with Tel-Jema, an enormous mound covered with broken pottery, immediately S. of Khirbet el Gerar. The name, lost to this the proper site, lingers in the neighbouring Khirbet el Gerar.

Gerasa. "Geraseses" is read in Mark v. 1 by Vat. and Sin. MSS.; also in Luke viii. 26 by Vat. A city on the eastern border of Peræa amid the Gilead mountains, 20 miles E. of Jordan, 25 N. of Rabbath Ammon, now Philadelphia. If G. be read for Gadara, "the region of G." must include Gadara and the coasts of the sea of Tiberias which lay far W. of G. The ruins are the finest on the E. of Jordan. However Dr. Thomson identifies G. with the Arab Gersa, close to the shore, with a mountain rising at the back, down which the swine might rush and be unable to stop themselves from rushing into the water. In the mountain are ancient tombs which may have been the demoniac's dwelling.

Gerizim. [See ERL.] The mount of the G., i.e. the dwellers in a storm (desert) land; subdued by David. 1 Sam. xxvii. 8, "Gezrites" or "Gerzites." Smith's Bible Dict. identifies G. with the mount on which Abraham offered Isaac, MORIAH [see]; it is objected to the temple mount being the site of Isaac's offering that "Abraham lifted up his eyes, and saw the place afar off," whereas the temple mount is not conspicuous from afar; also the Samaritans identify the site of the sacrifice with the natural altar on G. But Gen. xxii. 4 means simply that Abraham saw the spot at such a distance as the place admitted. Abraham had uttered an unconscious prophecy, ver. 8, "God will provide (or 'see') a lamb." Now in ver. 14 he sees that "God" (the ELOHIM whose resources he knew to be infinite) proves Himself to be JEHOVAH the Provider for the people in covenant with Him, "Jehovah-jireh." The meaning of "Moriah" = what Jehovah has made one see, alluding to "the mount of the vision of Jehovah" (ver. 14), favours the view that the name "Moriah" in ver. 2 is used by anticipation, and originated in Abraham's words, ver. 14. The identity of name favours the temple mount being the site (2 Chron. iii. 1). The distance, two days journey from Beersheba, which would bring him in sight of the temple mount at Jerusalem on the third day whereas G. could not be reached on the third day from Beersheba, favours the same view.

G. commands one of the finest views in Palestine, being 2500 ft. above the Mediterranean on the W. Hermon's snowclad heights lie on the N., and the transjordanic mountains, cleft by the Jabbok, on the E. Manasseh, brother of Jaddua the high-priest, married the daughter of Sanballat the Cuthæan (2 Kings xvii. 24), who in order to reconcile his son-in-law to this forbidden affinity obtained leave from Alexander the Great to build a temple on G. (Josephus, Ant. xi. 8, § 2-4.) Henceforward the Samaritans and Jews assumed mutual antagonism; but whereas the Jerusalem temple and worship were overthrow soon after our Lord's crucifixion, the Samaritan on G. have continued from age to age, and the paschal lamb has been yearly offered by this interesting community; they possess a copy of the law, attributed to Manasseh, and known to the Christian fathers of the second and third centuries. To G. our Lord alludes: "Woman, believe Me, the hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain nor yet at Jerusalem (exclusively) worship the Father" (John iv. 21). Lieut. Anderson within the ruin called "the castle" excavated the foundations and piers of an octagonal church, probably that built by Justinian. The church and castle were built on a rough platform of stones without mortar, including the so called "twelve stones." On this platform perhaps the Samaritan temple stood.

Gershon; Gershon. 1 Chron. vi. 1, 16. Firstborn of Moses and Zipporah—"a sojourner in a foreign land" (ger, "sojourner," is common to Heb. and Egyptian; shom is not from Heb. sham "there," as marg., but shom, Coptic, "a strange land"); alluding to Moses' sojourn in Midian, "for, he said, I have been a stranger in a strange land" (Exod. ii. 22, xviii. 3). [See CIRCUMCISION and Exod. iv. 25.] G. was founder of a family, of which was "Jonathan, son (descendant) of G.," the "young man the Levite," who became Micah's priest to the image (Jud. xvii. 7, xviii. 18-30), and subsequently the Danites' priest. His descendants held this priesthood till the taking of the ark by the Philistines, which is called "the day of the captivity of the land." G. in the Heb. text (ketib) is called "son of Moses." The name is altered into Manasseh with a hanging n (raised above the line to show it might either be inserted or omitted) in the Masoretic keri, or marg. Heb. "He did the deeds of idolatrous Manasseh," says the Talmud (Baba bathra, 109 b.), "therefore Scripture assigns him to the family of Manasseh." Rabbabar bar Channa says "it would have been ignominious to Moses to have had an ungodly son; he was the son of Manasseh in impiety, of Moses in descent." But other of Moses' descendants through G. reflected the piety of "the man of God." Shebuel G.'s descendant was "ruler of the treasures" dedicated in the sanctuary under David (1 Chron. xxiii. 15-17, xxvi. 24-28). One accompanied Ezra from Babylon (viii. 2).

Gershon. Eldest of Levi's three sons, born apparently before Jacob's going down to Egypt (Gen. xlv. 11). Kohath and his descendants Moses and Aaron's priestly line eclipsed G.'s line. G.'s sons were Libni and Shimei (1 Chron. vi. 17, 20, 21, 39-43). Some of his descendants took part in the service of the sanctuary (xxiii. 7-11). Asaph, the famous sacred singer and seer, was one of them. Comp. also under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 12). At the Sinai census the males of the sons of G. were 7500 (Num. iii. 21, 22). The serving men were 2630 (iv. 38-41). They had charge of the tabernacle, tent, covering, hangings, curtain of the door, and cords (iii. 25, 26; iv. 25, 26). They had two covered wagons and four oxen for the service (Num. vii. 3, 7, 8). The Merarites had twice as many wagons and oxen. The reason for this unequal division is not expressed; but on turning to chap. iv. the reason undesignedly appears (an unstudied propriety attesting the truth of the narrative); the Gershonites had the lighter parts to bear, the "curtains," "tabernacle," i.e. the misakan or great woven cloth consisting of ten breadths, the "tent" of goats' hair cloth, and the "covering" of rams' skins, and BADGEES' [see] (tachash) skins, the hangings and their cords. But the Merarites had the heavier and more solid framework to bear, the boards, bars, pillars, sockets, pins, their cords and instruments. Their station was "behind the tabernacle westward" (iii. 22); on march they were in the rear of the first three tribes. Thirteen of the Levitical cities were allotted to them; all in the northern tribes, two of them cities of refuge (Josh. xxi. 27-33; 1 Chron. vi. 62, 71-76).

Gerzites, Gizrites, or Gerizzites. A Bedouin tribe once dwelling in central Palestine, from whom mount Gerizim took its name, as another mount was named from the Amalekites when dwelling anciently in Ephraim (Jud. xii. 15). Afterwards driven to the southern border of Palestine, where with the Geshurites and Amalekites they were found by David in Saul's days (1 Sam. xxvii. 8), rich in "sheep, oxen, asses, camels, and apparel." Read "Gerzites."

Gesham. 1 Chron. ii. 47.

Geshem. An Arab who, with Sanballat of Horonaim, and Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite, opposed Nehemiah in repairing Jerusalem. (Neh. ii. 19, vi. 1, etc.) Frustrated in this as well as in the plot against Nehemiah's life. It was for the interest of the wandering marauders of the frontier of Palestine to prevent its restoration as a kingdom.

Geshur=bridge. A region N.E. of Bashan, adjoining Argob and Aram, conquered by Jair of Manasseh, but left in the hands of the original inhabitants (Josh. xiii. 13; Dent. iii. 14; 2 Sam. xv. 8). "Geshur at Aram" (Heb.), i.e. bordering on Syria of Damascus (1 Chron. ii. 23). The Geshuri bordering on the Philistines (Josh. xiii. 2), and invaded by David (1 Sam. xxvii. 8), were distinct from those N.E. of Gilead. Yet there may have been some connection, a portion of the Geshurites possibly passing southwards. At least David in his wandering life formed an alliance with Talmai king of G. by marrying Manahab his daughter, by whom he had his handsome but worthless son Absalom and his daughter Tamar. David's attack on the southern Geshurites, or else his stay near Moab (xxii.), may have first brought him into connection with Talmai king of the northeastern G. (2 Sam. iii. 3, xiii. 37.) The wild nature of Absalom accords with the wild home and stock whence he sprang; thither he fled after murdering Amnon. G. was probably part of the rugged ARGON [see], now Lejah, where amidst those basaltic fastnesses the Geshurites would be secure from the Israelites in the plains.

Gether. Third of Aram's sons (Gen. x. 23).

Gethsemane = oil-press. Beyond the brook Kedron at the foot of the mount of Olives; where probably oil was made from the olives of the adjoining hill (Luke xxii. 39, John xviii. 1). Called a "place" or farm (chorion). Matt. xxvi. 36, to which probably the "garden" was attached. E. of Jerusalem, from the walls of which it was half a mile distant. It was the favourite resort of our Lord with His disciples

(John xviii. 2), the shade of its trees affording shelter from the heat and the privacy so congenial to Him. Bethany lay on the E. of Jerusalem, and towards it our Lord led His disciples before the ascension. In Luke xxiv. 50 the sense is, He led them to the side of the hill where the road strikes downward to Bethany; for Acts i. 12 shows He ascended from the mount of Olives. "Bethany" probably includes not only the village but the district and side of the mount adjoining it; even still the adjoining mount on side is called by the same name as the village, el-Azariyeh. This reconciles Luke xxiv. 50 with Acts i. 12. Gardens and pleasure grounds abounded then in the suburbs (Josephus, B.J. vi. 1 §1, v. 3, §32), where now scarcely one is to be seen. In G. "without the city" Christ "trod the winepress alone" (Isa. lxiii. 3, Rev. xiv. 20). In these passages, however, He is the inflicter, not the sufferer, of vengeance; but in righteous retribution the scene of bloodshedding of Christ and His people shall be also the scene of God's avenging His and their blood on the antichristian foe (xix. 14). The time of the agony was between 11 and 12 o'clock Thursday night (Friday morning in the Jews' reckoning), two days before the full moon, about the vernal equinox. The sites assigned by the Latins and Armenians and Greeks respectively are too near the thoroughfare to the city to be probable. Some hundreds of yards farther up the vale and N.E. of St. Mary's church may be the true site. The fact that Titus cut down all the trees round about Jerusalem (Josephus, B.J., vi. 1, §1) is against the contemporary ancientness of the eight venerable olive trees now pointed out. The tenth legion, moreover, was posted about the mount of Olives (v. 2, §3, vi. 2, §8); and in the siege a wall was carried along the valley of Kedron to the Siloam fountain (v. 10, §2). The olives of Christ's time may have reproduced themselves.

Geuel. Nam. xiii. 15.

Gezer = cut off, i.e. isolated. An old Canaanite city, whose king, Hiram or Elam, helping Lachish, was slain with his people by Joshua (x. 33, xii. 12). A landmark of Ephraim, between lower Bethoron and the Mediterranean (xvi. 3), on the S.W. border (1 Chron. vii. 28). Now Tell el Djézir near Abou Shushéh (Ganneau). Allotted to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. xxi. 21; 1 Chron. vi. 67). At a short distance from Tell el Djézir, on the E. side, engraved on a horizontal rock, is a bilingual Greek and Hebrew inscription marking the limit of G. (Num. xxv. 5) as a Levitical city with its portion without the city. The inscription is at least as old as one century B.C.; also a second similar inscription exists on the N.W. Thus the sacred boundary was a square, having its four angles at the four cardinal points (Ganneau). The original inhabitants remained and paid tribute to Israel (Jud. i. 29; 1 Kings ix. 16, 17). It must have been independent when Pharaoh slew the Canaanite inhabitants, burnt the city, and gave it a present to his daughter, Solomon's wife. Solomon rebuilt it. Gob is identified with it (1 Chron. xx. 4; comp. 2 Sam. xxi. 18). It lay in the maritime plain, on the coast road to Egypt, an important post to fortify as it lay between Egypt and Jerusalem. It is the last point to which David pursued the Philistines (2 Sam. v. 25, 1 Chron. xiv. 16). Being 50 miles distant from "the S. of Judah . . . and the Kenites," it cannot be meant in 1 Sam. xvii. 8. [See GERZITES.] The inscription in the rock discovered by Ganneau, "the boundary of Gezer," verifies the conjecture that Abou Shushéh on the plain between Jaffa and Jerusalem is the site of G. The discovery of the limit outside the city probably defines "a sabbath day's journey."

Giah = valley. 2 Sam. ii. 21. Facing Ammah, "by the way of the wilderness of Gibeon."

Giants. Two Heb. terms. I. Nephilim; Heb. "those who fall on" men; men of violence, robbers, tyrants; comp. Gen. vi. 13, "the earth is filled with violence through them." Applied to antediluvians (Gen. vi. 4). Distinct from the gibborim, "mighty men of old, men of renown," the offspring of the intermarriage of the "sons of God" (the Sethites, iv. 26 marg. "then men began to call themselves by the name of the Lord"; Dent. xiv. 1, 2; Ps. lxxiii. 15; Prov. xiv. 26; Hos. i. 10; Rom. viii. 14) and the "daughters of men." The Sethites, the church separated from the surrounding world lying in the wicked one, had been the salt of the earth; but when even they intermarried with the corrupted races around the salt lost its savour, there was no seasoning of the universal corruption; (comp. Exod. xxxiv. 16, Ezra x. 3-19, Neh. xiii. 23-28, Deut. vii. 3, 1 Kings xi. 1-4;) a flood alone could sweep away the festering mass, out of which one godly seed alone, Noah, was saved. Hence our Lord dwells on the "marrying" in the list of the things lawful, but then unlawfully absorbing men wholly, as characteristic of the age just before the flood, as it shall be of the age when the Son of man shall appear (Luke xvii. 27). The Hindoo tradition of two races, Suras and Asuras, and the Greek legend that the demigods were sons of the gods and that the Titan giants sprang from the union of heaven and earth, flow from the history of Gen. vi. corrupted. Moreover nephilim is applied to the giant ANAKIM [see] in the report of the spies (Num. xiii. 33); comp. on the Anakim (= longnecked) about Hebron, Debir, Anab, and the mountains of Judah and Israel, Deut. ii. 10, 21, x. 2.

II. Rephaim: a people defeated by Chedorlaomer at Ashteroth Karnaim (Gen. xiv. 5), occupying the N.E. of the Jordan valley (Peraea) before the Canaanites came. Og, the giant king of Bashan, was the last of them (Deut. iii. 11). They once extended to the S.W., for the valley of "Rephaim" was near the valley of Hinnom and Bethlehem, S. of Jerusalem, "the valley of the giants" (Josh. xv. 8, xviii. 16; 2 Sam. v. 18, 22, xxiii. 13). Rephaim was used for "the dead," or their "ghosts" (Job xvi. 5, transl. "the souls of the dead tremble; (the places) under the waters, and their inhabitants (tremble)"; Ps. lxxxviii. 11; Prov. ii. 18, xxi. 16; Isa. xiv. 9, xxvi. 14, 19) perhaps because sheol or hades was thought the abode of the buried giants. Raphah "the weak," or "resolved into their first elements," expresses the state of the deceased. Whether it has any connection with the tribe Rephaim is doubtful. Possibly "tall" was the primary sense (Gesenius); then the tall national Rephaim; then giants in guilt, as in might; these being doomed to gehenna, the term became the general one for "ghosts." Or else from ghosts being magnified by fear to more than human size.

EMIM = terrors; so called from their terrible stature by the Moabites, who succeeded them in the region E. of Jordan (Deut. ii. 10). Or rather the word = the Egyptian term Amu, i.e. nomad Shemites. Smitten by Chedorlaomer at Shaveh Kiriathaim (Gen. xiv. 5). [See ANAKIM also.] The ZUZIM of Ham were a northern tribe of Rephaim between the Arnon and Jabbok, smitten by Chedor-laomer. The Ammonites who supplanted them called them Zamzumim (Deut. ii. 20, Gen. xiv. 5). Connected with the Horim. L. Clerc explains the name "wanderers" from zuz "to wander." Ham may be the original of Rabbath Ammon. The ruined cities of Bashan are thought by many to evidence their possession formerly by giant races. The success of David and his heroes against Goliath and the giants of Philistia (a remnant of the old giant races) illustrates the Divine principle that physical might and size are nothing worth, any are but beast-strength, when severed from God and arrayed against the people of God. Samson was but of average height (Jud. xvi. 17), yet was irresistible by the Philistines so long as he was faithful to God. David was chosen above his brothers in spite of their "height of stature" (1 Sam. xvi. 7, xvii. 36, 37, 45-47; 2 Sam. xxi. 15-22).

Gibbar, children of. "Gibeon" in Neh. vii. 25.

Gibbethon=lofty place. A town allotted to Dan (Josh. xix. 44), afterwards to the Kohathite Levites (xxi. 23). As bordering on the Philistines, it was soon seized by them, probably when Jeroboam drove all the Levites from northern Israel to Judah. Nadab with all Israel, and afterwards Omri, besieged it (1 Kings xv. 27, xvi. 17). Baasha smote Nadab there.

Gibea. 1 Chron. ii. 49.

Gibeah. From a root gabah, round, gibbous; a hill, less than a "mountain," har. Applied to the bare rounded hills of central Palestine. 1. A city in the mountain region of Judah, S.E. of Hebron, named with Maon and southern Carmel (Josh. xv. 55, 57; 1 Chron. ii. 49).

2. GIBEATH, a town of Benjamin, among the last next Jerusalem (Josh. xviii. 28), possibly the "G. of Saul," only that the latter was close to Gibeon and Ramah, five miles N. of Jerusalem, and if Saul's G. were meant we should expect it mentioned with those two towns in ver. 25. "G. of Saul" occurs 1 Sam. x. 26, xi. 4, xv. 34; 2 Sam. xxi. 6; Isa. x. 29. Now Tuleil el ful, "the hill of the beans" (a conical peak commanding an extensive view, about an hour from Jerusalem, on the road to Er-Ram, with a large heap of stones on the top, the ruins of a town built of unhewn stones), called by Josephus (B. J., v. 2, § 1) Gibath saoule, 30 stadia from Jerusalem, chosen retributively, as being Saul's residence, for the hanging of his seven sons "before the Lord" (i.e. as in the presence of Him the righteous Judge who appointed the retributive justice, 2 Sam. xxi. 14 end, 9), by the Gibeonites in revenge for his attempt to slay them in violation of the covenant. It is the G. of Benjamin destroyed by the other tribes under the Judges (xix., xx.) for the flagrant abomination perpetrated there. It was then a "city" with the usual open "street" or square, having its "700 chosen men," probably the same as the "left handed men who could sling stones at an hair breadth and not miss" (xx. 15, 16). The Levite left Bethlehem at "the tent pitching time of day" (xix. 9 marg.), about three in the afternoon. At five he would "come over against Jebus," and at seven would be four miles N. of Jerusalem on the Shechem (Nabbus) road towards mount Ephraim. Ramah and G. were now near; G. nearest. The suddenness of sunset in that region made him "turn aside" hither for the night, where the tragedy of the concubine ensued. The track N. of G. branches into two, one leading to Bethel the "house of God," the other to "G. (=Geba) in the field" (sadeh, "cultivated ground"), now Jeba, below which at the base of the hill whence G. is named was the care (Syriac, the Heb. "treeless meadows" will mean not their place of ambush but the open ground across which they advanced to the town) of G. "where the liars in wait hid" (xx. marg. 31-33).

"G. of Benjamin" was occupied by Jonathan with 1000 chosen men, three miles in the S. rear of the Philistine camp at Geba on the S. side of the wady Suweinat (1 Sam. xiii. 2). Saul was in their front at Michmash, holding also mount Bethel on the N. side of the wady Suweinat. Jonathan smote the garrison at Geba, and the Philistines in consequence gathering a vast host drove Saul's little army before them out of Bethel and Michmash down the eastern passes to Gilgal near Jericho, in the Jordan valley; took Michmash, Saul's former quarters, and sent out plunderers N., W., and E. Jonathan however held a force in G. (xiv. 2) where Saul, Samuel, and Abiah the priest with the ephod joined him from Gilgal (xiii. 7). Then followed the gallant stealthy assault of the Philistine garrison by Jonathan and his armourbearer, the first knowledge of which was conveyed to Saul by his watchmen in G., who at dawn saw "the multitude melting away and beating down one another." Saul first called the muster roll to discover the absentees; next he consulted the oracle of God; but when the noise in the Philistine host increased, with irreverent impatience (Isa. xxviii. 16) he desired the priest to stop the consultation, and put himself at the head of the people who, now that the Philistines fled, flocked to him from all their hiding places in mount Ephraim.

Gibeon. Chief of the four Hivite (in 2 Sam. xxi. called by the general name "Amorite") cities which obtained a league from Joshua by guile (ix.). "A great city like one of the royal cities, greater than Ai" (x. 2); "all its men were mighty." Within Benjamin; by the main road six and a half miles from Jerusalem; allotted to the priests (xxi. 17). Ninety-five men of G. returned with Zerubbabel, and helped in repairing the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (iii. 7, vii. 25). Here the Jews defeated Cestius Gallus and the Romans. Now el Jib, on a rounded chalk hill the limestone strata of which lie horizontally, forming terraces along which olives and vines abound, with a basin of broad valleys and plains below. E. of the hill is a spring and reservoir. The remains of a tank 120 ft. by 100 ft. are visible still amidst the trees lower down; this was "the pool of G." where Abner's and Joab's men had the encounter ending in Asahel's death and issuing in Abner's own murder. At the "great waters of G." Johanan son of Kareah found the treacherous Ishmael (Jer. xli. 12). Here were encamped the five kings of the Amorites when Joshua came down on them from Gilgal (Josephus, Ant. v. i. § 17). The "wilderness (midbar, pasture ground) of G." lay to the E. (2 Sam. ii. 24). Here immediately at "the great stone in G.," some old landmark, Joab pursuing the Benjaminite rebel Sheba among the towns of his tribe met and treacherously murdered Amasa (2 Sam. xx. 5-10). Retributively it was here also that Joab met his doom from Benaiah while clinging to the brazen altar of the tabernacle at G. (1 Kings ii. 28-31, 1 Chron. xvi. 39-41). To "the great high place" (whether Neby Samuil, the highest eminence about, at a mile's distance, or the twin mount on the S. and close to el Jib) the tabernacle was removed from Nob after Saul's slaughter of the priests there. David put the brazen altar before the tabernacle (2 Chron. i. 5) probably at the same time he removed the ark to Zion and appointed the priests under Zadok to offer the daily sacrifices, and Heman and Jeduthun to direct the music (2 Chron. i. 3). Here Solomon offered a thousand burnt offerings, and God appeared in a dream by night and gave him all and more than he asked (1 Kings iii.). Then in a few years the tabernacle was taken down and the holy vessels removed to the temple (1 Kings viii. 3).

Gibeonites. Their safety was covenanted by Israel (Josh. ix.), even though obtained by a deceit, their ambassadors having taken old sacks and mended wineskins (the rent being tied up like a bag) and old mended sandals ("clouted," i.e. mended coarsely); but they were made "hewers of wood and drawers of water." Israel's error was in making the treaty without inquiring of the Lord; a warning to the church of all ages against the dissimulation of the world, which seeks admission and union with the kingdom of God without real conversion, faith, and sanctification, when it suits its own carnal advantage. Saul in his zeal for Israel where God sanctioned it not, though wanting in zeal against Israel's foe Amalek (1 Sam. xv. 18-20) where God commanded it, sought to slay them, probably (2 Sam. xxi.) in the dark closing period of his reign seeking to atone for his deficiency as to Amalek and to win the Divine favour and popularity with his people by this mistimed and misplaced zeal. God remembers the sins of the fathers upon the children, and vindicates His righteousness as Ruler of the nations by making an entail of curse go down from one generation to another for the unexpiated guilt of bloodshed and violation of covenants. The three years' famine, the Lord's answer when consulted as to the cause, that it was "for Saul and his bloody house because he slew the G.," and after the execution of Saul's seven (seven, the sacred number, denotes the performance of a work of God) sons "the Lord being entreated for the land," prove that David did not contrive or eagerly fall in with this device for ridding himself of the remainder of Saul's royal line. Nay, he showed by the honourable burial he gave their remains, and by sparing Mephibosheth, that he entertained no such feeling, nor had he by this time anything to fear from Saul's family. The whole matter was divinely ordered to teach solemn moral lessons of God's government to the king and the nation (Exod. xx. 5, xxiv. 7; Lev. xxvi. 31-40; Num. xiv. 18-31, especially xxv. 33. "blood it defileth the land, and the land cannot be cleansed of the blood that is shed there; but by the blood of him that shed it"; Isa. xiv. 20, 21, lxx. 6, 7; Jer. ii. 9, xxxii. 18). The "water dropping upon them (the hanged or crucified seven) out of heaven" marked the cessation of the heaven-sent drought and the point of time when the bodies might be taken down from the stakes and buried. Ordinarily bodies were taken down for burial before night (Deut. xxi. 22, 23); but in this case guilt rested on the whole land, and therefore the expiatory sacrifice was to remain exposed to birds of prey (the greatest ignominy, 1 Sam. xviii. 44) before Jehovah, till the cessation of the drought showed that His wrath was appeased.

Giblites. Josh. xiii. 5, which shows how wide were the limits designed for Israel which as yet it has not inherited. Of Gibeon on the sea coast, at the foot of the northern slopes of Lebanon (marz. 1 Kings v. 18, Ps. lxxviii. 7, Ezek. xxvii. 9). [But see GERAZ.] Biblas was the seat of worship of the Syrian Adonis, Tammuz, which the Jews were seduced to worship (Ezek. viii. 10).

Giddalti. 1 Chron. xiv. 4, vi. 33.

Giddel, children of. 1. Ezra ii. 47, Neh. vii. 49. 2. Ezra ii. 56, Neh. vii. 58.

Gideon = a helper, i.e. warrior, or the helper of God (Isa. x. 33). Of Manasseh; youngest son of Joash, of the Abiezrite family at Ephraim (Jud. vi. 11, 15). Fifth of the judges of Israel, called by the angel of the Lord to deliver Israel from the seven years' yoke of the Midianite hosts, which like swarming locusts consumed all their produce except what they could hide in caves and holes (ver. 2, 5, 6, 11). Thither they fled, and "made" artificial caves besides enlarging natural caves for their purpose. God permitting them to be brought so low that their extremity might be His opportunity. Midian had long before with Moab besought Balaam to curse Israel, and through his counsel, by tempting Israel to whoredom with their and the Moabite women, had brought a plague on Israel, and had then by God's command been smitten sorely by Israel (Num. xxv. 17, 18; xxxi. 1-16, etc.). But now after 200 years, in renewed strength, with the Amalekite and other plundering children of the E.

they were used as God's instrument to chastise His apostate people. Crossing Jordan from the E. they spread themselves from the plain of Jezreel to the sea coast of Gaza. Affliction led Israel to crying in prayer. Prayer brought first a prophet from Jehovah to awaken them to a sense of God's grace in their former deliverances and of their own apostasy. Next the Angel of Jehovah came, i.e. Jehovah the Second Person Himself. Former judges, Othniel, Ehud, Barak, had been moved by the Spirit of God to their work; but to G. alone under a terribleness in Ephraim, a town belonging to Joash, Jehovah appeared in person to show that the God who had made theophanies to the patriarchs was the same Jehovah, ready to save their descendants if they would return to the covenants. His second revelation was in a dream, commanding him to overthrow his father's altar to Baal and to erect an altar to Jehovah and offer a burnt sacrifice with the wood of the Asherah ("grove") or idol goddess of nature, probably a wooden pillar (Deut. xvi. 21). [See ASHORETH.] In the first revelation Jehovah acknowledged G., in the second He commanded G. to acknowledge Him. As God alone, Jehovah will not be worshipped along with Baal (1 Kings xviii. 21, Ezek. xx. 39). G. at the first revelation was knocking out (hhabat) with a stick wheat in the winepress, sunk in the ground or hewn in the rock to make it safe from the Midianites; for he did not dare to thresh upon an open floor or hard-wooded area in the open field, but like poor gleaners (Ruth ii. 17) knocked out the little corn with a stick. The address, "Jehovah is with thee thou mighty man," seemed to G., rummaging on the Midianite oppression which his occupation was a proof of, in ironical and sad contrast with facts. "If Jehovah be with us why is all this befallen us?" alluding to Deut. xxxi. 17. But God's words guarantee their own accomplishment. JEHOVAH (no longer under His character, "Angel of Jehovah," but manifested as JEHOVAH) replied, "Go in this thy night (the night now given thee by ME, Isa. xl. 29), and thou shalt save Israel from the hand of the Midianites; have not I sent thee?" Then followed the requested "sign," the Angel of the Lord with the end of the staff in His hand consuming with fire G.'s "offering" (minchah, not a strict sacrifice but a sacrificial gift), the kid and unleavened cakes (comp. Gen. xviii, the theophany to Abraham very similar). Comp. and contrast the conduct of the angel and the acceptance of Manoah's sacrifice in chap. xiii. 20. G. in gratitude built an altar and called it "Jehovah Shalom," a pledge of "Jehovah" being now at "peace" with Israel again (Jer. xxix. 11, xxxiii. 16). The "see and" in age of Joash's ballocks, "seven years old," was appointed in the dream for an offering to Jehovah, to correspond to Midian's seven years' oppression because of Israel's apostasy. G. with ten servants overthrew Baal's altar and Asherah in the night.

for he durst not do it in the day through fear of his family and townsmen. Joash, when required to bring out his son to die for the sacrifice, replied, "Will ye plead for Baal? . . . he that will plead for him shall be put to death himself, let us wait till the morning (not 'shall be put to death whilst it is yet morning') and see whether Baal, if he be a god, will plead for himself." So G. got the surname "Jerubbab," "Let Baal fight," i.e. vindicate his own cause on the destroyer of his altar; and as the Jews in contempt changed Baal in compounds to beseth, "Jerubesheth," "Let the shameful idol fight." Then the Spirit of God "clothed" G. as his coat of mail (1 Chron. xii. 18, 2 Chron. xxiv. 20, Luke xxiv. 49, Isa. lxi. 10). His own clan the Abiezrites, Manasseh W. of Jordan, Zebulun, and Naphtali followed him. At his prayer the sign followed, the woollen fleece becoming saturated with dew whilst the earth around was dry, then the ground around being wet whilst the fleece was dry. Dew symbolises God's reviving grace: Israel was heretofore the dry fleece, whilst the nations around were flourishing; now she is to become filled with the Lord's vigour, whilst the nations around lose it. The fleece becoming afterwards dry whilst the ground around was wet symbolises Israel's rejection of the gospel whilst the Gentile world is receiving the gracious dew. Afterwards Israel in its turn shall be the dew to the Gentile world (Mic. v. 7). G. pitched on a height at the foot of which the fountain Harod ("the spring of trembling," now perhaps Ain Jahlood) sprang (2 Sam. xxiii. 25). Midian pitched in the valley of Jezreel (Jud. vi. 33). The timid were first thinned out of G.'s army (Deut. xx. 8). In Jud. vii. 3, "who-soever is fearful let him return from mount Gilead," as they were then W. of Jordan, the mount in eastern Palestine cannot be meant; but the phrase was a familiar designation of the Manassites. To take away still further all attribution of the victory to man not God, the army was reduced to 300 by retaining those alone whose energy was shown by their drinking what water they lifted with their hands, not delaying to kneel and drink (comp. as to Messiah Ps. ex. 7). Then followed G.'s going with Phurah his servant into the Midianite host, and hearing the Midianite's dream of a barley cake overturning the tent, that being poor men's food, so symbolising despised Israel, the "tent" symbolising Midian's nomad life of freedom and power. The Moabite stone shows how similar to Hebrew was the language of Moab, and the same similarity to the Midianite tongue appears from G. understanding them. Dividing his 300 into three attacking columns, G. desired them in the beginning of the middle watch, i.e. at midnight (this and the morning watch dividing the night into three watches in the O. T.), after him to blow the trumpets, break the pitchers, and let the lamps in their left hand previously covered with the pitchers (a type of the gospel light in earthen vessels, 2 Cor. iv. 6, 7), suddenly flash on the foe, and to cry "the sword of Jehovah and of G.," and to stand without moving round about the Midianite camp. A mutual slaughter arose from panic among the Midianites (a type of Christ's final overthrow of antichrist, Isa. ix. 4-7), each trumpet holder seeming to have a company at his back. The remnant fled to the bank of the Jordan at ABELMEHOLAH [see], etc. Then the men of Asher, Naphtali, and all Manasseh, who had been dismissed, returned to join in the pursuit. G. requested Ephraim to intercept the fleeing Midianites at the waters of Bethbarah and Jordan, viz. at the tributary streams which they would have to cross to reach the Jordan. A second fight ensued there, and they slew Oreb (the raven) and Zeeb (the wolf). Conder (Pal. Expl., July 1874, p. 182) observes that the nomadic borders of Midian, like the mod-ru Beni Suggar and Ghazawiyeh Arabs, come up the broad and fertile valley of Jezreel; their encampment lay, as the black Arab tents do now in spring, at the foot of the hill Moreh (Nebi Dahy) opposite to the limestone knoll on which Jezreel (Zer'ain) stands. The well Harod, where occurred the trial which separated 300 men of endurance from the worthless rabble, was the Ain Jalud, a fine spring at the foot of mount Gilboa, issuing blue and clear from a cavern, and forming a pool with rushy banks and a pebbly bottom, 100 yards long. The water is sweet, though slightly tasting of sulphur, and there is ample space for gathering a great number of men. Concealed by the folds of the rolling ground the 300 crept down to Midian's camp in the valley. The Midianite host fled to Bethshittah (the modern village Shatta), in Zererah (a district connected with Zertan or Zeretan, a name still appearing in Ain Zahrah, three miles W. of Beisan), and to the border of Beth Meholah (nady Malch), a course directly down the main road to Jordan and Beisan. Thus Midian fled ten or fifteen miles towards the Jordan. A systematic advance followed. Messengers went S. two days' journey to Ephraim; the lower fords of Jordau at Bethbarah were taken (Bethabara of the N. T.). Meantime G., having cleared the Bethshan valley of Midianites, crossed at the southern end of Succoth (now Makhathet Abu Sus), and continued the pursuit along the eastern bank. The Midianites followed the right bank S. towards Midian, intending to cross near Jericho. Here the men of Ephraim met them and executed Oreb and Zeeb, and sent their heads to G. "on the other side." Thus "the Raven's Peak" and "the Wolf's Den" seem identical with Ash el Ghorab and Tuueil el Dhiab. G.'s victory over self was still greater than that over Midian; by a soft answer he turned aside Ephraim's proud and unreasonable wrath at his not summoning them at the first: "is not the gleaming of grapes of Ephraim (their subsequent victory over the fleeing Midianites) better than the vintage of Abiezer?" than my first victory over them (Isa. x. 26; Prov. xv. 1, xvi. 32). Contrast the unyielding temper of Jephthah (Jud. xii. 1, etc.). Then followed the churchish unpatriotic cowardice of Succoth and Pennel, in answer to his request for provisions, through fear of Midian and disbelief of God's power to make victorious so small and so "faint" a force as G.'s 300. Coming unexpectedly on the host which thought itself "secure" amidst their Bedouin countrymen at Karkor, in a third battle he discomfited them and slew Zeeb and Zalmunnah the two kings (emirs) after battle, in just retribution for their having slain his kingly brothers in cold blood at Tabor; then he taught by corporal punishment with thorns the elders of Succoth to know their error, and beat down the tower of Pennel. Of 120,000 Midianites only 15,000 survived.

Declining the proffered kingdom because Jehovah was their king, G. yet made a gorgeous jewelled ephod with the golden rings the Israelites had got as booty, besides the ornaments (ver. 21, golden crescents or little moons), and collars (ear pendants), and purple raiment, and collars about their camels' necks. The ephod had the breastplate (choshen) and Urim and Thummim. G. "kept" it in his city Ophrah; wearing the breastplate, he made it and the holy lot his means of obtaining revelations from Jehovah whom he worshipped at the altar. Hissin which became a "snare" (means of ruin) to him and his house was his usurping the Aaronic priesthood, and drawing off the people from the one lawful sanctuary, the centre of theocratic unity, and so preparing the way for the relapse to Baal worship at his death. But his unambitious spirit is praiseworthy; he, the great Baal fighter, "Jerubbaal," instead of ambitiously accepting the crown, "went and dwelt in his own house" quietly, and died "in a good old age," having secured for his country "quietness" for 40 years, leaving, besides 70 sons by wives, a son by a concubine, Abimelech, doomed to be by ambition as great a curse to his country as his father was in the main a blessing.

to Isis, and noted for parental affection, which the Heb. name, still applied commonly, ra chamah, means.

Its usefulness as the scavenger of cities has secured for it legal protection, so that it is penal to kill it. It feeds on carrion, lizards, etc. Unprepossessing in look, disgusting in habits.

Gifts. So common in the East that there are 15 distinct Heb. words for them. Minchah, from an inferior to a superior (Jud. iii. 15). Maseeth, vice versa (Esth. ii. 18). Berakah, "a blessing," i.e. complimentary (2 Kings v. 15). Shochad, a bribe (Exod. xxiii. 8, 2 Kings xvi. 8). Many were not voluntary, but a compulsory exaction: tribute (2 Kings xvii. 3). "To bring presents" is to own submission (Ps. lxxviii. 29). That to a prophet was his consulting fee (1 Sam. ix. 7), not a bribe (xii. 3). To refuse a present was an insult; the wedding robe offered and slighted was the condemnation of the unrobed guest (Matt. xxii. 11).

Gihon. 1. Gen. ii. 13. [See EDEN.] The LXX., Jer. ii. 18, identify it with the Nile; but the writer of Genesis, so well acquainted with Egypt, would never have connected the Nile with the Euphrates. The Cush which the Gihon "compassed" was the Asiatic not the African Cush (Gen. x. 7-10); The LXX. being Alexandrian Jews, to glorify their adopted country, made the Nile one of the rivers of paradise. 2. A fountain near Jerusalem, where Solomon was anointed king (1 Kings i. 33, 38, 45). The "down" in going and "up" in returning show it was below the city. Manasseh built a wall outside the city of David from the W. of G. in the valley (nachal, wady, or torrent, the word employed for the valley of Kedron or Jehoshaphat E. of Jerusalem; ge being employed for the valley of Hinnom S.W. of Jerusalem) to the entrance of the fishgate. Hezekiah stopped its upper source, at some distance off, at a higher level (2 Chron. xxxiii. 20), and "brought it straight down to the W. side of the city of David" (2 Chron. xxxiii. 14). The Targum of Jonathan, Arabic and Syriac, has Silom for G. in 1 Kings i. A wall from W. of G. to the fishgate (near the Jaffa gate, Jerome) would be the course of a wall enclosing the city of David (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11). An aqueduct discovered lately (1872) runs from near the Damascus gate, on the Bezetha hill, to the southern at the convent of the Sisters of Zion. It probably brought the water from the pool N. of the tombs of the kings (probably the "upper pool," 2 Kings xvii. 17, Isa. vii. 3, xxxvi. 2, and "upper watercourse of G." stopped by Hezekiah) to the pool of Bethesda. Silom was the lower G. It is suggested that the city of David was on the eastern hill, so Hezekiah by bringing it W. of the city of David brought it within the city, and so out of the enemy's reach. Ps. xlviii. 2 confirms the view that mount Zion was to the N. of Moriah, the temple hill: "the joy of the whole earth is mount Zion, on the sides of the N. the city of the great King."

from W. to E. (1 Sam. xxviii. 4, xxiv. 1.) The scene of the death of Saul and Jonathan (xxxi. 1; 2 Sam. i. 6, 21; "ye mountains (for there is not merely one mountain) of G., let there be no dew, neither rain upon you, nor fields of 'firstfruit offerings,' i.e. producing fruit from which firstfruits are offered; xxi. 12; 1 Chron. x. 1, 8). The Philistines encamped on the N. side of the plain at Shunem; Saul on the S. side, round the fount of Jezreel (Harol, Jud. vii. 1) at the foot of G. The fountain is still to be seen half a mile from Jezreel's ruins. The village Jebbou is on the mountain top. The height of the hill is about 500 ft. above the plain; the sides are as bare and barren as David's poetical elegy desired them to be (excepting one green table land where perhaps the last struggle took place), and contrast strongly with the fertile plain beneath.

Gilead = a hard rocky region. The mountainous range and the region E. of Jordan are meant by "mount G.," not some one mountain. Bashan ("soft level soil"), a fertile plateau, bounds it on the N.; the Arabian table land on the E.; Moab and Ammon on the S. (Deut. iii. 12-17); Jordan on the W.; Heromax river (now Sheriat el Munkur) divides it from Bashan. The Jabbok divided O's northern half of G. (now Jebel Ajlun) from Sihon's southern half (now Belka). The valley of Heshbon was probably G.'s southern bound. Mishor, "a table land," is used to denote the plateau S. and E. of G. This Bezer was in the country of the Mishor ("plain country," A. V. Deut. iv. 13), the smooth downs of Moab contrasting with the higher districts of Bashan northwards and the rugged country W. of the Jordan. One prominent peak is still called Jebel Jil'ad, "mount G.," the probable site of Ramoth Mizpeh (Josh. xiii. 26), and the "Mizpeh of G.," whence Jephthah passed over to Ammon (Jud. xi. 29), an admirable place for assembling forces for war. Es-Salt, a town close by, is on the site of "Ramoth Gilead," the city of refuge in Gal. The mountains of G., 2000 or 3000 ft. high, appear still more elevated from the W. owing to the depression of the Jordan valley 1000 ft., and resemble a massive wall along the horizon; but when ascended they present a wide table land tossed about in wild confusion of undulating downs, clothed with rich grass and ragged forest, and broken by three deep dells, those of the Jarmuk, Jabbok, and Arnon (Stanley, Sinai and Pal.). The high Arabian plateau makes them look low from the E. Pasturage abounds in G.

more than in western Palestine, whence Reuben and Gad chose it for their numerous flocks and herds (Num. xxxii.). The physical nature of the country affected the character of its people, who ever retained nomad pastoral habits. [See GAD, which lay S. and W. by Jordan, stretching N. as far as the sea of Galilee.] Manasse lay N. and E., and stretched S. to Mahanaim. G.'s isolation kept its people in the background in Israel's history. Its aromatic spices and balm were exported to Egypt (Gen. xxxvii. 25, Jer. viii. 22).

Chedorlaomer attacked the giant Zuzim in Ham, i.e. probably G.; having first attacked the Rephaim in Asheroth Karnaim, now the Hauran, afterwards the Etam in Shaveh Kirathaim, the country subsequently of Moab. In G. Saul's son at Mahanaim tried to gain his father's throne (2 Sam. ii. 8, 9). Here David found shelter and hospitality whilst fleeing from Absalom (2 Sam. xvii. 22, 27-29). Elijah the Tishbite was of G., and in garb, abruptness, and active energy reflected his country's characteristics. Being a border land, it was exposed to the marauding tribes of the desert (Josh. xvii. 1), and RAMOTH GILEAD [see] was thought the eastern key of Palestine (1 Kings xxii. 3-6). Twice our Lord withdrew to the transjordanic hills: after His baptism; again just before His last stay at Jerusalem (John x. 39, 40). At Pella in the same region the disciples found the refuge from the siege of Jerusalem which their Lord had told them of beforehand; Cestius Gallus having providentially retired, and so given them the opportunity of fleeing (Matt. xxiv. 15, 16).

Gilgal. 1. Heb. "the G.," i.e. rolling. Israel's first encampment W. of Jordan (five miles) where they passed their first night after crossing, and set up the twelve stones taken from the river bed (Josh. iv. 3, 19, 20). Here they kept the first passover in Canaan (v. 10). On a rising ground ("hill," v. 3, 9) in the hot sunken Ghor between Jericho and the Jordan, one mile and a half E. of Jericho, five miles and a half W. of Jordan (Josephus, Ant. v. 1, 4, 11). On the N. side of wady Kelt, one mile and a third from the tower of modern Jericho (Eriha); toward the E. is a tamarisk, "Shejaret el Ittuleh," which tradition makes the site of "the city of brass," whose walls fell on their besiegers marching round them. A pool is 150 yards S. E. of the tree, such as Israel would need in their long encampment at G.; it is built with well packed pebbles without cement. S. E. of this are twelve or more small mounds, Tell aylat Jiljuleh, eight or ten ft. diameter, and three or four high, possibly remains of Israel's camp (Conder, Pal. Expl.). The distances stated by Josephus accord with this site.

The Israelites born in the wilderness were here circumcised with stone knives (v. 2 marg.; Exod. iv. 25), which "rolling" away of the reproach of uncircumcision gave the name. The sons under 20 years, when at Kadesh in the second year of the wilderness journey the murmuring nation was rejected (Num. xiv.), had been already circumcised; those born subsequently needed circumcision. As God abrogated at Kadesh the covenant, the sons of the rejected generation were not to receive the covenant rite. The manna and pillar of cloud were not withdrawn, because God would sustain the rising generation with the prospect of the ban being removed, and of the covenant temporarily suspended being renewed. The sentence was exhausted when they crossed the Zered and entered the Amrites' land (Deut. ii. 14; Num. xxi. 12, 13), when all the sentenced generation was dead (xxvi. 63-65). Moses, himself under sentence to die, did not venture on the steppes of Moab to direct the circumcision of the younger generation without Jehovah's command. And the rule of Divine grace is first to give, then to require; so first He showed His grace to Abraham by leading him to Canaan and giving the promises, then enjoined circumcision; also He did not give the law to Israel at Sinai till first He had redeemed them from Egypt, and thereby made them willing to promise obedience. So now He did not require the renewal of circumcision, the covenant sign of subjection to the law (Gal. v. 3), till He had first showed His grace in giving them victory over Og and Sihon, and in making a way through Jordan, a pledge that He would fulfil all His promises and finally give them the whole land. The circumcision was performed the day after crossing Jordan, i.e. the 11th day of the first month (v. 19). The passover was kept on the 14th (ver. 10). The objection that all could not have been circumcised in one day is futile. For the males in Israel at the census in Moab shortly before were 601,730 upwards of 20 years old, besides 23,000 Levites of a month old and upwards; at the outside all the males would be less than one million. Of these about 300,000 were 38 years old, therefore born before the census at Kadesh and circumcised already; so that only 600,000 would remain to be circumcised. The uncircumcised could easily be circumcised in one day with the help of the circumcised; the latter would prepare and kill the passover lamb for their brethren whose soreness (Gen. xxxiv. 25) would be no bar to their joining in the feast. The "reproach of Egypt rolled off" is (like "the reproach of Moab" Zeph. ii. 8, and "Syria" Ezek. xvi. 57) that heaped on Israel by Egypt, viz. that Jehovah had brought them into the wilderness to slay them (Exod. xxxii. 12, Num. xiv. 13-16, Deut. ix. 25). This "reproach of Egypt" rested on them so long as they were under the sentence of wandering and dying in the desert. The circumcision at G. was a practical restoration of the covenant, and a pledge of their now receiving Canaan. No village was, or is, at G.

In Mic. vi. 5, "O My people, remember . . . what Balak . . . consulted, and what Balaam . . . answered . . . from Shittim unto G.," the sense is, Remember My kindness from Shittim, the scene of Balaam's wicked counsel taking effect in Israel's sin, from the fatal effects of which I saved thee, all along to G. where I renewed the covenant with Israel by circumcision (2 Sam. xix. 15).

2. G. from which Elijah and Elisha went down to Bethel (2 Kings ii. 1, 2). Clearly distinct from 1. G., which is below in the Ghor along Jordan, not above Bethel, which is 1000 ft. above Jordan. Now perhaps the ruins Jiljilich, a few miles N. of Bethel. Another G. has been found four miles from Shiloh, and five from Bethel, which is 500 ft. lower; this may be the G. of 2 Kings ii. 3. G. not far from Shechem, beside the plains of Moreh (Deut. xi. 30). Josh. xii. 23, "king of the nations (goin) of G." i.e. of the nomad tribes, the aboriginal inhabitants of the country whose centre was G. 4. To the N. of Judah (Josh. xv. 7). [See GILOH.]

GILOH. A town in the hills of Judah (Josh. xv. 51); the native place of Abithophel (2 Sam. xv. 12, xvii. 23).

Gimzo. Taken with its dependent villages by the Philistines under Abaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 18). N.W. of Judah, or in Dan; now Jimzu, a large village on a height surrounded by trees, S. of the road between Jerusalem and Jaffa, where the highlands sink down into the maritime plain.

Gin. A trap for birds or beasts, consisting of a net and a stick acting as a spring (Isa. viii. 14).

Ginath. 1 Kings xvi. 21, 22.

Ginnethon. Neh. x. 6, xii. 16. The same as GINNETHO (xii. 4).

Girdle. Worn both by men and women. The mezeck was worn by men alone (Job xii. 21 marg.). The common girdle was of leather, as the Bedouins now wear a red leathern girdle with a long crooked knife and a pistol stuck in. The finer girdle was of linen (Jer. xiii. 1), often embroidered with gold (Dan. x. 5, Rev. i. 13). Girded up, so as to confine the otherwise flowing robes, when active exertion was needed; whence "gird up the loins" means "be in readiness for action" (Luke xii. 35, 1 Pet. i. 13, Eph. vi. 14). Fastened by a clasp, or tied in a knot, so that the ends hung in front. A costly present (1 Sam. xviii. 4). One end being folded back made a purse (Matt. x. 9). The abaceth was the priest's girdle of linen embroidered with wool; the highpriest's girdle on the day of atonement was of white linen only. The "needlework" on it was figuring on one side only, "cunning work" on two sides (Exod. xxviii. 39; the Mishna); or the "needlework" had the figures on both sides the same girdle, the "cunning work" different (Jarchi). Exod. xxvi. 31, "needlework" was of the embroiderer, "cunning work" of the skilled weaver. The "curious girdle" was made, as the ephod, of "gold, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen" (Exod. xxviii. 8), it was the band for fastening the ephod, which is upon it, and of the same work, of one piece with it.

EGYPTIAN GIRDLE

Girgashites. [See CANAAN.] Josh. xxiv. 11. W. of Jordan. Sprung from the fifth son of Canaan (Gen. x. 16).

GISPA. Neh. xi. 21.

Gittaim=two winepresses. The dual of Gath (2 Sam. iv. 3). The men of Beeroth, one of the Gibeonite towns (Josh. ix. 17), took refuge, probably when persecuted by Saul (2 Sam. xxi. 2), in G. Benjamites occupied G. with other towns N.W. of Jerusalem, on the return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 33).

Gittites. [See GATH.] The 600 who followed David from Gath under "Ittai the G.," "a stranger and an exile" (2 Sam. xv. 18-20). Obed Edom, being a Levite, must have derived his title "the Gittite" from some incidental connection with Gath; others derive his name from the Levitical city of Gathrimmon (2 Sam. vi. 10); but it seems strange if "Gittite" be used in one sense of Ittai of Gath, and in a different sense of Obed Edom (1 Chron. xxvii. 4).

Gittith. Title Ps. viii. lxxxi. lxxxiv. An instrument, or else tune, invented in Gath, whence David brought it after his sojourn there with Achish (1 Sam. xxvii. 2). Others take it from gath, "a winepress," being used on occasions of joy like the vintage; all three psalms having a joyous character. There may be an enigmatical reference to Messiah treading the winepress (Isa. lxxii. 3, Rev. xix. 15).

Gizonite, Hashem the. 1 Chron. xi. 34. Omitted in the parallel 2 Sam. xxiii. 32, 33. Kennicott would read the proper name Gonai.

Glass. Job xxviii. 17, "crystal" or glass, the only allusion to glass in O. T. The paintings at Benihasan and in tombs show that it was known in the reign of Osirtasin I., 1600 B.C. Egypt was probably the land of its discovery. A bead of 1500 B.C. was found at Thebes, of the same specific gravity as crown glass in England. Relics of the Phœnician trade in the shape of glass beads have been found in Cornwall and Ireland. A glass bottle with Sargon's name was found in the N.W. Nimrud palace, the oldest specimen of transparent glass, older than 700 B.C. Pliny attributes the discovery to Phœnician sailors using natron to support saucepans (H. N. xxxvi. 65). Probably vitreous matter was formed in lightning fires on the sand in a country producing natron or subcarbonate of soda. Pliny's story may have originated in the suitability of the sand at the mouth of the Syrian river Belus for making glass, for which accordingly it was exported to Sidon and Alexandria, the centres of that manufacture. In Deut. xxxiii. 19 there seems allusion to the same: "they (of Zebulun on the N.W. seacoast) shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of treasures hid in the sand"; glass being a precious "treasure" anciently, and the sand of that coast being specially prized for its manufacture. The Egyptians could inlay it with gold and enamel, and permeate opaque glass with variously coloured designs, and make the same hue and devices pass in right lines directly through the substance; and imitate precious stones. Glass is an emblem of brightness and coloured glitter, rather than transparency, which "crystal" represents (Rev. iv. 6). Hence it was not used for windows, which were simply openings furnished with shutters.

LOOKING GLASSES were made of polished metal, generally tin and copper mixed, not glass (Exod. xxxviii. 8 marg.). Job xxxvii. 18, "the sky . . . as a molten looking glass"; the polish of the metal representing the bright sky. In 1 Cor. xiii. 12 the sense is: "now (in our present state) we see in a mirror (the reflection seeming behind, so that we see it through the mirror) darkly (in enigma)"; the ancient mirrors being at best unequal to ours, and often being tarnished and dim. The inadequate knowledge of an object gained by seeing it reflected in the ancient mirror, compared with the perfect idea formed by seeing itself directly, happily represents the contrast between the saint's present reflected and his future direct, immediate, and intuitive knowledge. Comp. 2 Cor. iii. 18, Jas. i. 23. The word of God is a perfect mirror; but our minds imperfectly apprehend it, and at best see but the image indirectly, not the reality face to face. The lustre of some mirrors found at Thebes, though buried for centuries, has been partially restored.

Gleaning. The right was secured to the poor in harvest and vintage (Lev. xix. 9, 10; Ruth ii. 6, 8, 9).

Glede. The kite (Deut. xiv. 13). Raah, so called from its acute vision.

Glorify. Heb. habad, "weight," alluded to 2 Cor. iv. 17; "our lightness of affliction worketh out for us a weight of glory," exceeding beyond all measure the affliction. "My glory" is my soul, man's noblest part; rather my tongue, as explained in Acts ii. 26. So Ps. xxx. 12 marg., lvii. 8, cviii. 1. The tongue, as the soul's interpreter, is the glory of man above the brute, and the instrument of glorifying God, man's highest glory. David not only exults inwardly, but makes his "tongue" and "flesh" sharers of his joy. As God is the saints' glory (Jer. ii. 11), so they are His glory (xiii. 11, Isa. lxii. 3).

Gnat. Matt. xxiii. 24 transl., "ye strain out a gnat," viz. in filtering liquors. Figuratively for "ye are punctilious about trifles" whilst reckless of enormities.

GOAD. A pointed instrument, eight ft. long, often headed with iron (1 Sam.

GOAD.

xiii. 21, Eccles. xii. 11). To "kick against the pricks" expresses unavailing resistance, as if cattle were to kick against the goads of their driver who has them wholly in his power, as God has the recalcitrant sinner (Acts ix. 5).

Goat. 1. Wild goat, yé'etim, the ibex of ancient Moab. 2. The goat deer, or else gazelle, ayuo. 3. The attud, he goat, the leader of the flock; hence the chief ones of the earth, leaders in mighty wickedness; the ram represents headstrong wantonness and offensive lust (Isa. xiv. 9, Zech. x. 3; comp. Matt. xxv. 32, 33; Ezek. xxxiv. 17). As the word "shepherds" describes what they ought to have been, so "he goats" what they were; heading the flock, they were foremost in sin, so they shall be foremost in punishment. In S. of Sol. iv. 1 the hair of the bride is said to be "as a flock of goats that appear from mount Gilead," alluding to the fine silky hair of some breeds of goat, the angora and others. Amos (iii. 12) speaks of a shepherd "taking out of the month of the lion a piece of an ear," alluding to the long pendulous ears of the Syrian breed. In Prov. xxx. 31 a he goat is mentioned as one of the "four things comely in going," in allusion to the stately march of the leader of the flock. 4. Sa'ir, the goat of the sin-offering (Lev. ix. 3), "the rough hairy goat" (Dan. viii. 21). Sa'ir is used of devils (Lev. xvii. 7), "the evil spirits of the desert" (Isa. xlii. 21, xxxiv. 14). 5. 'Azazel, "the scapegoat" (Lev. xvi. 8, 10, 23 marg.) [see ATONEMENT, DAY OF]. The "he goat" represented Graeco-Macedonia; Caranus, the first king of Macedonia, was in legend led by goats to Edessa, his capital, which he named "the goat city." The one-horned goat is on coins of Archelaus king of Macedonia, and a pilaster of Persepolis. So Dan. viii. 5.

Goath. Jer. xxxi. 39. Named with the hill Gareb. From ga'ah "to low" as a cow, "the heifer's pool" (Targum). But Syriac version, "to the eminence," from gavah "to lose one's breath," viz. with ascending. S.W. outside the city of David, as Gareb was N.W. (Junius, in Poli Synopsis). Rather N.W. (Fergusson) [see JERUSALEM.]

Gob = a pit. The scene of encounter between David's heroes and the Philistines (2 Sam. xxi. 18, 19). "Gözer" in 1 Chron. xx. 1. In LXX. and Syriac "Gath"; comp. 2 Sam. xxi. 20 1 Chron. xx. 6.

God. [See GENESIS, on Elohim and Jehovah.] ELOHIM expresses the might of the Creator and Sustainer of the universe. ELYON, His sublimity (Gen. xiv. 22, "the Most High." SHADDAI, the "Almighty," His all-sufficiency (Gen. xvii. 1; Phil. iv. 19; 2 Cor. iii. 5, xii. 9). JEHOVAH, His unchangeable faithfulness to His covenantal promises to His people. ADONAI, His lordship, which being delegated to others as also is His might as ELOHIM. ADONAI and ELOHIM are used occasionally of His creatures, angels and men in authority, judges, etc. (Ps. viii. 5, xvii. 7 [Heb.], lxxii. 1, 6, 7.) "Lord" in small letters stands for Heb. ADONAI in A.V., but in capitals ("LORD") for JEHOVAH. ELYON, SHADDAI, and JEHOVAH are never used but of God; Jehovah the personal God of the Jews, and of the church in particular. ELOAH, the singular, is used only in poetry. The derivation is alah "to fear," as Gen. xxxi. 42, 53, "the fear of Isaac," or alah "to be mighty." The plural ELOHIM is the common form in prose and poetry, expressing that He combines in Himself all the fulness of Divine perfections in their manifold powers and operations; these the heathen divided among a variety of gods. ELOHIM concentrates all the Divine attributes assigned to the idols severally, and, besides those, others which corrupt man never of himself imagined, infinite love, goodness, justice, wisdom, creative power, inexhaustible riches of excellence; unity, self-existence, grace, and providence are especially dwelt on, Exod. iii. 13-15, xv. 11, xxxiv. 6, 7. The plural form hints at the plurality of Persons, the singular verb implies the unity of Godhead. The personal acts attributed to the Son (John i. 3; Ps. xxxiii. 6; Prov. viii. 22-32, xxx. 4; Mal. iii. 1, the Lord the Sender being distinct from the Lord the Sent, who "suddenly comes") and to the Holy Ghost respectively (Gen. i. 2, Ps. civ. 30) prove the distinctness of the Persons. The thrice repeated "Lord" (Num. vi. 25-27) and "Holy" (Isa. vi. 3) imply the same. But reserve was maintained whilst the tendency to polytheism prevailed, and as yet the redeeming and sanctifying work of the Son and the blessed Spirit was unaccomplished; when once these had been manifested the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity was fully revealed in N. T.

The sanctions of the law are temporal rather than spiritual, because a specimen was to be given in Israel of God's present moral government. So long as they obeyed, Providence engaged national prosperity; dependent not on political rules or military spirit, as in worldly nations, but on religious faithfulness. Their sabbatical year, in which they neither tilled nor gathered, is a sample of the continued interposition of a special providence. No legislator without a real call from God would have promulgated a code which leans on the sanction of immediate and temporal Divine interpositions, besides the spiritual sanctions and future retributions.

Gog. 1. 1 Chron. v. 4. 2. G. AND MAGOG. Magog was second son of Japhet, connected with Gomer (the Cimmerians) and Madai (Medes). In Ezek. xxxviii. xxxix., these two appear in the N. country, their weapon the bow, their warriors horsemen and notorious for cruel rapacity; probably the Scythians, the dominant Japhetic race between the Caucasus (Ghogh and Moghef are names still applied to its heights) and Mesopotamia from 630 to 600 B.C., who invaded Palestine and besieged Ascalon under Psammeticus. G. is the ideal head of Magog the land and people; also prince of Rosh (Roxolani), Mesekh (Moschi), and Tubal (Tibareni); Ezek. xxxviii. 2, "the chief prince," rather "prince of Rosh" (the Scythian Tauri). Hengstenberg supports A. V. The names resemble Russia and Moscow, but Slari and Wends were the ancient name of the Russians. In Rev. xx. 8 G. and Magog are both peoples. The Scythians were expelled 596 B.C., just before Ezekiel wrote, after making their name a terror to Asia. The prophet naturally uses their name taken from familiar history to represent the antichristian confederacy about to assail the Jews in the Holy Land before the millennium; Rev. xx. 7-9, to represent the confederacy headed by Satan, and about to assail the beloved city after the millennium. Antiochus Epiphanes, the O. T. antichrist, the "little horn" of the third world empire, who defiled Jehovah's temple and altar with swine sacrifices and set up Jupiter's altar there, prefigures the "king of fierce countenance" who, "when the transgressors shall come to the full, shall destroy the holy people" (Dan. viii. 10, 26); "the king of the N." (comp. Ezek. xxxix. 2), who "shall do according to his will, and exalt and magnify himself above every god, and speak marvellous things against the God of gods, and shall enter also into the glorious land and plant the tabernacles of his palaces between the seas in the glorious holy mountain, and shall come to his end," through Michael's interposition, after a "time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation" (Dan. xi. 21-45, xii. 1; Zech. xiii. 9, xiv. 2, 3). G. represents antichrist the beast; Magog the ten kingdoms leagued under him (Rev. xvi. xvii.). Haughty, blasphemous self confidence is his characteristic (2 Thess. ii.). Sheba, Dedan, Tarshish, mercantile peoples, though not openly joining his invasion of Israel, yet from selfish love of gain, sympathise with it secretly (Ezek. xxxviii. 13, xxxix. 6, "the isles"); they shall therefore share antichrist's doom, the robber shall be robbed in righteous retribution, the spoiler spoiled, and the slayer slain. Where antichrist thought to find an inheritance he shall only find a grave, and that near his prototypes, the fire blasted cities of the Dead Sea. No weapon formed against God's people shall prosper (Isa. liv. 17); not a fragment shall be left to defile the Holy Land.

Golan. A city of Bashan (Deut. iv. 43), allotted out of Manasse to the Levites; one of the three cities of refuge E. of Jordan (Josh. xx. 8, xxi. 27). Gaulanitis the province was named from it; E. of Galilee, N. of Hiteromax separating it from Gadarithis. Jordan, from the sea of Galilee to its source at Dan and Cesarea Philippi, was its western boundary. Now Jaulan, bounded on N. by Jedur (Iturra) and on E. by Hauran. It is a well watered, grassy table land, once densely peopled, having numerous towns and villages, of which 11 are now inhabited. The western side, the supporting wall of the plateau, along the sea of Galilee, is steep and rugged. Ogor his predecessors united principalities that were before distinct; after the Babylonian captivity the four provinces of Bashan became distinct; Gaulanitis, Trachonitis, Auranitis, and Batanea.

Gold. Emblem of purity (Job xxiii. 10), of nobility (Lam. iv. 1). Zuhab, "yellow gold," as gell from gel, yellow. Sagur, "treasured gold" (1 Kings vi. 20). Paz, "native gold" (Job xxviii. 17, S. of Sol. v. 15). Be-tzer, "gold earth," i.e. raw ore (Job xxii. 21). Kethem, figuratively (Job xxxvii. 22 marg.) "golden splendour"; but Maurer lit. "gold is to be found in northern regions, but God cannot be found out because of His majesty" (comp. xxviii.). Charutz, "dug out gold" (Prov. viii. 10). It was not coined anciently, but is represented on Egyptian tombs as weighed out in the form of rings of fixed weight (Gen. xliii. 21). Simon Maccabeus (1 Macc. xv.) was the first who coined Jewish money. Arabia, Sheba, and Ophir, Uphaz, and Parvaim (used for "gold" in Job xxii. 24), were the gold producing countries. It is no longer found in Arabia. The Asiatics have always possessed more gold in ornaments than in money.

Golgotha. Chald. Gulgaltha, Heb. Gulgoleth. [See CALVARY, Lat.] Gr. (Luke xxiii. 33) Cranion, "a skull"; "Calvary" is from Vulg. The "place" of our Lord's crucifixion and burial, not called in the Gospels a mount, as it is now commonly. "In the place where He was crucified was a garden, and in the garden a new sepulchre, . . . hewn in stone wherein never man before was laid" (Luke xxiii. 53, John xix. 41). The stone or rock perhaps suggested the notion of a hill. Moreover the derivation of G. (not "a place of skulls," but "of a skull," Matt. xxvii. 33) implies a bald, round, skull-like mound or hillock, not a mount literally, but spiritually entitled to the name as being that sacred elevation to which our lifted up Lord would draw all hearts (John xii. 32). "Without the gate" (Heb. xiii. 12); "nigh to the city" (John xix. 20); near a thoroughfare where "they that passed by reviled Him" (Matt. xxvii. 39), and where "Simon a Cyrenian who passed by, coming out of the country," was compelled to bear His cross (Mark xv. 21). Elliott thinks the arguments in favour of its proximity to the present traditional site preponderate; the nearness of the assumed site to that of Herod's palace is important. [But see JERUSALEM.] The explorations of Capt. Warren favour a site N. of Jerusalem.

Goliath. Perhaps a descendant of the old Rephaim, a remnant of whom, when dispersed by Ammon, took refuge with the Philistines (Deut. ii. 20, 21; 2 Sam. xxi. 22). Heb. golleh means an exile. Simonis derives it from an Arabic root, "stout." Gath is incidentally mentioned in Samuel as G.'s city. Now Moses records the spies' report (Num. xiii. 32, 33) of Canaan, "there we saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which came of the giants; and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers." Again in Josh. xi. 21, 22 it is written, "Joshua cut off the Anakims from the mountains, from Hebron, . . . there was none of the Anakims left in the land of Israel, only in Gath and in Ashdod there remained." Thus three independent witnesses, Moses, Joshua, and Samuel, in the most undesigned way confirm the fact that G. was a giant of Gath. His height, six cubits and a span, would make 9 ft. 2 in. Parisian measure, a height not unparalleled. But LXX. and Josephus read four cubits and a span. His coat of mail, covering chest, back, and lower parts of the body, was "scale armour," quasquicith (comp. Lev. xi. 9, 10). Keil and Delitzsch for "target of brass" transl. (kildon) "a brazen lance." G. needed no target to cover his back, as this was protected by the coat of mail. [On the scene of battle see ELAH; on the battle, etc., DAVID and ELHANAN.]

Gomer. 1. Japhet's eldest son; father of Ashkenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah (Gen. x. 2, 3). A warlike ally of Magog (Scythia) Gog (Ezek. xxxviii. 6), coming from the N. The Cimmerians warred in northwestern Asia from 670 to 570 B.C. Originally dwelling in what is now southern Russia, the Ukraine (the Crima betrays their name, the Cimmerian Bosphorus); then being dispossessed by the Scythians, they fled across the Caucasus into Armenia and Asia Minor; they warred with Lydia, and burnt the temple of Diana of Ephesus. They are the stock of the Cymry (as the Welsh call themselves; the English gave them the name "Welsh," i.e. foreigners, though originally they occupied the whole of the British isles but were driven back by succeeding invaders to the northwestern extremities, which their two divisions, the Gael of Ireland and Scotland and the Cymry of Wales, occupy), and gave their name to Cumber-land. They once occupied the Cimbric Chersonese (Denmark). The Galatians were Celts, and so sprang from G. 2. Daughter of Diblahim. G. = completion or ripeness, viz. of consummate wickedness; daughter of doubled layers of grape-vine (Hos. i. 3). One completely given up to sensuality. Hosea in vision (not in external act, which would be revolting to purity) takes by God's command G. to wife, though a woman "of whoredoms"; symbolically teaching that out of this world, which whorishly has departed from the Lord, God takes a church to be sanctified by communion with Himself in Christ, as G. was sanctified by communion with the prophet (1 Cor. vii. 14). The Saviour unites to Himself the unholy, to make it holy. [But see HOSEA.]

Gomorrah. Traces of the catastrophe recorded in Gen. xix. are visible in the whole region about the Dead, or as Scripture calls it, the SALT SEA [see]. Volcanic agency and earthquake, accompanying the fire shower, may have produced the deep depression of the sea, and so arrested the Jordan's original onward course through the Arabah into the gulf of Akabah. The northern end of the lake is 1300 ft. deep, the southern only 13 ft. below the surface. The southern division or bay of the sea most probably was formed at a late date. It abounds with salt, throws up bitumen, sulphur, and nitre on its shores. This answers to the vale of Siddim, "full of slime pits" (Gen. xiv. 10); and it accords with the destruction of the four cities of the plain by fire and brimstone, and with the turning of Lot's wife into a pillar of salt. Scripture does not say the cities were immersed in the sea, but that they were destroyed by fire from heaven (Deut. xxix. 23; Jer. xlix. 18, l. 40; Zeph. ii. 9; 2 Pet. ii. 6; Jude 4-7, "an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly"; Amos iv. 11). So Josephus, B. J., iv. 8, § 4. The traditional panes of Usdum, and site of Zoar, the hill of salt said to have been Lot's wife, favour the view that the cities lay either in or around the present southern bay. Grove argues for the northern site that Abram and Lot near Bethel could not have seen the southern valleys (Gen. xiii. 10) but could see the northern, and that what they saw was "the Ciccar of the Jordan," whereas Jordan flowed into the northern end of the Dead Sea but not into the southern. But Gen. xiii. probably means only that Lot, seeing the Jordan N. of the Dead Sea, and knowing the whole valley N. and S. to be well watered, chose it. Moreover, the catastrophes palpable to sight all round the southern end imply that the Jordan once flowed to the S. of that sea. G. means submersion; Arabic ghomara, to "overwhelm with water." G. was one of the five cities of the vale of Siddim whose forces were routed by Chedorlaomer, till Abram helped them. Zoar or Bela alone of the five, at Lot's request, escaped destruction by the fire from the Lord.

Jerusalem when corrupted (for "the corruption of the best is the worst of all corruptions") is termed Sodom and her people G. (Isa. i. 9, 10); as the church apostate corrupted is termed "Babylon" (Rev. xvii.). Worse still are they who see Christ's "mighty works" yet "repent not," and who receive not the apostles' teaching (Matt. x. 15, Mark vi. 11). The profound depression of the plain of G., the deepest on the earth, and its stagnant tropical air, answered to its sunken morals. De Sauley thinks that in Usdum and Um Zoghal traces of Sodom exist; and in Ain Feshkub (Gumran, Arabic) on the N.W. traces of G. Rather in wady Amrah is to be sought a connection with G. Tristram objects to the southern site for Sodom and G. that Chedorlamer marching from mount Seir to Hazazon Tamar (Engedi) afterwards meets the king of Sodom in the vale of Siddim, which therefore in the order ought to be rather at the northern end of the Dead Sea. Also Moses saw Zoar from mount Nebo (Deut. xxxiv. 3), which he could not had it been at the S.E. of Dead Sea. He thinks that the southern bed of the sea was formerly deeper than now, and that it was raised by deposits brought from the Arabah. Lightning probably kindled the masses of sulphurous bitumen abounding around. Combining with an earthquake, the storm cast showers of ignited bitumen on the cities, so that "the smoke of the country" was "as the smoke of a furnace," as beheld by Abraham. God often uses natural means in His most supernatural interventions.

Gopher wood. Gen. vi. 11. Perhaps cypress, kupar resembling gopher; suitable for shipbuilding; abounding in Babylonia and Adiabene, the region which may have been that of Noah's building. It was here Alexander obtained timber for building his fleet.

Goshen. 1. Three Egyptian nomes in the Delta, and extending over part of G. bore a name beginning with ka or ga, "a bull," viz. Mnevis, worshipped at On, representing Tum the unknown source of all existence. N.E. of Lower Egypt, having the Mediterranean on N., the desert on E., the Delta and the Tanitic branch of the Nile on W. (hence called the field of Zoan or Tanis, Ps. lxxviii. 12, 43), extending S. to the head of the Red Sea and nearly to Memphis. Called also the land of Ramesses, in which Israel built (i.e. fortified anew) for Pharaoh Raameses and Pithom as treasure cities (Gen. xlviii. 11, Exod. i. 11). Joseph naturally placed his family on the border land between Egypt and Palestine, the promised land, and at the same time near himself at Tanis or else Memphis the capital of Egypt. G. corresponded to Wady-t-Tumeylat. The fresh water canal runs through it from the Nile to Ismailia. From El Wady to the head of the gulf of Suez is three days' journey, the distance assigned in Exodus. The answer of Joseph's brethren to Pharaoh (Gen. xli. 28, 34), "thy servants have been herdsmen from our youth," (Joseph so instructing them "that ye may dwell in . . . G., for every shepherd is an abomination to the Egyptians.") proves that G. was regarded by Egyptians as scarcely Egypt proper, though having many Egyptians in it, as is recorded during the ten plagues; also foreigners. [See BERRAN.] The names of some places in G. are Semitic, as Migdol and Babilzaphon. Joseph lived under the 12th or 13th dynasty, a native not a shepherd dynasty (as Gen. xli. 34 proves). Pharaoh calls G. "the best of the land" (xlvii. 5-11), viz. terra pastoralis as Israel; for in tillage the parts of Egypt next the Nile are more fertile than G. In G. Pharaoh implies he kept some of his cattle, over which he proposed to set Israelites as rulers of herdsmen. The separation of Israel from the plagues marks the distinctness of the land. Israel setting out from Ramesses in G. in two days reached the edge of the wilderness, and in one day more the Red Sea, i.e. from Ramesses (on the old canal from the Tanitic arm of the Nile to lake Timsah) 30 miles direct to the ancient western shore. The LXX. call G. "Gesen of Arabia," and Pliny "the Arabic nome" from its bordering on Arabia. Now Esh-Shukkiyeh, well intersected by canals; Egypt's best province, yielding the largest revenue. 2. A district in S. Palestine, between Gaza and Gibeon (Josh. x. 41, xi. 16), and a city (xv. 51); between the S. country (the Negeb) and the shephelah (the low hills between the mountain and plain, not as A.V. "the valley") of Judah. Doubtless named in remembrance of Israel's original place of sojourn in Egypt.

Gospels. From god spel, "good news." The providential preparations for the gospel attest its Divine origin. (1) The translation at Alexandria of the O. T. into Greek (by the LXX.), rendering the Jewish Scriptures accessible through that then universal language of the refined and polite to the literary of all nations. All possibility of questioning the existence or falsifying the contents of O. T. prophecy was precluded thereby, however much the Jews who rejected Jesus would have wished to alter the prophecies which plainly identified Him as the foretold Messiah. The canon of the O. T. having been completed, and prophecy having ceased before the Sept. translation, they could not deny that the Divine knowledge derivable from it was complete. (2) Greek and oriental philosophy had drawn attention to religious and moral speculations, which at once exposed and undermined paganism, and yet with all its endless labours gave no satisfactory answer to the questionings and cravings of man's spiritual being. (3) The Roman empire had broken down the barriers between E. and W. and united almost the whole world, Asia, Africa, and Europe, in one, and established peace and good order, making possible the rapid transmission of the glad tidings from country to country: comp. Luke ii. 1, Matt. xxii. 21. (4) The universal expectation in the East of a great king to arise in Judea, probably due to fragments of revelation (as the prophecy of Balaam, Num. xxiv. 17) such as led the wise men of the East to come seeking "the king of the Jews." (5) The settling of the Jews, and the consequent erection of synagogues, throughout all the towns of Asia, Greece, Italy, Africa, and western Europe. Hence by the reading of the law and the prophets in the synagogues everywhere each sabbath proselytes of righteousness were gathered from the Gentiles, such as the eunuch or chamberlain of Candace, queen of the Ethiopians, a student of Scripture, Cornelius the centurion who "feared God with all his house, and gave much alms to the people, and prayed to God alway." These not being bound under the ceremonial yoke, as the original Jews, formed a connecting link with the Gentiles; and hence at Antioch in Pisidia, when the Jews rejected the preaching of Paul and Barnabas, these proselytes, with the Gentiles, "besought that these words might be preached to them the next sabbath, . . . and on that day came almost the whole city together to hear the word of God" (Acts xiii. 15-41). So at Iconium (xiv. 1), and at Thessalonica (xvii. 1-4). Such were the "devout men, out of every nation under heaven," the collected representatives of the world, to whom Peter preached with such success (ii. 4-11). The 3000 converts of that day and the 5000 of a few days after (iv. 4) would act as missionaries on their return to their several nations. To the Jews first in each synagogue abroad the apostles preached, and gathered many converts from among them; and then to the Gentiles. The Jews' national rejection of Jesus is no valid objection to the gospel, since He foretold it Himself (Matt. xvi. 21, xxvi. 2), and the O. T. prophets did so too (Isa. xlix. 16, 21, lit. liii.; Is. xxii.); so that, fixing their eyes on the prophecies of Messiah's glory and kingdom which they wrested to mean His setting up a temporal kingdom at Jerusalem and overthrowing the Roman existing dominion, and shutting their eyes to the prophecies of His humiliation, "they knew Him not, nor yet the voices of the prophets which are read every sabbath," and yet in spite of themselves, like their types Joseph's brethren (Gen. i. 20), "they have fulfilled them in condemning Him" (Acts xiii. 27, iii. 18). The harmony in Christ of prophecies seemingly so opposite, His temporal and temporary humiliation, and yet His spiritual dominion now and His final visible and everlasting kingdom, furnish conclusive proof of the Divinity of prophecies which no human sagacity could have anticipated or human agency fulfilled. The correspondence of the gospel event to the predictions of the O. T. is thus established by the Jews, unwilling witnesses and therefore beyond suspicion. Graves (Pentateuch, ii. 3. G.) well says, had they universally embraced the gospel at its first publication, the sceptic might allege the prophecies to have been fabricated or altered to fit them to the events; the contrary is now certain. This is one great cause why the national conversion of the Jews is delayed "until the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in" (Rom. xi. 35). They continue guardians of the prophetic records till these shall have had their contents examined, and their application ascertained, by every other nation in the world.

Genuineness and inspiration of the four Gospels. The "prophets" in the Christian church who had the spiritual gift of "discerning spirits" were an effectual check on the introduction of a pseudo inspired writing. Paul appeals to them on the inspiration of his epistles (1 Cor. xiv. 37, xii. 10; comp. 1 John iv. 1). Thus by the twofold inspiration, that of the authors and that of the judges, the canonicity of the four Gospels, as of the other books of N. T., is established. The anonymous fragment of the canon of the N. T. attributed to Cains a presbyter of Rome (published by Muratori, Antiq. Ital., iii. 854, and known as the Muratorian Fragment), recognises the Gospels (Luke and John, the sentences as to Matthew and Mark are obliterated) as inspired, and condemns as uninspired the Shepherd by Hermas, "written very recently in our own times," i.e. in the first part of the second century, the age in which John the last apostle died. Theophilus (Ad Autol., iii. 11), bishop of Antioch A.D. 168, refers to "the evangelists" and "the Holy Scriptures" of the N. T. Clement of Alexandria in the latter part of the second century refers to the collection of Gospels as one whole, "the gospel" (Quis Dives Salvus?). The anonymous epistle to Diognetus (§ 11 ed. Hefele) attributed to Justin Martyr refers to "the Gospels and the Apostles" (i.e. the epistles). Ignatius of Antioch, a hearer of St. John (Ep. ad Philad., § 5), calls "the (written) Gospel the flesh of Jesus," and classifies it with the O. T. prophets. Tertullian (Adv. Marc., iv. 2), mentioning the four Gospels two as the work of apostles and two as that of apostolic men (A.D. 208); Irenæus (Adv. Her., ii. 27, iii. 11, § 7), martyred A.D. 202; Origen, speaking of the four Gospels as "the elements of the church's faith"; Eusebius; and not only these orthodox writers but heretics, Marcion and others, appeal to the Gospels as the inspired standard (see CATON). They were translated into Syriac in the second century, and into Latin and the two Egyptian dialects by the fourth century. We have better evidence for their genuineness than for any other ancient writing. Theophilus arranged the four Gospels so as to form one work (Jerome, Ep. ad Algas., iv. 197). Tatian, who died A.D. 170, formed a Diatessaron or harmony of the four. Barnabas (Paul's companion), Clement of Rome (Phil. iv. 3), and Polycarp quote the Gospels, though not with verbal exactness. Justin Martyr quotes Matthew, Luke, and John largely and exactly. As the heretic gnostics and Marcion arose early in the second century their acceptance of the Gospels proves that these had been promulgated some time before (i.e. in the apostolic age itself), for after the dissensions between the orthodox and heretics had arisen the Gospels would never have been accepted by mutually hostile parties. A distinct line was drawn between the apocryphal and the genuine Gospels. Unbelievers, as Celsus in controversy with Origen, could not deny the genuineness of the four even whilst rejecting their contents. The fathers' large quotations (Origen's especially) prove our Gospels were the same as theirs.

Our Saviour wrote nothing Himself, the alleged letter to Algarus, king of Edessa, being probably spurious. Had He, like Mahomet, recorded His own miracles and teachings, internal consistency would have been nothing marvellous. Men would have deified the form, whilst failing to discern the inner essence. "If I bear witness of Myself My witness is not true" (John v. 31). There would be lost the powerful proof we now have, from the mutual coherence of writings not composed by the Founder of Christianity nor in His lifetime, but by Jews, unlearned mostly, giving independent yet marvellously agreeing accounts of miraculous works, and a spiritual system of doctrine unheard before, themselves willing to lay down their lives for the truths they witnessed to; these writings received and accepted too by numerous congregations, living at the time and in the very places where the miracles alleged in proof of their inspiration were wrought, and producing worldwide effects now for ages. The reality of their inspiration alone can account for all this. The Jews and Gentiles had attained high civilization when Christ came; it is not in such an age that myths spring up and are accepted, but in a people's infancy (2 Pet. i. 16).

Mutual relation of the four.—They differ in language and details, so that the later cannot have been mere copyists of their predecessors. Their accordance in unusual expressions and in choice of incidents implies at the same time that the later evangelists were acquainted with the Gospels that preceded. The four have by the Holy Spirit's design, if not by that of the writers, a supplementary relation to each other. Each later evangelist has a twofold aim: (1) to confirm by his own independent witness the facts recorded in the preceding Gospel; (2) to give new facts, and to place those already recorded in a new light. The former aim accounts for the agreements, the latter for the variations. In the first three, called the synoptical Gospels, from the main outline being the same and the scene of Christ's ministry mainly Galilee, the first aim is prominent. In the fourth, written long after, all is new except the events of passion week and the feeding of the 5000 (and the storm at sea) recorded to introduce the discourse in Galilean Capernaum (John vi.); and the scene is mainly not in Galilee but Judæa. But they hint also at Christ's ministry in Judæa (Matt. xxiii. 37, Luke xiii. 34); John too occasionally describes His Galilean ministry (ii. vi., vii., xxi.). Of 99 portions in Matthew and 93 in Mark, 78 are common to both; also of 65 particulars in Mark 54 appear in Matthew in the same relative order. Yet that Mark does not copy Matthew appears from his restoring the true order of events before the Baptist's death, from which Matthew had departed to give prominence to the sermon on the mount and the apostolic commission, and to make less prominent the narrative, which is but one third of the whole. Mark too, of all four, abounds in the most minute graphic touches as an eye-witness of the scenes, though his Gospel is the shortest. In 42 sections the three synoptists coincide, 12 more are given by Matthew and Mark alone, five by Mark and Luke alone, 14 by Matthew and Luke. Besides, five are peculiar to Matthew, two to Mark, nine to Luke. The verbal coincidences are chiefly in re-peating the words of Jesus or of others in connection with Him, seldom in the narrative of the evangelists themselves. In Matthew the proportion is as one to more than two, in Mark one to four, in Luke one to ten (Norton, Genuineness, i. 240). Stroud thus tabulates the four, taking 100 as the sum:

	Portions peculiar to each.		Coincidences.	Total.
Mark	7	...	93	100
Matthew	42	...	58	100
Luke	59	...	41	100
John	92	...	8	100

John's narrative of Mary's anointing of Jesus' feet combines her actions drawn from Luke, the ointment and its value from Mark, and the admonition to Judas from Matthew. His chief aim is to set forth Jesus as the incarnate Word, the everlasting Son of God, a truth which some gnostics preceding Cerinthus even already began to impugn. Yet he omits facts recorded by the synoptists which would have suited his purpose, just because he knew they had sufficiently recorded them already.

That Luke wrote chronologically in his general facts is probable from his phrase "in order" (i. 1; peculiar to him, expressing succession viii. 1, "afterward," Gr. "in order," Acts xviii. 23). His "Acts" are in chronological order. Notes of time occur in his Gospel (i. 26, 56; iii. 1, 23; vi. 1). Of 44 particulars in Mark and 42 in Luke, (forming the latter's main part ending with ix. 50.) 32 are common to both, and with one exception in the same order; the more remarkable as ten new particulars are inserted in Luke, 12 in Mark; the true succession alone would admit of such insertions without irregularity ensuing. At xviii. 15, the blessing of the children, Luke's narrative rejoins Matthew and Mark. The middle portion relates to the last half year of Jesus' ministry, ix. 51 refers to His last journey to Jerusalem. His mission of the 70 before Him (x.), also xiii. 22, 23, xvii. 11, xxiii. 5 confirm this. His route was through Samaria into Galilee from Ephraim (Luke ix. 51, John xi. 54) as the starting point, then along the border between Galilee and Samaria into Perea (Luke xvii. 11, xiii. 31), so by Jericho to Bethany and Jerusalem (Birks' Hore Evangel. and Gresswell; but see JESUS CHRIST).

Mark wrote before Luke, for except 24 verses all his Gospel is in one of the two other synoptists; he never, if he was after Luke, would for the sake of 24 verses of original matter have published a distinct Gospel. His graphic vividness indicates an eyewitness not a compiler. Matthew, the earlier, omits the ascension as involved in the resurrection. Luke, the later writer, supplies the omission. Matthew, writing for Judaea, dwells on facts less known there, Christ's appearing in Galilee, omitting the ascension as known to most of his readers. Luke, writing for Gentile converts, describes facts less familiar to them which occurred after the resurrection in and about Jerusalem. Matthew selects facts suitable for Jews, the fulfilment of O.T. prophecy in Jesus' descent from Abraham and David and His legal title to Solomon's throne. Luke shows the Gentiles that He was sprung from Adam, the common father of Gentiles and Jews. Matthew is more copious in discourses, the facts being taken for granted as notorious to his readers, the first thing needed being to show the Jews in what relation Christ's teaching stood to the law. Luke is copious in facts less known to the Gentiles and on Christ's later ministry; Matthew having already dwelt more on His earlier ministry. Mark uses "gospel" for Christ's doctrine; a later usage, not in Matthew (see MATTHEW and MARK). Matthew in naming the twelve (x. 3) modestly places himself after Thomas as "Luke the publican." Mark and Luke place him before Thomas, and omit the humiliating epithet; also they do not join his former profession with the apostolic name Matthew, but hide it under his less known name Levi (Matt. ix. 9, Mark ii. 14, Luke v. 27). This is an undesigned propriety and mark of truth. John by his greater fulness on Jesus' Godhead composed a doctrinal supplement to the synoptists, who dwelt more on His ministry as the "Son of man" (though they too declare plainly His Godhead: Matt. xvi. 16, 17; Luke i. 32, etc.). John marks Christ's going up to the feasts at Jerusalem, which they do not. He also supplies the interval, omitted in them, from the temptation to Jesus' second return to Galilee when His public ministry began, after John was cast into prison. He inserts in this interval Jesus' "earliest" return to Galilee (John i. 43) and visit to Jerusalem (ii. 13) and Judaea (iii. 22, 24), before the Baptist's imprisonment. Then at iv. 3, 43 his Gospel coincides with the synoptists at Christ's second visit to Galilee (Matt. iv. 12, Luke iv. 14). In John vii. 1 he alludes to His 18 months' ministry in Galilee, recorded by them and therefore omitted by him, between the visit to Jerusalem at the feast of tabernacles (vii. 2, 10) and the former visit (v. 1), for vi. 4 compared with vii. 1 implies Christ omitted attending the pass-over occurring in that interval lest the Jews should kill Him before the time. John xxi. 1 evidently supplements Matt. xxviii. 16, which it precedes in time. John xxi. 6, 7 supplements Luke v. 6, 8, the corresponding miracle before His resurrection.

There are three periods marked in Acts: (1) From the ascension to the rise of the first purely Gentile church at Antioch where the disciples were first called Christians (Acts xi. 23); the first Gospel, Matthew, answers to this first and Jewish period, between A.D. 30 and A.D. 41. The second period is from the rise of the Gentile church at Antioch to Paul's passing over to Europe in obedience to the vision at Troas; the second Gospel, Mark, answers to this Judaeo-Gentile transition period, A.D. 41 or 44—A.D. 50; hence there occur (Mark vii.) adaptations to Gentile converts by explanations of Jewish usages. The third period extends from Paul's first entering Europe down to his reaching Rome; the third Gospel, Luke, answers to this third period, A.D. 50-63, being suited to Greeks not familiar with the geography of Judaea; it must have been written before Acts i. 1 which refers to it (Acts being written probably soon after A.D. 63, the date of the close of Paul's imprisonment with which it abruptly breaks off). Theophilus probably lived at Antioch (Birks' Hor. Evang., 192), and Luke perhaps published his Gospel at the close of his first connection with Paul, whom he joined at Troas A.D. 53, and who seems to have helped him as Peter did Mark. Philippi, where Luke was left behind, was perhaps the centre from which he circulated it among the Greek churches. Comp. 2 Cor. viii. 18, "the brother whose praise is in the Gospel throughout all the churches."

Mark probably wrote whilst having the opportunity of Peter's guidance in Palestine, between his return from Perga and his second journey with Barnabas in or for Caesarea, the second centre of gospel preaching as Jerusalem was the first and Antioch the third, the scene of Cornelius' conversion by Peter, Mark's father in the faith, the headquarters of the Roman forces in Palestine, where Philip the evangelist resided. Latin idioms and Roman energy are characteristic of Mark, whose very name is Roman. Many centurions are honourably noticed in the Gospels and Acts, so that it is likely the gospel made much way among the Romans at Caesarea. In Col. iv. 10 he is identified with John (Heb.) Mark (Latin) by the addition "sister's son to Barnabas." He was with Peter in Mesopotamian Babylon (A.D. 58) when Peter (1 Pet. v. 13) calls him "Mark (Marcus) my son." Peter, after escaping from Herod's prison, went to the house of John Mark's mother first (Acts xii. 12). Eusebius, from Papias or John Presb., (H. Eccl., iii. 39, v. 8) calls Mark "Peter's interpreter," "handing down in writing what Peter preached." Justin Martyr, Dial. Tryph., 106, quotes Mark's Gospel as "Records (or Memorials, ἀπομνημονεύματα) of Peter." Tertullian (Marc., iv. 5) and Jerome (Ad Ecdih.) say, "Peter narrated, Mark wrote." Internal evidence favours this tradition. Mark's Gospel, except a few verses, is limited to the time of Peter's attendance on our Lord. The blessing pronounced on him after his confession of Christ is omitted, whilst the ensuing reproof is retained; his fall is recorded, but not his bitter tears of repentance. For other instances of omitting what tends to Peter's honour comp. Matt. xiv. 29, xvii. 24-27; Mark ix. 30-33, xiv. 47; John xviii. 10; Luke v. 10, xxiv. 34. The angel's words addressed to Mary Magdalene after Christ's resurrection, "Go, tell His disciples and Peter," are recorded owing to Peter's deep sense of Christ's pardoning grace after his grievous fall; delicacy forbade his recording his own repentance, gratitude can never forget that Jesus' first words of special comfort were sent to him, "tell Peter" specially, for his Saviour has risen even for his justification (Mark xvi. 7). Mark's Gospel, brief, vivid, and abounding in acts rather than discourses, was best suited to the Roman character, with fewer O.T. quotations than Matthew who wrote for the Jews. The tradition of its being written in Rome arose probably from its Roman character; from Caesarea it would soon pass to Rome through Romans sailing from Caesarea thither. Mark's shortcoming was that of his spiritual father, Peter, slowness to admit unrepentant Gentile Christians to the privileges of full fellowship (Acts xiii. 13, xv. 38; comp. x. 14, Gal. ii. 11-14). Mark, from love of ease and home, as well as Jewish prejudice, shrunk from carrying the gospel to the heathen of Pamphylia; but by subsequent zeal he so regained Paul's favour that the apostle desired Luke to bring him, saying "he is profitable to me for the ministry" (2 Tim. iv. 11).

Matthew presumes his readers are familiar with Jewish usages and localities, and appeals to their prophecies continually. This accords with the earliest period of church history. The closing charge "Go ye, teach all nations," accords with the church's circumstances at its opening the door to Cornelius and Gentile proselytes, A.D. 41. Eusebius' Chronicle in some MSS. gives this date. A written Gospel was not needed when all the apostles were in Jerusalem; but just when they were going abroad a record such as Matthew's was needed. Isidore and Nicephorus (H. Eccl., ii. 15) fix on 15 years after the ascension as the date.

Thus in the Jewish aspect of Matthew's Gospel, the Roman of Mark's, and the Greek of Luke's, we observe the contour of the three chief human civilizations, the Hebrew theocracy, the Roman polity, and the Greek literary and artistic refinement; whilst in John's the spiritual verities of the Son of God predominate. The same significant union appears in the Heb., Gr., and Latin inscription on the cross.

Gospel harmonies: spiritual relations. Discrepancies have been alleged in the Gospels. But they are not irreconcilable; granting that the ways of harmonizing proposed are not always the true ways, the very variations disprove collusion. Reconcilable diversity is a confirmation of the truth, as alleged by mutually independent witnesses. Entire sameness in all four would make all but the first mere copies. Contradictions would prove one or other inaccurate. Substantial unity, with circumstantial diversity, partial and reconcilable, is the highest kind of internal evidence. As in architecture a front and a side view, a ground plan and an elevation, are different, yet harmonize in viewing the connected whole, so the four, though not fac similes, have an inner harmony when one first looks to the purpose and the individual spiritual character of each, and then to the mutually connected whole in its fourfold aspect. The variation in the order of the same events as recorded in different Gospels (Matt. viii. 28 comp. Mark v. 1, Luke viii. 26; Matt. viii. 19-22 comp. Luke ix. 57-61) does not imply discrepancy unless it could be shown that all the evangelists designed throughout a chronological record. The spiritual sequence and connection is the essential thing in a revelation, and is as true in those Gospel passages which do not observe the chronological order as in those which do; for the same truth is manifold in its spiritual bearings, and is therefore put in various connections, under the Spirit's guidance, for the church's edification. Fuller information as to all the facts of the case would clear away seeming discrepancies. It is enough for the harmonist to show a possible reconciliation (in the absence of fuller knowledge); this is sufficient even to meet a priori objections against the accurate truth of details, and such objections have no force against the gospel as a whole. "Substantial truth under circumstantial variety" is the most conclusive testimony, as proving the mutual independence of the witnesses, for had all four been alike their testimony would have been that of but one witness. At the same time all four, being supervised by the Spirit of God, are true in their order of events spiritually, though but one order is true chronologically. Mechanical uniformity is no necessary result of inspiration. The four are not mere annals or biographies, but spiritual records, "memoirs" adapted to various wants of the Christian life. A diatessaron, or continuous record compiled chronologically out of the four, fails in this, viz. the setting forth of the events under their mutual, manifold, spiritual relations. Christ's life, death and resurrection are represented from four different aspects to complete the view. Each Gospel has its distinctive character; the progression of the four reaches its climax in John, who portrays the Divinity of the Son of God, as the former three portray His humanity. They are not four different Gospels, but one fourfold Gospel from the Holy Ghost, through four intelligent agents, each giving that view of the Lord Jesus which belonged to his own character and circumstances, and those of his immediate readers, and so by Divine providence meeting severally the church's wants in all ages. Seeming discrepancies are a test of faith, whether in spite of difficulties we will, because of the preponderating probabilities, believe all God's word. They are incentives for us more diligently to "search the Scriptures," which contain within themselves their own best vindication and harmony.

The Gospels are fragmentary, complete spiritually but not historically; hence the seeming discrepancies. Those early churches which collected the canon saw the alleged discrepancies, but saw nothing in them incompatible with inspiration and truth; otherwise they would not have transmitted them: as in nature the seeming variations in the orbits of some planets are found, on fuller knowledge, to be in harmony with the general law.

FOURFOLD GOSPEL.—Irenæus (iii. 11), Athanasius (Syn. Scr., p. 55), Jerome (Matt., proem.) regarded the four living CHERUBIM [see] united in one as representing the fourfold gospel. Both are the chariot of God bearing Him into all lands (Ps. xcix. 1, xix. 4), guided by the Spirit, intertwined with wheels in wheels of coincidences and variations, full of eyes, discerning the thoughts. The four in their spiritual ideal reveal the Saviour under a fourfold aspect. (1.) The lion denotes Christ's kingship, as "lion of the tribe of Judah." Matthew traces His line of succession to the throne from "David the king." The wise men (ii.), according to Balaam's prophecy of the "sceptre to arise out of Israel," sought "the king of the Jews." The climax of the three temptations (iv.) is Satan's offer of the kingdom. The sermon on the mount has the sententious tone of an authoritative king. Seven parables illustrate the true nature of the kingdom, for the Jews for whom Matthew writes looked for Messiah's kingdom. His claim of exemption from tribute, recorded in Matthew alone (xvii. 24), marks Him Son and Heir of the kingdom. Matthew closes with His universal dominion (xxviii. 18-20). (2.) The ox or calf typifies patient toil (1 Cor. ix. 9, 10). Mark's representation of Christ corresponds; homely, earnest, minutely graphic, full of action rather than discourse, suited to the Roman practical character, it abruptly carries us at once into Christ's ministry of unceasing toil (i.). The word variously translated "straightway," "immediately," "forthwith," "anon," "as soon as," "by and by" (entheôs) occurs 27 times, though in Matthew but eight times, in Luke twice; an illustration of its energetic tone. Minute details are peculiar to his vivid style: "Jesus was with the wild beasts" (i. 13); "Zebedee with the hired servants" (i. 20); Boanerges (iii. 17); Jesus' gestures (iii. 5); His successive acts in curing the deaf (vii. 33, 34); the lingering glory on His countenance, and the people's amazement (ix. 15). It presents the best picture of Jesus' daily outward life. (3.) A man's face denotes human sympathy. Luke's Gospel presents the lowly humanity of the Son of man's conception, birth, and childhood; it traces Him up to Adam, the common father of all men. The parables and miracles peculiar to Luke exhibit Christ's human tenderness; the prodigal son, the good Samaritan, the grateful Samaritan leper, the publican's prayer, Zaccheus, the raising of the Nain widow's son. (4.) The eagle denotes high soaring heavenly-ness. John's Gospel, say the fathers, is "the Gospel after the Spirit," as the others are "after the flesh." John supplies details of Andrew, Philip, Nathanael, Thomas, and Judas, not mentioned by the others; also details of time, place, and numbers; also supplemental matter (ii. 19), "destroy this temple," accounting for the charge of the false witnesses unexplained in Matt. xxvi. 61. In the prologue and elsewhere Christ's characteristic aspect is His Divine glory breaking forth the brighter amidst the darkness of the Jews' opposition. Each of the four, whilst recognising the Lord's other aspects, has one aspect prominent; and the four combine in one harmonious whole, joined by a spiritual not a mechanical unity. "Mutual intertexture is characteristic of Scripture. The second and third evangelists warranted the genuineness of each former Gospel with all the authority of the latter, by quoting its words. Thus they became joint vouchers for the genuine Gospels and joint opposers of the spurious. John authenticates the foregoing ones not by adopting but by omitting what they had related, and supplying what they omitted." (Bishop Wordsworth.)

Gourd. 1. Jonah iv. 6-10. So Augustine, LXX., and Syr. explain the Heb. quiquation; so modern Jews and Christians at Mosul (Nineveh). In gardens the arbour is often shaded with leaves of the bottle gourd; but the treelike and long growth of the Ricinus, Palma Christi, or castor oil plant make it the more likely; so Jerome describes it, "within a few days you see the plant grown into a little tree"; and Celsus identifies it with the Punic and Syriac el keraa, or Ricinus, and the Heb. is evidently from the Egyptian kiki, the same plant. The leaves are large and palmate, like a hand with outspread fingers (whence comes the name, Palma Christi), with serrated lobes. Castor oil is made from the seeds.

2. Wild gourds (2 Kings iv. 38-41), papayoth. It resembles the vine; and as several of the Cucurbitaceæ, melons, pumpkins, etc., from their juiciness, in a hot climate are favourite articles of food, a noxious sort might easily be mistaken for a wholesome kind. The squirting or wild cucumber (Ecbalium elaterium); the fruit opening, from papah "to open," and scattering its seeds when touched) and the calocynth (about the size of an orange) are such. The latter is favoured by the old versions, and its derivation also suits the dry gourds, when crushed, bursting or opening with a crashing noise.

GOZAN. A river (1 Chron. v. 26; 2 Kings xvii. 6, xviii. 11). Thither the captive Israelites were transported by Shalmaneser and Esarhaddon. Now the Kizil Ören, the golden river of Media, which rises in Kurdistan and ultimately falls into the White River, and so into the Caspian Sea. A country also bore the name of the river, Gazanitis (Ptolemy, Geog. v. 18); Mygdonia is the same name with M prefixed. So Habor was a region and a river (the Khabour, the affluent of the Euphrates). The region is one of great fertility (Gayard, Nineveh and Babylon). G. in G. Rawlinson's view was the district on the river Habor or Khabour.

Grass. Its rapid fading in the heat of Palestine is a frequent image of man's frailty (Is. ciii. 14, 15, xc. 5, 6; Isa. xl. 6, 7). In Jer. l. 11 for "the heifer at grass" (fat and frisky), since the gender of "at grass" (dasha), confounded with dasha "grass" does not agree with eglah "a heifer," transl. "a heifer threshing (treading out) corn." The strongest were used for threshing, and as the law did not allow their mouth to be muzzled in threshing (Deut. xxv. 4) they waxed wanton with superabundant food, an image of Judah's insatiable destroyers.

It is a coincidence undesigned, and therefore a mark of genuineness, that by three evangelists the "grass" is noticed in the miraculous feeding of the 5000; John (vi. 10) saying, "there was much grass in the place" (a notable circumstance in Palestine, where grass is neither perennial nor universal; the latter rain and sunshine stimulate its rapid growth, but the scorching summer soon withers it and leaves the hills bare); Mark (vi. 39), with his usual graphic vividness, mentioning "the green grass"; Matthew (xiv. 19) simply stating Christ's command to "sit down on the grass." But in the feeding of the 4000 the multitude in both Gospels (Matt. xv. 35, Mark viii. 6) are commanded to "sit down on the ground." This delicate distinction disproves the notion that the two miracles are really different versions of the same miracle, as also that of the 12 (small) baskets (kophinai) in the miracle of the 5000, and the seven (larger) baskets (spurides) in that of the 4000. Comp. Matt. xvi. 9, 10 with xiv. 20, Luke ix. 17; kophinai being uniformly applied to the former miracle, spurides to the latter (Blunt, Undesigned Coinc.). In Matt. vi. 30 "the lily" is classed with "the grass of the field." "Grass" must here be used for all that grows in the field, wild flowers as well as grasses, herb-age.

Grasshopper. [See LOCUST.]

Greeians, Greeks, Greece. Called "Javan" Gen. x. 2. The Ionian on the W. of Asia Minor, whence perhaps emigrants originally passed to Attica and the Peloponnese. The Ionians of secular history however were a colony from Attica. Being the most eastern of the Greeks they were the first known to the Asiatics. Joel (iii. 6) mentions the Grecians as the purchasers to whom the Tyrian slave-merchants sold the children of Judah (500 B.C.). Ezekiel lxxviii. 13 mentions Javan (Greece) and Tyre as "trading in the persons of men." Daniel (viii. 5, 21, xi. 3) foretold the rise of Alexander the Great, "the great horn between the eyes of the rough goat" which "came from the W. on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground governing the earth with incredible swiftness, the 'leopard' vii. 6), and smote the ram" (Medo-Persia). Zechariah (ix. 13) represents Judah and Ephraim as the arrows filling God's bow, "when I have raised up thy son, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece" (Javan) thus foretelling that the Jewish Maccabees would punish Greece in the person of Antiochus Epiphanes, one of Alexander's successors, in just retribution for her purchasing from Tyre as slaves "the children of Judah and Jerusalem." Isaiah (lxvi. 19) foretells that the Jews who survive His judgments He will send as missionaries to Javan to "declare My glory among the Gentiles."

The most important function Greece performed in the gospel scheme was that it furnished the language adapted by its wide use among the refined of all nations, as also by its marvellous flexibility, capability of forming new theological terms, and power of expressing the most delicate shades of meaning, for conveying to the world the glad tidings of salvation through Christ. Orally it was generally used by the apostles in preaching, being then widely spoken; and it is the sole medium of the N. T. written word. The Gr. of N. T. and of the Grecians or Hellenist Jews was not classical Gr., but Hebrew modes of thought and idiom clothed with Gr. words. The LXX. and the Heb. are a necessary key to this N. T. Hellenistic Gr. The Grecians or Greek speaking Jews were at once Jewish missionaries to the heathen, witnessing everywhere against the prevalent polytheism, and pioneers to prepare unconsciously the way for the gospel missionary. They formed the connecting link between the Hebrew Jews and the Gentiles.

In Acts xx. 2 "Greece" (Hellas) means Greece Proper, or "Achaia," i.e. southern Greece including the Peloponnese, as opposed to Macedonia on the N.

In N. T. "Greek" (Hellen) is distinguished from "Grecian" (Hellenist). "Greek" means either a native of Greece or else a Gentile in general (Rom. x. 12, ii. 9, 10 marg) "Grecian" is a foreign Jew, lit. one who speaks Gr., as contrasted with a home Jew, a "Hebrew," dwelling in Palestine, or rather one speaking the secret tongue, Heb., whether dwelling in Palestine or elsewhere. So Paul, though of the Greek city Tarsus, calls himself a "Hebrew" and "of the Hebrews," i.e. having neither parent Gentile (Phil. iii. 5, 2 Cor. xi. 22). The first church at Jerusalem was composed of these two classes, the "Hebrew" and the "Grecian" Jews; whence, when the Grecian widows complained of being "neglected in the daily ministrations" of alms, the seven chosen to rectify matters were all "Grecians," judging from their Gr. names, Stephen, Prochorus, etc.

"Greeks" in the strict sense, whether native Greeks or Gentiles in general, were not admitted to the Christian church until later. Acts xi. 20, "Greeks" is the reading of the Alex. MS. rightly for "Grecians," for the "Grecians" were long before a recognised portion of the church (vi. 1), and some of those "scattered abroad" were among them (for none of the seven "Grecian" deacons, except Stephen, was as yet martyred) [see CHRISTIAN]; the new name marking the new epoch in the church. At first those scattered abroad "preached to the Jews only" (the word is not "Hebrews" but "Jews," including "Grecians"); afterwards some of them preached to heathen "Greeks." Their conversion was a new thing, a special "grace of God," tidings of which reaching the Jerusalem church constrained them to send Barnabas as far as Antioch, who "when he had seen the GRACE of God was glad" and enlisted the co-operation of Paul who had been in vision already called to "bear Christ's name unto the Gentiles" (ix. 15). "Spake also unto" is the true reading (xi. 20, Alex., Vat., Sin. MSS., Vulg. version). The "also" marks a further step than their "preaching unto the Jews (including 'Grecians') only." It was with the Grecians (Hellenists) that Paul came into controversy at his first visit to Jerusalem (Acts ix. 29). Their Grecian or foreign culture and education made them clever disputants; hence their keenness in controverting the new convert who had before sided with them against Stephen; the latter also was once a Grecian (Hellenist) Jew before his conversion to Christianity (vii. 58, vi. 9-14).

Greyhound. Prov. xxx. 31 marg. "girl in the loins," referring to the slenderness of its body at the loins, as if tightly girt for grace and swiftness in running, so that it is classed among the "things which go well." The ancient Egyptian paintings represent such close girt hounds used in coursing. Gesenius understands Prov. xxx. 31 "a war horse with ornamental trappings girt on its loins." Maurer, "a wrestler with loins girt for the struggle."

Grove. [See ASHORETH.] Transl. rather "Asherah," the image of the goddess. So 2 Kings xxiii. 6, where it is nonsense "Josiah brought out the grove (Asherah) from the house of the Lord"; Manasseh had "set this graven image of Asherah in the house" (2 Kings xxi. 7, xxii. 7; comp. Jud. iii. 7). Also a "grove" could not be "set up under every green tree" (2 Kings xvii. 10; 1 Kings xiv. 23, xviii. 19; Exod. xxxiv. 13). In Gen. xxi. 33 it is a different word, "Abraham planted a grove (eshol) in Beersheba," rather "a tamarisk tree," a hardly evergreen fitted to be a memorial to his posterity that the well was theirs. The Asherah was upright, fixed or planted in the ground; of wood, so that it was capable of being "cut down and burned" (Jud. vi. 25, 26; transl. 1 Kings xv. 13). "Maachah had made an idol Asherah" (not "in a grove"). The worship of Asherah, like that of Astarte or Ashtoreth, was associated with Baal worship. Astarte is the personal goddess, Ashtoreth her conventional symbol in some one of her attributes. The sacred tree in Assyrian sculptures is similar, a symbol of the goddess of nature. The stone "pillar" (as the Heb. for "image" ought to be transl. Exod. xxiv. 13) was Baal's symbol; as the wooden pillar or tree was Astarte's (2 Kings xviii. 4). The attempt to combine this with Jehovah worship is the subject of the prohibition Exod. xxiv. 13.

The Heb. word transl. "plain" (elon) signifies a grove or plantation; that of Mamre (Gen. xiii. 18), of Moreh (xii. 6), of Zaana'im (Jud. iv. 11), of the pillar in Shechem (Jud. ix. 6), of Meonenim (37), of Tabor (1 Sam. x. 3).

Groves were associated with worship from ancient times, as the passages just quoted show. Pliny states that trees were the first temples. Their shade, solitude, and solemn stillness suggested this use. The superstitious abuse of them to idolatry and licentious rites caused the Divine prohibition of them for religious purposes; which prohibition Israel disregarded (Jer. xvii. 2, Ezek. xx. 25). Trees were also used for national assemblies (Jud. ix. 6, 37), for burying the dead (Gen. xxxv. 8, 1 Sam. xxxi. 14). Some trees are specially noted: the tamarisk (eshel) under which Saul abode in Gibeah (1 Sam. xxii. 6); the terebinth in Shechem under which Joshua, after writing the law of God, set up (Josh. xxiv. 26) a great stone as a witness; the palmtree of Deborah (Jud. iv. 5); the terebinth of enchantments (ix. 37 marg., see MEONENIM); of wanderers (iv. 11, see ZAANA'IM); 1 Sam. xiv. 2, "a pomegranate tree in Migron" (x. 3). Tree worship, perhaps a distortion of the tradition of the tree of life and the tree of knowledge (Gen. iii.), may be traced in Egypt, Arabia, Syria, Assyria, Persia, India, Thibet, Siam, China, Japan, Ceylon, the Philippine isles. The Druids venerated oak groves (Pliny H. N., xvi. 44; Tacitus Ann., xiv. 30). The negro priests in Africa alone may enter the sacred groves. The Etrurians worshipped a palmtree.

Guard; tabbach. The king's executioner, lit. cook (Gen. xxxviii. 36 marg.; 2 Kings xxv. 8; Dan. ii. 14).

Re'ez—"the runner" who carried despatches (2 Chron. xxx. 6), and also acted as military guard to the Jewish kings (2 Sam. xv. 1). Mishmoreth—"watchmen" (Neh. iv. 9, 22).

Gudgodah: HOR HAGUDGAD [see] Deut. x. 7.

Guni. 1. Gen. xvi. 24; 1 Chron. vii. 13; Num. xxvi. 48. A patronymic, the plural name implying a family as well as an individual. 2. 1 Chron. v. 15.

Gur, the going up to: i.e., ascent to G. or the lion's whelp, where Ahaziah was killed whilst fleeing from Jehu (2 Kings ix. 27). It was "by Ibleam" (now Bel'aneh), between Jezreel and "the garden house" (Beth-hag-zan, now Jen'ah). Now Kefr Knd. The similarity of d and r in Hebrew led to their frequent interchange.

Gur-Baal. Where Arabians dwelt (2 Chron. xxvi. 7). Between Palestine and Arabia.

H

Haashtari. 1 Chron. iv. 6.

Habaiah. Ezra ii. 61, Neh. vii. 63.

Habakkuk. The cordially embraced one (favourite of God), or the cordial embracer. "A man of heart, hearty toward another, taking him into his arms. This H. does in his prophecy; he comforts and lifts up his people, as one would do with a weeping child, bidding him be quiet, because, please God, it would yet be better with him" (Luther). The psalm (chap. iii.) and title "H. the prophet" favour the opinion that H. was a Levite. The closing words, "to the chief singer on my stringed instruments," imply that H. with his own instruments would accompany the song he wrote under the Spirit; like the Levite seers and singers, Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun (1 Chron. xvi. 1-5). A lyrical tone pervades his prophecies, so that he most approaches David in his psalms. The opening phrase (i. 1) describes his prophecy as "the burden which," etc., i.e. the weighty, solemn announcement. H. "saw" it with the inner eye opened by the Spirit. He probably prophesied in the 12th or 13th year of Josiah (630 or 629 B.C.), for the words "in your days" (i. 5) imply that the prophecy would come to pass in the lifetime of the persons addressed. In Jer. xvi. 9 the same phrase comprises 20 years, in Ezek. xii. 25 six years. Zeph. i. 7 is an imitation of Hab. ii. 29; now Zephaniah (i. 1) lived under Josiah, and prophesied (comp. iii. 5, 15) after the restoration of Jehovah's worship, i.e. after the 12th year of Josiah's reign, about 624 B.C. So H. must have been before this. Jeremiah moreover began prophesying in Josiah's 13th year; now Jeremiah borrows from H. (comp. Hab. ii. 13 with Jer. li. 58); thus it follows that 630 or 629 B.C. is H.'s date of prophesying. (Delitzsch.)

Contents.—H. complains of the moral disorganization around, and cries to Jehovah for help (i. 2-4); Jehovah in reply denounces swift vengeance (i. 5-11) by the Chaldeans. H. complains that the Chaldees are worse than the Jews whom they are to be the instruments of chastising: they deal treacherously, sweep all into their net, and then "they sacrifice unto their net and burn incense unto their drag," i.e. idolize their own might and military skill, instead of giving the glory to God (Deut. viii. 17; Isa. x. 13, xxxvii. 24, 25). H. therefore, confident that God is of purer eyes than to behold evil (i. 13), sets himself in an attitude of waiting for the Lord's own solution of this perplexing apparent anomaly (ii. 1); Jehovah desires him accordingly, "write the vision" of God's retributive justice plainly, so "that he may run that readeth it," viz. "run" to tell to all the good news of the foe's doom and Judah's deliverance, or, as Grotius, run through it, i.e. run through the reading without difficulty. The issue must be awaited with patience, for it shall not disappoint; the lifted up soul, as that of the Chaldean foe and the unbelieving apostatizing Jew, is not accounted upright before God and therefore shall perish, but the just shall be accounted just by his faith and so shall live. The Chaldeans' doom is announced on the ground of this eternal principle of God's moral government. The oppressed nations "shall take up a parable," i.e. a desire song (comp. Isa. xiv. 4, Mic. ii. 4), whom H. copies, against their oppressor. It is a symmetrical whole, five stanzas; three of three verses each, the fourth of four, and the last of two verses. Each stanza, except the last, begins with "woe." All have a closing verse introduced with "for," "but," or "because." Each strophe begins with the character of the sin, then states the woe, lastly confirms the woe (ii. 2-20). The prayer-song (iii.) is the spiritual echo, resuming the previous parts of the prophecy, for the enlightenment of God's people. Prayer, thanksgiving, and trust, are the spiritual key to unlock the mysteries of God's present government of the earth. The spirit appears tumultuously to waver (whence the title "Sbigimoth" from shagah to wander) between fear and hope; but faith at the end triumphs joyfully over present trials (17-19). Upon God's past manifestations for His people, at Paran, Teman, and the Red Sea, H. grounds the anticipated deliverance of his people from the foe, through Jehovah's interposition in sublime majesty; so that the believer can always rejoice in the God of his salvation and his strength. The interests of God's righteous character, seemingly compromised in the Chaldees' successful violence, are what H. has most at heart throughout; to solve this problem is his one grand theme.

Paul quotes i. 5 in his warning to the unbelieving Jews at Antioch in Pisidia. Thrice he quotes ii. 4 "the just shall live by his faith" (one fundamental truth throughout the Bible, beginning with Abram in Gen. xv. 6; first in Rom. i. 17, where the emphasis rests on "just," God's righteousness and the nature of justification being the prominent thought; secondly in Gal. iii. 11, where the emphasis is on "faith," the instrument of justification being prominent; thirdly in Heb. x. 38, where the emphasis is on "live," the continued life that flows from justification being prominent).

Habergeon. Coat of mail, covering the neck and chest. Exod. xxviii. 32: "as (the hole of an habergeon," viz. for the head and neck to go through: the sacerdotal meil or robe of the ephod resembling it in form, but of linen. Job xli. 26 marg. "breastplate.")

Habor. [See GOZAN.] Now the Khabour; omitting "by" in 2 Kings xvii. 6, xviii. 11. But "Halab" a province, going directly before Habor in the same connection, favours A.V. It would be awkward to say he put them "in Halab," a province, and "in Habor," a river. Probably the river Habor gave its name to the province. It joins the Euphrates at Circesium; the country adjoining abounds in mounds, the remains of Assyrian cities. The Khabour is mentioned in an inscription of the 9th century.

Hachaliah. Nehemiah's father (i. 1, x. 1).

Hachilah, the hill. In a wood in the untilled land near Ziph, facing (1 Sam. xxiii. 19, 24, "south") of the Jeshimon, i.e. the waste district. David and his 600 men lurked in the fastnesses of the hill; but as Saul approached withdrew to the wood (rather the chereesh or village attached to ZIPH) [see] below. Saul hounded by the way or road which passed over or at the side of the hill. Then ensued David's taking of Saul's spear and cruse (xxiii. 14, xxvi. 13). See title Ps. lv. There is an undesignated coincidence between David's language in Ps. xi. 1, "how say ye to my soul, Flee as a bird to your mountain," and the independent history (1 Sam. xxvi. 20), "the king of Israel is come out to seek a flea, as when one dith hunt a partridge in the mountains," a confirmation of the genuineness of both psalm and history. From the rock of Ziph David came down to "the wilderness of Maon." Both names are still found in southern Judah. Conder (Pal. Expl.) identifies H. with a high hill bounded by deep valleys N. and S. on which stands the ruin Yekin or Hachin, facing Jeshimon on the right. The "trench" where Saul pitched tent is the flat low plot between steep cliffs, the head of a large wady with water. David crossed the valley, and from either of the hill tops called to the hosts. There is only one hill E. of Ziph overlooking the desert, the rest are rolling downs at a lower level; on this one is Yekin, which is "Hachil," the liquids lan lu being interchanged as often. The "trench" in which Saul lay (1 Sam. xxvi. 5) was the hollow, with a spring and cave in it, still to be seen beneath the crest of the hill. Another knoll is beyond this hollow; just as the Bedouins take up their quarters, not on a hill where they can be seen, but in a slight hollow so as at will to emerge forth at the right moment on a foe. It is contrary to their customs of war to lie in a trench of an encampment; however the sense may probably be (see marg.), he lay within the region rampart.

Hachmoni, son of. The HACHMONITE (1 Chron. xxvii. 32, xi. 11). The former is the correct rendering; the Heb. in both passages is the same. In 2 Sam. xxiii. 8 "the Hachmoni" names, in Chronicles given with "son of" (ben), are given without it, but with the definite article. H. was founder of a family; for the actual father of Jashobeam (a Korinite) was Zababel (1 Chron. xxvii. 2, xii. 6).

Hadad. A name often recurring in the Syrian and Edomite dynasties, meaning the sun; so applied as the official title to the king, as supreme on earth as the sun is in the sky. It appears in Ben-hadad, son, i.e. worshipper, of H.; Hadad-ezer, helped by H. It appears as HABAR (Gen. xxv. 15; comp. 1 Chron. i. 30, 50). Nicolaus of Damascus (Fragm. 31), friend of Augustus Caesar (Josephus, Ant. vii. 5, § 2), confirms 2 Sam. viii. 3 as to David's defeating Hadadezer or Hadarezer, king of Zobah, "when he went to recover his border at the river Euphrates"; Nicolaus says, "a certain H., a native Syrian, had great power, ruling over Damascus and all Syria except Phœnicia [this accords with 2 Sam. viii. 5, 'the Syrians of Damascus came to succour Hadadezer,' being his vassals]; he contended against David king of Judæa in many battles; in the last, which was by the Euphrates, he suffered defeat [making his third defeat: 2 Sam. viii. 3, 5; x. 18], showing himself a prince of the greatest prowess."

1. Son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15). The Attæi, Attene, Chateni, on W. of Persian gulf, seem his descendants (Ptol. vi. 7, § 15; Plin. vi. 32). Hadad, a mountain belonging to Tema on the borders of the Syrian desert N. of el-Medeenah, corresponds to the dwelling of this tribe. 2. King of Edom; conquered Midian on the field of Moab (Gen. xxxvi. 35); AVITU [see] was his capital. 3. King of Edom (Pau was his capital: Gen. xxxvi. 39); probably living when Moses wrote, for Moses does not record his death as he does that of his predecessors; last of the kings. In the later written 1 Chron. i. 50 H.'s death is recorded. The dukes that follow were not successors, but hereditary sheikhs who chose one emir or king to preside. H.'s death does not therefore, as Smith's Bible Diet. supposes, mark a change to the dukedom [see Edom]. "H. could hardly have been living after the times of the kings of Israel, to which period those who consider Gen. xxxvi. 31-43 an interpolation would assign the genealogy" (Speaker's Comm.).

4. Of the royal house of Edom (1 Kings xi. 14, etc.). In childhood escaped the massacre of every Edomite male by Joab, and fled into Egypt. Pharaoh gave him house, victuals, and land, and his wife Tahpenes the queen's sister in marriage, who bare him Genubath. At David's death, in spite of Pharaoh's entreaties he left Egypt for his own country. The LXX. read Edom for Aram (Syria), 1 Kings xi. 25, thus making H. succeed in his attempt to regain rule over Edom, whence he harassed Israel; but the LXX. omits all as to Rezon, so that its authority is worth little here. Josephus (Ant. viii. 7, § 6) reads as A.V.; H. thus having failed to recover Edom joined Rezon in assailing Israel and received from him a portion of Syria; "he reigned over Syria" refers to Rezon, and is a repetition of ver. 24.

Hadad-Rimmon. A city in the valley of Megiddo, or plain of Jezreel or Esdraelon; named from Hadad the Syrian sun god and Rimmon [see], another Syrian idol. The scene of the national lamentation for Josiah's death in the battle fought here with Pharaoh Necho (2 Kings xxiii. 29, 2 Chron. xxxv. 23). Jerome calls the city Maximianopolis, from the emperor Maximian; not far from Jezreel.

Hadarezer, Hadadezer. Son of Rehob, king of Zobah. Helped by the Damascus Syrians [see HADAD]; driven by David beyond the river Euphrates (2 Sam. viii. 3, 5; x. 6-9; 1 Chron. xviii. 3, xix. 7-19). After Joab's first repulse of Aunmon and their Syrian allies H., undaunted by defeat twice (2 Sam. viii. 3, 5), sent a host under the command of Shophach to assist his kinsmen of Maachah, Rehob, and Ishtob; David in person routed them completely at HELAM; thus the Syrian confederacy was overthrown. H.'s subordinate princes submitted to David who dedicated to Jehovah the 1000 "shields" or "weapons (shelet) of gold" taken in the first war; these were long known as king David's (S. of Sol. iv. 4, 2 Chron. xxiii. 9). Rezon [see] of H.'s retainers escaped, and with "bands" marauded the thinly peopled district between the Jordan and the Euphrates (2 Kings v. 2, 1 Chron. v. 18-22), then became master of Damascus, and as an "adversary" did "mischief" to Israel in Solomon's days (1 Kings xi. 23-25). Edom invaded Israel during David's absence at the Euphrates; Ps. xlv. by the sons of Korah alludes to this. Ps. lx. by David was composed after victory in part had been gained over Aram Naharaim (Syria of the two floods) and Aram (Syria) of Zobah the kingdom of H., who had come to help his vassals of Mesopotamia, the region of the two rivers Tigris and Euphrates; after having conquered the two Syrians, Joab returned and smote Edom in the valley of Salt; Ps. lx. refers to the expedition subsequently undertaken to occupy Edom in revenge for Edom's invasion of Israel.

Hadashah. A town in the shepherd low hills of Judah (Josh. xv. 37).

Hadassah. Esther's original name (ii. 7). Possibly the same name as "Atossa," Cyrus' daughter.

Hadattah. A town in the extreme S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 25), the Keri (marg. Heb.) reads Hazor-hadattah, i.e. New Habor. So Eusebius and Jerome; but they place it near and E. of Ascalon, which is in the shepherd, whereas Joshua places it among towns of S. Judah. Now El-Hud-haira, S. of Jebel Khulil (Robinson).

Hadid=sharp, as being on a craggy height. Aditha, named by Eusebius, E. of Diospolis (Lydda or Lod, with which it is named Ezra ii. 33, Neh. vii. 37, xi. 34), is probably H. In Van de Velde's map el-Hadithah, three miles E. of Lydda.

Hadlai. 2 Chron. xxviii. 12.

Hadoram. 1. Son of Tou or Toi, king of Hamath; sent to congratulate David on his victory over Hadarezer (1 Chron. xviii. 10), bearing costly presents in gold, silver, and brass (antiques according to Josephus). More likely to be the true name than

"Joram," which contains the name of Jehovah (2 Sam. viii. 10). 2. The contracted form of Adoniram (2 Sam. xx. 24; 1 Kings iv. 6, xii. 18). Over the tribute, under David, Solomon, and Rehoboam. Stoned to death when sent as one of the old or moderate party, to appease the sedition; the choice of the superintendent of taxes for the purpose was consistent with the general want of tact in Rehoboam.

Hadrach, the land of. A region of Syria (Zech. ix. 1, 2). Derived probably from HADAR or HADAD [see]. Possibly another name for BIKATH AVEN (Amos i. 5). Maurer says it means in Syrian enclosed, i.e. Coelosyria, the western interior part of Syria; or its capital (Jerome). Heugstenberg makes it a symbolical name of Persia, Zechariah thereby avoiding offence to the government under which he lived; from had strong, and rah weak; strong then, but soon to be weakened by Alexander its conqueror. But the context implies a Syrian region. Gesenius thinks H. a Syrian king.

Hagab, the children of. Ezra ii. 46. Also HAGABAH (Neh. vii. 48, Ezra ii. 45).

Hagar. Perhaps akin to the Arabic hejira, "flight." Gen. xvi., xxi., xxv. 12. Abram's bondswoman; an Egyptian received into his household during his sojourn in Egypt. Taken as legal concubine at Sarai's suggestion to raise a seed, in hope of his being the promised heir, when Sarai's age seemingly forbade hope of issue by her. The marriage law was then less definitely recognised than at the beginning, and than subsequently. Want of faith moved Sarai to suggest, and Abram to adopt, a fleshly device instead of waiting the Lord's time and way. It was punished by consequent family disquiet, and the bad example copied by the Ishmaelites has proved morally and physically a curse to the race. Abraham gave up H., in violation of eastern custom, to Sarai's ill usage; so H. fled towards her native land Egypt, by the way through the wilderness towards Shur, probably Suez. The wilderness is identified with the N.E. part of that of Paran, now Al-jifâr. The angel of Jehovah reminded her that as "Sarai's maid" she owed her submission, and promised that her son Ishmael should be father of a numerous nation. So she called Jehovah that spake unto her "Thou God seest me" (Heb. "Thou art a God of seeing," a God who allows Himself to be seen), for she said, "Have I also seen (i.e. am I yet living and seeing) here, after seeing (God)?" (Gen. xxxii. 30; Jud. xiii. 22; Exod. xx. 19, xxxiii. 20.) The adjoining well was named Beer-lahai-roi, "the well of the seeing alive," i.e. at which one saw God and lived. This explanation involves a change of accents; but the A. V. explanation involves a grammatical difficulty; Chald. supports A. V., "Thou art a God of seeing," i.e. the all seeing, from whose eye the helpless is not hidden in the lonely desert, and Beer-lahai-roi, "the well of the living One who sees me," i.e. of the ever living omnipresent Providence. In either view the words show H. was now no heathen, but had become in some degree a believer in the God of Abraham. Ishmael's mocking at the feast which celebrated Isaac's weaning was the occasion of Sarai's saying, "Cast out this bondswoman and her son, for the son of this bondswoman shall not be heir with my son . . . Isaac." As Abram had laughed for joy at the promise of Isaac (Gen. xvii. 17), and Sarai for incredulity (xviii. 12-15), but afterwards, at Isaac's birth, for joyful gratitude, so Ishmael in derision and in the spirit of a persecutor, mocking (which contains the germ of persecuting) Isaac's faith in God's promises. Being the elder he prided himself above "him that was born after the Spirit," i.e. by the Spirit-energized promise of God, which made Sarai fruitful out of the course of nature.

The history typifies the truth that the spiritual seed of Abraham by promise, Gentile as well as Jewish believers, take the place of the Jews the natural seed, who imagined that to them exclusively belonged the kingdom of God. Paul expounds H. to answer to Sinai and the law, which generates a spirit of "bondage," as H. was a bondswoman, and that this must give place to the gospel dispensation and the church of grace, the "Jerusalem which is above." The carnal and legalists shall not be heirs with the free N. T. believers (Gal. iv. 22-31). Abraham, at God's command, did what Sarah said, though grievous to him. H. wandered with her child (15 years was childhood when human life was so long, he was old enough to "molek") in the wilderness of Beer-sheba; the water was spent in the bottle, and she cast him, soon worn out as a growing lad, under a shrub, having previously led him by the hand (for xxi. 14 means that Abraham put the bread and bottle, but not also the child, "on her shoulder"; so ver. 18, "hold him in thine hand"). The lad's own cry, still more than the mother's, brought "the angel of God" (here only in Gen., usually "angel of JEHOVAH"), i.e. God the second Person (ver. 17, 19, 20), to his aid and her help. The child's cry is the more potent with the Omnipotent, just because of its helplessness (Isa. xl. 29; xli. 17, 18). God opened her eyes to see water where she had supposed there was only a dry wilderness. In our greatest extremity God has only to open our eyes and we see abundant help near. Real prayer will bring Him to our side (2 Kings vi. 17-20; Luke xxiv. 16, 31). H. "took him a wife out of Egypt," the land of idols and worldliness; untaught by the piety of Abraham and by God's mercy to herself.

Hagarenes, Hagarites. E. of Palestine. Fell by the hand of Reuben, Gad, and half Manassch, in the time of Saul; these occupied their tents and land in eastern Gilead (1 Chron. v. 10, 18-20). Jetur, Nephish, and Nodab, Hagarites, are mentioned as "delivered into their land, and all that were with them; for they cried to God in the battle (and they were helped against them), and He was entreated of them; because they put their trust in Him. And they took away their cattle . . . camels . . . sheep . . . asses . . . for there fell down many slain, because the war was of God. And they dwelt in their steeds, until the captivity." The spoil shows their wealth as nomad tribes. In Ps. lxxxiii. 6-8 "the tabernacles of the H." are mentioned as distinct from the "Ishmaelites," with whom Moab, Geshur, Ammon, Amalek, Philistia, Tyre, and Assur, they confederated to invade suddenly Jehoshaphat's land and take it in possession. The H. probably were named not from Ishmael's mother Hagar directly, but from a district or town so called; possibly now Hejer, capital and subdivision of the province el-Bahrein in N.E. Arabia, on the Persian gulf.

Haggai = my feast. A name given in anticipation of the joyous return from exile. Perhaps a Levite, as the rabbins say he was buried at Jerusalem among the priests. Tradition represents him as returning with the first exiles from Babylon his birthplace, under Zerubbabel 536 B.C., when CYRUS [see], actuated by Isaiah's prophecies concerning himself (xliv. 28, xlv. 1), decreed the Jews' restoration and the rebuilding of the temple, for which he furnished all necessities. [See EZRA, ACHASUERUS, ARTAXERXES, DARIUS.] In spite of Samaritan opposition the temple building went on under Cyrus and Cambyses (Ahasuerus Ezra iv. 6); but under the Magian usurper Smerdis (Artaxerxes Ezra iv. 7-23) the Samaritans procured a royal decree suspending the work. Hence the Jews became so indifferent about it that when Darius came to the throne (521 B.C.), whose accession virtually nullified the usurper's prohibition, they pretended that as the prophecy of the 70 years applied to the temple as well as to the captivity in Babylon (Hag. i. 2), they were only in the 68th year, and that, the time not yet having come, they might build splendid cycled mansions for themselves. H. first, and Zechariah two months later, were commissioned by Jehovah (i. 1) in Darius' (Hystaspes) second year, 520 B.C., to rouse them from their selfishness to resume the work which had been suspended for 14 years.

The dates of his four distinct prophecies are given. 1. (chap. i.) On the first day of the 6th month of Darius' second year of reigning, 520 B.C. Reproves their apathy in leaving the temple in ruins; reminds them of their ill fortune because of their neglect of God's house. In consequence, within 24 days they began building under Zerubbabel (i. 12-15). II. (chap. ii. 1-9.) Predicts that the new temple's glory will exceed that of Solomon's temple; therefore the outward inferiority which had moved the elders to tears at the foundation laying (Ezra iii. 10-13) ought not to discourage them. Isaiah (lx., ii. 2-4), Jeremiah (li. 16-18), and Ezekiel (xl.-xlviii.), similarly had foretold the glory of the latter house; but the temple then being built so far showed no signs of glory. II.

shows wherein the glory should consist, viz. in the presence of Him who is "the Desire of all nations." Many object that the Heb. "desire" (chemah) being singular, and "shall come" being plural (bach), the singular must be collective for "desirable things shall come," viz. silver and gold. But when two nouns come together, one singular the other plural, the verb may agree with the latter. Besides Messiah is "all desires," containing collectively all desirable things in Himself such as they missed in the present temple, splendour, riches, etc. (S. of Sol. v. 16.) The desires of all nations can find their satisfaction in Him alone. He embodies the "good things to come," "to Him shall the gathering of the people be" (Gen. xlix. 10). He comes in His veiled glory to the temple at His first advent (Matt. xxi. 12-14), in His revealed glory at His second advent (Mal. iii. 1). The glory of the latter house did not exceed that of the former except in Messiah's advent; the silver and gold brought to it scarcely equalled those of Solomon's temple, and certainly all nations did not bring their desirable things to it. The A. V. is therefore right. The masculine plural verb implies that the feminine singular noun is an abstract for a masculine concrete. III. (chap. ii. 10-19.) On the 24th day of the 9th month, when building materials were collected and the workmen had begun to build; from this time God promises to bless them. He rectifies their past error of thinking that outward observances cleanse away the sin of disobeying God, as for instance in respect to the temple building. (Holy flesh of sacrifice sanctifies the skirt in which it is carried, but cannot sanctify anything beyond, as bread: Lev. vi. 27.) On the other hand, an unclean person imparts his uncleanness to anything he touches. So ceremonialism cannot sanctify the unclean person, but the unclean defiles all he touches.) IV. (chap. ii. 20-23.) On the same day as III., addressed to Zerubbabel, the representative of the theocracy, who asked about the national revolutions foretold in II. (chap. ii. 7.) Judah, whose representative Zerubbabel was, shall remain, as a signet ring secure, whilst God makes an end of other nations (Jer. xlv. 28). The time occupied by II.'s prophecies is three months. The temple was completed in the sixth year of Darius' reign, 515-516 B.C. (Ezra vi. 14.) The style of II. is prosaic but pathetic in exhortation, vehement in reproof, and lofty in contemplating the glorious future. Repetitions (e.g., "saith the Lord, the Lord of hosts" i. 2, 5, 7; ii. 4 thrice; "the Spirit" thrice in i. 14) and interrogations impart a simple earnestness of tone calculated to awaken from apathy to solemn attention. II. is referred to in Ezra v. 1, vi. 14, and in N. T., Heb. xii. 26; comp. chap. ii. 6, 7, 22. The final earthly shaking of kingdoms is preparing the way for the "kingdom that cannot be moved." The LXX. associate II. and Zechariah in the titles of Ps. cxxxviii. cxxxix.—cxlvi.

the Vulg. in the titles of Ps. cxi., cxi., the Syrian in those of Ps. cxxxv., cxxxviii. cxxxviii. II. according to Pseudo-Epiphanius (De Vitis Proph.) first chanted the Hallelujah, the hymn of II. and Zechariah, in the second temple. The Hallelujah psalms belong certainly to the period after the return from Babylon.

Haggeri. 1 Chron. xi. 38. Bot 2 Sam. xxiii. 36 has "Bani the Gadite," of which Kennicott thinks II. to be the corruption.

Haggi. Gen. xli. 26, Num. xxvi. 15. A patronymic.

Haggiah. 1 Chron. vi. 30.

Haggith = a dancer. One of David's wives, Adonijah's mother (2 Sam. iii. 4).

Hai (Gen. xii. 8, xiii. 3) = Al, with the Heb. article ha, which always accompanies Al.

Hair. Shaved closely by men, worn long by women, in Egypt. This illustrates Joseph's shaving himself

to conform to Egyptian manners, before going in to Pharaoh (Gen. xli. 14). The Hebrews wore long beards; the Egyptians only in mourning did so. At the same time the Hebrews kept the distinction of sexes by clipping the hair of men (though hardly so much as we do; Lev. x. 6, Heb. "let not loose [the hair of] your heads," not "uncover," etc.), but not of women (1 Cor. xi. 6, etc.; Luke vii. 38). The law forbade them to "round the corners of their heads, or mar the corners of the beard"; for the Arabs in honour of the idol Ormal cut the hair from the temples in a circular form, and in mourning married their beards (Lev. xix. 27; Jer. ix. 23 marg., xlviii. 37). BALDNESS [see], being often the result of leprosy, disqualified for the priesthood (Lev. xxi. 20, LXX.). Absalom's luxuriant hair is mentioned as a sign of beauty, but was a mark of effeminacy; its weight perhaps was 20, not 200 shekels, the numeral γ having by a copyist's error been substituted for ς (2 Sam. xiv. 26). Nazarites wore it uncut, a sign of humiliation and self denial, at the same time of dedication of all the strength, of which hair was a token, to God (Num. vi. 5; Jud. xiii. 5, xvi. 17). Shaving the head was often practised in fulfilment of a vow, as Paul did, the shaving being usually followed by a sacrifice in 30 days (Acts xviii. 18); probably his vow was made in some sickness (Gal. iv. 13). Black was the favourite colour. S. of Sol. v. 11, the bridegroom's locks are "bushy" (curled), betokening headship; iv. 1, the hair of goats in the East being fine like silk and flowing, the token of the bride's subjection; i. 5, vii. 5, "purple," i.e. glossy black. Eccles. xii. 5, "the almond tree shall flourish," does not refer to white hair on the old, but to the almond blossom is pink, but to the almond (lit. the wakeful) tree blossoming in winter, i.e. the wakefulness of old age shall set in. Bat Gesenius, "(the old man) loathes the (sweet) almond." In S. of Sol. vii. 5, for "galleries" transl. "the king is held (fascinated) with the glowing ringlets." The hair was often plaited in braids, kept in their place by a fillet. So Samson's "seven locks" (Jud. xvi. 13, 19; comp. 1 Tim. ii. 9, 1 Pet. iii. 3). Egyptian women swear by their side-locks, and men by their beards; the Jews' imitation of this our Lord condemns (Matt. v. 36). Hair represents what is least valuable (Matt. x. 30); innumerable to man, but "all numbered" by God's providence for His children. "Hair as the hair of women" (Rev. ix. 8), long and flowing, a mark of semibarbarous hosts (1 Cor. xi. 14, 15).

Hakkatan = Katan, with ha the article. (Ezra viii. 12.)

Hakkoz. 1 Chron. xxiv. 10. In Ezra ii. 61 Koz is a family of priests, the ha being the article.

Hakupha, children of. Ezra ii. 51.

Halah. The name appears in Chalcitis (Ptolemy, v. 18), and Gla, a mound on the upper Khabour (2 Kings xvii. 6). A Median district and city.

Halak, the mount = the smooth mountain, "which goeth up to Scir" (Josh. xi. 17, xii. 7); the southern extremity of Joshua's conquests. Kail identifies it with the chalk cliffs crossing the valley of the Ghor, six miles S. of the Dead Sea; the southern limit of the Ghor, the northern limit of the Arabah.

Halhul. A town in the Judah mountains. The hill is still so named, with ruins of walls and foundations, a mile to the left of the road from Jerusalem to Hebron, four miles from the latter. A mosque stands there, named Nebi Yunus, the prophet Jonah (Josh. xv. 58). Close to Bethsur (Bethzur) and Jedur (Geder).

Hali. A town on Asher's boundary (Josh. xix. 25).

Hall = ante, the court or uncovered space, on a lower level than the lowest floor, in the midst of a house, as the highpriest's (Luke xxii. 55). The "porch" (proaulon) was the vestibule leading to it (Mark xiv. 68). Called also pulon, the "gate" or "porch" (Matt. xxvi. 71).

Hallohesh. Lohesh with the article. Sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (x. 24). Father of Shallum (iii. 12).

Ham = hot. I. The Egyptian Kem (Egypt peculiarly the land of Ham, Ps. lxxviii. 51, cv. 23), "black"; the sunburat and those whose soil is black, as Ethiopia means. Father (i.e. ancestor) of Cush (Ethiopia), Mizraim (Egypt) [see], Phut (Libya), and Canaan. These mean races, not individuals. Egypt being the first civilized was singled out as the chief country of Hamite settlements. [On the Hamitic or Cushite origin of Babylon, alleged by Scripture and confirmed by the vocabulary in ancient remains, see CUSH and BABEL.] Solid grandeur characterizes the Hamite architecture, as in the earliest of Egypt, Babylonia, and S. Arabia. The first steps in the arts and sciences seemingly are due to the Hamites. The earliest empires were theirs, their power of organization being great. Material rather than moral greatness was theirs. Hence their civilization, though early, decayed sooner than that of the Semitic and Japhetic races. Egypt, fenced on the N. by a sea without good harbours, on the E. and W. by deserts, held its sway the longest. The Hamites of S. Arabia were at a very early date overcome by the Joktanites, and the Babylonians yielded to the Medes. Ammon, the god of N. Africa, is akin to Ham. Ham is supposed to be youngest of Noah's sons from Gen. ix. 24, but "younger (Heb. little) son" there probably means Noah's grandson, viz. Canaan, not Ham. Shem is put first, having the spiritual eminence of being father of the promised seed. The names Shem (the man of name or renown), Ham (the settler in hot Africa), and Japhet (father of fair descendants, or of those who spread abroad), may not have been their original names, but derived from subsequent facts of their history.

2. A place where Chedorlaomer smote the Zuzim (Gen. xiv. 5). If Zuzim be the same as Zamzumim, who dwell in the territory afterwards occupied by Ammon (Deut. ii. 19-21), Ham answers to Rablath Ammon. LXX. and Vulg. read bethem to beham, i.e. with them, but A. V. seems correct.

3. Simeonites went to the eastern entrance of the valley of Geder in quest of pasture, and dispossessed the previous inhabitants, being men "of Ham" (1 Chron. iv. 10). Perhaps an Egyptian settlement, Egypt being closely connected with this southern part of Palestine.

Haman. [See ESTHER.] Son of Hammedatha "the Agagite," probably of Amalekite origin (Num. xxiv. 7, 20; 1 Sam. xv. 8). The Amalekites had from the first pursued Israel with unrelenting spite (Exod. xvii. 16 marg., Deut. xxv. 17-19), and were consequently at last exterminated by Israel (1 Sam. xv. 8, xxx. 17; 2 Sam. viii. 12; 1 Chron. iv. 43). A survivor of such a race would instinctively hate Israel and every Jew. Elevated by one of those sudden turns which are frequent in despotic states where all depends on the whim of the autocrat, he showed that jealousy of any omission of respect which is characteristic of upstarts. These two motives account for his monstrous scheme of revenge whereby he intended to exterminate a whole nation for the affront of omission of respect on the part of the one individual, Mordecai. God's retributive judgment and overruling providence are remarkably illustrated; his wicked plot recoiled on himself; the honours which he designed for himself he, in spite of himself, heaped on the man whom he so scornfully hated; and the gallows on which he meant to hang Mordecai was that on which he was hanged himself (Ps. vii. 15, 16).

Hamath. The chief city of upper Syria, in the valley of the Orontes, commanding the whole valley, from the low hills which form the watershed between the Orontes and the Litany, to the defile of Daphne below

Antioch; this was "the kingdom of Hamath." An Hamitic race (Gen. x. 18). Akin to their neighbours the Hittites. "The entering in of H." indicates that it (the long valley between Lebanon and Antilibanon) was the point of entrance into the land of Israel for any invading army, as the Assyrians and Babylonians, from the N. The southern approach to H. from Caelosyria between Libanus and Antilibanus formed the northern limit to Israel's inheritance (Num. xiii. 21, xxxiv. 8; Josh. xiii. 5).

It was an independent kingdom under Tou or Toi in David's time; Toi sent presents to David who had destroyed the power of Hadarezer, Toi's enemy (2 Sam. viii. 9-11). Tributary to Solomon who built "store cities" in it (2 Chron. viii. 4) as staples for the trade which passed along the Orontes valley. Mentioned as an ally of the Syrians of Damascus in the Assyrian inscriptions of Ahab's time. Jeroboam II. "recovered H." (2 Kings xiv. 25); but it was subjugated soon by Assyria (xviii. 34; Amos vi. 2, 14), who calls it "H. the great." Solomon's feast congregated all Israel "from the entering in of H. unto the river of Egypt" (1 Kings viii. 65). The same point from which Solomon's kingdom began was the point from which, according to Amos' prophecy, began the triumph of Israel's foes for Israel's sin. From Antiochus Epiphanes it afterwards got the name Epiphaneia. It has resumed its old name little changed, Hamah; remarkable for its great waterwheels for raising water from the Orontes for the gardens and houses. The alah or high land of Syria abounds in ruins of villages, 365 according to the Arabs. Hamath stones have been found, four blocks of basalt inscribed with hieroglyphics, first noticed by Bairekhardt in 1810; the characters in cameo raised from two to four lines, not incised, as other Syrian inscriptions. The names of Thothmes III. and Amenophis I. are read by some scholars in them. Burton thinks these inscriptions form a connecting link between picture writing and alphabetic writing. Probably they were Hittite in origin.

Hamath-Zobah. Conquered by Solomon (2 Chron. viii. 3). Distinguished from "H. the great."

Hammath. A fortified city in Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35). Meaning "hot baths," viz. of Tiberias. Three hammaths still send up hot sulphurous waters about a mile S. of the modern town, at the extremity of the ancient ruins. In Josh. xxi. 32 it appears as the Gershonite Levite city of refuge, HAMMOTH DOR. In 1 Chron. vi. 76 HAMMON, Hammath Tubariyeh (Chabas).

Hammedatha. Haman's father. Medatha with the definite article.

[See ESTHER and HAMAN.] In Persian = double.

Hammelech. Jer. xxxvi. 26, xxxviii. 6. Jehoakim at this time (the fifth year of his reign) had not grown up son. Jeconiah his successor was then but eleven (2 Kings xxiii. 36; comp. xxiv. 8). We must not then, with Smith's Bible Dict., transl. "the king," but as a proper name, Hammelech, father of Jerahmeel and Malechiah.

Hammer. Besides its ordinary sense, used for any overwhelming power, earthly (Jer. i. 23, "the hammer of the whole earth," Babylon, as Martel, "little hammer," was a title of the Frank king) or spiritual (xxiii. 29, "is not. My word like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces"?). Comp. Nah. ii. 1 marg.

Hammoleketh. Mother of ABIEZER; meaning "the queen." She reigned, according to tradition, over part of Gilead (1 Chron. vii. 17, 18).

Hammon. 1. A city in Asher, near great Sidon (Josh. xix. 28). 2. A Levite city of Naphtali (1 Chron. vi. 76).

Hammonah. Ezek. xxxix. 16. The place near which Gog's multitudes shall be buried, whence it gets its name, meaning multitude. Grotius makes Jerusalem to receive the name H. from the multitude of slain. After the cleansing of the land Jerusalem shall be known as the conqueror of multitudes.

Hamon Gog, the valley of = "the ravine (geey) of Gog's multitude." After the burial of Gog and his multitude there, the ravine shall be so named, which had been called "the ravine of passengers [from Syria to Petra and Egypt] on the E. of the Dead Sea" (Ezek. xxxix. 11, 15). Gog shall find a grave where he expected spoil. The publicity of the road, and the multitude of graves, will arrest the many passers by to observe God's judgments, executed nigh the scene of judgment on Gog's prototypes, Sodom and Gomorrah.

Hamor = a large he ass. So (Gen. xlix. 14) Issachar. A Hivite; but Alex. MS. LXX., a Horite; prince of Shechem and the adjoining district, probably named from his son. Head of the clan named from him whilst yet alive "the children of H." (Gen. xxxiii. 19). From them Jacob bought for 100 kesita (i.e. bars or rings of silver of a certain weight, perhaps stamped with a "lamb," see marg., all the versions transl. "lambs," which were the original representative of wealth) a parcel of a field. Abraham bought only a burying place, Jacob a dwelling place, which long after was also Joseph's burial place (Josh. xxiv. 32) referred to by Stephen (Acts vii. 16). "Jacob and our fathers were carried over into Sychem and laid in a sepulchre that Abraham bought . . . of the sons of EMMOR" (the Gr. form of H.). Stephen with elliptical brevity sums up from six chaps. of O. T. in one sentence the double purchase (by Abraham from Ephron the Hittite, Gen. xxiii.; and by Jacob from the children of H.), the double burial place (Abraham's cave of Machpelah and Jacob's ground near Shechem), and the double burial (of Jacob in the cave of Machpelah, and of Joseph in the ground at Shechem), just because the details were familiar to both himself and the Jewish council; not, as rationalism objects, because he was ignorant of or forgot the historical facts so notorious from the O. T. In Jud. ix. 28 H.'s name is made to Shechemites the signal of revolt from Israelite rule. The cruel retaliation by Simeon and Levi of Shechem's wrong to Dinah (Gen. xxxiv.) left a lasting soreness in the minds of the Hivite remnant, who even without such ancient grudge would be ready enough to cast off Israel's yoke and revert to their original government by Hivite sheikhs. [See GAAL.]

Hamul. 1 Chron. iv. 26.

Hamul. Gen. xiv. 12. The HAMULITES sprang from him (Num. xxvi. 21).

Hamutal. Daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah, wife of king Josiah, mother of Jehoahaz and Mattaniah or Zedekiah (2 Kings xxiii. 31, xxiv. 18).

Hanameel. Son of Shalum, Jeremiah's cousin, from whom the prophet in prison bought a field in Anathoth whilst Jerusalem was being besieged by the Chaldeans, as a token to assure the Jews that a time of security would hereafter come when their land would once more be a safe possession (Jer. xxxii. 7-12, 44). Anathoth being a sacerdotal city with a thousand cubits of suburban fields, the land could not be alienated (Lev. xxv. 25, 34); but this did not prevent sales within the tribe of Levi, on the failure of the owner the next of kin could redeem the land.

Hanan. 1. 1 Chron. viii. 23. 2. 1 Chron. viii. 38, ix. 44. 3. 1 Chron. xi. 43. 4. CHILDREN OF H.: Ezra ii. 46. 5. Neh. viii. 7, x. 10. 6. Ezra x. 22. 7. Ezra x. 26. 8. Store-keeper of the treasures ("treasurer of the treasures"), Neh. xiii. 13, where priests, scribes, Levites, and laymen are represented. 9. Son of Igalliah, "a man of God" (Jer. xxxv. 4), so revered that none would call in question what was transacted in his chamber.

Hananeel, tower of. Neh. iii. 1, 24, 32; xii. 39. Either the same as "the tower of Meah," i.e. the hundred, or next it, between the sheep-gate and fish-gate S. of Jerusalem. A breach reaching from it to the "gate of the corner" (2 Kings xiv. 13, 2 Chron. xxvi. 9) Jeremiah foretells (xxxii. 38) shall be "rebuilt to Jehovah," and "not thrown down any more for ever." Connected with "the corner gate" (which was on the other side of the sheep-gate), also in Zech. xiv. 10, where Ewald transl. "on to the corner gate-and tower of H. on to the king's vinepresses."

Hanani. 1. 1 Chron. xxv. 4, 25. 2. The seer who rebuked Asa [see] king of Judah, 911 B.C., for buying the alliance of Benhadad I. of Syria, to help him against Baasha of Israel, instead of "relying on the Lord his God," "whose eyes run to and fro throughout the whole earth to show Himself strong in behalf of those whose heart is perfect toward Him" (Jer. xvii. 5). So Asa lost the victory over Syria itself which faith would have secured to him. H. was imprisoned for his faithfulness (2 Chron. xvi. 1-4, 7-10; comp. Jer. xx. 2, Matt. xiv. 3). But Asa only thereby sealed his own punishment; by compromising principle to escape war he brought on himself perpetual wars (1 Kings xv. 32). Jehu his son was equally faithful in reproving Baasha and Asa's son Jehoshaphat (1 Kings xvi. 1, 7; 2 Chron. xix. 2, xx. 34). 3. Ezra x. 19, 20. 4. Nehemiah's brother, who returned from Jerusalem to Susa and informed him as to Jerusalem, 446 B.C.; afterwards made governor of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (i. 2, vii. 2). 5. Neh. xii. 31, 36.

Hananiah. 1. One of the singer Heman's 14 sons; chief of the 16th of the 24 courses into which the 288 Levite musicians were divided by king David; employed chiefly to "lift up the horn" (1 Chron. xxv. 4, 5, 23). 2. 2 Chron. xxvi. 11.

3. Jer. xxxvi. 12. 4. Son of Azur, the prophet of Gilbeon, a priests' city (Jer. xxviii.). In the fourth year of Zedekiah's reign H., in opposition to Jeremiah, foretold that Jeremiah and the captives at Babylon would return with all the vessels of the Lord's house within two years. This hope rested on Pharaoh Hophra (Apries). Judah already had designed a league with Edom, Ammon, Moab, Tyre, and Sidon against Babylon. Their ambassadors had therefore come to Jerusalem, but were sent back with yokes and a Divine message from Jeremiah that their several masters must submit to Nebuchadnezzar's yoke, to whom God had given these lands and the very beasts of the field, or else be punished with sword, famine, and pestilence (xxvii.). H. broke off the yokes on Jeremiah's neck, in token of God's breaking off Nebuchadnezzar's yoke. Comp. 1 Kings xxii. 14, 25. Jeremiah said Amen, praying it might be so; but warned him that for the broken wooden yokes he should have iron yokes, adding "H., the Lord hath not sent thee, but thou makest this people trust in a lie . . . therefore . . . this year thou shalt die, because thou hast taught rebellion against the Lord. So H. died the same year in the 7th month." In Zedekiah's 6th year the league with Pharaoh Hophra tempted Zedekiah to open revolt in violation of his oath to Nebuchadnezzar (Ezek. xvii. 12-20). A temporary raising of the siege of Jerusalem through the Egyptian ally, was soon followed by the return of the Chaldean army, the capture of Jerusalem, and the blinding of Zedekiah and his removal to Babylon (xxxvii. 5). Each claimant to inspiration, as H., must stand two tests: does his prophecy accord with past revelations of God's word? does the event verify it? H. failed in both. Moreover he promised sinners peace and safety without repentance. H.'s namesake in N. T. is a similar warning instance of God's vengeance on the man "whosever loveth and maketh a lie" (Acts v.); a foretaste of the final retribution (Rev. xxii. 15).

5. Jer. xxxvii. 13. 6. 1 Chron. viii. 24.

7. [See SHADRACH, ANANIAS.] Of the house of David (Dan. i. 3, 6, 7, 11, 19; ii. 17). 8. 1 Chron. iii. 19. Identified by some with Joanna (the Jah or Jehovah being put at the beginning instead of at the end, as in Hanan-jah, "graciously given by Jehovah"), Luke iii. 27. 9. Ezra x. 28. 10. Exod. xxx. 22, 28; 1 Chron. ix. 39; Neh. iii. 8, 30, comp. xii. 41. 11. Neh. xii. 12. 12. Ruler of the palace (as ELIAKIM [see] "over the house" of Hezekiah) along with Hanani, Nehemiah's brother, at Jerusalem. Neh. vii. 2, 3, "a faithful man who feared God above many." Had charge concerning setting watches, and opening and shutting the city gates. Prideaux argues from this Nehemiah at this time returned to Persia; but his presence in Jerusalem some time after the wall's completion is implied in Neh. vii. 5, 65, viii. 9, x. 1. Gesenius moreover (from ii. 8) thinks hobbiak in vii. 2 means not the tirshatha's (governor's) palace, but the fortress of the Lord's "house"; in this case H. was a priest. But the charge as to the city gates implies a civil, not a sacerdotal, office. The Heb. for "over (at) Jerusalem" may mean simply "concerning." 13. Neh. x. 23.

Hand. Symbol of skill, energy, and action. "Strength of hand." Also control. To "kiss the hand" expresses adoration (Job xxxi. 27). "Fill one's hand" is consecrating him a priest (Exod. xxviii. 41 marg., Jud. xvi. 5, 1 Kings xiii. 33). To "lift up the hand" is to swear (Gen. xiv. 22), the hand being raised in appeal to God above; also the attitude of benediction (Lev. ix. 22). To "give the hand" assures of faithfulness and friendship (2 Kings x. 15); also submission, "she hath given her hand," i.e. surrendered to her conqueror (Jer. l. 15, Lam. v. 6). The hand of God is His eternal purpose and executive power (Acts iv. 28, 30); His providential bounty (Ps. civ. 28); His firm hold preserving His saints (John x. 28, 29; Deut. xxxiii. 3). His "heavy hand," affliction (Ps. xxxviii. 2). God's "right hand" denotes His omnipotence, "The right hand," being more efficient than the left, is the place of honour (Ps. cx. 1, Matt. xxv. 33), "the left" of dishonour (xxvi. 64).

The Hebrews in reckoning the four quarters faced the E. So "in front" or "before them" was E.; "at the back," or "behind," W.; "the right hand," S.; "the left hand," N. The accuser in a trial stood "at the right hand" of the accused, so Satan at Joshua's right hand (Zech. iii. 1, Ps. cix. 6); but the Advocate Messiah also is at the believer's "right hand," to defend his cause effectually (Ps. xvi. 8, cix. 31); therefore Paul could say (Rom. viii. 31, 33, 34), "If God be for us, who can be against us? Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that just-feth. Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us."

"The hand of the Lord on" the prophets is the Holy Spirit's extraordinary and powerful impulse, His felt impression inspiring them (1 Kings xviii. 46; 2 Kings iii. 15; Ezra i. 3, iii. 14). His "good hand upon" His people means His gracious help (Neh. ii. 8, Luke i. 66). "Laying on of hands" was usual in blessing; as the Lord Jesus blessing the infants (Mark x. 16), Jacob blessing Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. xlviii. 14); also in laying guilt and punishment upon persons accused (Deut. xiii. 9, xvii. 7); also in constituting magistrates, as Moses did in appointing Joshua his successor (Num. xxvii. 18); also setting apart the Levites (Num. viii. 10). Also the offerer put his hand upon the head of his burnt offering (Lev. i. 4), thereby identifying himself with it, and making it his representative to bear typically the death which his sin deserved. Also in ordaining ministers (Acts vi. 6, xiii. 3; 1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6). The impartation of the Spirit was connected with the symbolical laying on of hands; "Joshua was full of the spirit of wisdom, for Moses had laid his hands upon him" (Deut. xxxiv. 9). The "gift" in Timothy was "by (dia) the putting on of Paul's hands" as the chief instrument (2 Tim. i. 6), but "with (meta) the laying on of the hands of the presbytery," implying accompaniment rather than direct instrumentality. Comp. Acts viii. 17, ix. 17, xix. 1-6; the apostles and others specially appointed by God had powers of miraculously conferring spiritual gifts and qualifications, such as have not been transmitted; so in confirming those already baptized. Bishops in confirming and ordaining now can only pray for the gift of the Holy Spirit to be bestowed on the candidates, not give it.

Handicraft. [See CIVILIZATION, BRASS.] Jewish workmen, as distinguished from the heathen ancients, were not slaves, nor were their trades hereditary. After the captivity it was deemed at once honourable and necessary for a father to teach his son a trade. (Mishna, Pirke, ab. ii. 2.) Hence Joseph the carpenter taught the holy Jesus his trade; and many of His own country marvelled that works so mighty should be wrought by one like themselves, an artisan: "is not this the carpenter?" (Mark vi. 3.)

Handkerchief: naphkin. The two translations of the same term, soudarion, the Græcised Lat. sudarrium, lit. that wherewith the sweat is wiped off. ΑΡΡΩΝ, simikinthion, the Græcised Lat. semicinctum (wider than the cinctus). Sudarrium means (1) a wrapper to fold up money in, Luke xix. 20; (2) a cloth about a corpse's head (John xi. 44, Lazarus;

xx. 7, our Lord), brought from the crown under the chin; (3) a handkerchief worn on the head, as the Bedouin's keffieh (Acts xix. 12). The semicinctum was the artisan's linen garment for the front of the body.

Hanes. Isa. xxx. 4, the same as Tahpanhes or Daphne, a fortress on the N.E. frontier of Egypt, to which the Jews sent ambassadors with presents for the reigning Pharaoh (perhaps Zet or Sethos of the 23rd dynasty), as also to the neighbouring Zoon his capital. Gesenius, less probably, makes H. to be Heracleopolis, W. of the Nile in central Egypt.

Hanging. Criminals were usually put to death before hanging, for ignominy (Josh. x. 26). The bodies were removed before nightfall in order not to defile the land (Deut. xvi. 22, 23). Hence our Lord's body as those of the two thieves was taken from the cross before the "high day" of the approaching "sabbath" (John xix. 31).

Hangings. I. Masak, "the covering before the door (rather 'the curtain for the entrance,' so A. V. distinguishes the words rightly at Num. iii. 26) of the tabernacle" (Exod. xxvi. 36, 37); of variegated stuff "wrought with needle-work" ("the work of the embroiderer"), hung on five pillars of acacia wood; the curtain, unlike the hangings at the sides and back of the court, could be drawn up or aside at pleasure. Another before the entrance of the court (Exod. xxvii. 16). The term also is used in connection with the veil of the holy of holies, the "veil of the covering" (Exod. xxxv. 12). 2. Qebeh'im, hangings of fine-twined linen for the walls of the court of the tabernacle, like our tapestry (Exod. xxvii. 9).

Haniel. 1 Chron. vii. 39, 40.

Hannah=grace. The favourite wife of Elkanah, a Levite of Ramathaim Zophim. His other wife Peninnah, who had sons and daughters, acted as "her adversary provoking her sore for to make her fret, because the Lord had shut up her womb"; and this "year by year when she went up to the house of Jehovah," and when her husband gave her a double portion of the flesh at the sacrificial meal (Heb. one portion for two persons); to show her he loved her as dearly as if she had sons, which aggravated Peninnah's enmity: "therefore (instead of joy such as a festive season usually produces) she wept and did not eat" (1 Sam. i.). Elkanah comforted her saying, "Am not I better to thee than ten sons?" Polygamy begets jealousies, and is its own punishment (Gen. xvi. 1-6). Her sorrow drove her the more closely to God; "in bitterness of soul" she "prayed unto Jehovah and wept sore, and vowed, O Lord of hosts (who hast therefore all powers at Thy command), if Thou wilt indeed look on the affliction of Thine handmaid and wilt give a man child, then I will give him unto Jehovah all his life, and no razor shall come upon his head." Her desire for a son was subordinate and subsidiary to her higher desire that he should be the instrument of a religious revival, then so much needed in Israel. As Samson, the last divinely sent deliverer, was a Nazirite from the womb so H. desired that her son should have Samson's consecration but without Samson's delusion. Her vow implies how much she felt the need of some extraordinary instrument being raised to stem the tide of evil; hence instead of leaving it optional how long the Nazirite vow should last she destined her son to a vow for life. "Only her lips moved but her voice was not heard (a proof how real prayer may be, though unspoken, for the still water is often deepest whilst the shallow stream babblest loudest), therefore Eli the highpriest thought her drunken." Hasty judgments are often uncharitable, love thinketh no evil. It had been better if he had been as faultfinding where it was really needed, viz. with his own dissolute sons. To his reproach, which one already overweighted should have been spared, she meekly replied: "No, my lord; I am a woman of a sorrowful spirit, I have drunk no strong drink, but have poured out (emptying of all its contents, the definition of true prayer, Ps. lxi. 8) my soul before Jehovah." Eli's reproof was turned into blessing, "the God of Israel grant thee thy petition." So she went her way and did eat, and her countenance was no more sad, for prayer dispels care (Phil. iv. 6). In due time "Jehovah remembered her," and gave her a son whom she named SAMUEL [see], i.e. heard of God, "because I have asked him of the Lord." She did not go up again to the sanctuary till she had weaned him (the Hebrew weaning was not till three years of age) and could present him to the Lord for ever. The mention of Elkanah's offering "his vow" shows that he too had vowed for the birth of a son by his beloved H. His prayer, "only the Lord establish His word," refers to their joint hopes that their son might be an instrument of spiritual blessing to Israel. The three bullocks offered were, one a burnt offering wherewith Samuel was consecrated to Jehovah, the other two the festal offering, i.e. the burnt offering and the thank offering which Elkanah presented yearly. H. in presenting the child to Eli made herself known as the woman who had prayed for him in that place years before; "Jehovah hath granted what I asked, therefore I also make him one asked of Jehovah, as long as he liveth he shall be as one asked of Jehovah." The translation "lent" is unsuitable; Jehovah had given, not "lent." Samuel to her; still less could she "lend" him to Jehovah. Elkanah then "worshipped Jehovah."

H. followed with her song of praise, the prototype of the Virgin Mary's song and Zacharias' (Luke i. 46, etc., and 68, etc.), as Samuel typifies Jesus (comp. Ps. cxiii.). H. regards her case as an illustration of the eternal principle of God's moral government which was to find its highest realization in God's "Anointed," King Messiah. Joy in the Lord's salvation is the final portion of the now afflicted righteous, founded on the holiness of

CARPENTER'S TOOLS.

God (ii. 2). Proud speech escapes not God's acquiescence (ver. 3); Peninnah's case is a sample of the universal law, "by God actions are weighed" (Dan. v. 27). Keil transl. "to Him actions are weighed," i.e. His (God's) actions are just; alleging that it is men's hearts not their actions that are weighed (Prov. xvi. 2, xxi. 2, xxv. 12). Israel's now insulting foes shall yet be brought to account; "the bows of the mighty shall be broken," and stumbling Israel shall be "girded with strength." "The barren bears seven," i.e. many children, seven being the sacred number indicating divinely covenanted fullness and perfection. "And she that hath many children is waxed feeble"; "Jehovah bringeth down to the grave and bringeth up": soon to be illustrated in Israel's history under Samuel (iv.—viii.). "He will keep the feet of His saints, and the wicked shall be silent in darkness"; the humble saints will be "kept" finally (1 Pet. i. 5, v. 5-7), whereas the now loud boasting wicked shall be silenced (Jude 15, Matt. xxi. 12, 13) in perpetual darkness. Her prophetic anticipations have been and are being fulfilled. The Philistine oppressors have long passed into oblivion, but trodden down Israel survives, awaiting the day when "the adversaries of Jehovah shall be broken to pieces," when "He shall judge the ends of the earth, and give strength unto His King, and exalt His Anointed," in whom alone the Divine kingdom finds its culmination (Ps. ii.).

H. made and brought Samuel yearly a coat (meil), the term for the coat of the highpriest, which it resembled, though of simpler material and less ornament; it marked his close spiritual relation to Jehovah and His highpriest) when she accompanied Elkana to the yearly sacrifice. Her devoting him to Jehovah was, in accordance with Eli's prayer, followed by God giving her three more sons and two daughters, for He rewards superabundantly any sacrifice we make for Him (2 Chron. xxv. 9; 2 Cor. ix. 10, 11).

Hannathon. A city on the N. boundary of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 14).

Hanniel. Num. xxiv. 25.

Hanoch. 1. Gen. xiv. 4. HENOKH, 1 Chron. i. 23. 2. Gen. xvi. 9, Exod. vi. 14, Num. xxi. 5. From him sprang the HENOCHITES.

Hanun. 1. Son of Nahash, king of Ammon 1367 B.C. David had in his outlawry by Saul received kindness from Nahash; naturally, as Nahash was (1 Sam. xi) Saul's enemy and neighbour of Moab with which David's descent from the Moabitess Ruth connected him. He therefore at Nahash's death sent a message of condolence to his son H. As gratitude, kindness, and sympathy characterized David's conduct, so ingratitude, uncharitable suspiciousness, and insolent injustice characterized H. Insulting the ambassadors (by shaving half the beard, which is a foul insult in oriental estimation, and cutting off their skirts) brought on himself and his country a disastrous war which ended in the capture of Rabbah and of the royal crown, and the cruellest retaliations on their fighting men of their own cruelties to Israel (2 Sam. x., xii. 30, 31; 1 Chron. xix., xx.).

2. Neh. iii. 13. 3. Neh. iii. 30.

Haphraim. A city of Issachar (Josh. xix. 19), meaning "the two pits." Probably now el-Afaleh.

Hara. 1 Chron. v. 26. Pul and Tiglath Pileser carried the men of Reuben, Gad, and half Manasse away to H. whilst most were taken to Habor. The name may be akin to Aria and Aryans, the Gr. for Media and the Medes. Probably HARAN, the Mesopotamian city whither Abram came from Ur, where he received his second call from God [see ABRAHAM], and where his brother Nahor's children settled (Gen. xi. 31, xxiv. 10, xxvii. 43, xxv. 20) in Padan Aram—the low and beautiful region at the foot of the hills below mount Masius, between the Khabour and the Euphrates. Here still is a town bearing the old name Harran, whose people retained until lately the Chaldean language and idols; upon the Belitk (anciently Bilechus), an affluent of the Euphrates. Called Charran Acts vii. 2, 4. The scene of Crassus' defeat. At our Lord's time in Abgarus' kingdom of Edessa.

Haran was Terah's firstborn son, eldest brother of Abram (who is named first in Gen. xi. 27, because heir of the promises), father of Lot, and Milcah who married her uncle Nahor, and Iscah or Sarai who married her uncle Abram, being "daughter (i.e. granddaughter) of his father not of his mother" (xx. 12). That H. was oldest brother appears from his brothers marrying his daughters, Sarai being only ten years younger than Abram (xvii. 17); H. died in Ur, his native place, before his father. In the Heb. the country H. begins with ch, the man H. with h, as also the H. the Gershemite Levite under David of Shime'i's family (1 Chron. xxiii. 9). Hara begins with h; Caleb's son by Ephah (1 Chron. ii. 46) begins with ch. Jewish tradition makes H. to have been cast into Nimrod's furnace for wavering during Abram's fiery trial.

Hararite = mountaineer. 2 Sam. xiii. 11, 33; comp. 1 Chron. xi. 31, 35. Kennicott would read in both Sam. and Chron. "Jonathan, son of Shammah (David's brother Shime'i) the H."

Harbona. Third of the seven eunuchs of Ahasuerus. Suggested the hanging of Haman on his own gallows (Esth. i. 19, vii. 9).

Hare; arabeth. Reckoned unclean on the ground that it "chews the cud, but divideth not the hoof" (Lev. xi. 6, Deut. xiv. 7). It brings up from the oesophagus and chews again its food; but there is no genuine rumination, neither it nor the hyrax ("coney") or shaphan have the peculiar stomach of the ruminants. Rodent animals, as the hare and the hyrax, keep down the undue growth of their teeth, which grow during life, by grinding with their jaws. The sacred legislator did not design the classification of a scientific naturalist or a comparative anatomist, but to furnish a popular mode of recognising animals the flesh of which was not to be eaten. The rule in ver. 27, HARE.

"whatsoever goeth upon his paws" (as the dog, cat, and beasts of prey), sufficiently excludes from the clean the hyrax and the hare. The Parsees still abominate the hare. The hare, though having a divided foot, has not a cloven hoof, which was a requisite for legal cleanness. True ruminants have four stomachs, molar teeth, and a jawbone suited for the circular movement of chewing the cud. The hare has none of these marks, and has in the upper jaw incisor teeth, which ruminants have not. But hares retain the cropped food within the hollows of their cheeks and masticate it at leisure, which in phenomenal language is "chewing the cud," and is so described by even so close an observer of nature as the poet Cowper. The ancient Britons rejected it as food. The Palestinian hare, Lepus Syriacus, was of a fur buff or yellowish grey colour, the hare of the desert (Sinaiticus) darker and smaller. The rabbit (Lepus cuniculus) seems to be unknown in Syria and Palestine.

Hareph. 1 Chron. ii. 51. HARAPH, CHILDREN OF (Neh. vii. 24), called also Jorah in Ezra ii. 18; 112 returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. x. 19).

Hareth, forest of. David's refuge when by Gad's counsel he quitted the "hold" of the cave of Adullam, or else Mizpeh of Moab (1 Sam. xxii. 5). Ganneau would identify with Herche (=forests) near Yalo; but LXX. and Josephus speak of "the city of Hareth." There could have been no forests in that part of Palestine. It answers to Kharas, a mile above Keilah, among inaccessible ravines, but easily reached from the valley of Elah. Ruined walls, cisterns, and caves are to be seen. (Conder, Pal. Expl.) [See KEILAH.]

Harhas. 2 Kings xxii. 14. HASRAH in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22.

Harhur, children of. Ezra ii. 51, Neh. vii. 53.

Harim. 1. 1 Chron. xxiv. 8. 2. CHILDREN OF H.; 1017 came up with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra ii. 20, x. 21; Neh. vii. 42, x. 5). 3. Rehob or H. (by transposition of letters); Neh. xii. 3, 15. 4. Ezra ii. 32, x. 31; Neh. vii. 35, x. 27.

Harlot. [On the spiritual "harlot" see ANTICHRIST and Isa. i. 21, Rev. xvii.; contrast Rev. xii. and BEAST.] Fornication was regarded by the unconverted Gentiles as a thing indifferent in itself, having no moral guilt intrinsically; hence in the Jerusalem decree (Acts xv.) it is classed with things which Gentile usage allowed but Jewish law forbade. The moral abomination of it is elsewhere condemned as excluding from heaven (1 Cor. vi. 9-20). The general Heb. term zonah expresses any licentiousness in the married or unmarried; so the Gr. porneia in Matt. v. 32. Zarah and nokriyah, "the strange woman," implies that foreign women were those often found among the harlot class. In Prov. v. 17-20 "strange" seemingly contrasts with one's own rightful wife; another term, qudeeshah, "consecrated woman" (in Gen. xxxviii. 21, 22, Dent. xxiii. 17, Hos. iv. 14), refers to the abominable worship of the Syrian Astarte or Venus by prostitution. By Divine retribution in kind Israel's sin was made its punishment: "My people have gone a whoring (spiritually as well as literally) from under their God . . . therefore your daughters shall commit whoredom, and your spouses shall commit adultery." What ye do of your own will, desert your Divine Father and Husband, your daughters and wives shall do against your will, desert you and Him. The people's idolatry became the source of dishonour to those to whom their honour was dearest, their wives and daughters. "The men of Babylon in the Saeeth Benoth" their idol in Samaria (2 Kings xvii. 30); the idol's name means "booths for their daughters," referring to their prostitution in this detestable worship. The masculine qudeesh, "Solonites," implies male prostitution in the same vile worship (Dent. xxiii. 17; 1 Kings xiv. 24, xv. 12, xxii. 46; 2 Kings xxiii. 7; Job xxvi. 10). Tamar veiled herself and sat by the wayside as a consecrated harlot (qudeesh) under a vow, and was so regarded by Judah. Herodotus (i. 199) mentions the impure custom in the Babylonian worship of Mylitta, so that of the Dea Syria at Byblos very anciently. Singing and harping about a city was the badge of a harlot (Isa. xxiii. 16). Male relatives exercised unlimited power in punishing chaste women for the family dishonour (Gen. xxxviii. 24). A priest's daughter playing the whore was burnt to death (Lev. xxi. 9). The children of a harlot could not inherit with legitimate children (John viii. 41, Dent. xxiii. 2), but "bastard" means probably one born of incest or adultery; so the rabbis explain Jud. xi. 1, 2.

Harnepher. 1 Chron. vii. 36.

Harod, the well of. Jud. vii. 1, 3. Gideon's encampment, where the 300 who drank the water from their hands were selected. The word Harod is played upon, "whosoever is trembling (haral) let him return." Now Ain Jalud, the hill Moroh is Jebel Duhay. From it two of David's 37 warriors of the body guard are called each "the Harodite," viz. SHAMMAH and ELIKA (2 Sam. xiii. 25).

Haroh=the seer. 1 Chron. ii. 52.

Harosheth of the Gentiles. So called from the mixed races that inhabited it. A city in Naphtali W. of the lake Merom (El Huleh), from which the Jordan passes in an undivided stream. Sisera, captain of Jabin II. king of Canaan, resided there (Jud. iv. 2). Jabin's own residence and seat of government was Hazor, N.W. of H. To H. Barak pursued Jabin's routed army. Joshua

(xi. 6, 10) had 150 years before routed the confederate kings of northern Canaan, headed by Jabin I., at the waters of Merom, the first occasion of Israel's having to encounter "chariots and horses." Joshua "loathed (hamstrung) their horses and burned their chariots with fire" in firm faith and obedience to God's prohibition against their fighting the foe with his own weapon (Dent. xvii. 16). Unbelieving fear subsequently altered Israel's policy, so that they shrank from battling with the enemy's chariots in plains such as the Jordan valley, beside which H. stood (Josh. xvii. 16-18, Jud. i. 19), and at last adopted chariots in their armies under the kings: 2 Sam. viii. 4 David, xv. 1 Absalom, 1 Kings i. 5 Adonijah, iv. 26 Solomon. Hazor was rebuilt in the interval between Jabin I. and Jabin II.; the latter of whom was the first who threw off Israel's yoke and oppressed Israel in turn (for their previous oppressors, the kings of Mesopotamia and Moab, Chushan Rishathaim and Eglon, were outside not within the promised land, as Jabin II.). After the defeat by Barak, Hazor and H. and northern Canaan remained permanently in Israel's hand.

Harp: kinor. With ten strings, played on with a plectrum (quill), according to Josephus; but also with the hand by David (1 Sam. xvi. 23, xviii. 10, xix. 9). Jubal invented it, the simplest kind of stringed instrument, and the "organ" (uyab), rather the "pipe," the simplest kind of wind instrument; his brother Jubal was "father of such as dwell in tents and have cattle." The brotherhood accords with the fact that the leisure of a nomad life was well suited to the production and appreciation of music (Gen. iv. 20, 21). The harp was the earliest of all musical instruments, and the national instrument of the Hebrews. They used it, not as the Greeks, for expressing sorrow, but on occasions of joy and praise (Gen. xxi. 27, 2 Chron. xx. 28, Ps. xxxiii. 2); therefore it was hung on the willows in the Babylonian captivity (exxxvii. 2, Job xxx. 31). The words "My bowels shall sound like an harp" (Isa. xvi. 11) do not allude to the sound as lugubrious, but to the strings vibrating when struck. There was a smaller harp played with the hand, as by the walking prophets (1 Sam. x. 5), besides the larger, with more strings, played with the plectrum. Its music, as that of other instruments, was raised to its highest perfection under David (Amos vi. 5). It was an important adjunct to the "schools of the prophets."

Harrow: charitz. 2 Sam. xii. 31. Possibly a "threshing instrument." In modern Palestine no such instrument as our harrow exists, and it is unlikely it did anciently.

Harsha. Ezra ii. 52, Neh. vii. 54.

Hart: ayyal. The male of the stag, Cervus Dama. Resorting to the mountains (S. of Sol. vii. 14); sure-footed there (2 Sam. xxii. 34, Hab. iii. 19). Monogamous and constant in affection (Prov. v. 19). In Ps. xlii. 1 the verb is feminine; the hind therefore, not the hart, is meant; her weakness intensifies her thirst. The emblem of activity (Isa. xxxv. 6). So Naphtali is described by Jacob prophetically

HIND.

(Gen. xlix. 21), "a hind let loose." His active energy was shown against Jabin the Canaanite oppressor (Jud. iv. 6-9, v. 18). The targum say he first told Jacob that the Gargum was yet alive; "he giveth goodly words." The Heb. sheluchin, "the apostles," answers to shelucha "let loose." So the prophecy hints at what Isaiah (lii. 7) more clearly unfolds, "how beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings." Easily agitated (S. of Sol. ii. 7, iii. 5), so that the hunter must advance on them with breathless caution if he would take them; an emblem of the resting (Zeph. iii. 17) but easily grieved Holy Spirit (Ezek. xvi. 43, Matt. xviii. 7, Eph. iv. 30). The thunder so terrifies them that they prematurely bring forth (Ps. xxix. 9). The ease of their parturition, through the instinct given them by God's care, stands in contrast to the shepherd's anxiety in numbering the months of the flock's pregnancy, and is an argument to convince Job (xxxix. 1-3) of God's consummate wisdom; why then should he harbour for a moment the thought that God, who cares so providentially for the humblest creature, could be capable of harshness and injustice towards His noblest creature, man? The masculine ayyal, LXX. elaphos, is the fallow deer (Dama vulgaris) or the Barbary deer (Cervus Barbatus) according to Appendix, Smith's Bible Dict. Timid and fleet especially when seeking and not able to find pasture (Lam. i. 6); emblem of Zion's captive princes at Babylon. LXX. and Vulg. read eyylim, "rams." Ajalon abounded in the ayyal, whence it took its name. Aycheh, "the hind," in the title Ps. xxii. symbolises one shot at by the archers and persecuted to death, viz. Messiah; as the persecutors are symbolized by "hulls," "lions," "dogs." The addition "of the mourning" (shahar) implies prosperity dawning after suffering. The hind is emblematic of the grace, innocence, and loveliness (S. of Sol. ii. 9) of the Antitype to Joseph (Gen. xlix. 23, 24). The hind's sure footing in the rocks typifies the believer's preservation in high places and difficulties. The Arabs call a deer by a like name to the Heb., tyal. The deer is represented on the slabs at Nineveh, and seems to have abounded anciently in Syria, though not there now.

Harum. 1 Chron. iv. 8.

Harumaph. Neh. iii. 10.

Haruphite. 1 Chron. xii. 5.

Haruz. 2 Kings xxi. 19.

Hasadiah. Zerubbabel's son (1 Chron. iii. 20). Meaning "beloved of Jehovah," marking the hopeful spirit of the returned exiles.

Hasenuah. Sennah with the article (1 Chron. ix. 7).

Hashabiah. 1. "Regarded by Jehovah" (1 Chron. vi. 15). 2. 1 Chron. ix. 11. 3. 1 Chron. xxv. 3. 19. 4. 1 Chron. xxvi. 30, one of the Hebronites (a chief Levite family sprung from Hebron, Kohath's son). With 1,700 men he had charge of all business appertaining to the Lord's and to king David's service. Called "ruler of the Levites, son of Kemuel" (1 Chron. xvi. 17). 5. 2 Chron. xxxv. 9. 6. Ezra viii. 19. 7. Ezra viii. 24. 8. Neh. iii. 17. 9. Neh. x. 11; the "chief" (xii. 24, 26). 10. Neh. xi. 15. 11. Neh. xi. 22. 12. Neh. xii. 1, 10, 21, 25.

Hashabnah. Neh. x. 25.

Hashabnah. 1. Neh. iii. 10. 2. Neh. ix. 5.

Hashbadana. Neh. viii. 4.

Hashem. 1 Chron. xi. 34. JASHEN in 2 Sam. xxiii. 32.

Hashmannim. Heb. for "princes shall come out of Egypt" (Ps. lxxviii. 31); rich nobles, whence the Maccabees took their name. Asmonaeus. The Egyptian civil name of Hermopolis Magna was Hashmen. The idol of wisdom, Hermes, Thoth, gave his name to the city; thus the derived term H. means wisest Egyptian princes. These as well as distant Ethiopians shall turn to the true God.

Hashmonah. The stage of Israel's journeyings near mount Hor, next before Moseroth (Num. xxxiii. 29, xx. 28; Deut. x. 6). Heshmon (Josh. xv. 27), an "utmost city of Judah toward the coast of Edom southward," like Kedesh outside the natural frontier of Palestine, in the extreme N. of the desert. At Ain Hasb, N.W. of the Arabah, is a pool still of sweet living water, surrounded by verdure, and with traces of ruins (Robinson, Bib. Res. ii. 119).

Hashub, Hasshub. 1. 1 Chron. ix. 11. Neh. iii. 11. 2. Neh. iii. 23. 3. Neh. x. 23. 4. Neh. xi. 15.

Hashubah. See HASADIAH.

Hashum, children of. 1. 223 in Ezra, 325 in Nehemiah, came back with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 22, Ezra ii. 19). Many causes which we can only conjecture may have produced the variation; some gave in their names to go who did not go; others joined the caravan subsequently (Neh. x. 18, Ezra x. 33). 2. Neh. viii. 4.

Hashupha. Neh. vi. 16. HASHUPHA more correctly (Ezra ii. 13).

Hassenaah, children of. Neh. iii. 2. Sennah with the article (Neh. vii. 38). Comp. the kindred name of a cliff, Senah (1 Sam. xiv. 1).

Hatach. Esth. iv. 5, 10.

Hathath. 1 Chron. iv. 13.

Hatipha, children of. Ezra ii. 54. Neh. vii. 56.

Hatita, children of. Ezra ii. 42. Neh. vii. 45.

Hattil, children of. "Children of Solomon's slaves" (Ezra ii. 57, 58; Neh. vii. 59, 60).

Hattush. 1. 1 Chron. iii. 22. Lord A. Hervey identifies Shemaiah with Shimei, Zerubbabel's brother. Thos H. would be Zerubbabel's nephew. An H. "of the sons of David" (Ezra viii. 2). An H. in Neh. xii. 2. The one and the same H. may be meant in all the passages. But the same name in the same family may be repeated in different generations; the H. in 1 Chron. iii. 22 seems distinct from the H. of Ezra viii. 2, Neh. xii. 2. 2. Neh. iii. 10.

Hauran. Ezek. xlvii. 16, 18. Extending from near Damascus southward as far as the Jabbok. The Gr. Auranitis. Derived from haur "a cave," as it abounds in cisterns excavated for storing water or else grain. With rugged Trachonitis (on the N.), mountainous Batanea (on the E.), and Gaulanitis (on the W.), it formed ancient Bashan. It was N. of the plains of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 21). The country is level and among the richest in Syria, free from stones except on a few low volcanic tells here and there. It is still the granary of Damascus. Ruins of Roman towns abound with buildings antenanted, though perfect with walls, roofs, and doors of black basalt rock, there being no timber in the H. Besides the Roman architectural magnificence traceable in some buildings, each village has its tank and bridge. The style of building in Um er Ruman, in the extreme S., is not Roman but almost like that of Palmyra. El Lejah is a rocky plain N.W. of H. proper, and is full of deserted towns and villages. El Gebel is a mountainous region between H. and the eastern desert.

Havilah. 1. Gen. x. 7. 2. Descendants of H. son of Cush, probably intermingled with the descendants of H. the Joktanite H. So one people was formed, occupying Khawlan, the fertile region in the N.W. portion of Yemen or Arabia Felix. The Joktanite settlement was probably the earliest, the Arabs tracing the name Khawlan (which is another form of H. or Chavilah, with the ending n) to a descendant of Kahtan or Joktan. The region is fertile, abounding in myrrh, well watered, and populous. The H. bordering on the Ishmaelites "as thou goest to Assyria" (Gen. xxv. 18), also on Amalek (1 Sam. xv. 7), seems distinct. This H. is not as the former H. in the heart of Yemen, but on the border of Arabia Petraea towards Yemen, between the Nabatheans and the Hagrites; the country of the Chanlotheans.

Havothjair. See BASHAN HAVOTH-JAIR.

Hawk: neets: implying strong and rapid flight. Migratory in S. Europe and parts of Asia; so Job xxxix. 26, "doth the hawk fly by thy wisdom, and stretch her wings toward the S?" Of the dozen lesser raptors, birds, in Palestine nearly all are summer migrants; the Falco saker and lanarius, besides the smaller F. melanopterus, Hypotriorchus subbuteo or the hobby, etc. The sacred monuments show that one kind was sacred in Egypt. The Gr. name implies sacredness, hierax.

HAWK.

Hay. The Heb. has no word for it, chatzir (Prov. xxvii. 25, Isa. xv. 6) expressing grass as well as hay. For in the hot East the grass becomes hay as it stands; comp. Matt. vi. 30. It was cut as it was used, and not stacked (Ps. xxxvii. 2, lxxii. 6, cxxix. 7). Amos vii. 1, "the latter growth," is that which springs up after mowing. Chashash (Isa. v. 24) is not "chaff," but the withered grass. In Isa. xv. 6, Prov. xxvii. 2, transl. "the hay grass."

Hazael. King of Damascus from 886 to 840 B.C. Sent by his master Benhadad originally to Elisha to ask if he would recover from his sickness. The prophet answered he might recover (the disease not being fatal), but "that he should surely die." Then Elisha gazing at H. burst into tears (typifying Him who wept over Jerusalem, Luke xix. 41), and said his weeping was "because I know the evil thou wilt do unto Israel . . . their strongholds wilt thou set on fire, and their young men wilt thou slay with the sword, and wilt dash their children, and rip up their women with child." H. replied, expressing surprise at such a one as he being about to do so [see ELISHA for the true transl. of 2 Kings viii. 32]. Herein Elisha fulfilled Elijah's commission, that he should appoint H. king of Syria to be the Lord's scourge of His guilty people (1 Kings xix. 16). H. having murdered Benhadad became king, and fought with Ahaziah king of Judah, and Jehoram of Israel, for Ramoth Gilead (2 Kings viii. 28). The atrocities forbidd (the same as in Hos. xiii. 16) were doubtless perpetrated by him when in Jehu's days "Jehovah cut Israel short, and H. smote them in all the coasts of Israel, from Jordan eastward, all . . . Gilead, the Gadites, Benvenites, Manassites, from Aroer by the Arnon, even Gilead and Bashan" (2 Kings x. 32, 33). Jehovah therefore threatened, and executed his threat, "for three transgressions of Damascus, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof; because they have threshed Gilead with threshing instruments of iron; and I will send a fire into the house of H." etc. (Amos i. 3). The very same image is used in the independent history (an undesigned coincidence and mark of genuineness), concerning the king of Syria's oppression of Israel under Jehoahaz, Jehu's son: "he made them like the dust by threshing" (2 Kings xiii. 7). A black marble obelisk of the central palace of Nimrud, now in the British Museum, is inscribed with the names of H. and Benhadad of Syria, and Jehu of Israel, mentioned as tributaries of Shalmanassar king of Assyria. The tribute from Jehu is mentioned, gold, pearls, precious oil, etc. The name H. means "whom God looks on," implying some connection with the true God (El). El was also in the name of El-isha, who appointed him in the name of El; probably he assumed this name because of this call. Benhadad means on the contrary "worshipper of Hadad," the Syrian idol. H. led the Syrians, we read in the Assyrian monuments, in confederacy with the Hittites, Ha-mathites, and Phœnicians, against Assyria; at Antilibanus the Assyrians slew 16,000 of her warriors, and took 1100 chariots. Three years later H. submitted to the Assyrians when they again invaded Syria.

It was after this, when the Assyrians were prevented by internal troubles from continuing to invade, that H. assailed Gilead towards the close of Jehu's reign (about 860 B.C.), and held Israel in a kind of subjection (2 Kings xiii. 3-7, 22). He took Gath and even "set his face to go up to Jerusalem" (xii. 17) in Josiah's reign (2 Chron. xxiv. 23, 24), "and destroyed all the princes of the people from among the people" (it was God's righteous retribution, for it was "the princes of Judah" who with flattering "obsequence" at Jehoiada's death persuaded Joash to "leave the house of the Lord God of their fathers, to serve groves and idols," ver. 17, 18, and stoned Zechariah son of Jehoiada, who "testified against them," ver. 19-22), and sent all the spoil to Damascus; Jehovah delivering "a very great host into the hand of a small company of Syrians, because the Jews had forsaken the Lord God of their fathers" (ver. 23, 24). Joash saved Jerusalem only by "sending to H. all the hallowed things that Jehoshaphat, Jehoram, and Ahaziah his fathers had dedicated, and his own hallowed things, and all the gold in the treasures of the house of the Lord, and in the king's house" (2 Kings xii. 18). H. died about 810 B.C., after a 45 years' reign.

Jehoash, son of Jehoabaz, recovered from Benhadad, H.'s son, the cities taken by H. Jeroboam II. still further "restored the coast of Israel from the entering in of Hamath unto the sea of the plain," according to Jonah's prophecy, through the Lord's great compassion (2 Kings xiii. 25, xiv. 25-27). H.'s cruelty and ambition failed to secure a lasting dynasty; see Jer. xvii. 11.

Hazaiah. Neh. xi. 5.

Hazar. All the compounds of HAZER were in the wilderness or its borders. Hazer is the "court" or quadrangle of a palace; and applies to the villages of rovers, semi-permanent collections of dwellings, such as still exist, rough stone walls being covered with tent cloths, holding thus a middle place between the tent and the town.

HAZAR-ADDAR. Between Barnea and Azmon (Num. xxiv. 4). A landmark on the southern boundary of the promised land.

HAZAR-ENAN=village of springs. Here the northern boundary terminated (Num. xxiv. 9, 19), and the eastern boundary began. Identified with Ayn ed Dara, a fountain in the midst of the central chain of Antilibanus; in Van de Velde's map, lat 33° 49', long. 36° 12'. Ruins mark the spot. Thus the E. and W. declivities of the northern part of the Antilibanus range, excluding the Damascus plain and its contiguous valleys, were included in the borders of the promised land (Speaker's Comm., Num. xxiv. 9).

HAZAR-GADDAH; probably now El Ghura (Conder). A town on the S.

of Judah (Josh. xv. 27). HAZAR-HATTICON, "the middle village"; on the boundary of Hauran (Ezek. xlvii. 16). HAZAR-SHUAL, "fox or jackal village"; in southern Judah, between Hazar-Gaddah and Beersheba (Josh. xv. 28, xix. 3; 1 Chron. iv. 28; Neh. xi. 27); now Satech. HAZAR-SUSAN, "horse village"; belonging to Simeon, in southern Judah (Josh. xix. 5, 1 Chron. iv. 31); possibly made a depot for horses in the trade with Egypt in Solomon's time; the name may be changed from some ancient name, as the import of horses was prohibited, and not practised till David's and Solomon's time. In the Quarterly Statement of the Pal. Expl. the sites of Hazar-Shual and Hazar-Gaddah are described as walled towns of flint, answering to the meaning of Hazar, an "enclosure."

Hazarmaveth="the court of death." Third of Joktan's sons (Gen. x. 26). Hadramut, a province in S.E. of Arabia, abounding in myrrh and frankincense, but deadly in climate, whence it derives its name. Called Atramite by the Romans and Greeks. The most powerful of the Arab tribes. Between the modern Yemen which lies on the W. and the Mahra country. Shibam is its capital. Hazel: bez. Rather the "almond," (Gen. xxx. 37 (Gesenius)).

Hazeleponi. With the article, "the Tzeleponi" (1 Chron. iv. 31).

Hazerim. The villages or "enclosures" [see HAZAR] of the wandering Avvims, the ancient occupants of south-western Palestine (Deut. ii. 23).

Hazereth. The stage after Kibroth Hattaavah in Israel's wanderings (Num. xi. 35, xii. 16, xxxiii. 17; Deut. i. 1). Now El Ain, famed for its spring, on Israel's probable route (which Ain el Hudherah is not) by the wady es Zuhrah. But Clark identifies H. with Bir eth Themed, many miles farther on the march northwards. Several valleys converge round El Ain, which with other springs make this region the oasis of the E. of the peninsula.

Hazezon Tamar="pruning of palms." The old name of ENGEDI [see], famed for palms. Perhaps this was "the city of palmtrees" (Jud. i. 16) (though Jericho is generally called so; Deut. xxiv. 3), from which the Kenites, the tribe of Moses' father-in-law, went into the wilderness of Judah with the children of Judah. Thus Balhan standing on a height opposite Jericho, and seeing the western shore of the Dead Sea to Engedi, appropriately speaks of the Kenite as having fixed his "nest" in the cliff there (Num. xxiv. 21).

Haziel. 1 Chron. xxiii. 9.

Hazo. Son of Nah-r by Mileah (Gen. xxi. 22). There is a Chazene in Mesopotamia, and another in Assyria (Strabo, xvi. 736).

Hazor="enclosed." [See HAROSH-ETH.] 1. In Naphtali, on a height overlooking lake Merom (Josh. xi. 1, 19, "head of all those kingdoms," i.e. the chief city of northern Palestine; xii. 19, xix. 36; Jud. iv. 2, 17; 1 Sam. xii. 9). Burnt by Joshua in order not to leave such a strong place in his rear; rebuilt and made the second Jabin's seat whence he oppressed Israel. Fortified by Solomon as a point of defence at the entering into Palestine from Syria and Assyria; its fortification was one among the works which necessitated a "levy" of taxes (1 Kings ix. 15). Its inhabitants were carried to Assyria by Tiglath Pileser (2 Kings xv. 29). Now Tell Khareibeh, "the ruins," according to Robinson; but there are no old ruins there and no cisterns. Rather Tel Hara, where is an ancient fortress, and walls, ruins, and pottery (Our Work in Palestine. Pal. Expl. Fund.). 2. A city in the extreme S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 23). 3. HAZOR-HADATHAN, "the new H." as distinguished from the former; also in southern Judah (Josh. xv. 25). 4. A city N. of Jerusalem, where the Benjamites resided after the return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 33).

Headdress. The head was usually uncovered. In Lev. x. 6 the sense of "uncover (lit. let loose) not your heads" is "let not your hair fall loosely from your head" as in mourning. When needful the head was covered with the mantle; the radal and tzaniph were so used, the veil also. In Job xxix. 14, "my judgment (justice) was as . . . a diadem," transl. "a turban," or headdress of linen rolled around (tzaniph). It and the flowing outer "robe" characterize an oriental grandee or high-priest (Zech. iii. 5). The tzaniph was worn also by an adorned lady (Isa. iii. 23, "hoods" or mitres), also by kings, lxii. 3. The pe-er was a holiday ornamental headdress: (Isa. lxi. 3) "beauty for ashes" (a play on like sounds, pe-er epher), to give them the ornamental headdress worn on joyous occasions (Ezek. xxiv. 17) for the ashes cast on the head in mourning (2 Sam. xiii. 19). The highpriest's "mitre" was a twisted band of linen coiled into a cap, like a turban, with a plate or crown of gold in front. Instead of this the ordinary priests wore "bonnets" (rather cops) "for glory and for beauty." In Isa. lxi. 10, "as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments" (pe-er), transl. "with the priests' ornamental headdress," appropriate to the "kindness of priests," consecrated to offer spiritual sacrifices to God continually (Exod. xix. 6; Rev. v. 10, xvi. 6). The pe-er refers especially to the jewels and ornaments with which the turban is decorated. In Ezek. xvi. 10 "I girded thee about with fine linen" may refer to the turban. In Ezek. xxxiii. 15 "exceeding in dyed attire," transl. "redundant in dyed turbans," i.e. with amply-dyed turbans; the Assyrians delighted in amply richly dyed headdresses and robes. In Dan. iii. 21 for "bats" transl. "outer mantles."

Heart. Often including the intellect as well as the affections and will; as conversely the "mind" often includes the feeling and will as well as the intellect. Rom. i. 21, "their foolish heart was darkened." Eph. i. 18, "the eyes of your understanding."

ing (Nat. MS.; but Sin. and Alex. MSS. 'heart') being enlightened." Thus the Scripture implies that the heart and the head act and react on one another; and in men's unbelief it is the will that perverts the intellectual perceptions. John vii. 17, "if any man be willing to (Gr.) do, he shall know." Willingness to obey is the key to spiritual knowledge. See Jer. xvii. 9, Hos. vii. 11, "Ephraim is like a silly dove without heart," i.e. moral understanding.

Heath. Heb. 'arcor, 'ar'ar; Arabic - arar; the Juniper sabina or savin, with small scalelike leaves, close to the stem, a gloomy looking bush on a sterile soil, symbolising "the man that trusteth in man and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord" (Jer. xvii. 6); the Heb. means "naked"; such is he whose defence is other than Jehovah, a shrub in a barren soil, contrasted with the "tree spreading out her roots by the river," i.e. the man that trusteth in Jehovah (ver. 7, 8; comp. xlviii. 6 marg.).

Heathen. [See GENTILES.]

Heaven. From heaved up; so the heights (Ps. cxlviii. 1). The Gr. ouranos and the Heb. shamaim are similarly derived. It is used of the surrounding air wherein "the fowls of heaven" fly (Gen. i. 26, comp. 20); whence the rain and hail fall (Deut. xi. 11). "I will make your heaven as iron," i.e. your sky hard and yielding no rain (Lev. xxvi. 19). "The four quarters of heaven" (Jer. xlix. 36) and "the circuit of heaven" (Job xxii. 14) refer to the atmospheric heaven. By metaphor it is represented as a building with foundations and pillars (2 Sam. xxii. 8, Job xxvi. 11), with an entrance gate (Gen. xxviii. 17) and windows opened to pour down rain (Gen. vii. 11, comp. 2 Kings vii. 2, Mal. iii. 10). Job xxxvii. 18, "spread out the sky . . . strong . . . as a molten looking glass," not solid as "firmament" would imply, whereas the "expanse" is the true meaning (Gen. i. 6, Isa. xlv. 24), but phenomenally like one of the ancient mirrors made of firm molten polished metal.

Matthew, who is most Hebraistic in style, uses the plural, the Heb. term for heaven being always so. "The heaven of heavens" (Dout. x. 14) is a Hebraism for the highest heavens. Paul's "third heaven" (2 Cor. xii. 2) to which he was caught up implies this superlatively high heaven, which he reached after passing through the first heaven the air, and the second the sky of the stars (Eph. iv. 10). Heb. vii. 26, "made higher than the heavens," for Christ "passed through the heavens" (Heb. iv. 14, Gr.), viz. the aerial heaven and the starry heaven, the veil through which our High-priest passed into the heaven of heavens, the immediate presence of God, as the Levitical highpriest passed through the veil into the holy of holies. The visible heavens shall pass away to give place to the abiding new heaven and earth wherein shall dwell righteousness (Ps. cii. 25-27; Isa. lvi. 17, lvi. 22; 2 Pet. iii. 7, 13; Rev. xxi. 1; Heb. xii. 26-28). "The kingdom of the heavens" in Matthew, for "the kingdom of God" in Mark and Luke, is drawn from Dan. iv. 26, "the heavens do rule," (ii. 41) "the God of heaven shall set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed." It consists of many stages and phases, issuing at last in heaven being brought down fully to earth, and the tabernacle of God being with men (Rev. xxi. 2, 3, 10, etc.). The plurality of the phases is expressed by "the kingdom of the heavens."

The Bible is distinguished from the sacred books of false religions in not having minute details of heavenly bliss such as men's curiosity would crave. The grand feature of its blessedness is represented as consisting in holy personal union and immediate face to face communion with God and the Lamb; secondarily, that the saints are led by the Lamb to living fountains of water, and fed with the fruit of the tree of life in the midst of the paradise of God, the antitype of the former Adamic paradise. It is no longer merely a garden as Eden, but a heavenly "city" and garden combined, nature and art no longer mutually destructive, but enhancing each the charm of the other, individuality and society realized perfectly (Rev. ii., iii., vii., xxi., xxii.). No separate temple, but the whole forming one vast "temple," finding its centre in the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb, who are the temple to each and all the king-priests reigning and serving there. This was the model Moses was shown on Sinai (Heb. vii. 1-6). The earthly tabernacle was its pattern and figure (ix. 23, 24). The "altar" (Rev. vi. 9) and the "censer," etc. (viii. 3), the "temple" in heaven (xi. 19, xiv. 17, xv. 5, 8), are preliminary to the final state when there shall be "no temple therein" (xxi. 22), for the whole shall be perfectly consecrated to God. Negatives of present provisional conditions and evils form a large part of the subordinate description of heaven's bliss: no marriage (Luke xx. 34-36), no meats for the belly (1 Cor. vi. 13), no death, no sorrow, crying, pain; no defilement, no curse, no night, no candle, no light of the sun, for the Lord God giveth them light (Rev. xxi. 4, 27; xxii. 3, 5).

Heaven is not merely a state but a place. For it is the place where Christ's glorified body now is; "the heaven must receive Him until the times of restitution of all things" (Acts iii. 21). Thither He will "receive His people to Himself" after He hath "prepared a place for them" (John xiv. 2-4), that where He is there His servants may be (xii. 26). From heaven, which is God's court, angels are sent down to this earth, as the multitude of the heavenly host (distinct from "the host of heaven," Acts vii. 42), and to which they return (Luke ii. 13-15, xxii. 43). God Himself is addressed "Our Father who art in heaven."

His home is the parent home, the sacred hearth of the universe.

Heber: "EBER" means "beyond."

1. The father of Peleg and ancestor of Abraham (Gen. x. 24, 25); marking that Arphaxad's descendants were now crossing over or beyond the great rivers on their way to Mesopotamia and thence to Canaan. In Luke iii. 35 Heber = Eber. 2. Neh. xii. 20. 3. 1 Chron. v. 13. 4. 1 Chron. viii. 12, 22. Abel or Obed is substituted in LXX for 2, 3, 4.

Heber. 1. Gen. xli. 17, Num. xxvi. 45. 2. 1 Chron. iv. 18. 3. 1 Chron. viii. 17. 4. Heber the Kenite (Jud. iv. 11, 17, v. 24), husband of Jael, descendant of Hobab "priest of Midian," who was himself a Kenite resident in Midian. The Kenites migrated with the children of Judah into the wilderness of Judah at the time of the conquest of Canaan (Jud. i. 16). They had accompanied Israel to Canaan at Moses' request (Num. x. 29, etc.). [See HAZEKON TAMAR.] Besides this general migration Heber's family migrated to Kadesh in Naphthali, the debatable ground between northern Israel and Jabin.

Hebrew: HEBREWS. Shem is called "the father of all the children of Eber," as Ham is called "father of Canaan." The Hebrews and Canaanites were often brought into contact, and exhibited the respective characteristics of the Shemites and the Hamites. The term "Hebrews" thus is derived from Eber (Gen. x. 21, comp. Num. xxiv. 24). The LXX transl. "passer from beyond" (perates), taking the name from 'eber "beyond," Abram in Palestine was to the inhabitants the stranger from beyond the river (Gen. xiv. 13). In entering Palestine he spoke Chaldee or Syriac (Gen. xxxi. 47). In Canaan he and his descendants acquired Hebrew from the Hamitic Canaanites, who in their turn had acquired it from an earlier Semitic race. The Mabit stone shows that Meab spoke the same Hebrew tongue as Israel, which their connection with Lot, Abraham's nephew, would lead us to expect. In the patriarchs' wanderings they never used interpreters until they went to Egypt. In Israel's bondage in the time of the judges they never lost their language; but in the 70 years' captivity in Babylon their language became in a great degree Aramaic or Chaldee, and they adopted the present Hebrew alphabet. Thus it is proved the Israelites spoke the languages of the surrounding peoples. The sense of Gen. x. 21 is: as in ver. 6-20 the three Hamite settlements are mentioned, Babylon, Egypt, Canaan, so next the Shemite races are spoken of as commencing at the most easterly point of the Hamites, viz. Babylon and the Euphrates. Shem was "father of all the children of Eber," i.e. of the nations settled eastward, starting from beyond the Euphrates. The name Hebrews, applied to them in relation to the surrounding tribes already long settled in Canaan, continued to be their name among foreigners; whereas "Israelite" was their name among themselves (Gen. xxxix. 14, 17, xliii. 32; 1 Sam. iv. 6, 9). In N. T. the contrast is between "Hebrews" and those having foreign characteristics, as especially the Greek or any Gentile language (Acts vi. 1, Phil. iii. 5 [see GREEK, GREEKIAN], 2 Cor. xi. 22, Luke xliii. 38). The name Hebrews is found in Genesis and Exodus more than in all the other books of the Bible, for it was the international name linking Jacob's descendants with the nations; Israel is the name that separates them from the nations. After the constitution of Israel as a separate people (in Exodus) Hebrews rarely occurs; in the national poetry and in the prophets the name does not occur as a designation of the elect people among themselves. It, as seems implied in Gen. x., Eber, by a patronymic, his name must be prophetic (as Peleg is) of the migrations of his descendants.

Hebrew language. Called "the language of Canaan" (Isa. xix. 18), as distinguished from that of Egypt; "the Jewish" as distinguished from Aramaean (2 Kings xviii. 26, 28). [See HEBREW above.] Internal evidence also favours its Palestinian origin; as yam, "the sea," in oldest documents used for the west. It is Semitic, as distinguished from the Indo-Germanic, Indo-European, Aryan, or Japhetic languages. The Semitic includes Aramaean or Chaldean and Syriac on the N.E., the Arabic on the S., the Ethiopic between the Heb. and Arabic, the Heb., and kindred Phœnician or Canaanitish.

In Heb. and the other Semitic languages gutturals preponderate. Consonants are not grouped round one vowel, yet a consonant always begins a syllable. The Semitic languages are less matured and polished, and more impulsive than deliberative. The roots have three letters. The conjugations of verbs are threefold: 1. Expressing intensity or repetition by a change within the root. 2. Reflexiveness or causation by addition to the root. 3. Passives by u or a in the first syllable. Modifications of the root idea are marked by changes within the root, not by additions. The a sound marks activity; the e and o sounds rest or passiveness. Intensity and repeated action are expressed by doubling the consonant. The neuter gender is unknown, because Semitic imagination endows with life every object in nature and makes it male or female. Mental qualities are represented by bodily members: strength by the "hand" or "arm"; anger by the "nostril" (aph); favour by the "shining face"; displeasure by the "falling of the countenance." Go, way, walk, course express spiritual motion. Tenses or times of verbs are twofold (not three as with us, past, present, future). What the mind realizes is put in the past, even though it may be future; what the mind regards as about to be, or being, realized is put in the future; so that the future may be used of the historic past, and the preterite of the prophetic future. The vowels were not originally written; latterly they were put as points under the consonants, which are read from right to left. The particles are few; hence subtle reasonings cannot be expressed. The Gr. is the language of philosophy; the Heb. of imagination and intuition. The sentences are a succession of coordinate propositions, not of propositions moulded by interdependence and mutual subordination into complete periods. The style is pictorial: "Behold!" is of frequent occurrence; and the process of doing, as well as the act, is stated, as "he arose and went," "he put forth his hand and took," "he lifted up his voice and wept." Symbolical phrases are frequent: "incline the ear"; "stiffen the neck," i.e. to be perverse; "to uncover the ear," i.e. to reveal.

Adam, Eve, Abel, etc., are pictorial names, possibly Heb. equivalents for the original names. The fall has among its evil effects caused a severance between names and things. The Bible retains some of the original connection, all the ancient names being significant of things. The choice of essentially the same language as that of commercial Shōn and Tyre for the Divine revelation was a providential arrangement for diffusing the knowledge of His law widely among the Gentiles. There may be a Hamitic element in Heb., considering that the Canaanites who spoke it when Abram entered Canaan were Hamites; even though they probably acquired it from earlier Semitic occupants of Canaan, they would infuse a Hamitic element themselves. The vocabulary of the oldest Babel monuments is Hamitic. The Aramaic is decidedly Semitic, and was Abraham's original tongue. The Hamites and Nimrod took the lead in building Babel, which entailed the confusion of tongues; their tongue accordingly is found more confounded into endless varieties of dialect than the Semitic and Japhetic, whose dialects bear a nearer resemblance among themselves than the Turanian and other Hamitic dialects. As Heb. sprang from the confusion of Babel, it cannot have been the language of Adam and the whole earth when there was but one speech; still, though an offshoot like the rest, it may retain most of the primitive type, a view which the Heb. Bible names favour, though these be modified from the original form. The Shemites and Japhetites have had a higher moral civilization, and so a purer language. The Heb. terms for SIN, ATONEMENT, GOD, JEHOVAH [see], and many such theological ideas, must have conveyed to the Gentiles, whithersoever fragments of the Heb. revelation reached, many fruitful germs of Divine truth. The sacred books of Moses gave a fixity to the language, so that no essential change of language is observable in the books of different ages till the Babylonish captivity; thenceforward Chaldean became largely mixed with Heb. (See Neh. viii. 8)

Hebrews, Epistle to the. Canonically.—Clement of Rome (1st century A.D.) refers to it oftener than any other canonical N. T. book, adopting its words as on a level with the rest of the N. T. As the writer of this epistle claims authority Clement virtually sanctions it, and this in the apostolic age. Westcott (Canon, xxii.) observes, it seems transfused into Clement's mind. Justin Martyr quotes its authority for applying the titles "apostle" and "angel" to the Son of God. Clement of Alexandria refers it to Paul, on the authority of Pantænus of Alexandria (in the middle of the second century) saying that as Jesus is called the "apostle" to the Hebrews, Paul does not in it call himself so, being apostle to the Gentiles; also that Paul prudently omitted his name at the beginning, because the Hebrews were prejudiced against him; that it was originally written in Heb. for the Hebrews, and that Luke translated it into Gr. for the Greeks, whence the style resembles that of Acts. He however quotes the Gr. epistle as Paul's, so also Origen; but in his Homilies he regards the style as more Grecian than Paul's but the thoughts as his. "The ancients who handed down the tradition of its Pauline authorship must have had good reason for doing so, though God alone knows the certainty who was the actual writer," i.e. probably the transcriber or else interpreter of Paul's thoughts. The Peshito old Syriac version has it. Tertullian in the beginning of the third century, in the African church, ascribes it to Barnabas. Irenæus in Eusebius quotes it. About the same time Caius the presbyter of Rome mentions only 13 epistles of Paul, whereas if epistle to Hebrews were included there would be 14. The CANON [see] fragment of Muratori omits it, in the beginning of the third century. The Latin church did not recognise it as Paul's for a long time subsequently. So Victorinus, Novatian of Rome, and Cyprian of Carthage. But in the fourth century Hilary of Poitiers (A.D. 368), Lucifer of Cagliari (A.D. 371), Ambrose of Milan (A.D. 397), and other Latins quote it as Paul's; the fifth council of Carthage (A.D. 419) formally recognises it among his 14 epistles.

Style.—The partial resemblance of Luke's style to it is probably due to his having been companion of Paul: "each imitated his teacher; Luke imitated Paul flowing along with more than river fullness; Mark imitated Peter who studied brevity" (Chrysostom). But more familiarity with Jewish feeling, and with the peculiarities of their schools, appears in this epistle than in Luke's writings. The Alexandrian phraseology does not prove Apollos' authorship (Alford's theory). The Alexandrian church would not have so undoubtedly asserted Paul's authorship if Apollos their own catechumen had really been the author. Paul, from his education in Hebrew at Jerusalem, and in Hellenistic at Tarsus, was familiar with Philo's modes of thought.

At Jerusalem there was an Alexandrian synagogue (Acts vi. 9). Paul knew well how to adapt himself to his readers; to the Greek Corinthians who idolized rhetoric his style is unadorned, that their attention might be fixed on the gospel alone; to the Hebrews who were in no such danger he writes to win them (1 Cor. ix. 20) in a style attractive to those imbued with Philo's Alexandrian conceptions and accustomed to the combination of Alexandrian Greek philosophy and ornament with Judaism. All the O.T. quotations except two (Heb. x. 30, xiii. 5) are from the LXX., which was framed at Alexandria. The interweaving of the LXX. peculiarities into the argument proves that the Greek epistle is an original, not a translation. The Heb. O.T. would have been quoted, had the original epistle been Heb.

Pauline authorship.—This is further favoured by internal evidence. The superiority of Christianity to Judaism in that the reality exceeds the type is a favourite topic of Paul. Compare this epistle with 2 Cor. iii. 6-18, Gal. iii. 23-25, iv. 1-9, 21-31. Heroin allegorical interpretation, which the Alexandrians strained unduly, is legitimately under Divine guidance employed. The Divine Son is represented as the image of God; comp. i. 3, etc., with Paul's undoubted epistles, Phil. ii. 6, Col. i. 15-20; His lowering Himself for man's sake (ii. 9) with 2 Cor. viii. 9, Phil. ii. 7, 8; His final exaltation (ii. 8, x. 13, xii. 2) with 1 Cor. xv. 25-27; His "mediator" (peculiar to Paul) office (viii. 6) with Gal. iii. 19, 20; His sacrifice for sin prefigured by the Jewish sacrifices (vii.—x.) with Rom. iii. 22-26, 1 Cor. v. 7. "God of peace" is a phrase peculiar to Paul (xiii. 20 with Rom. xv. 33, 1 Thess. v. 23). So "distributed gifts of the Holy Ghost" (ii. 4) with (Gr.) "distributions of gifts . . . the same Spirit" (1 Cor. xii. 4); "righteousness by faith" (x. 38, xi. 7) with the same quotation (Hab. ii. 4), Rom. i. 17, iv. 22, v. 1; Gal. iii. 11; Phil. iii. 9. "The word of God . . . the sword of the Spirit" (iv. 12) with Eph. vi. 17. Inexperienced Christians are "children needing milk," i.e., elementary teaching; ripper Christians, as full grown men, require strong meat (v. 12, 13, vi. 1 with 1 Cor. iii. 1, 2, xiv. 20; Gal. iv. 9; Eph. iv. 13). Believers have "boldness of access to God by Christ" (x. 19 with Rom. v. 2, Eph. ii. 18, iii. 12). "Allusions are a fight" (x. 32 with Phil. i. 30, Col. ii. 1). The Christian life is a race (xii. 1 with 1 Cor. ix. 24, Phil. iii. 12-14). The Jewish ritual is a service (ix. 1-6 with Rom. ix. 4); a "bondage," as not freeing us from consciousness of sin and fear of death (ii. 15 with Gal. v. 1). Paul's characteristic "going off at a word" into a long parenthesis, playing upon like sounding words, and repeating favourite words, quotations from the O. T. linked by "and again" (i. 5, ii. 12, 13, with Rom. xv. 9-12; ii. 8 with 1 Cor. xv. 27, Eph. i. 22; x. 30 with Rom. xii. 19).

to any but Paul, for it was to the Hebrews of Alexandria and Palestine it was mainly addressed; but in the western and Latin churches of N. Africa and Rome, which it did not reach for some time, it was long doubted owing to its anonymous form, not opening as other epistles though closing like them; its Jewish argument; and its less distinctively Pauline style. Insufficient evidence for it, not positive evidence against it, led these for the first three centuries not to accept it. The fall of Jerusalem previous to the full growth of Christianity in N. Africa curtailed intercourse between its churches and those Jews to whom this epistle is addressed. The epistle was, owing to distance, little known to the Latin churches. Muratori's Canon does not notice it. When in the fourth century at last they found it was received as Pauline and canonical (the Alexandrians only doubted its authorship, not its authority) on good grounds in the Greek churches, they universally accepted it. The churches of the East and Jerusalem their centre, the quarter to which the epistle was first sent, received it as Paul's, according to Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem (A.D. 349). Jerome, though bringing from Rome the Latin prejudice against this epistle, aggravated by its apparent sanction of the Novatian heresy (vi. 4-6), was constrained by the almost unanimous testimony of the Greek churches from the first to receive it as Paul's; after him Rome corrected its past error of rejecting it. Augustine too held its canonicity. What gives especial weight to the testimony for it of the Alexandrian church is, that church was founded by Mark, who was with Paul at Rome in his first confinement, when probably this epistle was written (Col. iv. 10), and possibly bore it to Jerusalem where his mother resided, visiting Colosse on the way, and from Jerusalem to Alexandria. Peter also (2 Pet. iii. 15, 16), the apostle of the circumcision, in addressing the Hebrew Christians of the dispersion in the East, says, "as our beloved brother Paul . . . hath written unto you," i.e., to the Hebrews. By adding "as also in all his epistles" he distinguishes the epistle to the Hebrews from the rest; and by classing it with the "other Scriptures" he asserts at once its Pauline authorship and Divine inspiration. A generous testimony of Christian love to one who formerly rebuked him (Gal. ii. 7-14). The apostle of the circumcision attests the gospel preached by the apostle of the uncircumcision; and the latter was chosen by God to confirm the Hebrews, as conversely the former was chosen to open the door to the Gentiles (Acts x.). So perfect is the unity that reigns amidst the diversity of agencies.

Rome originally received this epistle through Clement of Rome, then rejected it, until in the fourth century she saw her error: a refutation of her claim to unchangeableness and infallibility. But for the eastern churches the epistle would have been lost to the world; so it is well for Christendom Rome is not the catholic church.

Place of writing.—The writer was at the time in prison (xiii. 3, 19), had been formerly imprisoned in Palestine (x. 34, "ye had compassion on me in my bonds." So Sin. and Vat. MSS., but Alex. MS. "on the prisoners"). The salutation which he transmits from believers in Italy implies that Rome was the place of writing (xiii. 24). The rhetorical character of the epistle may be one cause of his waiving the usual epistolary address. The intention expressed (xiii. 23) to visit those addressed shortly with Timothy, just "set at liberty" and styled "our brother," accords with the authorship of Paul.

Design.—The superiority of the gospel over Judaism is shown in its introduction by the Son of God, infinitely higher than the angels, or Moses through whom the Hebrews received the law. The legal priesthood and sacrifices did not perfect us to salvation, but those of Christ do. He is the substance and antitype, to which they, the shadow and type, must give place. They kept men removed from immediate communion with God; we have direct access through the opened veil, Christ's flesh. Hence, as having such privileges we should incur the heavier condemnation if we apostatize (a temptation then pressing upon Hebrew Christians when they saw Christians persecuted, whilst Judaism was tolerated by the Romans and fanatically upheld by the Jewish authorities). The O. T. patterns of faith must be their encouragement to persevering endurance. The epistle ends in the Pauline manner with exhortations and prayers for them, and especially his wonted apostolic salutation, "grace be with you all," his "token (of identification) in every epistle" (2 Thess. iii. 17, 18; so 1 Cor. xvi. 21, 23, Col. iv. 18). Every one of his epistles has the same closing greeting, which is not in any epistle of the other apostles in Paul's lifetime. After his death it occurs in the last N. T. book, Revelation, and subsequently in the epistle of Clement of Rome. This proves that by whomsoever the body of the epistle was committed to writing (whether an amanuensis or else a companion of Paul, such as Luke was, transfusing Paul's inspired sentiments into his own inspired diction), Paul by his express "token" at the close sanctions the whole as his own.

Persons addressed and date of writing.—As there was no exclusively Jewish Christian church he does not address the rulers, but the Jews of the Palestinian and adjoining churches, Jerusalem, Judaea, and Alexandria, wherein Jewish Christians formed the majority. It was from Alexandria the epistle came to the knowledge of Christendom. The internal notices accord with Jerusalem being the church primarily addressed. He addresses the Jews as "the people of God" (ii. 17, iv. 9, xiii. 12), "the seed of Abraham," the stock on which Gentile Christians are grafted (comp. Rom. xi. 16-24). But they must come out from earthly Jerusalem, and realize their having "come to the heavenly Jerusalem" (xii. 18-23).

xiii. 13). Those addressed are presumed to be familiar with temple services, with discussions of Scripture (32 O. T. quotations occur, including 16 from Psalms), and with the Alexandrian philosophy. Some of them had relieved the distressed with their goods (vi. 10, x. 34; comp. Rom. xv. 26; Acts ii. 45, iv. 34, xi. 29). Anticipations of Jerusalem's doom occur (vi. 8, viii. 13, x. 25, 37, xii. 27). A reference to James's martyrdom at Jerusalem probably occurs (xiii. 7) (A.D. 62). Paul's first imprisonment at Rome ended A.D. 63, so that this epistle was probably written in A.D. 63, shortly before his release. It was certainly before Jerusalem's overthrow, for he implies the temple service was then going on (xiii. 10, viii. 4, 5; ix. 6, 7). The mode of address, hortatory not commanding, is just such as Paul would have used in addressing Jews. He enjoins obedience to church rulers (xiii. 7, 17, 24), thus meeting the possible objection that by writing this epistle he was interfering with the prerogative of Peter the apostle of the circumcision, and with the bishop of Jerusalem (James's successor, if by this time James was martyred). Hence his delicate mode of address: "I beseech you, brethren, suffer the word of exhortation" (xiii. 22).

The difference of style from that of his epistles to Gentiles was to be expected. But distinctively Pauline phrases and ideas occur, as shown above. Comp. the Gr. idiom, xiii. 5, with Rom. xii. 9; xiii. 18, "we trust we have a good conscience," with Acts xxiii. 1, xxiv. 16, 2 Cor. i. 12, iv. 2, 2 Tim. i. 3. He quotes the O. T. as a "Hebrew of the Hebrews" (Phil. iii. 5) writing to Hebrews, "God spake to our fathers," not "it is written." The use of Greek, not Hebrew, and the quotation of the LXX. version of O. T. prove that it was written not merely for Hebrew but for Hellenistic Jew converts in Palestine and the East. Many had left Jerusalem and settled in Asia Minor in the troubled times that preceded the fall of the city. The epistle comforts them, persecuted as they were by Jewish brethren, and disheartened at the prospect of soon losing their distinctive national privileges, by showing that in Christ they have a better Mediator than Moses, a better sabbath than the judicial, a better atonement than the sacrifices, and a better Jerusalem than the earthly one. He fortifies them with arguments against their unbelieving brethren. Established in the faith by this epistle they were kept from apostasy; migrating to Pella they escaped the doom of Jerusalem. Throughout the epistle no allusion occurs to the admission of Gentiles to the church, and no direction as to the proper relations of Hebrew to Gentile Christians. The comparative purity of the Greek, the periodic style, and the frequent plays upon similarly sounding words (vi. 8, xiii. 14), confirm the view that the present Greek text is the original one.

Divisions.—The doctrinal body of the epistle is divided into three parts:

vii. 1-25; vii. 26—ix. 12; ix. 13—x. 18. Its theme is, Christ our High-priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek. The first part sets forth what this is, in contrast to the Aaronic priesthood. The second that He is Aaron's Antitype in the true holy place, by His previous self sacrifice on earth, and is mediator of the better covenant which the old only typified. The third part that His offering through the Eternal Spirit is of everlasting power, as contrasted with the unavailing cycle of legal offerings. The first half of this third part (ix. 13-28) shows that both our present possession of salvation and the future completion of it are as certain as that He is with God, reigning as Priest and King, once more to appear, no longer bearing our sins but bringing consummated salvation; the second half (x. 1-18) reiterates the main position, Christ's high-priesthood, grounded on His self offering, its kingly character and eternal accomplishment of its end, confirmed by Ps. xl. and cx. and Jer. xxxi. (Delitzsch.) The first main portion, i.—vi., prepares the way for the doctrinal. The third (x. 19—xiii.) resumes the exhortation of the first (comp. x. 22, 23 with iv. 14-16); its theme is, our duty now whilst waiting for the Lord's second advent.

- Hebron. 1. Third son of Kohath; younger brother of Amram, father of Moses and Aaron (Exod. vi. 18). The family of Hebronites sprang from him. In the 40th year of David's reign 2700 of them, at Jazer in Gilead, "mighty men of valour," superintended for the king the two and a half tribes "in matters pertaining to God and the king" (1 Chron. xxvi. 30-32); Jerijah was their chief. Also Hashabiah and 1700 Hebronites were officers "in all the Lord's business and the king's service" on the W. of Jordan. 2. 1 Chron. ii. 42, 43.
3. A city in the hill country of Judah, originally Kirjath (the city of) Arba (Josh. xv. 13, xiv. 15). "Arba was a great man among the Anakims, father of Anak." (See xxi. 11, Jud. i. 10.) Twenty Roman miles

S. of Jerusalem, and twenty N. of Beersheba. Rivalling Damascus in antiquity. Built seven years before Zouan in Egypt (Num. xiii. 22). Well known at Abram's entrance into Canaan, 3780 years ago (Gen. xiii. 18). It was the original name, changed to Kirjath Arba during Israel's sojourn in Egypt, and restored by Caleb, to whom it was given at the conquest of Palestine (xxiii. 2; Josh. xiv. 13-15). The third resting place of Abram; Shechem was the first, Bethel the second. Near it was the cave of Machpelah, where he and Sarah were buried. Now El Khalil, the house of "the friend" of God. Over the cave is now the mosque El Haran, from which all but Mahometans are excluded jealously (though the Prince of Wales was admitted), and in which probably lie the remains of Abraham and Isaac, and possibly Jacob's embalmed body, brought up in state from Egypt (Gen. i. 13). Near it was the oak or terebinth, a place of heathen worship. It was called for a time also Mamre, from Abram's ally (xxiii. 19, xxxv. 27). It was made a Levite city of refuge (Josh. xxi. 11-13). Still there is an oak bearing Abraham's name, 23 ft. in girth, and covering 90 ft. space in diameter. In it David reigned over Judah first for seven and a half years (2 Sam. v. 5). Here Absalom set up the standard of revolt. On the return from Babylon some of the children of Judah dwelt in Kirjath Arba (Neh. xi. 25). After various vicissitudes it fell into the Moslems' hands in A.D. 1187, and has continued so ever since.

It is picturesquely situated in a narrow valley running from N. to S. (probably that of Esheol, whence the spies got the great cluster of grapes, Num. xiii. 23), surrounded by rocky hills, still famed for fine grapes. S. of the town in the bottom of the valley is a tank, 130 ft. square by 50 deep. At the western end is another, 85 ft. long by 55 broad. Over the former probably David hung Ishbosheth's murderers (2 Sam. iv. 12).

4. A town in Asher; spelt in Heb. differently from the former H. Abdon is read in many MSS.

Hedge: geder and mesulah. It was customary to surround vineyards with a wall of loose stones or mud, often crowned with thorns to keep off wild beasts; so Israel fenced by God (Ps. lxxx. 12; Matt. xxi. 33). The haunt of serpents (Eccles. x. 8; "whose breaketh an hedge a serpent shall bite him," i.e., maliciously pulling down his neighbour's hedge wall he brings on himself his own punishment; Dent. xix. 14; Amos v. 19), and of locusts in cold weather (Nah. iii. 17), "which camp in the hedges in the cold day (the cold taking away their power of flight), but when the sun ariseth . . . flee away"; so the Assyrian hosts shall suddenly disappear, not leaving a trace behind. Mandrell describes the walls round the gardens of Damascus, they are built of great pieces of earth hardened in the sun, placed on one another in two rows, making a cheap, expeditious, and in that dry country a durable wall. Isaiah (v. 5) distinguishes the "hedge" (mesulah) and the "wall" (geder); the prickly, tangled "hedge" being an additional fence (Mic. vii. 4). Prov. xv. 19, "the way of the slothful is as an hedge of thorns"; it seems to him as if a hedge of thorns were in his way (xx. 4, xxii. 13, xxvi. 13), whereas all is clear to the willing. The narrow path between the hedges of vineyards is distinct from the "highways" (Luke xiv. 23, Num. xxii. 24). Hegai, or Hege. (Esth. ii. 3, 8, 15.) Eunuch, or chamberlain, in charge of the women of Ahasuerus' harem.

towns in Galilee, moreover, had their wants best supplied by numerous petty farms. Subdivision tends also to the multiplication of population, and so to repairing the waste of life caused by wars. It attaches large numbers to their country, as proprietors, eager to defend the soil which is their own, and on which each ate of his own vine and figtree (Isa. xxxvi. 16).

Helah. 1 Chron. iv. 5.

Helam. E. of Jordan and W. of Euphrates, where Hadarezer and the Syrians were defeated by David (2 Sam. x. 16, 17).

Helbah. A town of Asher, not far from Sidon (Jud. i. 31).

Helbon=fat. "The vine of H. and white wool" (Ezekiel (xxvii. 18) makes Damascus supply to Tyre. Not Aleppo, which is a long overland journey from Damascus, but a village still called Helbon, three hours and a half journey N. of Damascus, high up in a wild glen of Antilebanon; still famed for the finest grapes, also a depot for wool through its trade with the Bedouin shepherds.

Heldai. 1. 1 Chron. xxvii. 15. 2. A Jew from Babylon, from whom and Tobijah and Jedaiah the gold and silver which they presented toward building the temple were to be taken, and crowns made for Joshua's head, afterwards to be deposited in the temple as a memorial of the donors (as Cornelius' prayers and alms of faith "came up for a memorial before God," Acts x. 4), till Messiah should come. H. means robust; called also Helam (Zech. vi. 10, 14).

Heleb. 2 Sam. xxiii. 29. HELED in 1 Chron. xi. 30.

Helek. Num. xxvi. 30, Josh. xvii. 2.

Heleph. The place from which Naphtali's boundary commenced (Josh. xix. 33). Now the ancient site called Beitlif (Van de Velde).

Helez. 2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Chron. xi. 27, xxvii. 10. "The Pelonite," of which "the Paltite" is a corruption.

Heli. Father of Joseph, husband of the Virgin Mary. Probably brother of Jacob, Mary's father (Luke iii. 23). [See GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.]

Helkai. Neh. xii. 3, 10, 12, 15.

Helkath. The town where the boundary of Asher began, proceeding from S. to N. (Josh. xix. 25.) Allotted to the Gershonite Levites (xxi. 31). H'KOK in 1 Chron. vi. 75.

Helkath Hazzurim=the field of strong men (Vulg.), the field of swords (Gesenius). The smooth ground near the pool of Gibeon, where Joab's men and Abner's men fought and slew one another, and so brought on a general engagement.

Hell. Representing two distinct words: gehenna and hades (Gr.), sheol (Heb.). Gehenna is strictly "the valley of Hinom" (Josh. xv. 8, Neh. xi. 30); "the valley of the children of Hinom" (2 Kings xxvii. 10); "the valley of the son of Hinom" (2 Chron. xxxiii. 3); "the valley of dead bodies," or Tophet, where malefactors' dead bodies were cast, S. of the city (Jer. xxxi. 40). A deep narrow glen S. of Jerusalem, where, after Ahaz introduced the worship of the fire gods, the sun, Baal, Moloch, the Jews under Manasseh made their children to pass through the fire (2 Chron. xxxiii. 6), and offered them as burntofferings (Jer. vii. 31, xix. 2-6). So the godly Josiah defiled the valley, making it a receptacle of carcases and criminals' corpses, in which worms were continually breeding. A perpetual fire was kept to consume this putrefying matter; hence it became the image of that awful place where all that are unfit for the holy city are cast out a prey to the ever gnawing "worm" of conscience from within and the "unquenchable fire" of torments from without. Mark ix. 42-50, "their worm dieth not," implies that not only the worm but they also on whom it preys die not; the language is figurative, but it represents corresponding realities never yet experienced, and therefore capable of being conveyed to us only by figures. The phrase "forever and ever" (eis tous aionas aionon) occurs 20 times in N. T.; 16 times of God, once of the saints' future blessedness, the three remaining of the punishment of the wicked and of the evil one: is it likely it is used 17 times of absolute eternity, yet three times of limited eternity? The term for "everlasting" (aidios) in Jude 6, "the angels who kept not their first estate He hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day," is from a word meaning absolutely "always" (aiei). Gehenna is used by our Lord Matt. v. 29, 30, x. 28, xxiii. 15, 33, Luke xii. 5; with the addition "of fire," Matt. v. 22, xviii. 9, Mark ix. 47; and by James (iii. 6).

Our present meaning of "hell" then applies to gehenna, but not to the other word hades or sheol. "Hell" formerly did apply when the A.V. of the Bible was written; it then meant "hole," "hollow," or unseen place. Sheol comes from a root "to make hollow," the common receptacle of the dead below the earth (Num. xvi. 30, Dent. xxxii. 22), deep (Job xi. 8), insatiable (Isa. v. 14, S. of Sol. viii. 6). "Hell," hades, often means the "grave" (Job xiv. 13). In the O. T. time, when as yet Christ had not "abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel" (2 Tim. i. 10), death and the intermediate state represented by hades suggested thoughts of gloom (as to Hezekiah, Isa. xxxviii. 9-20), lit up however with gleams of sure hope from God's promises of the resurrection (Ps. xvi. 10, 11, xvii. 15; Isa. xxvi. 19; Hos. xiii. 14; Dan. xii. 2). Hints too occur of the spirit's being with God in peace in the intermediate state (Eccles. iii. 21, xii. 7; Ps. xxiii. 6, cxxxix. 8; Isa. lvi. 2). The passages which represent hades and the grave as a place where God can no longer be praised mean simply that the bodily powers are all suspended, so that God's praises can be no longer set forth on earth among the living. The anomalous state in which man is unclothed of the body is repulsive to the mind, and had not yet the clear gospel light to make it attractive as Paul viewed it (Phil. i. 21-23, 2 Cor. v. 6-8). To the bad hades was depicted as a place of punishment, where God's wrath reached to the depths (Dent. xxxii. 22; Amos ix. 2; Ps. ix. 17, xlix. 14; Isa. xiv.). Thus the unseen state even in O. T. was regarded as having a distinction between the godly and the ungodly; Prov. xiv. 32, "the wicked is driven away in his wickedness, but the righteous hath hope in his death"; so Ps. i. This is further confirmed by the separation of the rich man and Lazarus, the former in "hell" (hades), the latter in "Abraham's bosom" (Luke xvi. 23), and in the penitent thief's soul going to be with Jesus in "paradise," the word implying the recovery in heavenly bliss of the paradise lost by Adam (xxiii. 43). "Tartarus," the heathen Greek term for the place of enchainment of the Titans, rebels against God, occurs in 2 Pet. ii. 4 of the lost angels; the "deep," or "abyss," or "bottomless pit," Luke viii. 31, Rev. ix. 11. The firm faith and hope of an abiding heavenly city is unequivocally attributed to the patriarchs (Heb. xi. 16-35); so all the believing Israelites (Acts xxvi. 7, xxiii. 6-9). Hades, "hell," is used for destruction (Matt. xi. 23, xvi. 18). Jesus has its keys, and will at last consign it to the lake of fire which is the second death; implying that Christ and His people shall never again be disembodied spirits. Rev. i. 18, xx. 13, 14: I can release it will from the unseen world of spirits, the anomalous state wherein the soul is severed from the body. The "SPIRITS IN PRISON" [see] (1 Pet. iii. 19) mean the ungodly antediluvians shut up in this earth, one vast prison, and under sentence of death and awaiting execution (Isa. xxiv. 22); not the prison of hades. It is solemnly significant of the certainty of hell that He who is Love itself has most plainly and fully warned men of it, that they may flee from it. TOPHET [see], the scene of human immolations by fire to Moloch amidst sounds of drums (toph) to drown the cries of the victims, symbolised the funeral pyre of Sennacherib's Assyrian army, and finally the lake of fire that shall burn for ever the lost (Isa. xxx. 33). In an Assyrian tablet of the goddess Ishtar, daughter of Sin, the moon goddess, hades is described as having seven gates, "the house of the departed, the house from within which is no exit, the road the course of which never returns, the place within which they long for light, where dust is their nourishment and their food mud, light is never seen, in darkness they dwell, spirits like birds fill its vaults, over the door and its bolts is scattered dust!" What a contrast to the gospel (2 Tim. i. 10).

Helon. Father of ELIAB [see].

Helps. One class of ministrations in the early church, antipileis (1 Cor. xii. 28). A lower department, as "governments" are a higher; for instance, deacons who helped in relieving the poor, baptizing and preaching, subordinate to higher ministers (Acts vi. 1-10, viii. 5-17); others helped with their time and means in the Lord's cause (1 Cor. xiii. 3, Num. xi. 17). Americans similarly use

"helps" for "helpers." In Rom. xii. 8 "he that giveth" answers to "helps," "he that ruleth" to "governments," as bishops or presbyters (1 Tim. v. 17; Heb. xiii. 17, 21).

Hem of garment. The beged or outer robe was a quadrangular, plaid-like cloth, worn so that two corners hung in front. The corners were ornamented with a tassels, in which was a "riband of blue" or dark violet thread (so narrow was the riband), according to the command Num. xv. 38, 39, where for "put upon," etc., transl. "add to the fringes of the borders a thread of blue," that "looking on it they might remember all the commandments of the Lord, and do them." The blue symbolised the heavenly origin of the commandments. The Jews adjusted the threads and knots so as to represent the 613 precepts of which the law was thought to consist. The other threads were made white (according to tradition), to represent purity (Isa. i. 18). The Pharisees enlarged their fringes as a show of piety (Matt. xxiii. 5). Latterly the Jews have worn the talith or fringed garment of a smaller size and as an under dress. It is used especially at morning prayer in the synagogue. The talith is the Heb. term for the fringed or fringed edge, the ordinary mode of finishing the robe, the ends of the wool thread being left that the cloth might not unravel. The supposed sanctity of the "hem" explains why the woman with the issue of blood and other sick persons touched Jesus' hem in particular (Matt. ix. 20, xiv. 36).

JEW WITH TALITH.

Hemam, or Homan. Gen. xxxv. 22. Hence comes Homina, a place to the S. of Petra.

Heman. 1. 1 Chron. ii. 6; 1 Kings iv. 31. Probably the same as 2; though a Levite by birth he was reckoned in the family of Zerach, of Judah, as dwelling among them. 2. Grandson of Samuel; a Kohathite (1 Chron. vi. 31-38, 40). Colleague of ASAPH and ETHAN [see both] or Jeduthun (the praise man) in arranging the vocal and instrumental music of the temple service, under David "after that the ark had rest" (xv. 16-22, xxv. 1-3). Lord A. Hervey makes H. 14th in descent from Levi. Called "the king's seer in the matters (words) of God, to lift up the horn," inheriting by God's gift the spirit of prophecy of his grandfather. H. had 14 sons and three daughters. The sons were each the head of one of the 24 wards of Levites, "instructed in the songs of the Lord." H. the Kohathite probably, or his father, married an heiress of the house of Zerach (see 1), and so, though by birth son of Joel, he is legally called the Ezrahite or son of Zerach in the title of Ps. lxxxviii., as Euben is named the author in the title of Ps. lxxxix., and other psalms have Asaph in the title. Not that Ps. lxxxix. was actually by H.; it was by "sons of

Hemath. 1 Chron. ii. 55.

Hemdan. Gen. xxxvi. 26. HAMRAM or AMRAM, 1 Chron. i. 41. Humeidy and Hamaity are of the five families of the Amran tribe, S.E. of Akala; also "the children of Hamaity" S. of Kerak, S.E. of the Dead Sea, and towards el Busairah or Bozrah, towards Petra.

Hemlock. So Colsons and the learned Ben Melech explain rosh (Hos. x. 4; Amos vi. 12). [See GALL.] Gesenius explains, from the etymology, "poppy heads." Possibly many plants of bitter juice are meant. Rosh grew in cornfields rankly, and bore a berry or fruit. Dent. xxix. 18; Jer. ix. 15, xxiii. 15; Lam. iii. 19. Not necessarily poisonous.

HEMLOCK

Hen. Zech. vi. 14 = favour, the same person as Josiah (God found or supports), ver. 10.

Hen. Matt. xxiii. 37; Luke xiii. 34. As "the EAGLE [see] stirring up her nest, fluttering over her young, spreading abroad her wings, taking, bearing them on her wings," represents the O. T. aspect of Jehovah in relation to Israel under the law (Deut. xxxii. 11), so the "hen," Christ the lowly loving Son of God gathering God's children under His overshadowing wing, in the gospel (Ruth ii. 12; Ps. xvii. 8, xci. 4). So Jehovah "passed over" [see PASSOVER, EXODUS], or sprung forward to overshadow Israel from the destroying angel (Exod. xii. 13).

Hena. A city with its king subjugated by Assyria before Sennacherib's invasion of Judaea (2 Kings xix. 13). Associated with Sepharvaim or Sippara (now Mosab), probably therefore in Babylonia or on the Euphrates. Near Mosab is still an Ana, probably H. The Assyrian inscriptions mention Anat, a town on an island in the Euphrates, some distance below its union with the Chabour. The present Anat is on the right bank, but ruins lower down on the left bank are so called. On some one of the string of islands between Anat and the ruins H. seems to have been situated.

Henadad. Ezra iii. 9; comp. Neh. iii. 18, 24, x. 9.

Hepher. 1. Num. xxvi. 32, 53; xxvii. 1. 2. 1 Chron. iv. 5, 6. 3. 1 Chron. xi. 36; not in the catalogue 2 Sam. xxiii. 34, etc.

4. A place in ancient Canaan, whose king was conquered by Israel (Josh. xii. 17), W. of Jordan; so Solomon's commissariat district (1 Kings iv. 10), named with Seob. Distinct from Gath-Hepher in Zebulun.

Hephzibah = my delight is in her. Jehovah's name for Jerusalem when restored to His favour (Isa. xli. 4); instead of being as now "desolate" and "forsaken." As the prophets naturally mould their prophecies in a form suggested by the facts of the day, Hezekiah's marriage to Hephzibah, Manasseh's mother (2 Kings xxi. 1), would obviously suggest itself. Hence Isaiah terms restored

Jerusalem both H. and Baulah, i.e. "married." The marriage of Hezekiah moreover was at a late period of his reign, after his sickness and recovery described in Isa. xxxviii. Indeed Hezekiah's desire of life in that sickness was mainly because, being childless then, he was leaving no successor to the kingdom (Josephus); to which God's words may refer, "set thine house in order," i.e. make arrangements as to the succession to the throne. That sickness was probably in the 14th year of his reign (Isa. xxxvi. 1). Manasseh was only 12 years old at his father's death; so that if Isaiah's prophecies are at all in the order of their delivery, this late prophecy, chap. lxiii., concerning Hephzibah would be just at the time of Hezekiah's marriage to her; his reign in all being 29 years, the marriage was after the 14th year and before the 12th year preceding Hezekiah's death, i.e. between the 11th and 17th years of his reign. These undesigned coincidences accord with truth.

Herd. Cattle formed a considerable part of Israel's wealth. The full grown ox was seldom slaughtered, being more useful for ploughing, threshing, and carrying burdens. The people's act, recorded in 1 Sam. xiv. 22, was one of excess. The third year was the time for breaking to service (Isa. xv. 5). Fattening for beef is not practised in the East. Grazing is afforded in the South region (the Negeb), Carmel, Dotlan, and Sharon. The ox ate foliage too in Bashan and Gilead (Ps. i. 10). Uzziiah "built towers in the desert" (waste land) to guard the pasturing cattle. When pasture failed "providence," Heb. a mixture of various grains, was used. Isa. xxx. 24, "clean (chamitz, "salted") provender," or well fermented mastic, composed of grain, beans, vetches, hay, and salt, which beasts of burden in the East relish. The Arabs say, "sweet provender is as bread to camels, salted provender as confectionery." Also chopped straw (xi. 7, lxxv. 25).

The sense in Mal. iv. 2 is, "Ye shall go forth, and grow up, as calves of the stall," which when set free from the stall disport with joy; the believer's future joy at the Lord's second coming (Isa. xxv. 9, lxi. 10; 1 Pet. i. 8). When harvest was over, and open pastures failed because of the heat, the ox was fed in stalls (Hab. iii. 17) until vegetation returned. Saul himself had herded cattle, and Daeg his chief herdsman was high in his favour (1 Sam. xi. 5, xxi. 7). Joseph's brethren were assigned the office as an honourable one by Pharaoh (Gen. xlvii. 6). Hezekiah and Uzziiah, when the land was less disturbed by hostile inroads, revived cattle tending which had previously declined (2 Chron. xxvi. 10, xxxii. 28, 29).

Heresh=artificer. 1 Chron. ix. 15.
Heresy. 1 Cor. xi. 18, 19. "Schisms" meant "divisions" through differences of opinion of recent standing. "Heresies" meant schisms become inveterate. "Sect" (Gr. "heresy") Acts v. 17, xv. 5. Paul means by "there must be heresies among you," that sin must bear its natural fruit, as Christ foretold (Luke xvii. 1), and schisms (comp. 1 Cor. xii. 25) must eventuate in natural secessions or confirmed schisms. "Heresy" did not yet bear its present meaning, doctrinal error. However see its use Acts xxiv. 14.

Hermas. One at Rome to whom Paul sends greeting (Rom. xvi. 14). A Greek name. Irenæus, Tertullian, and Origen attribute to him "The Shepherd," supposed by some to have been written in the episcopacy of Clement I.; others deny H. of Rom. xvi. to be the author. Its author appears from internal evidence to have been married and to have had children, and to have been a lay mystic. Originally in Gr., but now only in a Latin version entire. An inferior kind of Pilgrim's Progress in three parts: the first has four visions, the second 12 spiritual precepts, the third ten similitudes shadowing forth each some truth. Each man, according to it, has a bad and a good angel, who endeavour to influence him for evil and good respectively.

Hermes=saluted. Rom. xvi. 14. One of the seventy, and bishop of Dalmatia afterwards, according to tradition (?).

Hermogenes. 2 Tim. i. 15: "all they which are (now) in Asia (when they were in Rome, or else in Nicopolis whither they had escorted him, and where he was apprehended on his way to Rome) turned away from me," "ashamed of my chain," unlike Onesiphorus, not standing by me but forsaking me; iv. 15, "of whom are H. and Phygellus," specified as persons from whom such unchristian cowardice was not to be expected; often probably spoken of in conversations between Paul and Timothy when together in Asia.

Hermon=mountain nose, or peak. The highest of the Antilibanus range, at its S. end. N.E. of Palestine (Josh. xii. 1), over against Lebanon (xi. 17), adjoining Bashan (1 Chron. v. 23). Called Sion, "the lofty," distinct from Zion at Jerusalem (Deut. iv. 48); among the Amorites Shenir, rather Senir, i.e. cataract or else breastplate, from senar to clatter (Deut. iii. 8, 9; Ezek. xxvii. 5); among the Sidonians Sirion, the breastplate, a name given from the rounded snowy top glittering in the sun, from sharah "to glitter" (Ps. xxix. 6). A centre to Syria and Palestine; the watershed of the Jordan fountains, and of the Syrian Abana and Pharpar of Damascus, the Orontes of Antioch, and the Leontes. Bashan, Damascus, Syria, and Israel converged there. It had numerous Baal sanctuaries, which gave it a name [see BAAL HERMON] very anciently. Rising 9500 feet, it is seen even from the Jordan valley and the shores of the Dead Sea. Lebanon means the "white" mountain, the Mont Blanc of Palestine. Now Jebel es Sheykh, "the old whiteheaded man's mountain," referring to the long streaks of snow remaining in the ravines radiating from the centre, when the snow has disappeared elsewhere, like an old man's scanty white locks. Jebel esh Tili, "the mount of ice." Shenir and H. are mentioned distinctly, S. of Sol. iv. 8. The whole was called H. The part held by the Sidonians was "Sirion," that by the Amorites Shenir, infested by devouring "lions" and swift though stealthy "leopards," in contrast to "the mountain of myrrh" (v. 6), the mountain of the Lord's house (Isa. ii. 2), the good land (xxxv. 9). In Ps. lxxxix. 12 Tabor is made the western, H. the eastern landmark. Thus N., S., E., and W. represent the whole earth. "The dew [see] of H." (Ps. cxxiii. 3) is used proverbially of an abundant, refreshing dew. The distance precludes the possibility of the literal dew of H. "descending upon the mountains of Zion." But a Hermon dew was a dew such as falls there, the snow on the summit condensing the summer vapours which float in the higher air, and causing light clouds to hover round and abundant dew to fall on it, whilst the air is elsewhere without a cloud and the whole country parched. The "ointment" sets forth "how good" and "precious" is brotherly "unity"; the dew "how pleasant" it is. Zion is the mountain where this spiritual dew descends, as pleasant as the natural dew that descends on H.

It has three summits, a quarter of a mile from each other; hence arises the plural "Hermons" (Ps. xlii. 6), not "Hermonites." A rude wall of massive stones surrounds the crest of the peak, within are the remains of a small ancient temple. Jerome refers to this, and no doubt it is one of those Baal high places set up by the former inhabitants, and so often condemned in the O. T. A circle of temples surrounded H., facing its summit, so that H. seems to have been the great sanctuary of Baal. At the top, says Capt. Warren, is a plateau comparatively level; here are two small peaks lying N. and S., about 400 yards from each other. The third peak is 500 yards to the W. On the southern peak a hole scooped out is surrounded by an oval of hewn stones; at its southern end is the temple nearly destroyed, with Roman mouldings, and of later date than the stone oval, of stones from 2 to 8 ft. long, 2½ broad, and 2 thick.

Herod. Of Idumean descent (Josephus, Ant. xiv. 1, §3). The Idumeans were conquered and brought to Judaism by John Hyrcanus, 130 B.C. Thus the Herods, though aliens by birth, were Jews in faith. They made religion an engine of state policy. Eschewing Antiochus Epiphanes' design to Grecize Jerusalem by substituting the Greek worship and customs for the Jewish law, the Herods, whilst professing to maintain the law, as effectually set at naught its spirit by making it a lever for elevating themselves and their secular kingdom. For this end Herod adorned gorgeously the temple with more than Solomonian splendour.

Thus a descendant of Esau tried still to get from Jacob the forfeited blessing (Gen. xxvii. 29, 40), in vain setting up an earthly kingdom on a professed Jewish basis, to rival Messiah's spiritual kingdom, as it was then being fore-announced by John Baptist. The "HERODIANS" probably cherished hopes of Herod's kingdom becoming ultimately, though at first necessarily leaning on Rome, an independent Judaic eastern empire. The Jewish religion thus degraded into a tool of ambition lost its spiritual power, and the theocracy becoming a lifeless carcass was the ready prey for the Roman eagles to pounce upon and destroy (Matt. xxiv. 28).

1. HEROD THE GREAT (Matt. ii., Luke i. 5), second son of Antipater (who was appointed by Julius Caesar procurator of Judaea, 47 B.C.) and Cyprus, a noble Arabian. At the time of Antipater's elevation, though only 15 (or as other passages of Josephus make probable, 20), he received the government of Galilee and soon afterwards

Celosyria. He skillfully gained the favour of Antony, who made him and his elder brother Phasael joint tetrarchs of Judaea. Forced to abandon Judaea by the Parthians, who supported Antigonus the representative of the Asmonæan dynasty, H. fled to Rome

(40 B.C.), where he was well received by Antony and Octavian, and made by the senate "king of Judaea." With Roman help he took Jerusalem (37 B.C.), slew his leading adversaries there, including the whole sanhedrin except two, and established his kingly authority. Undertaking next for Antony an expedition to Arabia against Malchus, he thereby escaped taking share in the war between Antony his patron and Octavian. After the battle of Actium he gained, by a mixture of humility and boldness at Rhodes, the favour of Octavian the conqueror, who confirmed him in the kingdom, and added several cities along with the province of Trachonitis and district of Paneas. But external prosperity did not save him from internal troubles, the fruits of his own lust and insatiable cruelty. He put to death successively Hircanus, his wife Mariamne's grandfather, Mariamne herself to whom he had been passionately attached, his two sons by her, Alexander and Aristobulus, and just four days before his death signed the order for executing their bitter accuser, his eldest son Antipater. At last, seized with a fatal disease in the stomach and bowels, he became more cruel than ever; he ordered that the nobles whom he had called to him should be slain immediately after his decease, that there might be no lack of mourners at his death.

It was at this time that he ordered the slaughter of all males, from two years old and under, in and about Bethlehem, the foretold birthplace of the expected Messiah. Josephus does not notice this, probably both because of his studied reserve as to Jesus' claims, and also because the slaughter of a comparatively few infants in a village seemed unimportant as compared with his other abounding deeds of atrocity. Macrobius long subsequently (A.D. 400) says that "when Augustus heard that among the children whom H. ordered to be killed H.'s own son (Antipater) was slain, he remarked, 'It would be better to be one of H.'s swine than H.'s sons,' punning on the similar sounding Gr. terms for son and swine, huios, huidas. H. being a professed Jew, his swine as unclean were safe from death, his sons were not. Josephus records what illustrates the Scripture account of the massacre of the innocents; "H. slew all those of his own family who sided with the Pharisees, looking forward to a change in the royal line" (Ant. xvii. 2, § 6). As Matthew says, "H. privately called the wise men and inquired of them diligently what time the star appeared." So Josephus says, "an Essene, Menahem, foretold when H. was a boy he should be king. Accordingly when he was in full power he sent for Menahem and inquired of him how long he should reign. Menahem did not define the time, but in answer to H.'s question whether ten years or not, replied, 'Yes 20, nay 30 years' (Ant. xv. 19, § 5). H.'s keenness to establish his dynasty, jealousy of any rival, craft, hypocrisy, cruelty, recklessness of any sacrifice to gain his object, appear as vividly in the Scripture narrative as in Josephus. The wise men's question, "Where is he that is born king of the Jews?" was precisely one to excite H.'s jealousy. For H. was not a born Jew, much less born king of the Jews, but an Idumean alien, made king by the anti-Jewish world power, Rome. Unimportant as the event seemed to the world, the murder of the innocents was the consummation of his guilt before God, and places him among the foremost of Satan's and the world's foretold (Jer. xxxi. 15) representative adversaries of the Lord and His church, answering to the Pharaoh who oppressed Christ's type, Israel, murdering the male children in the nation's infancy in order to stifle the nation's first beginnings; but in vain, for God secured the nation's exodus from Egypt by the tyrant's overthrow, just as subsequently He saved Jesus and destroyed H., and in due time "called His (antitypical) Son out of Egypt" (Matt. ii. 15; comp. Hos. xi. 1). H.'s death and Jesus' birth therefore must have been at least four years before the era known as A.D.

Ambition was his ruling passion. For its sake he compromised the Jewish religion which he professed, in order to conciliate Rome, by offerings to the Capitoline Jupiter at his elevation to the throne. He rebuilt the temple of Apollo at Rhodes, which had been consumed by fire, "the greatest and most illustrious of all his works" according to Josephus. He built a theatre and amphitheatre, and introduced heathen games in honour of Cæsar every fifth year at Jerusalem. He rebuilt Samaria and its temple, and called it Sebaste (Gr. for Augusta) in honour of Augustus; also Cæsarea on the site of Straton, and made provision at it for heathen worship. At Paneas he dedicated a temple of white marble to Augustus. The stricter Jews were so offended that ten men conspired to kill him in the theatre at Jerusalem. Being detected by a spy they were put to death, but the spy was torn to pieces afterwards by the mob. Thereupon he erected the castle of Antonia, near the temple, to overawe the disaffected.

However, he turned the tide of feeling in his favour by two acts. In the 13th year of his reign during a severe famine he spent all his resources and sold even valuable works of art to import corn from Egypt for the relief of the people. Still more did he win popularity by rebuilding the temple on a magnificent scale, to vie with that of Solomon; yet with such scrupulous care that it seemed a restoration rather than a new building. He inaugurated the work with a set speech. The building of the temple itself began in 20 B.C., and was finished in a year and a half. The surrounding buildings occupied eight years more. But still fresh additions continued to be made, so that at the beginning of Jesus' ministry the Jews said, "Forty and six years was this temple in building, and wilt Thou rear it up in three days?" At that time He was 30 years old, which added to 16 years (for 20 B.C., when H. began building, means only 16 before His real date of birth) makes 46. It has been thought that he used the opportunity of building the temple to destroy the authentic genealogies of the priesthood, and that the monument which he raised over the tombs of the kings was owing to superstitious fear after his sacrilegious attempt to rob them of treasures. His title "H. the Great" was given him in admiration of splendid and successful, though often awfully impious and cruel, tyranny. How vastly different it is to be "great in the sight of the Lord" (Luke i. 15).

2. HEROD THE TETRARCH (Matt. xiv. 1, etc.; Mark vii. 17, etc.; Luke iii. 1, 19, ix. 7; Acts xiii. 1). Called "King H." by courtesy, not right (Mark vi. 14). ANTIPAS contracted for Antipater; son of H. the Great by a Samaritan, Malchaze. Originally H. the Great destined him to succeed to the throne, but in his last will made him tetrarch of Galilee and Perea, which yielded him a yearly revenue of 200 talents. He married the daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea; but afterwards, meeting at Rome, he became enamoured of and took, his half-brother Herod Philip's wife and his own niece, daughter of Aristobulus, Herodias. This sin against God became the retributive source of evil to him. Aretas in consequence invaded his land and defeated him severely. H. stood to John Baptist in the same relation that Ahab did to Elijah. H. "feared" John at first (comp. Ahab's fear of Elisha, 1 Kings xxi. 20), "knowing that he was a just man and an holy, and observed him (preserved him from Herodias, or else respected, regarded him); and when he heard him he did many things and heard him gladly." But H. when reproved for his sin by John preferred keeping his sin to gaining God's favour and the approval of God's minister. A slight breath of temptation, regard for the world's opinion, and dislike of reproof, were enough to dry up his shallow religion. His first downward step was, he cast John his faithful reprover into prison (comp. Aza, 2 Chron. xvi. 10). Herodias having gained this first step, like her prototype Jezebel, found the next step an easy one; at the first "convenient day" (his birthday, which he observed with the Herodian characteristic aping of Roman ways, in defiance of Jewish abhorrence of the pagan custom) when H. made a supper to his lords, and Herodias' daughter by dancing so pleased him that he promised to give whatever she might ask, Herodias prompted her to ask for John's head. [Josephus, Ant. xix. 7, § 1, notices the Herods' magnificent celebration of their "birthdays," which became proverbial and were celebrated by the Herodians even at Rome, as noticed by the heathen Persians, v. 180.] So "she came in straightway with haste" to give him no time to repent, and though "exceeding sorry, yet for his oath's sake and for their sakes which sat with him he would not reject her." So John was beheaded in fort Machærus, facing the Dead Sea from the S. on the borders between H.'s and Aretas' dominions. How scrupulous men are as to the law of opinion among men, how reckless of the law of God! True conscientiousness would see his oath, which involved the sacrifice of an innocent life in violation of God's law, would be more honoured in its breach than in its observance. Not to let conscience have time to restrain him, he ordered the execution "immediately" as she had demanded it.

When Christ appeared conscience reasserted her supremacy; he said unto his servants, "This is John the Baptist, therefore mighty works do show forth themselves in him." In comparing Mark viii. 15 with Matt. xvi. 6 we find "the leaven of H." is "the leaven of the Sadducees," i.e. disbelief of angel or spirit or resurrection. Luke (ix. 7) says, "H. was perplexed because it was said of some that John was risen from the dead." A Pharisee would have regarded John's reappearance in Jesus as an instance of the transmigration of the souls of good men, and would have felt no perplexity; H.'s "perplexity" is just what we might expect from a Sadducee, accused by a guilty conscience and trembling lest the world of spirits and the judgment should prove after all to be realities. And that he was so comes out in the most incidental and undesigned way, a clear mark of the truth of the narrative. On his lending himself, foxlike, to the Pharisees' design to get Christ out of Galilee into Judæa [see Fox] his superstitious fears were too great to admit of his repeating in Christ's case the execution which, to his own torment of conscience, he had perpetrated in John's case; but he was glad of any means to relieve himself of Christ's presence which "perplexed" him (Luke xiii. 32). Yet "he desired to see Him" (ix. 9), for he had "heard of the fame of Jesus" (Matt. xiv. 1); and so in Christ's last hours "when he saw Him he was exceeding glad, for he was desirous to see Him of a long season, because he had heard many things of Him (doubtless through Joanna, wife of Chuza, H.'s steward, and through Manaen his foster brother: Luke viii. 1-3, Acts xiii. 1), and he hoped to have seen some miracle done by Him." So "he questioned with Him in many words, but He answered him nothing." Christ would not gratify H.'s idle curiosity, but He did answer Pilate when the honour of His Messianic kingship was at stake, "Art Thou the King of the Jews?" (Luke xxiii. 3-12.) Battled in his idle wish, H. in proud scorn "with his men of war set Him at nought, and mocked Him, and arrayed Him in a gorgeous robe, and sent Him again to Pilate." The Roman governor in the first instance had sent Him to H. as soon as he knew that He as a Galilean belonged unto Herod's jurisdiction. So "the same day Pilate and H. were made friends together," doubtless owing to Pilate's courtesy and recognition of H.'s jurisdiction, even as their estrangement was owing to the contrary conduct on Pilate's part towards Galileans (xiii. 1). At variance at other times and on other points, the world potentates agree in this, to insult and persecute Christ. So H. and Pilate are coupled together in their divinely foretold antichristianity (Acts iv. 25-27, Ps. ii. 1, 2, etc.).

Another incidental and therefore unstudied coincidence with truth is the implication that neither Pilate nor H. resided at Jerusalem: "H. who himself ALSO was at Jerusalem at that time," Josephus states that the H. who slew James (Acts xii.) was "not at all like that H. who reigned before him, he took pleasure in constantly living in Jerusalem" (Ant. xix. 7, § 3); this proves that H. Antipas did not reside much at Jerusalem. So Pilate's usual residence was at Cæsarea, the abode of the Roman governors of Judæa (Ant. xviii. 4, § 1; xx. 1, § 4; Bell. Jud. ii. 9, § 2). The danger of popular outbreaks at the passover was what brought Pilate to Jerusalem for a brief time.

Finally Herodias, the source of H.'s sin, became his source of shame, for at her instigation he went to Rome, A.D. 38, to sue the emperor Caligula for the title of "king," just conferred on his nephew H. Agrippa. Instead of this, through Agrippa's influence, H. lost his kingdom and was banished to Lyons, thence to Spain, where he died. The one faithful (humanly speaking) act of her life was her preferring to share H.'s exile rather than stay at home in her own country; surely sinners "eat of the fruit of their own ways, and are filled with their own devices" (Prov. i. 31, Jer. ii. 19). H. was wicked in other respects besides adultery, and was accordingly "reproved by John for all the evils which he had done" (Luke iii. 19). Cruel yet cunning, like his father (xiii. 32), he was the very type of an oriental despot, sensual, capricious, yet with a sense of honour and having a respect for piety in others; but like Ahab too weak to resist a bad woman's influence, under which false scrupulosity outweighed right conscientiousness, to be succeeded by superstitious terrors. Tiberius, which he founded and named after the emperor, was one of his greatest works.

HEROD PHILIP II. Son of H. the Great and Mariamne, the highpriest Simon's daughter. Distinct from the tetrarch H. Philip II. He married Herodias, sister of Agrippa I., by whom he had Salome, the daughter who by dancing pleased H. ANTIPAS (see above), the paramour of her own mother and dishonourer of her father! Owing to his own mother Mariamne's treachery, H. Philip I. was excluded from all share in his father's dominions, and lived privately. His being without a kingdom was doubtless a cause of the ambitious Herodias deserting him for his brother the tetrarch. But "vaulting ambition o'erleaps itself and falls on the other side"; and seeking the name of "king" besides the reality which her paramour had, she and he ended their days in shame and exile.

HEROD PHILIP II. Son of H. the Great and Cleopatra. Advocated Archelaus' claims before Augustus, on the death of his father. His own kingdom was Batanæa, Trachonitis, Auranitis, and some parts about Jamnia.

with the title "tetrarch." He ruled justly, without taking part in the intrigues which rent his family asunder. He built Cæsarea Philippi at the site of Panæas, near the sources of the Jordan (Matt. xvi. 13). His wife was Salome, daughter of H. Philip I. and Herodias. He died at Julias, the city which he raised Bethsaida into, A.D. 34. As he died childless his dominions were added to the Roman province, Syria.

HEROD AGRIPPA I. Son of Aristobulus (H. the Great's son) and Berenice. Imprisoned by Tiberius for an unguarded speech. Caius Caligula, COIN OF AGRIPPA.

A.D. 37, on his accession set him free, and gave him the governments formerly held by the tetrarchs Philip and Lysanias, Abilene, etc., with the title of "king" (Acts xii. 1). Galilee and Peraea were added to his dominions on the exile of H. ANTIPAS (see above), whom, notwithstanding the kindnesses he formerly when in difficulties received from him, Agrippa supplanted by intrigues at Rome. By services to Claudius, Caligula's successor, he secured in return the addition of Judæa and Samaria, so that now his kingdom equalled that of H. the Great. Unlike his predecessors he strictly kept the law. A legend states that once he burst into tears on reading in a public service Deut. xvii. 15, on which the Jews exclaimed, "Be not distressed, thou art our brother," viz. by half descent from the Hasmoneans. It was on his entreaty at the risk of his interest and life that Caligula desisted from his attempt to set up his statue in the temple, which so engrossed the Jews that for a time they let the Christians alone (Acts ix. 31). To "please the Jews" he slew James the brother of John, and imprisoned Peter with the intention of bringing him forth to the people for execution after the pass-over ("Easter"). Love of popularity was his ruling principle, to which his ordinary humanity was made to give way. Self-seeking vanity led him to design Peter's death, but the issue was his own death. The church's "prayer without ceasing" (Isa. lxii. 6, 7; Luke xviii. 7) saved Peter, whereas the church's Lord avenged His own and her cause on the church's persecutor. In the fourth year of his reign over the whole kingdom (A.D. 41) he attended games at Casarea "in behalf of the emperor's safety" (possibly on his return from Britain), according to Josephus (Ant. xix. 8). When he appeared in the theatre in a robe all of silver stuff which shone in the morning light, his flatterers saluted him as a god, and suddenly he was afflicted with a terrible pain in the bowels, of which he died in five days, in the 54th year of his age. The sacred writer unveils the unseen world in his account, which Josephus so remarkably confirms. The authorities of Tyre and Sidon offended him, "but came with one accord and, having made Blastus the king's chamberlain their friend, desired peace because their country" was dependent on the king's country for corn, etc. (1 Kings v. 9, 11; Ezek. xxvii. 17.) Then upon a set day "H. arrayed in royal apparel sat upon his throne and made an oration. And the people gave a shout, saying It is the voice of a god and not of a man. And immediately the angel of the Lord smote him, because he gave not God the glory; and he was eaten of worms and gave up the ghost. But the word of God (which he had thought to still) grew and multiplied." So Belshazzar (Dan. v.): "pride goeth before destruction" (Prov. xvi. 18). Josephus states that H. said in his pain, "I whom you call a god am ordered to depart this life immediately. Providence thus instantly reproves the lying words you just now addressed to me, and I who was by you called immortal am immediately to be hurried away by death." Thus fell he whom the world called Agrippa the Great! a monument to warn proud men, "Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker! Let the potsherd strive with the potsherds of the earth" (Isa. xlv. 9).

HEROD AGRIPPA II. Son of H. Agrippa I. and Cypros, grandniece of H. the Great. Being but 17 at his father's death (A.D. 41), he was thought too young to succeed his father in the kingdom, but six years later (A.D. 50) the emperor Claudius conferred on him Chaleis which had been under his uncle, shortly before deceased (A.D. 48). Then (A.D. 52) he was transferred to the tetrarchies formerly held by Philip and Lysanias with the title "king." Accurately he is called so in Acts xxv. 13, xxvi. 2, 7. Nero added several cities of Galilee and Perea to his kingdom (A.D. 55). Five years later Paul pleaded before him (see FESBUS, who naturally consulted him on a question of Jewish law). The great pomp with which he and his sister Berenice (whose connection with him caused leave suspicion) "entered into the place of hearing with the chief captains and principal men of the city" accorded with his character, fond of show. In the last Roman war he took part with the Romans in the destruction of his nation in the same spirit of cold cynicism with which he met the impassioned appeal of the apostle. After the fall of Jerusalem he retired with Berenice to Rome, where he died in the third year of Trajan (A.D. 100). He was the last of the race of H. commemorated in history. Acts xxv. 13 represents his losing no time in going to Casarea to salute the new Roman governor. In exact consonance with this Josephus (Bell. Jud., ii. 15, § 1; Life, § 11) records his anxiety to stand well with the Roman governors, Alexander in Egypt, and Gessius Florus in Judaea, in the latter case Berenice accompanying him.

Herodians. Matt. xxii. 15, etc.; Mark xii. 13, etc. Upholders of the Herodian dynasty, regarding it as the safeguard against direct heathen rule which the Jews loathed, and also as the best compromise between the ancient faith and heathen civilization. Hence they were said to look upon Herod the Great, Antipas, and Agrippa successively as Messiah. Thus the Herods were forerunners of the coming antichrist, and like the O. T. antichrist, Antiochus Epiphanes (Dan. viii., xi.), they paved the way to apostasy by an introduction of Greek refinements, theatres, etc., and a blending of honours to heathen gods along with the recognition of Jehovah and the law. (See above the HERODS, and 1 Mace. i. 10-16.) A falsely presumed political necessity was their plea for supporting the Herods, however unfaithful to God, and even for supporting the Roman government, in so far as the Herodian dynasty leaned on it. Thus on the side of maintaining the Jewish polity they coincided with the Pharisees; on the side of their lax and scarcely orthodox views and means for maintaining it, they had common ground with the Sadducees. Hence what is termed "the leaven of Herod" (Mark viii. 15) is "the leaven of the Sadducees" (Matt. xvi. 6). After Christ's miracle on the sabbath "the Pharisees went forth and straightway took counsel with the H. against Him how they might destroy Him" (Mark iii. 6). The legal zealots joined with the Jewish politicians, adherents of the ruling dynasty, in getting rid of One who thwarted the views of both alike by setting up a spiritual kingdom adverse both to legalism and to the temporal kingdom of Herodianism. The same coalition appears at the close of Christ's ministry: "the Pharisees sent unto Him their disciples with the H." as "spies, feigning themselves just men, that they might take hold of His words, that so they might deliver Him unto the power and authority of the governor" (Matt. xxii. 15, 16; Mark xii. 13; Luke xx. 20). With flattering words to Him as "not accepting the person of any" (by which compliment they "tempted" Him to pronounce against Caesar) they asked "Is it lawful for us to give tribute to Caesar?" designing if He said "no" to give Him up to the Roman governor, if "yes" to stir up the people against Him as violating the law (Deut. xvii. 15). "He perceived their craftiness, and said, Why tempt ye Me? show Me a penny." Their acceptance of Caesar's currency showed they accepted as a fact Caesar's rule: "Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's." Man as made in the image of God owes himself to God (Gen. i. 27, ix. 6; Acts xvii. 29; Jas. iii. 9; Luke xv. 8, 9). Because Judah had not given herself to God, she was now under Caesar. "Their question therefore was as if an adulterer were to ask, was it lawful for him to pay the penalty of his adultery?" (Clandins). 2 Chron. xii. 8; Jer. xxvii. 4-18; Rom. xiii. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 13, 14; John xix. 11. Obedience to Caesar is an application of the higher principle of obedience to God, from whom all power is; Christ's reply unites rather than separates the Christian's political and religious duties. Yet, such is man's perversity, they had the impudence soon after at Jesus' trial before Pilate to say, "We found this fellow perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Caesar, saying that He Himself is Christ a king" (Luke xxiii. 2).

Herodian. Rom. xvi. 11. Whom Paul sends greetings to, calling him "my kinsman."

Heron: anaphah. An unclean bird (Lev. xi. 19, Deut. xiv. 18). Rather "the great plover," thick kneed. Charadrius adienemus, widely spread in Europe, Asia, and N.

Africa. It lives on slugs, worms, frogs, and toads (Speaker's Comm.). But Gesenius derives it from anaph "to snort angrily," which applies well to the heron, an irritable, voracious bird, frequenting marshes. The addition "after her kind" implies that a genus is meant.

HERON.

Hesed, the son of. Benhesed: 1 Kings iv. 10.

Heshbon. The Amorite king Sihon's capital (Num. xxi. 26, etc.). On the western border of the high plain, nishor (Josh. xiii. 17), on the boundary between Reuben and Gad. Now Heshbon, 20 miles E. of Jordan, on a line with the N. of the Dead Sea. In the poem, "there is a fire gone out of H., . . . it hath consumed Ar of Moab. . . . Woe unto thee, Moab: he hath given his sons . . . and his daughters . . . unto Sihon," the poet paints H.'s triumph over Moab, and Moab's misery; but suddenly the scene changes, and Israel is introduced as conquering the conqueror: "We have shot at them, H. is perished," etc. At Jahaz, a little S. of H., Israel overthrew Sihon (Deut. ii. 32, 33). H. was rebuilt by Reuben (Num. xxii. 37), but assigned to the Levites in connection with Gad (Josh. xxi. 39). It passed from Israel into the hands of its former masters the Moabites before the captivity. It is included accordingly in Isaiah's (xv. 4) and Jeremiah's (xlviii. 2, 34, 45) denunciations of Moab. Playing upon the meaning of H. (a place of deriding counsel) Jeremiah says, "in H. they (the Chaldeans) have devised evil against Moab." The old proverb shall hold good again; as anciently Sihon seized H., and issued forth thence as a devouring flame against Moab, so now the Chaldeans shall seize H. and make it their starting point to destroy Moab.

The ruins stand on a low hill, and are a mile in circuit, but do not include a single entire building. On the southern base of the hill is an ancient reservoir; comp. S. of Sol. vii. 4, "thine eyes are like the fishpools in H. (deep, quiet, full, reflecting the bridegroom's mace) by the gate of Bathrabbim" (daughter of a multitude; a crowded thoroughfare of H.). The bride is calm amidst the crowd.

Heshmon. Near Beersheba (Josh. xv. 27). Probably Azmon on the southern boundary of Judah (Num. xxiv. 1); but according to Conder El Meshash.

Heth. Son of Canaan, Ham's son; whence sprang the Hittites, occupying the hill country of Judah near Hebron. But the race enlarged its borders so that they with the Amorites represent all Canaan (Josh. i. 4; Ezek. xvi. 3, "thy father was an Amorite, thy mother an Hittite"). See Gen. xxiii. 3-20. Esau's marriage to one of the daughters of H. "grieved the mind" of Isaac and Rebekah, for their morals were lax and their worship idolatrous (Gen. xxvi. 34, 35; xxvii. 45). In Solomon's and in Joram's times there were independent Hittite kings (1 Kings x. 29, 2 Kings vii. 6). In the Egyptian monuments they are called the Kheta, who made themselves masters of Syria.

Hethlon. On the northern border of the promised land (Ezek. xlvii. 15, xlviii. 1). "The way of H." is the pass at the N. end of Lebanon from the Mediterranean coast to the plain of Hamath, i.e. the entrance of Hamath (Num. xxiv. 8).

Hezeki: i.e. Hizkiah shortened = "strength of Jehovah" (1 Chron. viii. 17).

Hezekiah = "strength of Jehovah." 1. Twelfth king of Judah; son of the unbelieving Ahaz and Abi or Abijah; ascended the throne at the age of 25, 726 B.C. Of his faithfulness it is written (2 Kings xviii. 5) "he trusted in the Lord God of Israel, so that after him was none like him among all the kings of Judah, nor any that were before him, for he clave to the Lord, and departed not from following Him but kept His commandments." Probably his mother, being daughter of Zechariah "who had understanding in the visions of God" (2 Chron. xxvi. 5), was pious, and her influence counteracted the bad example of his father. In the very first year and first month of his reign the Lord put it "in his heart to make a covenant with the Lord God of Israel" (2 Chron. xxix.), so he opened and repaired the doors of the Lord's house which had been "shut up," and charged the Levites not to be negligent but to "sanctify" the house and "carry forth the filthiness out of the holy place," and to light the lamps, to burn incense, and to offer burnt offerings as in former times; all which, to the shame and disaster of Judah, had latterly been neglected. They did so, and moreover sanctified all the vessels which Ahaz had "cast away in his transgression." Then an atonement was made for the kingdom, the sanctuary, and Judah, with a sin offering of seven bullocks, seven rams, seven lambs, and seven hegoats; then followed the burnt offering, whilst "the Levite singers sang with the words of Da id and Asaph the seer, and the trumpets sounded." The priests were too few to flay the burnt offerings which the congregation "of a free heart" brought in; therefore the Levites helped them "until the other priests had sanctified themselves, for the Levites were more upright in heart to sanctify themselves than the priests." So "H. rejoiced that God had prepared the people, for the thing was done suddenly." Then followed the passover, in the second month, "because the priests had not sanctified themselves sufficiently, neither had the people gathered themselves together to Jerusalem," so as to keep it in the regular month (Num. ix. 10, 11; comp. Exod. xii. 6, 18). H. by letter invited not only Judah, but also Ephraim and Manasse, to it: "Ye children of Israel, turn again unto the Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, and He will return to the remnant of you, escaped out of the hand of the king of Assyria." The majority "laughed the messengers to scorn; nevertheless, divers of Asher, Manasse, and Zebulun [Ephraim and Issachar also] humbled themselves and came to Jerusalem." Also "in Judah the hand of God was to give them one heart to do the commandment of the king by the word of the Lord" (2 Chron. xxx. 2, 12, 18, 23; Jer. xxxii. 39). Owing to the want of priests several were not duly cleansed and sanctified, yet did eat the passover; but H. prayed for them, "the good Lord pardon every one that prepareth his heart to seek God, though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the sanctuary." So "the Lord hearkened to H. and healed the people." "And H. spake comfortably unto all the Levites that taught the good knowledge of the Lord," assuring them of God's pardon upon their "making confession to the Lord God" for the people, so that "the whole assembly took counsel and kept other seven days with gladness." "So there was great joy in Jerusalem, for since Solomon's time there was not the like . . . and the priests blessed the people . . . and their prayer came up to the Lord's holy place, even unto heaven."

Next, all Israel present went out to break the images, cut down the groves [see ASHTORETH, Ashterah], and throw down the high places and altars out of all Judah and Benjamin, in Ephraim also and Manasse, until they had utterly destroyed them all. "H. also brake in pieces the brazen serpent that Moses made," for previously "Israel did burn incense to it, and he called it Nehustan" (piece of brass, nothing better; 2 Kings xviii. 4); a practical condemnation of "relics" when superstitiously venerated. Yet in spite of the warning the brazen serpent was revered by professing Christians in the church of Ambrose at Milan! (Prideaux, Connex., i. 19.) The passover must have been five or six years later than the purification of the temple, which was in H.'s first year; for it was not till the sixth year of H. that the king of Assyria took Samaria (ver. 9, 10); its fall prepared many in Israel to accept humbly H.'s invitation (2 Chron. xxx. 6, 9). H. also provided for the maintenance of the priests and Levites by commanding the payment of tithes; he ordered also their courses of service, and "in every work that he began in the service of the house of God, and in the law, and in the commandments, to seek his God, he did it with all his heart and prospered"; a good motto for Christians (Col. iii. 23).

Isaiah the prophet was the great supporter of H. in his pious efforts; but not without opposition from drunken scoffers, who asked "whom shall he (Isaiah) teach knowledge? them that are weaned from the milk?" i.e., does he take us for babes just weaned, that he presumes to teach us? (Isa. xxviii. 9) "I r precept upon precept, line upon line, here a little and there a little," i.e., for he is constantly repeating the same thing as if to little children, and as one teaching young beginners how to make the strokes of a letter and join line to line; the scoffers imitated Isaiah's stammering like repetitions, in Heb. tsar la-tsar, quare la-quare. The simplicity of Divine teaching offends proud scoffers (2 Kings v. 11, 12; 1 Cor. i. 23); but children in knowledge needed to be spoken to in children's language (Matt. xiii. 13). Isaiah replies, "You will have a sterner teacher with stammering and foreign speech to convict you of unbelief (Isa. xxviii.). Ahaz the former king's counsellors recommended worldly alliances and compromises of principle for political expediency, instead of Isaiah's counsel to rest on Jehovah alone. Shelma was one of these half hearted, self indulgent, and ostentatious officers at court. His father's name is not given, though his office is, "the scribe" (2 Kings xviii. 38, xix. 2); whereas the fathers of Eliakim and Joah, with Shelma, are named. The reason appears quite incidentally in Isa. xxiii. 15, "Say unto Shelma . . . this treasurer over the house (prefect of the palace), What hast thou here? and whom hast thou here, that thou hast hewed thee out a sepulchre here?" i.e. as being a foreigner (his name is un-Hebrew like, he was probably a Syrian brought from abroad to Ahaz's court) thou hast no paternal burying place or kindred here. He was degraded; but (probably upon his repentance) the lower yet honourable office of "scribe" or secretary of state was given him, and in that office he is mentioned as if faithful (Isa. xxxvii. 2, etc.), so that the sentence of exile and humiliation, "tossed like a ball into a large country, and there the chariots of his glory becoming the shame of his lord's house," was apparently reversed, though Jewish tradition says he was tied to the horses' tails by the enemy to whom he designed to betray Jerusalem, but who thought he mocked them. [See ELLAKIM.] It is possible that, unwearied by the past, he relapsed into treachery, and then were fulfilled Isaiah's prophetic threats, which but for his relapse would have been averted, and which were temporarily suspended.

II. recovered from the Philistines all the cities which his father Ahaz had lost, viz. of "the low country and the S. of Judah, Bethshemesh, Ajalon, Gath-ron, Shiccho, Timnah, Gimzo," with their dependent villages, "the Lord having brought Judah low because Ahaz had made Judah naked, and transgressed sore against the Lord" (2 Chron. xxviii. 18, 19). "II. smote them even unto Gaza (Gaza and Gath alone remained to them: Josephus, Ant. ix. 13, § 3), from the tower of the watchmen to the fenced city" (2 Kings xviii. 8). This was foretold by Isaiah (Isa. xiv. 29, 30): "Rejoice not thou, whole Palestina, because the God of him that smote thee (Uzziah, 2 Chron. xxvi. 6) is broken (viz. under Ahaz), for out of the serpent's (as Uzziah was regarded by the Philistines) root shall come forth a cockatrice," an adder, to the Philistines, II.; "and the firstborn of the poor (the poorest) shall feed" in safety, instead of constant alarms of Philistine invasions.

II. bore for a time the yoke of tribute imposed by the Assyrian Tiglath Pileser on Ahaz (2 Kings xvi. 7); but having spent much on the Philistine war, trusting in the aid of Egypt, he now ventured to withhold payment from Assyria. Sennacherib had begun, and Sargon had just terminated, the siege of Samaria (Isa. xx. 1, 4, 6; 2 Kings xvii. 6, 24; xviii. 7, 7, 9, 10 "THEY took it," 11). Sargon moreover removed some of the Israelites to "the cities of the Medes"; the Scripture herein being confirmed by Assyrian monuments which mention his seizing and annexing several Medea cities, to which Assyrian policy would of course transplant distant colonists. Eight years subsequent to Samaria's fall, in II.'s fourteenth year, Sennacherib, in the third year of his reign according to Assyrian records, undertook his first expedition against Judah. In the interval between Samaria's fall and this invasion Tyre's gallant resistance under their king Eubelus had forced the Assyrians to retire after a five years' siege. II. had used this interval to "stop the waters of the fountain without the city, stopping the upper watercourses (rather 'spring head') of Gihon (i.e. the spring source of the Ketron stream, Nichol being the valley E. of the city, Ge the valley W. and S. of the city), and bringing it straight down to the W. side of the city of David" (i.e. into the valley separating mount Moriah and Zion from the upper city (2 Chron. xxvii. 3, 4, 13, 30): Zion must therefore have lain on the N. not on the S.W. of the city, so that the water brought to the

W. of it should be inside not outside the city); also building up the broken wall (using the materials of the houses which they broke down for the purpose), and raising it up to the towers, and another wall without, and repairing Millo in the city of David, and making darts and shields in abundance. II. also "gathered together the waters of the lower pool," i.e. brought into the city by subterranean passages in Zion rock the waters from the fountain which supplied the lower pool (Isa. xxii. 9-11, vii. 3; 2 Kings xx. 20). "He also made a ditch between the two walls for the water of the old pool," i.e. the lower pool's water he diverted to a new tank in the city between the two walls. His words too cheered the hearts of his captains and people, being the language of faith: "there be more with us than with him; with him is an arm of flesh, but with us is the Lord our God to fight our battles." So "the people rested themselves upon his words." [See JERUSALEM.]

sent saying, "I have offended; return from me, that which thou putteth upon me I will bear"; and "the king of Assyria appointed 300 talents of silver, and 30 talents of gold." The monuments confirm this Scripture statement: "because H. king of Judah would not submit, I took 46 of his strong fenced cities . . . and from these, as spoil, 200,150 people, with horses, asses, camels, oxen, and sheep; and H. himself I shut up in Jerusalem, like a bird in a cage, building towers round the city to hem him in, and raising banks of earth against the gates. . . . Then H. sent out to me the chiefs with 30 talents of gold and 800 talents of silver . . . by way of tribute." The patriotism of the Hebrew historian (2 Kings xviii.) suppresses the ravages, advance on the capital, and the siege; but Isaiah (x. 28-32, xxii. 1-14, xxiv., xxix.) more vividly than even Sennacherib's annalist notices all. In the main facts there is a singular agreement between the sacred and the secular records, the variation in the number of talents of silver being probably due to the Hebrew recording the number appointed as permanent tribute, the Assyrian the whole that was actually carried off. The inscriptions record that Ekron had submitted to H. and delivered their king Padi up to him because of his adherence to Assyria. Sennacherib recovered Padi from Jerusalem and seated him again on the throne.

II.'s sickness must have occurred just before Sennacherib's expedition, for God assures him (Isa. xxxviii. 6), "I will deliver thee and this city out of the hand of the king of Assyria, and I will defend this city," in the 14th year of II.'s reign. Moreover, 15 years was the addition promised by God to his life, which added to the 14 would give 29, the actual number of years in all that he reigned. His sickness was owing to an inflammatory carbuncle and abscess. Having then no heir, he shrank from death with a fear scarcely worthy of a believer. God granted his earnest prayer; "before Isaiah had gone out into the middle court the word of the Lord came to him," i.e. when he had just left H. and H. was in the act of praying, after having heard God's message, "thou shalt die." God hears whilst His children are yet speaking (Isa. lxx. 24, Ps. xxxii. 5, Dan. ix. 21). Our wishes, when gratified, often prove curses. Three years afterwards H. had a son, Manasseh, the chief cause of God's wrath against Judah and of the overthrow of the kingdom (2 Kings xxiii. 26, 27). God gave H. as a sign of recovery the recession of the shadow ten degrees on Ahaz's DIAL [see], an obelisk in the midst of the court, the shadow of which could be seen by H. from his sick chamber, falling on the successive steps ascending to his palace.

II. composed a thanksgiving hymn for his recovery, based on the psalms of David, which he had restored to liturgical use in the temple. The beginning rests on Ps. cii. 2, the first half of ver. 11 on Ps. xxvii. 13 (chedel, "the world" or age soon ceasing, is from chadal "to cease"; usually written chedel, this transitory world, Ps. xlix. 1); ver. 18 on Ps. vi. 5, xxx. 9; the beginning of ver. 20 on Ps. lxx. 1. [See HEPHIZIBAH.] H. did not disbelieve in a future state, but regarded the disembodied state as one wherein men cannot declare the praises of God before men, it is as to this world an unseen land of stillness, the living alone can praise God on earth. That the true view was at the time held of the blessedness of the sleeping saints Isa. lviii. 1, 2 proves. A cake of figs was the instrument used for the cure; God can make effectual the simplest means.

Sennacherib's object in his second expedition was Egypt, H.'s ally. Hence with the great body of his army he advanced towards Egypt by S.W. Palestine, and did not himself approach Jerusalem; this was two years after the former invasion. The Assyrian annals are silent as to Sennacherib's second expedition in the fifth year of his reign, which began by his "treacherously" (Isa. xxxiii. 1) attacking LACHISH [see], and which ended in the destruction recorded in 2 Kings xix. 35; for, unlike the faithful Jewish historians, they never record any of their monarch's disasters. But the disaster is tacitly deducible in the Assyrian records from the discontinuance subsequently of expeditions by Sennacherib westward farther than Cilicia. The Assyrians did not resume aggression upon southern Syria and Egypt till the close of Esarhaddon's reign. Moreover the Egyptian priests told Herodotus, from their records, that, a century and a half before Cambyses, Sennacherib led a host of Assyrians and Arabs to the Egyptian border where king Sethos met them near Pelusium on the E. of the Nile; and that swarms of field mice ate the Assyrians' quivers, bowstrings, and shield thongs in the night, so in the morning they fled, and multitudes fell, having no arms to defend themselves. Sennacherib erected a monument, a man in stone with a mouse in his hand, and the inscription, "Look on me and learn to reverence the gods." The mouse symbolised ruin (1 Sam. vi. 4, 5); the story arose out of this symbolical statue, not the statue out of the literal story. Sennacherib, according to Assyrian inscriptions, which mention the 22nd year of his reign, lived about 17 years after the invasion and was slain by his two sons.

Isaiah, whilst disapproving of trust in Egypt, regarded the voluntarily offered aid of the tall and warlike Ethiopians as providential (xviii. 1, 2, 7). "Ho (not Woo!) to the land of the winged bark," or else "to the land of the clanging sound of wings" (i.e. armies). To Ethiopia Isaiah announces the overthrow of Sennacherib the common foe, and desires the Ethiopian ambassadors, then at Jerusalem, to carry the tidings to their people. TIR-

HAKAH's [see] coming forth to encounter Sennacherib created a diversion in favour of Judaea. In the former invasion Sennacherib in his first expedition inflicted a decisive blow on the united forces of Egypt and Ethiopia at Altage (possibly the Eltekon of Josh. xv. 50); but now he was forced to raise the siege of Pelusium by Tirhakah, and send an imperious letter to H. by Rabshakeh, whose sneers at his religious reforms in removing the high places (2 Kings xviii. 22-32) and flattering promises in fluent Hebrew to the people favour the idea that he was a renegade Jew. H.'s simple childlike faith appears in his spreading the foe's insolent letter before the Lord. His faith received an immediate answer of peace; 185,000 were slain by the angel of the Lord in the "night," perhaps by "the plague that walketh in darkness" (2 Kings xix. 35, with which Isa. xxxvii. 36 undesignedly accords, "when they arose early in the morning"). In this second expedition, according to Jehovah's word, Sennacherib did not "come before the city with shields, nor cast a bank against it" (Isa. xxxvii. 33); whereas in the first he shut H. up as a "bird in a cage" also "raising banks of earth against the gates." It is possible Rabshakeh took the army with him from Jerusalem to Libnah on the borders of Egypt (ver. 8), and that the destruction occurred there, which accords with the Egyptian story to Herodotus above; the Lord's words "he shall not shoot an arrow there, nor come before it with shields" seem corrupted into the Egyptian legend of the mice gnawing the bowstrings and shield straps. ognomy of the captives is discernible, after mentioning the capture of the 200,150 Jews heads, "then I prayed unto God," the only instance of God's name in an inscription without a heathen adjunct. On returning to Nineveh Sennacherib, according to Tobit i. 18, revenged himself on the Jews then in his power; but that apocryphal book makes him die 55 days afterwards, whereas 17 years elapsed: see above.

In Isa. xxxix. an embassy from Merodach Baladan to H. is recorded. He congratulated H. on his recovery, and sent also a present. About this time precisely it was that Babylon had revolted from Assyria, and set up an independent kingdom. Scripture calls him "king of Babylon," though both before and after him Babylon was subject to Assyria. This is an undesigned coincidence of Scripture with secular history, confirming the truth of the former. The Assyrian inscriptions say he reigned twice, and that Sennacherib in his first year expelled him and set up Belib in his stead. Probably he recovered the Babylonian kingdom when Sennacherib was weakened by his disaster in Judaea, and sent the embassy not merely to congratulate H. on his recovery but mainly to court H.'s alliance, as having like himself cast off the Assyrian yoke. Hence arose H.'s excessive attention to his ambassadors. But how had H. such a store of precious things? Either the transaction was before H.'s straits when he had to cut off the gold from the doors and pillars of the temple, to give to the Assyrian king. [Then Merodach Baladan's embassy would be during his earlier reign at Babylon, in Sargon's time, 713 B.C.; whereas his second reign fell in 703 B.C., five or six years before the date of H.'s death (these dates are deduced from the Assyrian records, if they be trustworthy). The chronology favours the view that H.'s sickness and Merodach Baladan's embassy were some years before Sennacherib, in the first reign of Merodach Baladan.] Or the more probable (though the dates cause difficulty) explanation is in 2 Chron. xxxii. 22, 23: "thus the Lord saved H. from Sennacherib. . . . And many brought gifts unto the Lord (doubtless impressed with His great majesty and power in the miraculous destruction of the Assyrians) to Jerusalem, and presents to H. king of Judah; so that he was magnified in the sight of all nations from thenceforth." The spoils of the Assyrian host left in panic, as on a different occasion (2 Kings vii. 15), would add to H.'s wealth. The sending of the embassy so long after his recovery is accounted for by Babylon being then regarded in respect to Judah as "a far country" (Isa. xxxix. 3), also by the impossibility of sending sooner during Sennacherib's invasion; moreover another object of the princes of Babylon, which was famed for astronomy, was "to enquire of the wonder that was done in the land" (2 Chron. xxxii. 25, 26, 31), i.e. the recession of the shadow on Abaz's dial. H. was "glad"; it was not the act but the ostentatious spirit, and the unbelief tempting him to rest on Babylon, proud of its alliance, instead of on Jehovah, which called forth God's retributive threat that Babylon, the instrument of his and Judah's sin, should be the instrument of their punishment (Isa. xxxix. 5-7); fulfilled 120 years afterwards. Ingratitude to God, and pride, were his fault in this affair; "H. rendered not again according to the benefit done unto him, for his heart was lifted up," "God leaving him to try him, that He might know all that was in his heart" (Deut. viii. 2). But when the believer's foot slides, it slides the deeper into humility. First, H. frankly confessed "all"; unlike Saul and Asa, submitting to God's servant though his subject (Isa. xxxix. 4; 2 Chron. xvi. 7-10; 1 Sam. xv. 20, 21), and "humbling himself for the pride of his heart," and "accepting the punishment of his iniquity" (Lev. xxvi. 41) meekly, and even finding cause for thanksgiving in the mitigating fact foretold by implication, "there shall be peace and truth in my days." Not the language of mere selfishness, but of one feeling that the national corruption must at last lead to the threatened judgment, and thanking God for the stroke being deferred yet for a time. The prophecy of the carrying away to Babylon, in the form of a rebuke, forms the connecting link between the former portion of Isaiah's prophecies (i.—xxxix.), which relate to the deliverance from Assyria, and the latter (xl.—lxxvi.) as to the deliverance from Babylon, more than a century and a half later.

Ps. xli. and lxxvi. commemorate Sennacherib's overthrow. Two coincidences in Ps. xli. occur: "the city of God" (ver. 4) is that wherein "God is in the midst," so that "she shall not be moved," just as history states that the mother city Jerusalem alone escaped, whereas "all the defended cities of Judah" fell before Sennacherib (Isa. xxxvi. 1); also in ver. 10, "Be still and know that I am God, I will be exalted in the earth," is God's reply to H.'s prayer, "O Lord our God save us, that all the kingdoms of the earth may know that Thou art the Lord" (Isa. xxxvii. 20). Also ver. 5, "God shall help her . . . right early," Heb. at the turning of the morning (Ps. xxx. 5 end). On the previous night the cause of the city of God seemed desperate and the Assyrian triumphant, but "when they (the Jews) arose early in the morning, behold they (the Assyrians) were all dead corpses" (Isa. xxxvii. 36). In ver. 8-10 Sennacherib's overthrow is made the earnest of the final cessation of wars throughout the earth under the Prince of Peace, after He shall have made "desolations" of the adversary.

Ps. lxxvi. 3, "there brake He the arrows of the bow . . . shield . . . sword . . . battle," implies that by one stroke at Jerusalem (which opposes the view that Libnah was the scene of the Assyrian overthrow) God ended completely the war. Ver. 6, 8 imply that it was by Jehovah's direct interposition. The "death sleep" of the host at God's rebuke is described vividly (ver. 5, 6), the camp so recently full of life now lying still as death. "The stout hearted are spoiled, they have slept their sleep. . . . At Thy rebuke, O God of Jacob, both the chariot and horse are cast into a dead sleep." God's "cutting off the breath (spirit) of princes" (ver. 12) implies probably that Rabshakeh and other leaders fell on the same night. "Let all that be round about Him bring presents unto Him that ought to be feared" (ver. 11) accords with the fact recorded 2 Chron. xxxii. 22, 23. The assurance of God's help in Ps. lxxv. accords with Isa. xxxvii. 21-35; also the omission of the N. among the quarters whence help is expected accords with the Assyrian attack being from the N.

11. died in his 56th year after a 29 years' reign, 607 B.C. He was buried "in the chiefest (or highest) of the sepulchres of the sons of David, and all Judah and Jerusalem did him honour at his death" (Prov. x. 7). His "acts and goodness were written in the vision of Isaiah . . . and in the book of the kings of Judah and Israel" (2 Chron. xxxii. 32, 33). A fitting accompaniment of the religious reformation he wrought was his setting "the men of H." (Isaiah, Micah, Joah, etc.) to "copy out" some of the 3000 proverbs which Solomon spoke 300 years before: thus he brought forth the word of God from its obscurity (1 Kings iv. 32, Eccles. xii. 9, Prov. xxv. 1).

2. Son of Neariah, of Judah (1 Chron. iii. 23, Zeph. i. 1).

Hezion. King of Syria, father of Tabrimon; grandfather of Benhadad. Possibly = Rezon, Solomon's contemporary (1 Kings xv. 18, xi. 23).

Hezir. 1. 1 Chron. xxiv. 15. 2. Neh. x. 20.

Hezrai, in the keri or Heb. marg.; Hezro in the Heb. text, kethub (2 Sam. xxiii. 35); "the Carmelite." Once perhaps an adherent of Nabal (1 Chron. xi. 37).

Hezron. 1. Gen. xlii. 9, Exod. vi. 14, Num. xvi. 6. 2. Gen. xlii. 12, Ruth iv. 18; Esom's Matt. i. 3.

Hiddai. 2 Sam. xxiii. 30, "of the brooks (torrents) of Gash." Hurai 1 Chron. xi. 32.

Hiddekel. Tigris. A river of EDEN [see], going "eastward to Assyria" (Gen. ii. 14). "The great river" (Dan. x. 4). From hai "lively," and dig "an arrow," in early Babylonian; equivalent to Tigra in Aramaean. Now called by the Arabs Dijleh.

Hiel = God liveth. Native of Bethel. Rebuilt, i.e. restored as a fortified town, Jericho in Ahab's reign, who hoped through fortifying it (for H. was Ahab's profane and reckless tool) to have on his borders a city securing to himself the passage of Jordan. In H. was fulfilled Joshua's curse on the rebuilder of Jericho (vi. 26), "he shall lay the foundation in (i.e. at the price of) his firstborn (Abiram), and in (i.e. at the price of) his youngest son (Segub) shall he set up the gates of it." The builder paid for its restoration by the loss of all his sons, from the firstborn to the youngest. The Benjamites, by Joshua's allotment (xviii. 21), inhabited it, and it is called "the city of palms" (Jud. iii. 13, 2 Sam. x. 5); but not till Ahab's time, when men cast off all fear of Jehovah, was Joshua's curse fulfilled, when H. presumed to fortify it (1 Kings xvi. 34). The walls had been miraculously cast down, and it was against their being rebuilt that the curse was levelled. The sin marks how deeply Israel had fallen; the curse how God will not let His word be transgressed with impunity.

Hierapolis. Col. iv. 13. Associated as the seat of a church with the neighbouring Colossae and Laodicea; on a height between the rivers Lycus and Meander, within a few miles of one another; the three churches were probably all founded by Epaphras. Now Pamouk Kalesi. Hot calcareous springs are near, which have deposited curious incrustations. There is a frozen cascade, the surface wavy, as of water suddenly petrified. A nephitic cavern, Plutonium, was anciently connected with the worship of Cybele, whence the city was designated Hierapolis, "the sacred city."

Hieroglyphics. One of the earliest modes of representing visibly the words or ideas already orally expressed. For many centuries the key to these representations was altogether unknown; but a piece of granite found near Rosetta by the French army in 1798, and now in the British Museum, contains a decree in honour of Ptolemy Epiphanes (204 B.C.) written in hieroglyphics with a Gr. translation alongside. Also the shaft of an obelisk brought to England from Philae in the S. of Egypt contains a hieroglyphic inscription of its dedication to the gods by Ptolemy Physcon and Cleopatra (146 B.C.) and at the base a Gr. inscription. Champollion, by comparing the Gr. names Ptolemy and Cleopatra with the hieroglyphics corresponding, made out letter by letter. Young and others have perfected the transcription of Heb. and the Egyptian hieroglyphic. Thus the derivation from Egyptian of many of the Hebraised words in Exodus is proved, confirming its having been written by one in such circumstances as Moses was.

The hieroglyphics originally were picture writing, but in the form handed down to us on oldest monuments they are phonetic with occasionally an accompanying picture of the object in order to make the group of hieroglyphic letters which form the word more intelligible.

Thus the names of individuals the figure of a man is attached; such characters are called determinatives. The initial of the Egyptian (Ahom) for eagle is A, so an eagle became the representative of A; a lion (Egyptian Laho) is L; an owl (Mowlad), M.

CLEOPATRA'S NEEDLE.

Higgaion = meditation, from hagah "to meditate." Found Ps. ix. 16, xix. 14, xcii. 3 marg. "upon the harp with musik" (Lam. iii. 61). A call to solemn reflection on God's dealings. The Selah (a pause in the music) follows to give time for meditation.

High places. Archaeological and scientific researches have made it evident that in the varying forms of early religions, and in lands far distant from each other, high places were selected for worship of a sacrificial character. This was so especially among the Moabites (Isa. xv. 2, xvi. 12; Num. xxiii. 2-5). The three altars built by Abraham at Shechem, between Bethel and Ai, and at Mamre, were on heights. Such sites consecrated of old would naturally be resorted to in after times as sanctuaries. Not only these, but heights originally dedicated to idols (Num. xxiii. 52, Lev. xxvi. 30). The law forbade sacrificial worship elsewhere save at the one national sanctuary. Old usage however strove against the law, and too frequently reasserted itself. The high places polluted by idol worship (2 Kings xxiii. 9) were condemned by all the kings that worshipped Jehovah. But those sacred to Jehovah (2 Chron. xxxii. 12, xxxiii. 17) were tolerated by less thoroughly reforming kings; and sacrifices and burnt incense were offered on them (1 Kings xii. 3, xiv. 4, xv. 35). Hezekiah and Josiah removed them utterly, as opposed to the letter of the law and mostly to the spirit of it too (2 Kings xxiii. 4, xxiii. 5 marg.; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 3). In the time of the judges (Jud. vi. 25, 26, xiii. 16-23; 1 Sam. vii. 10, xvi. 5), and whilst the temple was yet unbuilt (1 Kings iii. 2), and in the Israelite northern kingdom where religious order could not be preserved, owing to the severance from Judah (1 Kings xviii. 30), greater latitude was allowed. But the strict rule was against it, except where God specially (1 Chron. xxi. 26) sanctioned sacrifice on some one occasion at a place (Deut. xii. 4-11, Lev. xvii. 3, 4, John iv. 20). The priests whom the kings of Judah ordained to burn incense in the high places were called Chenarim; comp. Hos. x. 5, Zeph. i. 4, idol priests not having reached the age of puberty, meaning "ministers of the gods," the Tyrian camilli, (black attired ministers, subordinate to the priests, they felled the victim.) from chamar "to be black." The high places of Dan and Bethel were already sacred by usage; so Jeroboam found it easy to induce the people to forsake the temple and cherubim at Jerusalem for his calves in Dan and Bethel. Bamoth, the Heb. for "high places," became so common that the term was used for a shrine in a valley or a city (2 Kings xvii. 9, Ezek. xvi. 31, Jer. vii. 31). In Ezek. xx. 29, "I said . . . what is the high place wherunto ye go? And the name thereof is called Bamah unto this day," the sense is, You ought to have long since put away the name, and the high place which it expresses; the very name implies it is not sanctioned by Me; therefore your sacrifice even to ME in it (much more to idols) is only a "provocation" to Me (ver. 28). In Ezek. xvi. 16, "of thy garments thou didst take and deckedst thy high places with divers colours," the sense is: as a harlot spreading her tent of divers colours to lure victims, so Israel set up on the high places, not stone chapels, but tents hung with coloured tapestry, as the "woven hangings of (Asherah) Astarte" (the right transl. for "grove") (2 Kings xxiii. 7).

Asa in one place is said to have taken away the high places, in another not so; also Jehoshaphat similarly. The seeming discrepancy occurs not only between Kings and Chronicles, but even between different passages of the same chronicler. Doubtless the godly kings at first tried to put down entirely the high places, but afterwards yielded to the general usage of the people in cases where the high place was to Jehovah; where it was to idols they put them down utterly. "They opposed impiety but winked at error" (Bp. Hall). So rooted was the practice that the removal of the high places was made by Rabshakeh a taunt against Hezekiah as if it were an impious innovation against Jehovah's honour; evidently he knew that the act had provoked the enmity of a considerable party among the Jews.

Highpriest. In Heb. "THE priest," and in books after the pentateuch "the great priest," "the head priest," or "chief priest" (2 Kings xxv. 18). In Lev. iv. 3 and elsewhere "the priest that is anointed," for he alone of the priests was anointed on the head in consecration, "the crown of the anointing oil of his God" (Lev. xxi. 12), i.e. the holy oil was poured on his head like a crown (Exod. xxix. 7), a peculiarly compounded ointment (xxx. 22-33) which it was death to imitate or to put upon a stranger. Certain priests, "apothecaries," manufactured it (Neh. iii. 8); this oil was wanting in the second temple. The anointing of the ordinary priests was limited to sprinkling their garments with the anointing oil (Exod. xxviii. 41, etc., xxix. 21; Lev. viii. 30), which does not sanction the Jewish tradition that the oil was smeared on the forehead of the ordinary priests with the finger. The highpriest's special designation, "the priest that is anointed" (iv. 3), implies a marked distinction between his anointing and theirs, besides what was common to both, viz. the "sprinkling." Love is compared to it, streaming down from Aaron's head upon his beard, then to his skirts (Ps. cxxiii. 2). Christ the antitypical Highpriest was anointed with the fulness of the Spirit (Dan. ix. 24, Acts x. 38, John iii. 34); from Him the Spirit in measure streams on His members who touch by faith the hem of His garment (Matt. ix. 20, John i. 16).

Besides the girdle common to all the priests the highpriest wore also the curious girdle of the ephod. Of eight articles of priestly dress the coat or tunic, girdle, breeches, and bonnet or turban belonged also to the common priests; the breastplate, ephod with the curious girdle, mitre (instead of the ordinary priest's turban) and robe of the ephod were peculiar to the highpriest. The breastplate (choshen, "ornament," literally) was two spans long by one broad, but doubled it became a square, fastened by rings and chains of gold to the two onyx stones on the shoulders, and beneath with two other rings and a lace of blue to two rings in the ephod above the curious girdle. On it were the 12 stones in four rows, with the 12 tribes engraven in the order of the encampment; just as the names of the 12 tribes were on the 12 pearl gates, and in the 12 foundations (of precious stones) of the New Jerusalem wall the names of the 12 apostles of the Lamb.

He represented the whole chosen nation as "a kingdom of priests" (Exod. xix. 6). In other nations the priesthood was discovered from every other class, but in Israel Levi held the priesthood rightfully belonging to all, and only delegated to one tribe and family as representing the whole; as Num. viii. 19 proves. This trust was delegated to Levi only until all the children of God could exercise it suitably. Christianity restores the suspended relation of God's people as all king-priests unto God (1 Pet. ii. 9, Rev. i. 6). In the Jewish church there was a delegation of the priesthood to one tribe and family; not so in the Christian church, which unites under the antitypical Melchizedek the kingdom and priesthood which were distinct in Israel. United to Messiah, the spiritual Israel the church shall form one grand heavenly king-priesthood as literal Israel shall be the earthly king-priesthood among the nations (Isa. lxi. 6, lxvi.

21). Christian ministers as distinct from laymen are never called in N. T. hieréis, "sacerdotal priests," as the Jewish priests were. The highpriest alone entered the holy of holies once a year; but we have "boldness to enter" it through the rent veil of Christ's flesh continually (Heb. x. 19, 20). He alone consulted God by the mysterious Urim and Thummim; we have truly our fellowship with the Father of lights (1 John i. 3, ii. 20; Jas. i. 17, 18), having our "unction from the Holy One" and knowing all things. The highpriest's death prefigured Christ's who gets the blood-stained captive free (Num. xxv. 25). The first separation of Aaron to the priesthood, which previously belonged to the firstborn, occurs in Exod. xxviii., after the directions for the tabernacle and its furniture. Previously Moses bidding him lay up the pot of manna before the Lord implied that the ark would, when made, be under his charge. His being taken up with Nadab and Abihu to see the glory of the God of Israel foreshadowed his hereditary priesthood; also xxvii. 21, xxix. 9, 24.

Josephus, I. XX., and Scripture favour the view that the 12 breastplate stones were the Urim and Thummim. Answers were given by Jehovah to the highpriest (John xi. 51) whilst wearing them and the ephod (1 Sam. xiv. 3, 18, 19, xxiii. 2, 4, 9, 11, 12, xxvii. 6; 2 Sam. v. 23; Jud. xx. 28). "Judgment" was the breastplate's chief significance (Exod. xxviii. 30), "Aaron shall bear the judgment of . . . Israel upon his heart before the Lord continually," viz. the judicial sentence of justification, often represented by a particular kind of robe (Isa. lxi. 10, lxii. 3). So the white linen robe expresses the righteousness or justification of the saints (Rev. iii. 4, 5; xix. 14). Joshua the highpriest represented the nation on its trial before God, at first in filthy garments to represent its guilt, Satan accusing; then by Messiah's intercession justified; therefore the filthy garments are removed and a change of raiment is given and a fair mitre put on his head (Zech. iii.). Thus "the breastplate of righteousness" or "judgment" symbolises Israel's 12 tribes accepted on the ground of the highpriest's sacrificial intercession before God (Num. xxiii. 21). Thummim expresses perfections, Urim lights. Israel's perfect justification in "the Lord her righteousness" and her consequent ultimate prosperity are thus symbolised (Isa. lx. 1, lxii. 1, 2). Levi the priest tribe is called "God's holy one," privileged to bear the Urim and Thummim because of proved faithfulness (Deut. xxxiii. 8). Israel's justification in the person of her highpriest is the ground of her receiving through him communications of God's will. Her children's being "taught of Jehovah" is so connected with "His laying her stones with fair colours" (Isa. liv. 11-17). S. Clark (Speaker's Comm.) thinks that some means of casting lots were kept in the bag formed by the doubled fold of the choshen or breastplate, and that these were the Urim and Thummim: Exod. xxviii. 15-30, "thou shalt put in the breastplate of judgment the Urim and Thummim." But this passage suits at least as well the view that the Urim and Thummim were the 12 precious stones put into the piece of cunning (skilled weaver's) work, and representing Israel "perfected" and "shining with light" because justified before God, as the view that they were some distinct means of lot casting, inside the fold of the ephod. [See URIM AND THUMMIM.]

The ephod consisted of blue, purple, and scarlet yarn and "fine twined linen," wrought in "work of the skilled weaver"; the highpriest's distinctive vestment (1 Sam. ii. 28, xiv. 3, xxi. 9, xxiii. 6, 9, xxx. 7) to which "the breastplate of judgment" was attached (Exod. xxviii. 6-12, 25-28; xxxix. 2-7). It consisted of a back piece and a front piece joined by shoulder straps; ver. 28 transl. "two rings of gold shalt thou make, and put them on the two shoulder pieces of the ephod, low down in the front of it, near the joining, above the band for fastening it" (Speaker's Comm.). Below the arms the two pieces were kept in place by a band attached to one of the pieces ("the curious girdle of the ephod"), "of the same work, of one piece with it" (ver. 8). Two onyx stones, each inscribed with the names of six tribes, clasped together on the shoulders the back and front pieces. An ordinary linen ephod was worn by other priests (1 Sam. xxi. 18); by Samuel, only a Levite (2 Sam. ii. 18); and by David (vi. 14).

The robe of the ephod (meil). A simple, sky-blue frock, without seam or sleeves, drawn over the head, visible above and below the ephod, the elaborate texture of which it set off as a ground work; transl. Exod. xxviii. 32, "its opening for the head shall be in the middle of it," a round hole not connected with any slit before or behind. The skirt was ornamented with pomegranates of blue, purple, and scarlet, a small golden bell being attached between each two of the pomegranates (ver. 33-35). The bells' sound heard from within the veil by those outside assured them that the highpriest, though out of sight, was ministering in their behalf, and acceptably before God, for otherwise he would have been smitten with death, which the sounding bells showed he was not.

The mitre or turban, a twisted band of linen coiled into a cap, with the gold plate in front fastened to a blue lace or band (which went round the mitre) and engraved with holiness to the Lord. Rabbi Eliezer in Hadrian's reign saw it at Rome, probably with the other temple spoils deposited in the Temple of Peace.

Four garments were common to all priests. "The coat of fine linen embroidered," rather "woven in diaper work," the threads of one colour being diapered in checkers by the ordinary weaver (xxviii. 39, xxxix. 27): a long tunic worn next the skin, the sleeves of which appeared from under the ephod. "The girdle (abnet) of needlework" ("of the work of the embroiderer," Speaker's Comm.) was of three colours, the texture loose, would several times round the body, the ends hanging to the feet but thrown over the shoulder in active work. The breeches or drawers, of linen. The bonnet or turban, of linen, for the head, but not in cone shape as the highpriest's mitre. The highpriest's successors were inaugurated by wearing these eight articles of dress seven successive days. They were kept in the Baris built by Hyrcanus for the purpose, and called Antonia by Herod, to be along with the highpriesthood at the king's disposal. The highpriest in his robes of glory and beauty in Josephus' time entered the temple before all the people on the great DAY OF ATONEMENT [see], then in secret in obedience to the law (Lev. xvi. 4, 24) assumed his linen garments alone and made expiation; afterwards resuming his splendid robes, he appeared before the people (Bell. Jud. v. 5, 7).

A sagan or deputy, next in dignity to the highpriest, was often appointed; "the second priest" (2 Kings xxiii. 4, xxv. 18). He was memunneh, "prefect of the temple," and officiated in the absence of the highpriest. Annas was deposed by Valerius Gratus (A. U. C. 779), and Joseph or Caiaphas, his son-in-law, was made highpriest (John xviii. 13). Annas retained in the Jews' feeling the lawful highpriesthood, and had influence enough to get his five sons successively appointed; as sagan he evaded the Roman deposition and kept his power.

Any blemish or illegitimate birth debarred from the highpriesthood. So Christ (Heb. vii. 26). The epistle to the Hebrews explains the antitypical meaning of the highpriesthood, realized in Christ. He was "appointed" and "called of God" (Heb. iii. 1, 2; v. 4, 5), "after the order of Melchizedek" (v. 6; vi. 20; vii. 15, 17; Ps. cx. 4). Superior to the Aaronic priests (Heb. vii. 11, 16, 22; viii. 1, 2, 6) in that He was "consecrated with an oath" (vii. 20, 21), has an intransmissible priesthood (marg. vii. 23, 28), was "holy, harmless, and undefiled," and without "infirmity" (26-28), "faithful to Him that appointed Him" as the "Son," whereas Moses the lawgiver was but a "servant"; needed no sacrifice for Himself (ver. 27); Himself the sacrifice, purifying "the heavenly things" (ix. 14, 26), "better" than the sacrifices which "purified the patterns of things in the heavens" (23); not often, but offered once for all (vii. 27; ix. 25, 26, 28; x. 1, 2, 12, 9, 10-14, 17, 18); "making him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience," which the law sacrifices could not (ix. 9; x. 1, 2, 16, 22). "A merciful and faithful highpriest, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people" (ii. 17). "Obtained eternal redemption for us" (ix. 12). "Passed into the heavens" (iv. 14) "to appear in the presence of God for us," as our advocating highpriest within the heavenly veil (ix. 24, vii. 25). "Tempted Himself in all points like as we are, yet without sin." He is able to succour the tempted (ii. 18); "touched with the feeling of our infirmities," and so having the needful qualification of a priest, that He "can have compassion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way" (iv. 15, v. 2). "Blesses in turning men from their iniquities" (Acts iii. 26, Num. vi. 23-26). At once the King and the Priest upon His throne (Zech. vi. 13). As the priests' glory had to be traced, so Christ's Divine sonship and human descent from David. Their bodily soundness typifies His faultless perfection without blemish or spot (Heb. vii. 26). The highpriest's obligation to marry a wife in her virginity answers to the bride of the Lamb (2 Cor. xi. 2, Rev. xiv. 4). The highpriest's ephod of gold, blue, and purple represents the lovely graces of His manhood. The firm and orderly setting of the precious stones in the breastplate answers to the firm union of Christ's people, His jewels, to Himself; earth and hell cannot sever them (Mal. iii. 17). The highpriest's consecration at the tabernacle door with washing in water, arraying in priestly vestments, anointing with costly oil, and sanctifying with sacrifices, answer to Christ's baptism with water, anointing with the Holy Ghost, and clothing with His curiously wrought body (Heb. x. 5, Ps. cxxxix. 15). Like the highpriest Christ sacrificed for, prays for, blesses, instructs, oversees the service of His people in the spiritual temple, blows the gospel trumpet, judges. Having such a "highpriest passed into the heavens," "over the house of God," we ought to "hold fast our profession," "without wavering," ever "drawing near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience" (Heb. iv. 14, x. 21-23). The epistle to the Hebrews is the N. T. Leviticus, unfolding the spiritual and everlasting meaning of the legal priestly types fulfilled in Christ. His true sphere of priesthood is in heaven, for "if He were on earth He would not even be a priest" (viii. 4, vii. 13, 14), being of Judah, not Levi the priestly tribe, whose functions He never assumed on earth because His was an infinitely better priesthood. His sacrifice on the cross on earth was a priestly act "without the gate"; but the crowning work, the bringing of the blood into the holy of holies, He could not do on earth, but could and did bring it into the better holy of holies above. He appeared to John in His highpriestly long white garment and golden girdle (Rev. i. 13). The gold, purple, etc. of the ephod typify the unsearchable riches of Christ. His robes are "for glory and beauty" to His saints; what He is, they are by union with Him (Isa. xxviii. 5, lxxii. 3). The names of Israel's twelve tribes on the highpriest's shoulders and breast, as a memorial before the Lord continually, imply that the weight of our salvation is upon His shoulders, and our names on His heart before God (S. of Sol. viii. 6), not one name is wanting (Isa. xlix. 16; John x. 3; Rev. i. 17, iii. 12). His are the Urim and Thummim, "lights and perfections," whilst He bears the judgment of His Israel before the Lord continually (Ps. lxxii. 1). The curious girdle typifies His alacrity in ministering as our Highpriest, as one girding up the loins for action (Heb. x. 7, Luke ix. 51). Faithfulness and righteousness were His girdle (Isa. xi. 5). The bells on the hem sweetly sounding from within the veil typify the gospel joyful sound (Ps. lxxxix. 15); the pomegranates represent the fruits which accompany the gospel preaching. The plate with "Holiness to the Lord" implies "He is made unto us sanctification" (1 Cor. i. 30). Aaron was washed because sinful, Jesus was baptized "to fulfil all righteousness." Aaron was anointed with oil, Jesus with the Holy Ghost without measure (Acts x. 38, John iii. 34). Aaron was consecrated with the blood of beasts, Christ with His own blood. The highpriest could only marry a virgin or a priest's widow, typifying Christ's wedding to His Godhead our marriage in purity, and also wedding to Him the church and its members individually as "a chaste virgin" (Rev. xiv. 4, 2 Cor. xi. 2). His not going out of the sanctuary to mourn for the dead typifies that death and mourning shall be abolished by Christ, that where He is they cannot come (Rev. xxi. 4; Isa. xxxv. 10, xxv. 8). To draw nigh to God by any other highpriest, or to say self-sufficiently "all the congregation are holy," incurs Korah's guilt and penalty (Num. xvi.).

Phinehas, son of Eleazar, is the last of Eleazar's line before Eli (Jud. xx. 28). Eli in 1 Sam. i. 3, the next, is of Ithamar's line. Josephus supplies the interval by stating that Joseph Abiezer, i.e. Abishua, was the last highpriest of Phinehas' line before Zadok. How the transfer to Ithamar's line occurred we do not know; possibly by Abishua's son at his death being under age, and Eli so succeeding. Down to David the highpriests officiated in Shiloh in Ephraim, Joshua's tribe; under David and thenceforth in Jerusalem of Judah, David's tribe: the secular power from the first influencing the ecclesiastical. During the captivity of the ark and its neglect in Saul's days Samuel the prophet stands prominent as the interpreter of God's will, and Ahiah the highpriest is more in the background (Jud. xx. 27, 28; 1 Chron. xiii. 3; 1 Sam. vii. 2, xiv. 18). [See ABATHAR in relation to Zadok.] The highpriest at Solomon's dedication of the temple in the 11th year of his reign was probably Zadok's grandson, Azariah, son of Ahiaaz, for Zadok was old at Solomon's accession (1 Kings iv. 2; 1 Chron. vi. 9, 10); the notice that he executed the priest's office in Solomon's temple must refer to the Azariah of ver. 9, not of ver. 10. The non-mention of his name at the dedication shows how the royal power overshadowed the priestly. From David to Jeconiah there are twenty kings, but from Zadok to Jehozadak but 13 highpriests, in 1 Chron. vi. 8-15. The six first tally well to the six first kings, Amariah the sixth priest answering to Jehoshaphat the sixth king from David; also the five last tally to the five last kings, Hilkiah son of Shallum, fourth from the end, tallying to Josiah, the fourth king from the end. There are but two names for the intervening 240 years, Ahitub and Zadok. The histories supply four or five for the interval. Jehoiada in Athaliah's and Joash's reigns, Zechariah, his son AZARIAH [see] in Uzziah's reign, Urijah in AHAZ [see] reign, and AZARIAH [see] under Hezekiah. Josephus (Ant. x. 10) brings up the number to 18. Seraiah ends the series, taken by Nebuzaradan and slain by Nebuchadnezzar, along with Zephaniah, the second priest or sagan (2 Kings xxv. 18). Seraiah's son, Jehozadak or Josedech, was carried captive (1 Chron. vi. 15). Excepting Jehoiada, who overthrew Athaliah, and Azariah who withstood Uzzah, the kings took the lead in great religious movements. David arranged the temple service and 24 priest courses; Solomon dedicated the temple; Jehoshaphat directed Amariah and the priests as to teaching the people; Hezekiah led the reformation, and urged on Azariah; Josiah encouraged the priests in the service of the Lord's house. On the other hand the priests truckled to the idolatrous Manasseh; the highpriest Urijah was Ahaz' ready tool in copying the Damascus altar, supplanting Jehovah's brazen altar (2 Kings xvi. 10-16). No instance is recorded of consulting the Lord by Urim and Thummim after David. The prophets seem to have superseded the highpriests as media of revealing God's will (2 Chron. xv., xviii., xx. 14; 2 Kings xix. 2, xxii. 12-14; Jer. xxi. 1, 2). Yet Nehemiah seems to have expected the return of a "priest with Urim and Thummim" (vii. 65). The early cessation of responses proved by this favours the view that consultation was not the essential but the incidental use of "the breastplate of judgment."

Josedech died in Babylon. His son Jeshua co-operated zealously with Zerubbabel in the restoration of Israel's temple and polity along with Haggai and Zechariah. His successors were Joiakim, ELIASIB [see], Joiada, Johanan (Jonathan), and Jaddua [see ALEXANDER] (Neh. xiii. 4-7, xii. 10, 11).

Josephus (Ant., xi. 8, § 5, etc.) states that Jaddua's brother Manasseh was at Sanballat's request made the first highpriest of the Samaritan temple by Alexander the Great. Simon the Just, second after Jaddua, was reputed the last of the Great Synagogue and the finisher of the O. T. canon. Jesus and Onias adopted the Gr. names Jason and Menelaus, and to gain the Syro-Greek kings' favour began to forsake the Jewish laws for Greek customs. A gymnasium at Jerusalem was built for the apostate Jews, and they endeavoured to conceal their circumcision when stripped at the games. This paved the way for the attack on Jehovah's worship by Antiochus Epiphanes the O. T. Antichrist (1 Macc. i., 2 Macc. iv. 12-15). This attack roused the national zeal for their religion, and a brilliant succession of highpriests arose in the Asmonean family who combined civil rule and independent sovereignty with the highpriesthood. Judas Maccabeus (Josephus, Ant. xii. 10, § 6) was highpriest of the nation, but more probably Jonathan his brother was "the first of the sons of Asmoneus who was highpriest" (Life, § 1). They were of the course of Joarib, the first of the 24 courses, (1 Chron. xxiv. 7). The Asmonean dynasty lasted from 153 B.C. down to Aristobulus, Mariamne's brother, murdered by Herod 35 B.C. The independence of the Asmonean priest kings lasted till Pompey took Jerusalem and removed the diadem from Hyrcanus. Herod deposed and substituted highpriests at will. In the N. T. we see Anas highpriest at the beginning of John Baptist's ministry with Caiaphas second priest, but Caiaphas chief and Anas second at our Lord's crucifixion. Ananias, the same perhaps as Ananias murdered by the Zealots before Jerusalem's fall, was the one to whom Paul hastily said, "God shall smite thee, thou whited wall!" (Acts xxiii.) Theophilus, son of Ananias, was the highpriest from whom Saul received the letters of authority, for persecution, to the Damascus synagogue (ix.). Phannias was the last, dragged reluctantly by the Zealots and chosen by lot, "a more rustic who scarcely knew what the highpriesthood meant." This shocking impiety, to them a subject of sport, drew tears from the other priests who beheld their law turned into ridicule (Josephus, B. J. iv. 3, § 8). So ended the highpriesthood, which had lasted for at least 14 centuries and comprised upwards of 76 highpriests! But One in whom the priesthood found its perfection had come, and the types in spite of Jewish resistance must withdraw before the Antitype who abideth for ever.

Hilen. A city of Judah allotted to the priests (1 Chron. vi. 58). Holon in Josh. xxi. 15.

Hilkiah = Jehochah is my portion. 1. 2 Kings xviii. 37. 2. Highpriest (2 Kings xxii. 4, etc.; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 9, etc.; 1 Chron. vi. 13, Ezra vii. 1). In the 18th year of Josiah's reign the king directed him to have the Lord's house repaired out of the money contributed by the people. So faithfully did the workmen execute their task that no reckoning was made with them of the money entrusted to them. II. in the course of the repairs "found the book of the law of the Lord, given by the hand of Moses," being not able to read it himself gave it to Shaphan to read (2 Kings xxii. 8, etc., marg. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 11). Possibly Moses' own autograph copy, but "by the hand of Moses" may mean only that God gave it by means of him (xxxv. 6, John i. 17, Gal. iii. 19, Exod. ix. 35 marg., xxxv. 29, Neh. x. 29). Still the place where it was found, the temple, and its not having been found before but only brought to light during the repairs, and that by the highpriest, identify it with the original temple copy deposited by Moses' command by the side of the ark within the veil (Deut. xxxi. 9, 26). The two tables of the decalogue were in the ark (1 Kings viii. 9); the book of the law by the ark, probably in a chest, securing its safety, attesting its Divine authority, and witnessing against Israel's breach of the covenant of which the ark was the symbol. The expression "the book of the law," not a book of laws, must refer to the well known book, the pentateuch, not to some book then coming to light for the first time. II. "found" it, not "forged" it under the name of Moses, as rationalists in despite of the text conjecture. Shaphan "read therein" (not the whole, which would require a different phrase, 2 Kings xxiii. 2) to the king. The threats and curses of the law against transgressors (Lev. xxvi.; Deut. xxviii., xxix.) were prominent in the passages read, and so overwhelmed the king that he rent his clothes. Probably Josiah, owing to the neglect of the law in Manasseh's and Amon's ungodly reigns, had never heard the law read from before. The intimate acquaintance with both its words and truths which the psalmists and prophets long before Josiah's time display establishes the certainty of the pentateuch's prior existence and of its being the basis of their inspired utterances. Deuteronomy, the repetition of the law in a summary, was the leading portion read, just as at the reading in the feast of tabernacles every seventh year, the year of release, not the whole pentateuch but lessons from it day by day were read (Neh. viii. 18, ix. 3-5, etc.; Deut. i. 5, xxxi. 9-13). "The covenant," and the words "with all their heart and soul" (2 Kings xxiii. 2, 3), answer to the same in Deut. xxi. 1, xxx. 2; comp. also 2 Chron. xxxv. 3 with Deut. xxxiii. 10. Josiah's mind and utter destruction of idolatrous symbols, removal of wizards, and keeping of the passover were the fruits of his hearing Deut. xvi., xviii. Allusions also occur to Lev. xxii. 5, xxii. 1, 5, iii. 2-5, Num. viii. 20-22, ix. 3, in 2 Chron. xxxv. 1, 6, 11, 12. Jeremiah's frequent references to Deuteronomy are well known; comp. xi. 3-5, where he quotes Deut. xxvii. 25. This correspondence is doubtless due to the prominence given to Deuteronomy in reading the book of the law just then found; the finding and the reading would naturally interest Jeremiah deeply and tinge his prophecies. Josiah read (i.e. caused to be read) "all the words of the book of the covenant found in the house of the Lord," i.e. all the essential parts, "the commandments, statutes, and rights," without the reasons and exhortations, narratives, etc.; just as Joshua (viii. 32-35) did at Ebal and Gerizim. The directions for the reading of the law every seventh year or year of release, also the direction (Deut. xvii. 18, 19) that a copy of the law should be made for the king distinct from that of the priests and Levites, imply a plurality of readers and of copies (comp. 2 Chron. xvii. 9, 2 Kings xiv. 6, xviii. 5, 6). Shaphan the professional "scribe" read it to Josiah, who as well as H. probably could not read, for reading and writing were confined to the "scribes," excepting a few who like Moses had learned in Egypt (Acts vii. 22). The ignorance of the law which this narrative implies accords with the prevalence of idolatry and of a low state of education ever since Jehoshaphat's alliance with Ahab, except in Hezekiah's reign.

H. was employed by Josiah also to consult Huldah the prophetess for him, and to help with Zechariah and Jehiel, "rulers of the house of God," in celebrating the passover (2 Chron. xxxiv. 20-22, xxxv. 2, 8).

3. 1 Chron. vi. 45. 4. 1 Chron. xxvi. 11. 5. Neh. viii. 4; perhaps the same as the H. in xii. 7, 21. 6. Jer. i. 1. 7. Jer. xxix. 3.

Hill. Heb. gibeah, a carved, rounded hill; frequent in the Holy Land. Hir, mistranslated "hill," means a mountain range or district (Exod. xxiv. 4, 12, 13, 18; Num. xiv. 40, 44, 45). The "hill" in Josh. xv. 9, comp. 8, is the mount of Olives. "The hills," Deut. i. 7, Josh. ix. 1, is the mountain district of Judah, Benjamin, and Ephraim (Num. xiii. 29). The "holy hill," "hill of Jehovah," etc., Ps. iii. 4, xxiv. 3, is mount Zion. Carmel should be called the mount, not "a hill" (2 Kings i. 9, iv. 27; comp. 1 Kings xviii. 19). Ma'aleh should be "ascent," not hill (1 Sam. ix. 11 marg.).

In Luke ix. 28, 37, "the hill" (oros) is the mountain of transfiguration. In i. 39 "the hill country" ought to be transl. "the mountain country" of Judah.

Hillel. Of Pirathon in mount Ephraim, father of the judge ABDON (Jud. xii. 13, 15).

Hind. [See HART.]

Hinge. In the Hauran the door was often a stone slab with a stone pivot above and below of the same piece, fitting into corresponding sockets. (Prov. xxvi. 14). As the door moves round the same centre, and cannot be separated from it, it moves indeed, but not forward; so the slothful man lies now on this side now on that, but will not beturn from his bed.

Hinnom, valley of. [See HELL.] "The son of H." was some ancient hero who encamped there (Stanley, Sin. and Pal., 172). S.W. and S. of Jerusalem; from 50 to 100 yards wide at the sweep round the S.W. corner of the so called mount Zion. An aqueduct on nine low arches, 290 yards from the Jaffa gate, crosses the valley, and conveys water from "the pools of Solomon" to the temple mount, below which is "the lower pool." The reservoir, supposed by some to be "the upper pool," or GINON [see], is 700 yards from the Jaffa gate. The valley where it runs between the "hill of evil counsel" and the S.W. corner of Jerusalem is pierced with many sepulchral recesses. It opens out into an oblong space, the site of Tophet, where now are gardens watered by Siloam, before it meets the valley of Jehoshaphat or Kedron on the S.E. At the E. end of it is a bed of clay worked still by potters, the probable site of "the potters' field," Aeldama.

Hiram. Gen. xxxviii. 1, 12.

Hiram (HURAM in Chronicles usually, except 1 Chron. xiv. 1, in the ketib, original Heb. text). 1. King of Tyre. Sent carpenters, masons, and cedars to David to build his palace (2 Sam. v. 11). Eupolemon (see Polyhistor, Fragm. Hist. Gr., iii. fr. 18), apparently on the authority of Dins and Menander of Ephesus in the time of Alexander the Great, states, "David reduced the Syrians near the Euphrates, and Commagene, the Assyrians, and Phoenicians in Gilead, Edom, Ammon, Moab, Ituraeans, and Nabatheans; and made an expedition against Suron (Hiram?) king of Tyre and Phœnicia, and compelled them all to pay tribute to the Jews." This confirms 2 Sam. viii., ix., and adds particulars drawn probably from Phœnician or other non-Israelite sources.

H. was "ever a lover of David" (1 Kings v. 1, 10, 12). So he made a "league" with his son Solomon (berith, "a covenant," recognising Jehovah, and guaranteeing to Jewish sojourners at Tyre religious liberty). The mention that "there was peace between H. and Solomon" may hint at there having been once war between H. and David, before H. became "a lover of David." H. gave Solomon for the temple cedars and firs, and gold, six score talents, according to all his desire, and Solomon in return gave H. 20,000 measures of wheat and 26 measures of pure oil yearly; the mercantile coast cities being dependent on the corn and olive abounding region of Palestine (Acts xii. 20 end). Solomon also gave H. 20 cities in Galilee, which did not satisfy him, and which therefore he called CABUL [see] (1 Kings ix. 11-14, 27-32). Tyre is threatened with punishment for delivering the Jewish captives to Edom, and not remembering "the brotherly covenant," viz. between H. and David and Solomon. H. sent also in the navy expert shipmen to OPHIR [see] from Ezion-Gaber, with Solomon's servants; and a navy with Solomon's navy of Tharshish (1 Kings x. 22) to share in the Mediterranean trade.

Dins assigns to H. a 34 years' reign, and names Abibalas his father, Baleazar as his son and successor. Josephus (Ant. viii. 2, § 8) states that the correspondence between H. and Solomon was kept in his day among the Tyrian archives.

2. King H. sent to Solomon an overseer of workmen skilled in working gold, silver, brass, iron, stone, wood, purple, linen, etc. Bezaleel similarly (Exod. xxxi. 25), but by supernatural endowment, combined weaving with metallurgy. He cast the two great brass pillars of the temple, and made the lavers, shovels and basins (1 Kings vii. 13, 14-40). He is called "my father," i.e. a title of honour, counsellor, master workman (Gen. xlv. 8). "Son of a widow of Naphtali," but in 2 Chron. ii. 13, 14, of one "of the daughters of Dan," i.e. she was by birth a Danite, and married into Naphtali. When her husband died she married again, as widow of a Naphtalite, a Tyrian to whom she bore H. Blunt (Undes. Coins.) makes her of the colony Dan or Laish in Naphtali, bordering on Sidonian or Tyrian territory.

Hittites. Descended from Cheth or Heth [see], second son of Canaan. A peaceable and commercial people when first brought before us at Kirjath Arba or Hebron (Gen. xxiii. 19, xxv. 9). Their courteous dignity of bearing towards Abraham is conspicuous throughout. As he took the Amorites as his allies in warfare, so he sought from the H. a tomb.

The Amalekites' advance necessitated their withdrawal to the mountains (Num. xiii. 29). In Joshua (i. 4; ix. 1; xi. 3, 4; xii. 8) they appear as the principal power occupying upper Syria, between Palestine and the Euphrates. The Egyptian monuments represent them (Sheta) as forming a confederacy of chiefs, Egypt's opponents in the valley of the Orontes, during the 19th and 20th dynasties of Manetho, including Joshua's time. Sethos I. took their capital Kotosh near Emesa, 1340 B.C. Two or three centuries later the Assyrian inscription of Tiglath-Pileser (1125 B.C.) mentions them. As the Philistines appear in Joshua (xiii. 3; Jud. iii. 3) predominant in S. Canaan towards Egypt, so the H. in the N. Their military power is represented in Joshua as consisting in chariots (1 Kings x. 29, 2 Kings vii. 6). A hieroglyphic inscription of Rameses II. mentions Asort (Ashtoreth) as their god. Uriah, the unsuspicious, self-denying patriot, whom David so wronged though of his own bodyguard "the thirty," was a Hittite, and showed the chivalrous bearing which Ephron the Hittite and his people had showed of old. The names of H. mentioned in Scripture, Adah, Abimelech, etc., seem akin to Hebrew [see]. G. Smith has just discovered their capital lying about half way between the mighty cities of the Euphrates valley and those of the Nile. Their art forms the connecting link between Egyptian and Assyrian art. The name of their capital is identical with that of the Etruscans. This implies a connection of the H. with that people.

Hivites. Heb. always in the singular="midlanders" (Ewald), "villagers" (Gesenius). Their abode was about Hermon and Lebanon (Josh. xi. 3, "under Hermon in the land of Mizpah"; Jud. iii. 3, "from mount Bala-hemmon unto the entering in of Hamath"); towards Tyre (2 Sam. xxiv. 7), and Sichem or Shechem (Gen. xxxiv. 11), and Gibeon (Josh. ix. 1, 7). Descended from Ham (Gen. i. 17). [See AVIM, with whom LXX. identify them.] A warm, impulsive, unsuspicious people, as their readiness to accept the cunning proposition of Simeon and Levi shows; peaceful and commercial, more keen to gain cattle and wealth than to wage war, as the same story shows; as also that of Abimelech (Jud. vii. 33-ix. 53). The Shechemite idol Baalberith, "Baal of the covenant," was a god of peace not war. Their not revenging themselves on Jacob's family, as he feared, is another proof of their quiet spirit. The Gibeonite H. showed the same unwarlike spirit, with the additional element of craft wherewith they in their turn deceived Israel, as Jacob's sons had deceived their forefathers.

Hizkiah. 1. Zeph. i. 1. 2. HIZKIAH, Neh. x. 17.

Hobab = beloved. Only in Num. x. 29, Jud. iv. 11. Not probably "father in law," but as the Heb. chathan often means, "brother in law," of Moses. Son of Raguel = Reuel (as Gazah = Azzah), Exod. ii. 18. Moses' entreaty, "Leave us not, I pray thee, forasmuch as thou knowest how we are to encamp in the wilderness, and thou mayest be to us instead of eyes," implies that H. was younger than Moses' father in law could now have been. Reuel had seven grown daughters when Moses first went into the wilderness at 40, and now Moses was 80. It is therefore probable that by this time Reuel's son Jethro had succeeded him in his hereditary priesthood.

Moreover, H. is not Jethro (Exod. xviii. 27), for Jethro left the Israelites for his own land Midian before they reached Sinai, whereas H. accompanied them and settled in Canaan (Jud. i. 16, iv. 11). H. and Jethro ("excellency") were probably brothers of Zipporah, Moses' wife, and sons of Reuel; H. the younger, and therefore not bound, as Jethro the elder, to his own tribe by the duties of an hereditary priesthood. We do not hear of Jethro after his departure from Israel before Sinai. As Jethro helped Moses in counsel as a judicious administrator, so H. helped him as the experienced Arab sheikh familiar with the tracks, passes, and suitable places of the wilderness for an encampment, quick eyed in detecting the far off shrubs which betoken the presence of water, and knowing well where there was danger of hostile attacks. The ark of the covenant was their main guide (Num. x. 23). But Divine guidance does not preclude human; nay, the God of ordinary providence works by natural means and is the same as the God of special grace.

Moses' words to H., "We are journeying unto the place of which the Lord said, I will give it you," imply Israel's assured faith in God's promise; as sure as if it were in their hands. So the believer answers every allurements to make this pilgrimage world his rest (Heb. xiii. 14, xi. 13-16). He is no longer in the Egypt of the world in spirit, nor is he yet in the heavenly Canaan; he is on the way, and has no doubt of the end (2 Tim. i. 12). He tries to persuade all others to join him, for, whereas other riches are diminished by sharing, these are increased: "Come thou with us, and we will do thee good; for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel." Holy importunity succeeds at last. H. said: "I will not go, but I will depart to mine own land and kindred." Moses replied: "Leave us not, I pray thee . . . and it shall be, that what goodness the Lord shall do unto us, the same will we do unto thee." The Kenite complied, and in due time shared in Israel's blessing in Canaan. So Zech. viii. 23. Going with those with whom God is, we shall share in their blessing from God (1 John i. 3). So Ruth experienced, who did not need to be entreated, but entreated to go with her godly mother in law (i. 16, 17). H.'s family by joining Israel escaped Amalek's doom (1 Sam. xv. 6). If we suffer with Israel in the wilderness, we shall reign with Israel in Canaan (2 Tim. ii. 12; Luke xxii. 28, 29).

Hobah. N. of Damascus. To it Abram pursued Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv. 15). It means a hiding place. Tradition makes Masjad Ibrahim, "the prayer place of Damascus," at the village of Burzeh, three miles N. of Damascus, the scene of his thanksgiving to God after routing the kings. Nicolaus of Damascus makes him to have reigned there (Josephus, Ant. i. 7, § 2). The Jews make Jobar near Burzeh to be H.

Hod. 1 Chron. vii. 37.

Hodaiah. Among the latest mentioned of Judah's royal line (1 Chron. iii. 24).

Hodaviah. 1. 1 Chron. v. 24. 2. 1 Chron. ix. 7. 3. Head of "the children of H." or Hodevah (who returned with Zerubbabel); akin to the name Judah (Ezra ii. 40, iii. 9 marg; Neh. vii. 43).

Hodesh. Possibly a second name of one of Shaharaim's two wives Huslium and Baara (1 Chron. viii. 9).

Hodiah. 1. One of Mered's two wives. Mother to the fathers or founders of Keilah and Eshtemoa (1 Chron. iv. 19). The same as Jehudiah (but Keil gives reason for Hodiah being a man [see JEHUDIAH]) "the Jewess" (ver. 18), to distinguish her from his other wife Bithiah ("worshipper of Jehovah"), an Egyptian princess, daughter of Pharaoh, a convert from idolatry.

2. HODIAH. Neh. viii. 7, ix. 5, x. 10, 13, 18.

Hoglah. Third of Zelophehad's five daughters, in whose case a daughter's right of inheritance was decided, in the absence of sons (Num. xxvi. 33, xxvii. 1, xxxvi. 11; Josh. xvii. 3).

Hoham. King of Hebron (Josh. x. 3). One of the five kings pursued down the pass of Bethhoron, and taken in the cave of Makkedah and slain.

Holon. 1. A town in the mountains of Judah; allotted to the priests (Josh. xv. 51, xxi. 15); HILEN in 1 Chron. vi. 2. A city of Moab, in "the plain country" or level dowus (mi-shor) E. of Jordan.

Holy Ghost. In the N.T. used in the A.V. In the O.T. "the Holy Spirit" (Ps. li. 11; Isa. lxiii. 10, 11). The Heb. ruach, and Gr. pneuma, is the same for both "Spirit" and "Ghost." His personality is proved by attributes and acts being attributed to Him peculiarly. Gen. i. 2, "the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters" at creation, as distinct from the Word's operation (ver. 3). He "strove with man" befor the flood (vi. 3). He "came upon" Saul (1 Sam. x. 10) and "upon David," and then "the Spirit of Jehovah departed from Saul" (xvi. 13, 14). David prays "take not Thy Holy Spirit from me" (Ps. li. 11). Israel "vexed God's Holy Spirit," though He had "put His Holy Spirit within" Moses, Israel's leader, and "the Spirit of Jehovah" had "caused Israel to rest" in the promised land after his wilderness wanderings (Isa. lxiii. 11, 12, 14). He is invoked in prayer to revive Israel long dead spiritually and politically (Ezek. xxxvii. 9): "Come, O Life breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live." S. of Sol. iv. 16, the Heavenly Bridegroom calls for (John xiv. 16) the Holy Spirit first as the "N. wind" to "awake," i.e. arise strongly as a Reprover (John xvi. 8-11), then like the S. wind to "come" gently as the Comforter (John xiv. 16). He first clears away the mists of gloom, error, unbelief, and sin, which intercept the light of the Sun of righteousness; then He infuses spiritual warmth, causing the "spices" (i.e. graces) to "flow out" (2 Cor. iv. 6). The coming renewal or "regeneration" of the earth shall be through God's "sending forth His creating Spirit" (Ps. civ. 30, Isa. xxxii. 15). The restorations after the flood, and on a smaller scale every spring after winter's deadness, are an earnest of it (Matt. xix. 28, Rev. xxi. 5).

At the opening of N. T. it is written respecting our Lord's body "that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost" (Matt. i. 20); and to Mary herself the angel said, "the Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee" (Luke i. 35). His personal agency is marked by His "descending in a bodily shape like a dove" upon Christ at His baptism (Luke iii. 22; John i. 32, 33). His office is distinguished from that of Christ, and yet identified with it: "I will pray the Father, and He shall give you ANOTHER Comforter . . . the Spirit of truth. . . I will not leave you comfortless, I will come to you." The Father "sends the Holy Ghost the Comforter in Christ's name," (i.e. representing Christ: Christ absent in the flesh, that He may be more than ever present in Spirit): John xiv. 16, 18, 26. The Father gives, promises, and sends Him, but is not sent. The Son must go that He may come (xvi. 7-11), so that "it is expedient" for the church that Christ should go away, in order that Christ's finished work may be applied to the soul by the Holy Spirit (John vii. 39). "He shall receive . . . take of Mine, and show it unto you." The Son "sends" forth "the Spirit of truth which proceedeth from the Father" (xv. 26). The Constantinopolitan council (A.D. 381) therefore added to the Nicene Creed "who proceedeth from the Father." The western churches added "and from the Son," which Scripture sanctions, though originally inserted by Recared, king of a portion of Spain, A.D. 589, at the third council of Toledo; opposed by Leo III., bishop of Rome; accepted by Pope Nicholas I.; but always rejected by the eastern churches.

His Godhead, distinct personality, and oneness with the Father and the Son, are implied in the baptismal formula enjoined by Christ (Matt. xxviii. 19). As Christ intercedes for us in heaven, so the Holy Spirit intercedes in us on earth. "for we know not what we should pray for as we ought, but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered. And He that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because He maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God" (Rom. viii. 26); thus He "helpeth our infirmities," and is the Paraclete in both senses, as Intercessor and Comforter. He calls and qualifies ministers for their work. Acts xiii. 1, 2, the Holy Ghost said, "Separate Me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them." He makes them "overseers over the flock" (xx. 28). He "hears," "speaks," "teaches," "guides into all truth," "glorifies Christ," "receives of Christ's things," viz. from the Father and Son, "and shows them," "brings all Christ's words to His people's remembrance," "shows things to come," "knoweth the things of God," "searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God," and "reveals them" to the Spirit taught (1 Cor. ii. 9-13); therefore is Divine. Ananias "lying" to Him is called "lying unto God" (Acts v. 3, 4, 9), and "tempting (putting to the proof) the Spirit of the Lord." "Where He is, there is liberty" (2 Cor. iii. 17). The writers of Holy Scripture "spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," "not by the will of man" (2 Pet. i. 21). "The Spirit of Jehovah spake by David" (2 Sam. xxiii. 2), and "God testified against Israel by His Spirit in His prophets," and "gave His good Spirit to instruct them" (Neh. ix. 30, 20). The sin against Him is unpardonable, whereas sin against the Son is pardonable; because the former is against Him who alone can make the Son's work effectual to each soul (Matt. xii. 31, 32). "Except a man be born of the Spirit he cannot enter the kingdom of God" (John iii. 5). "God sends," in the case of His sons by adoption, "the Spirit of His Son into their hearts crying, Abba, Father" (Gal. iv. 6; Rom. viii. 15, 17). They are "led by the Spirit of God" who "beareth witness with their spirit, that they are the children of God." "After they have believed, they are sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance until the (final) redemption of the purchased possession" (Eph. i. 13, 14; also 2 Cor. i. 21, 22). The sanctification of believers is His especial work (2 Thess. ii. 13, 1 Pet. i. 2). We are warned not to "grieve" or "quench" Him (Eph. iv. 30, 1 Thess. v. 19). Between Christ's ascension and return continues the dispensation of the Spirit; the true church is now "the temple of the Holy Ghost," in which believers are "living stones" "builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit" (Eph. ii. 22); "living in the Spirit and walking in the Spirit" (Gal. v. 25); "by one Spirit baptized into one body . . . and made to drink into one Spirit," for "no man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost" (1 Cor. xii. 3, 13; vi. 19; iii. 16, 17; 2 Cor. iii. 8; Acts xix. 1-5). All the various spiritual gifts and graces "that one and the selfsame Spirit worketh, dividing to every man severally as He will" (1 Cor. xii. 11, Gal. v. 22).

In O. T. the law was in the foreground, the Holy Spirit less prominent; in N. T. the Holy Spirit is prominent, the law in the background. Jesus was anointed with the Spirit without measure; we receive a measure out "of His fulness" (John i. 16, iii. 34). Jesus by His unction became Messiah or Christ (Isa. lxi. 1). We receive a share of this "unction," whereby "we know all things" needful for salvation (1 John ii. 20). The full outpouring of the Holy Spirit on Israel and on the nations is yet future (Isa. xlv. 3, xxxvi. 25-27; Zech. xii. 10; Joel ii. 28), of which the earnest was given on pentecost (Acts ii. 16, 21); the law of God, which is love, being written on the heart, instead of on stone as the decalogue (Jer. xxxi. 33, 34; Heb. viii. 8, 12, x. 16, 17; 2 Cor. iii. 3).

The triune benediction puts the Holy Ghost on a level with the Father and the Son, one God. So Rev. i. 4, 5, where "the Seven Spirits before God's throne," coming between God "who is, was, and is to come," and Jesus Christ, can only mean the ONE sevenfold Divine Spirit (Isa. xi. 2, 3).

HOMAM (1 Chron. i. 39); HEMAM, Gen. xxxvi. Homama now, in ruins, between Petra and Ailath, on the ancient road behind the mountain.

HONEY. [See BEE.] Bees deposit it in the crevices of rocks (Ps. lxxi. 16) and in hollow trees. Its "dropping" symbolises speech, sweet, loving, and profitable (S. of Sol. i. 11). The word of God (Ps. xix. 10). As wine and meat express strong spiritual nourishment in faith, so honey and milk sometimes symbolise incipient faith (S. of Sol. v. 1). The vegetable honey exuded from trees, as the Tamarix mannifera, and is found only in small globules which must be carefully collected and strained, so that it cannot be what Jonathan ate in the wood (1 Sam. xiv. 25), or the "wild honey" which John Baptist ate (Matt. iii. 4).

Honey was forbidden in meat offerings, for it soon turns sour and was used for making vinegar (Pliny, xxi. 48). It produces fermentation, which is a symbol of the working of corruption in the heart (Lev. ii. 11, 12; 1 Cor. v. 7).

HOOK. For fishing (Amos iv. 2). In Job xli. 2 transl., "canst thou put a rush rope into his nose? or bore his jaw through with a hook?" or ring attached by a cord to a stake; such rings were put through the mouth of a fish to keep it secure, yet alive, in the water. Wild beasts were led about by the same means. Ezek. xiv. 4, "they brought him with chains," rather hooks such as were fastened in a wild beast's nose. So in the Assyrian remains at Khorsabad captives are represented with a hook in the nose or upper lip, and a cord attached in the king's hand. So God threatens the Assyrian king himself with retribution in kind, "I will put My hook in thy nose" (Isa. xxxvii. 29), as thou didst to others. So the last antichrist shall fare, of whom Sennacherib is type (Ezek. xxxviii. 4). So 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11, "in the thorns," rather perhaps "the captains of the host of the king of Assyria took Manasseh with hooks" or "rings" passed through his lips (Maurer). Might not the "thorns" be the instrument of chastising him, just as it was that used by Gideon upon the elders of Succoth (Jud. vii. 7, 16)? In Ezek. xl. 43 the "hooks" are "fastened" in the walls to hang the meat from for roasting, or else to hang up animals to flay them.

FISHING WITH HOOK

Hophni and Phinehas. "Sons of Beelial," who, though knowing externally and professionally, "knew not the Lord" internally and practically (1 Sam. ii. 12, comp. Jer. xxii. 16, Tit. i. 16). Greediness, violent rapacity, wherewith they made themselves fat with the chiefest of the offerings of God's people, (and this in the sanctuary itself, so that "men abhorred the offering of the Lord," and even lost indulged with the women assembling at the door of the tabernacle, were their crying sins. These in accordance with the prophecies of a man of God, and of Samuel, brought on both a violent death in one day. In vain Israel relied on the ark of God when H. and P. were its escort. If Eli had "restrained them" firmly when "they made themselves vile," and had Israel thoroughly amended their ways, the ark, so far from falling into the foe's hands, would have been the pledge of victory over the foe (Jer. vii. 4, Isa. xlviii. 2). [See ELI.] (1 Sam. ii. iii., iv.)

Hôr. 1. The mount in which Aaron died (Num. xx. 22, 23, 25-28). An archaic form of hor, "mountain." The only instance in which the proper name comes first, "Hôr the mountain," the mount upon the mountain. It "rises like a huge castellated building from a lower base" (Stanley, S. and P., 86). Now Jebel Horan, "by the coast (or 'edge') of the land of Edom" (xxxiii. 37, 38). On the E. side of the Arabah, close to Petra. The white chalk summit rises on a dark red sandstone bare rock, 5300 feet above the Mediterranean. On the northernmost of its two summits is shown a square building with dome, called the tomb of Aaron. A flight of steps cut in the rock leads up a precipice to it. The roof is decorated with ostrich shells and such like ornaments. It is an ordinary Moslem web; over the door is an inscription stating that the building was restored by Es Shimani, son of Mohammed Calain, sultan of Egypt, by his father's orders, in the year 739 of the Hegira; square almost, 28 ft. by 33, having two chambers one above the other. The host encamped in the Arabah below at Moseroth (xxxiii. 30), or Mosera (Deut. x. 6). [See AARON.] His death resembled Moses' in being on a mountain, but differed from it in being in the presence of Moses and Eleazar on the mount to which they ascended "in the sight of all the congregation." Moses' death was in solitude, but with Gilead's heights, and Benjamin's hills, and the rich Jordan valley in view; whereas Aaron's last looks rested on rugged Edom, and chalky mount Seir, and the red sandstone rocks round Petra, and the dreary Arabah.

2. The name H. is applied to the whole western crest of Lebanon, 80 miles long from the E. of Sidon to the entrance of Hamath (Kalat el Husn close to Huns, i.e. ancient Hamath); the northern boundary appointed to Israel (Num. xxxiv. 8).

Hôr Hagidgad. A desert stage in Israel's journey (Num. xxxiii. 32). Gidgad in Dent. x. 7: "the cavern" or else "the summit" of Gidrad, according as the first letter in Heb. be ch (as in received text and Syr.) or h (as LXX. and Vulg. and Samaritan text read). The Arabic jedjed means a hard level tract such as the summit of a mountain range would be.

Horam. King of Gezer, who helped Lachish, but fell before Joshua (Josh. x. 33).

Horeb=dry, dried up. The designation of the northern part of the Sinaitic range, so Rephidim is made to be situated in it (Exod. xvii. 6). Sinai was the central mass of mountains including the particular peak from which the law was given. So the name "Sinai" is most used from Exod. xix. 11 to Num. iii. 1, where Israel is described as at or about the scene of the giving of the law. But in Dent. where Israel appears no longer in that region, "H." is used. Sinai means "sharp pointed," "toothed" (Knobel), the point Ras Sufsafeh. [See EXODUS and SINAI.]

Horem. A fortified place of Naphtali. Now Hurrah, near Yarân, the ancient Iron.

Hori. 1. Son of Lotan, son of Seir, brother to Heman (Gen. xxxvi. 22, 30). The HORITES (troglodytes or inhabitants of caves, probably excavators of the remarkable ones near Petra) inhabited mount Seir (the thickly bushy, or rugged, shaggy) before Esau's invasion (Gen. xvi. 6; Dent. ii. 12, 22; Job xxx. 6, 7). 2. Num. xiii. 5.

Hormah. Joshua (xii. 14) smote its king. Anciently Zephath (Jud. i. 17). Capital of a Canaanite tribe in S. Palestine. Taken by Judah and Simeon (Jud. i. 17). Judah appropriated it (Josh. xv. 20, 1 Sam. xxvi. 30). But Simeon's territory was so blended with that of Judah that elsewhere it is enumerated among Simeon's towns (1 Chron. iv. 30). In Num. xiv. 45 it is called Hormah by anticipation. After Israel's unbelief, consequent on the spies' report, and subsequent presumptuous advance toward Canaan, in defiance of the Lord who no longer would go with them since they had refused to go when He invited them, the Amalekites from the hill "smote them and discomfited them even unto H." Then followed the wandering in the wilderness for 38 years. Then they came again to H. (xxi. 3), i.e. the place under the ban (Lev. xxvii. 28, 29), devoted to destruction. "Zephath" is compared with es Sefith on the S.E. frontier of Canaan, the pass by which Israel probably ascended from the Et Th desert and the Arabah. Rowlands however identifies it with Subith where are extensive ruins, and near is a ruined fortress El Meskerijeh, the presumed site of the "watchtower." The site suggested in the Speaker's Comm. is some miles E. of Sebith, viz. Rakhmah, an anagram of H., the more permanent name. Israel marching N.N.W. from the Arabah, past Rakhmah or H., would come to the wide plain, es Sir, the "Seir" of Dent. i. 44. Twenty miles' farther march would have brought them to Arad royal city (Num. xxi. 1); but before they could reach it the king drove them back to H. Num. xv., xvi., xvii., xviii., xix. belong to the dreary period of the 38 years' wandering after a year spent at Sinai; xx. presents them at the same point they started from 38 years before, Kadesh, in the 40th year; xxi. introduces Arad assailing Israel and taking prisoners, then defeated by Israel in answer to prayer, and H. utterly destroyed. Israel not wishing to remain there marched S.E. The Canaanites reoccupied the place and restored it under the old name Zephath. Not till northern Canaan was subdued did Israel reach it again in the extreme S., and Joshua conquered the king. Finally under the judges Judah and Simeon consummated the ban of Moses and his contemporaries on it, so that henceforth its name was permanently H. This sets aside the objection to Num. xiv. 45 and xxi. 3 as if these passages were post-Mosaic because of Jud. i. 17.

Hörn = queren. Trumpets were perhaps at first merely horns perforated at the tip. In Josh. vi. 4, 5, instead of "trumpets of rams' horns," transl. "jahilee trumpets." Rams' horns would scarcely have been effective enough. Hajabael, from jabal "to stream violently with noise," is the name for a long wind instrument like a horn. Used for summoning to war, or for public proclamations (Jud. iii. 27, vii. 18). The horn was also used for a flush to contain oil (1 Sam. xvi. 1); also to contain stibium or antimony to beautify the eyelashes and eyelids of women; whence Job's daughter drew her name Keren-hapach, "horn of stibium," in contrast to Job's "horn dabbled in the dust" formerly (Job xvi. 15).

The "horn" being the instrument of the oxen's strength is the symbol of power (1 Kings xii. 11). The "horns of the ALTAR" [see] were simply projections from the four corners. The peak of a hill is called a horn. Isa. v. 1, "a very fruitful hill," Heb. "a horn of the son of oil," as the Swiss Shreckhorn, Wetterhorn, Celtic cairn. In Hab. iii. 4, "He had horns coming out of His hand" means, He had the emblems of power wielded by His hand (L. de Dieu), or else "rays" (i.e. lightning): Ps. xviii. 8 (Maurer). So Ex. 1, xxxiv. 29, Ex. 30, 35, quarana, "to horn," is used in the sense to emit rays. Livingstone mentions a horn-shaped cap as worn by Africans; married Druse women wear on the head silver horns.

ORIENTAL HORN.

The ram with two horns (Dan. viii. 3) represents the Medo-Persian double power. The "notable horn" of the "he goat" (ver. 5) is Alexander the Great who on coins is represented with horns. The four horns in Zech. i. 18 represent the four ruling powers of the world, to be superseded finally by Messiah's kingdom: Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome. [On "the little horn" of the third and of the fourth world powers (Dan. vii. 8, viii. 9) see ANTI-CRIST.] On Egyptian and Roman coins, and in Assyrian sculptures, are figures of gods with horns, symbolical of power. "A horn of salvation" means a mighty instrument of salvation (Luke i. 69).

Hornet: tzire'ah. Whence Zorah is named (Josh. xv. 33). In Exod. xliii. 28, "I will send hornets before thee, which shall drive out the Hivite," etc., is perhaps figurative for I will send terror on them (Josh. ii. 11, Deut. ii. 25), so that they will flee as if before a swarm of hornets. So "bees" (Deut. i. 41, Ps. cxviii. 12).

Horonaim = two caverns. Gave their name to a town of Moab (Isa. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 3, 5, 24). On an eminence from which there was a "descent." Ptolemy's "Avara" is identified with H. Sanballat, the opponent of the rebuilding of the Jerusalem wall (Neh. iv. 7, ii. 10), was an Horonite.

Horse. In Scripture used for warlike purposes, not agriculture (except in treading out corn for threshing, Isa. xxviii. 28, where for "horsemen" transl. "horses"). Job's magnificent description refers to the war horse (xxxix. 19-25), "hast thou clothed his neck with thunder?" i.e. with the power of inspiring terror. Rather "with majesty" (Umbreit), "with quivering mane" (Maurer). The Gr. connection between maue (phobe) and terrore (phobos) favours A. V. which is more poetic. "Canst thou make him afraid (rather 'make him spring') as a grasshopper?" S. in Joel ii. 4 war horses are compared to locusts. Their heads are so like that the Italian for "locust" is cavalletta, "little horse." "The glory of his nostrils is terrible: he paweth in the valley and rejoiceth in strength," he goeth on," etc.; "he swalloweth the ground with fierceness," i.e. draws it in fierce impatience towards him with his hoof, as if he would "swallow" it. "Neither believeth he (for joy) that it is the sound of the trumpet," rather "he will not stand still at the sound." "He smith among the trumpets, Ha, ha!" his mettlesome neighing expressing his eagerness for battle, which "he smelleth," sniffeth, i.e. discerneth, "the thunder (i.e. thundering voice) of the captains." [See CHARIOT.] The ass is the emblem of peace.

The bride is compared to "a company of horses in Pharaoh's chariots" (S. of Sol. i. 9), viz. in ardour and beauty (ver. 4, "run"; 5, "comely"), and in forming "a company" militant, orderly, and numerous (Rev. xix. 7, 14). The qualities which seemed prominent in the enemy Pharaoh's hosts at the Red Sea really belonged to Israel. Maurer transl. "I compare thee to my mare in chariots (i.e. received from) Pharaoh," but the plural "chariots" requires the collective sense "a company of horses." The "cutting off of the horse from Jerusalem" prophetically symbolises the cessation of war (Zech. ix. 10). Not the horse's speed or utility but his "strength" is his characteristic in Scripture (Ps. xxxiii. 17).

Two names are used in Heb., both Persian in origin: sus from Susa, and parash from Pares. The sus was of stronger make, used for the war chariot; the parash more for riding. Perhaps in Exod. xiv. 9 "horsemen" mean "chariot riders."

EGYPTIAN CHARIOT.

Certainly no Egyptian monument represents horsemen. Transl. 1 Kings iv. 26, "forty (rather 'four,' a copyist's error, as 2 Chron. ix. 25 proves. Also 1400 chariots suit 4000 horses, two horses for each chariot and a reserve horse: i. 14, 1 Kings x. 26) thousand chariot horses and twelve thousand riding (i.e. cavalry) horses"; Ezek. xxvii. 14, "with (chariot) horses and riding horses" (A. V. "horsemen").

Isa. xli. 7, "a chariot with a couple of horsemen"; rather "a cavalcade of horsemen riding in pairs." In 1 Kings iv. 28, Esth. viii. 14, Mic. i. 13, rekesh "dromedary"; rather "a courser," a "racehorse," for such purposes as the royal post. In 1 Kings x. 28, 29, the sense seems that the Egyptians regularly brought horses to a mart in S. Palestine (LXX. and Vulg. name the mart in their transl. of the Heb. Koa. In A. V. Mid-Kesh is transl. "linen yarn") and handed them to the king's dealers at a fixed price, 150 shekels for one horse, 600 for a chariot, including its two draught horses and one reserve horse.

In Gen. xii. 15 horses are not mentioned among the possessions which Abram acquired during his sojourn in Egypt. But in xlvii. 17 they stand foremost among the Egyptians' possessions. The greater intercourse latterly of Egypt with Canaanite and Arab nomads accounts for the introduction of horses. The camel, one of Abram's possessions in Egypt, is not mentioned in Joseph's time nor on the Egyptian monuments. Their early possession of the desert of Sinai makes it certain they knew and must have used the camel there, "the ship of the desert," but they avoid mentioning it as being unclean. Saddles were not used till a late period. Horses' hoofs hard "as flint" were a good point in days when shoeing was unknown (Isa. v. 28). White horses were emblematic of victory (Rev. vi. 2, xix. 11, 14). Horses were consecrated to the sun, since that luminary was supposed to drive a fiery chariot through the sky (2 Kings xxiii. 11). They were driven in procession to meet the rising sun.

Horseleach (Prov. xxi. 15). Typifying rapacious and cruel covetousness. The "two daughters" who come out of her are the two words "give," "give" (see ver. 14). Aluqaah, from an unused Heb. root, "adhere."

Hosah. 1. A city of Asher (Josh. xiv. 29) on Israel's border next Tyre. 2. One of David's first doorkeepers ("porters") to the ark on its reaching Jerusalem (1 Chron. xvi. 38). A Merarite Levite (xxvi. 10, 11, 16) having charge at the "gate Shallecheth" and the ascending causeway.

Hosanna. "Save we pray": the multitude's cry at Christ's triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Matt. xxi. 9, 15; Mark xi. 9, 10; John xii. 13). Taken from Ps. cxviii. which they were wont to recite at the feast of tabernacles in "the great Hallel" (Ps. cxiii.—cxviii.), in responses with the priest, whilst they waved willow and palm branches with rejoicings. The seventh or last day of the feast was called "the Great Hosanna." The houghs too were called hosannas. They often transferred the joyous usages of this feast to other occasions of gladness, as that of our Lord's approach in triumph to His capital. [See FEASTS, on the prophetic significance of the Hosanna cry and the feast of tabernacles which is especially associated with consummated salvation.] Heb. ix. 28, Rev. vii. 9, 10: Israel shall join the Hosanna cry and say, "Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord" (Luke xix. 38, xlii. 35; Ps. cxviii. 25, 26; Isa. xlii. 1-3).

Hosea. Placed first of the minor prophets in the canon (one collective whole "the book of the prophets," Acts vii. 42), probably because of the length, vivid earnestness, and patriotism of his prophecies, as well as their resemblance to those of the greater prophets. Chronologically Jonah was before him, 862 B.C., Joel about 810 B.C., Amos 790 B.C., H. 784 to 722 B.C., more or less contemporary with Isaiah and Amos. Began prophesying in the last years of Jeroboam II., contemporary with Uzziah; ended at the beginning of Hezekiah's reign. The prophecies of his extant are only those portions of his public teachings which the Holy Spirit preserved, as designed for the benefit of the universal church. His name means salvation. Son of Beeri, of Issachar; born in Bethshemesh. His pictures of Israelite life, the rival factions calling in Egypt and Assyria, mostly apply to the inter-reign after Jeroboam's death and to the succeeding reigns, rather than to his able government. In ii. 8 he makes no allusion to Jehovah's restoration of Israel's coasts under Jeroboam among Jehovah's mercies to Israel. He mentions in the inscription, besides the reign of Jeroboam in Israel, the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, though his prophecies are addressed primarily to Israel and only incidentally to Judah; for all the prophets whether in Judah or Israel regarded Israel's separation from Judah, civil as well as religious, as an apostasy from God who promised the kingship of the theocracy to the line of David. Hence Elijah in Israel took twelve stones to represent Judah as well as Israel (1 Kings xviii. 31). Eichhorn sees a Samaritanism in the masc. suffix of the second person (ok).

STYLE AND SUBJECT. Abrupt, sententious, and unpolitic, he is the more weighty and impressive. Brevity causes obscurity, the obscurity being designed by the Spirit to call forth prayerful study. Connecting particles are few. Changes of person, and anomalies of gender, number, and construction, abound. Horsley points out the excessively local and individual tone of his prophecies. He specifies Ephraim, Mizpah, Tabor, Gilgal, Bethel or Bethaven, Jezreel, Gibeah, Ramah, Gilead, Shechem, Lebanon, Arbela. Israel's sin, chastisement, and restoration are his theme. His first prophecy announces the coming overthrow of Jehu's house, fulfilled after Jeroboam's death, which the prophecy precedes, in Zachariah. Jeroboam's son, who was the fourth and last in descent from Jehu, and conspired against by Shallum after a six months' reign (2 Kings xv. 12). The allusion to Shalmaneser's expedition against Israel as past, i.e. the first inroad against Hoshea whose reign began only four years before Hezekiah's, accords with the inscription which extends his prophesying to the reign of Hezekiah (2 Kings xvii. 1, 3, xviii. 9). He declares throughout that a return to Jehovah is the only remedy for the evils existing and impending: the calf worship at Bethel, established by Jeroboam, must be given up (viii. 5, 6; x. 5; xiii. 2); unrighteousness towards men, the necessary consequence of impiety towards God, must cease, or sacrifices are worthless (iv. 2, vi. 6, based on Samuel's original maxim, 1 Sam. xv. 22). The pentateuch is the foundation of his prophecies. Here as there God's past favours to Israel are made the incentive to loving obedience (ii. 8, xi. 1, xii. 9, xiii. 4, comp. Exod. xx. 2). Literal fornication and adultery follow close upon spiritual (iv. 12-14). Assyria, the great northern power, which Israel foolishly regards as her friend to save her from her acknowledged calamities, H. foresees will be her destroyer (v. 13, vii. 11, viii. 9, xii. 1, xiv. 3, iii. 4, x. 6, xi. 11). Political makeshifts to remedy moral corruption only hasten the disaster which they seek to avert; when the church leans on the world in her distress, instead of turning to God, the world the instrument of her sin is made the instrument of her punishment. H. is driven by the nation's evils, present and in prospect, to cling the more closely to God. Amidst his rugged abruptness soft and exquisite touches occur, where God's loving-kindness, balmy as the morning sun and genial as the rain, stands in contrast to Israel's goodness, evanescent as the cloud and the early dew (vi. 3, 4; comp. also xiii. 3, xiv. 5-7).

DIVISIONS. There are two leading ones: i.—iii., iv.—xiv. Chaps. i., ii., iii., form three separate cantos or parts, for chaps. i. and iii. are more prose than poetry. Probably H. himself under the Spirit combined his scattered prophecies into one collection. Chaps. iv.—xiv. are an expansion of iii.

On his marriage to GOMER [see] Henderson thinks that there is no hint of its being in vision, and that she fell into lewdness after her union with H., thus fitly symbolising Israel who lapsed into spiritual whoredom after the marriage contract with God on Sinai. But an act revolting to a pure mind would hardly be ordained by God save in vision, which serves all the purposes of a vivid and as it were acted prophecy. So the command to Ezekiel (iv. 4-15). Moreover it would require years for the birth of three children, which would weaken the force of the symbol. In order effectively to teach others H. must experimentally realize it himself (xii. 10). Gomer, daughter of Diblaim, was probably one associated with the lascivious rites of the prevalent idolatries. H.'s union in vision with such an one in spite of his natural repugnance would vividly impress the people with God's amazing love in uniting Himself to so polluted a nation. H.'s taking her back after adultery (chap. iii.), at the price of a slave, marks Israel's extreme degradation and Jehovah's unchangeable love yet about to restore her. The truth expressed by prophetic act in vision was Israel's idolatry (spiritual impurity, "a wife of whoredoms") before her call in Egypt and in Ur of the Chaldees (Josh. xxiv. 14) as well as after it. So also the Saviour took out of an unholty world the church, that He might unite her in holiness to Himself.

No more remarkable prophecy exists of Israel's anomalous and extraordinary state for thousands of years, and of her future restoration, than iii. 4, 5: "Israel shall abide many days without a king (which they so craved for originally), without a sacrifice (which their law requires as essential to their religion), without an image . . . ephod . . . teraphim (which they were in H.'s days so mad after). Afterward shall Israel return and seek the Lord their God, and David their king . . . in the latter days."

But first must come her spiritual probation in the wilderness of trial (ii. 14) and her return to the Egypt of affliction (viii. 13, ix. 3), not literal "Egypt" (xi. 5).

The later prophets also stamp with their inspired sanction H.'s prophecies, which they quote. Comp. i. 11 with Isa. xi. 12, 13; iv. 3 with Zeph. i. 3; iv. 6 with Isa. v. 13; vii. 10 with Isa. ix. 12, 13; x. 12 with Jer. iv. 3.

HOSHAIAH. 1. Neh. xii. 32. 2. Jer. xlii. 1, xliii. 2.

HOSHAMA. Son of Jehoiachin, or Jeconiah (1 Chron. iii. 18). In Jehoiachin's capture by Nebuchadnezzar his mother and wives are mentioned, but not his sons (2 Kings xxiv. 12, 15), and he is doomed to be "childless" in Jer. xxii. 30. Either there is confusion of the genealogies in 1 Chron. iii., or, as Matt. i. 12 says "Jeconias begat Salathiel," by "childless" Jeremiah means he should have no literal heir to the throne, as Jeremiah adds, "no man of his seed shall prosper . . . sitting upon the throne of David."

Hoshea. Nineteenth and last king of Israel. Succeeded Pekah, whom he conspired against and slew, (fulfilling Isa. vii. 16.) 737 B.C., "in the 20th year of Jotham," i.e. 20th after Jotham became sole king (2 Kings xv. 30, 33). An interregnum elapsed of eight years before H. mounted the throne, 729 B.C., the 12th year of Ahaz (2 Kings xvii. 1-3, xviii. 9). "He did evil in the sight of Jehovah, but not as the kings of Israel before him." Tiglath Pileser had carried off the golden calf from Dan, and Shalmaneser from Bethel, in his first invasion (xv. 29, Hos. x. 14). So he had not the same temptation to calf worship as his predecessors. Hezekiah's piety probably in the last years of his reign influenced him.

Shalmaneser cruelly stormed Beth-el, and made H. tributary. But H. secretly made alliance with So or Sabaoh, king of Egypt (of an Ethiopian dynasty, the 25th of Manetho, Shebek I. in the hieroglyphics, 725 B.C.), and ceased to bring tribute. "Shalmaneser" therefore invaded Israel and shut up H. in Samaria, and after a siege of upwards of two years (not "three" full years, for it began in H.'s seventh and ended in his ninth year of reign) "the king of Assyria," Sargon, Shalmaneser's successor, who usurped the throne (according to the Assyrian monuments), took him and "bound him in prison" (2 Kings xvii. 4-6), the sixth year of Hezekiah's reign, 722 B.C. H.'s imprisonment was not before the capture of Samaria, but the sacred writer first records the eventual fate of H. himself, then details the invasion as it affected Samaria and Israel. His speedy removal is graphically depicted (Hos. x. 7); "as for Samaria her king is cut off as the foam upon the water." Sargon in the Assyrian inscriptions thus writes: "Samaria I looked at, I captured; 27,280 men (or families) who dwelt in it I carried away; I appointed a governor over them, and continued the tribute of the former people": like Julius Caesar's memorable "I came, I saw, I conquered." So exactly Isa. xxviii. 4 describes the eager absorption of Samaria by Shalmaneser and Sargon "as the luscious fruit (the early fig, hikkurash, a great delicacy) before 'the summer, when he that looketh upon it seeth, while it is yet in his hand, he catcheth it up." Sargon in the inscriptions describes his transporting prisoners from Babylon to "the land of the Hittites" (Samaria), exactly as 2 Kings xvii. 24.

Hoshea = Joshua. 1. Deut. xxxii. 44. Num. xiii. 8. Oshea = salvation. JAH added makes it Joshua, i.e. Jehovah's salvation. 2. 1 Chron. xxvii. 20. 3. Neh. x. 23.

Hospitality. The law as to strangers and the poor encouraged it (Lev. xix. 33, 34, xxv. 14, 15, 23, etc.; Deut. xv. 7). Exemplified in Abraham, Gen. xviii.; Lot, xix.; Renel, Exod. ii. 20; Manoah, Jud. xiii. 15; the old man of Gibeah (its inhospitality is instanced as a sign of how lost to all right feeling its people were), xix. 17-21. The Lord Jesus illustrates it in the good Samaritan, promises to reward it, and regards its exercise towards His disciples as being towards Himself, and will count it as one proof of the love whose crowning joy shall be the invitation, "Come ye blessed of My Father," etc. (Luke x. 30-37; Matt. x. 42, xxv. 43). The apostles urge the duty (Rom. xii. 13; 1 Tim. v. 10, iii. 2; Tit. i. 8; Heb. xiii. 2; 1 Pet. iv. 9).

Hotham. 1 Chron. vii. 32.

Hothan. 1 Chron. xi. 44.

Hothir. 1 Chron. xxv. 4, 28.

Hour. [See DAY.] Abaz's sun dial implies the Jews' acquaintance with hours before the Babylonian captivity. During it, they would certainly meet with that division of time which prevailed for ages at Babylon.

The Egyptians too in early times knew it. Lepsius says as far back as the 5th dynasty. Astronomers knew anciently the "hour," that is the 24th part of a civil day; its use in common life is said not to have begun till the fourth century A.D. The hour which is the 12th part of the natural day, between sunrise and sunset, is of the same length as the astronomical hour only at the equinoxes. In our Lord's days the Jews must have had dials, and clepsydrae or water hour-glasses, as these were long known to the Persians with whom they had been so closely connected. Christ alludes to the day hours, John xi. 9, "are there not twelve hours in the day?" The 3rd, 6th, and 9th are mentioned often as the regular hours of prayer (Acts ii. 15 iii. 1, x. 9).

House. Known to man as early at least as Cain; the hut not till Abel, the fifth in descent from Cain (Gen. iv. 7, 17, 20). The rude wigwam and the natural cave were the abodes of those who, being scattered abroad, subsequently degenerated from the primitive civilization implied in the elaborate structure of Babel (Gen. xi. 3, 31). It was from a land of houses that Abram, at God's call, became a dweller in tents (Gen. xii. 1, Heb. xi. 9). At times he still lived in a house (Gen. xvii. 27); so also Isaac (xxvii. 15), and Jacob (xxxiii. 15). In Egypt the Israelites resumed a fixed life in permanent houses, and must have learned architectural skill in that land of stately edifices. After their wilderness sojourn in tents they entered into possession of the Canaanite goodly cities.

The parts of the eastern house are (1) The porch; not referred to in the O. T. save in the temple and Solomon's palace (1 Kings vii. 6, 7; 2 Chron. xv. 8; Ezek. xl. 7, 16); in Egypt (whence he derived it) often it consisted of a double row of pillars; in Jud. iii. 23 the Heb. word (the front hall) is different. The porch of the highpriest's palace (Matt. xvi. 71; pulon, which is transl. "gate" in Acts x. 17, xii. 14, xiv. 13, Rev. xxi. 12) means simply the gate. The five porches of Bethesda (John v. 2) were cloisters or a colonnade for the use of the sick. (2) The court is the chief feature of every eastern house. The passage into it is so contrived that the court cannot be seen from the street outside. An awning from one wall to the opposite shelters from the heat; this is the image, Ps. civ. 2, "who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain."

At the side of the court opposite the entrance was the (3) guest chamber (Luke xxii. 11, 12), Heb. lshkah, from lshak to recline; where Samuel received his guests (1 Sam. ix. 22). Often open in front, and supported by a pillar; on the ground floor, but raised above the level. A low divan goes round it, used for sitting or reclining by day, and for placing beds on by night. In the court the palm and olive were planted, whence the psalmist writes, "I am like a green olive tree in the house of God"; an olive tree in a house would be a strange image to us, but suggestive to an eastern of a home with refreshing shade and air. So Ps. xcii. 13, "those that be planted in the house of the Lord shall flourish in the courts of our God." Contrast the picture of Edom's desolation, "thorns in the palaces, nettles and brambles in the fortresses . . . a court for owls" (Isa. xxiv. 13).

(4) The stairs. Outside the house, so that Elud could readily escape after slaying Egion (Jud. iii. 23), and the bearers of the paralytic, unable to get to the door, could easily mount by the outside stairs to the roof, and, breaking an opening in it, let him down in the midst of the room where Jesus was (Mark ii. 4). The Israelite captains placed Jehu upon their garments on the top of the stairs, as the most public place, and from them proclaimed "Jehu is king" (2 Kings ix. 13).

(5) The roof is often of a material which could easily be broken up, as it was by the paralytic's friends: sticks, thorn bushes (bellan), with mortar, and marl or earth. A stone roller is kept on the top to harden the flat roof so that rain may not enter. Amusement, business, conversation (1 Sam. ix. 25), and worship (Acts x. 9) are carried on here, especially in the evening, as a pleasant and cool retreat (2 Sam. xi. 2) from the narrow filthy streets of an eastern town. Transl. 1 Sam. ix. 26, "about day-break Samuel called (from below, within the house, up) to Saul upon the top (or roof) of the house (where Saul was sleeping upon the balcony, comp. 2 Kings iv. 10). Rise up," etc. On the flat roof it was that Rahab spread the flax to dry, hiding the spies (Josh. ii. 6). Here, in national calamities, the people retired to bewail their state (Isa. xiv. 3, Jer. xlviii. 38); here in times of danger they watched the foe advancing (Isa. xxi. 1, "thou art wholly gone up to the housetops"), or the bearer of tidings approaching (2 Sam. xviii. 24, 33). On the top of the upper chamber, as the highest point of the house, the kings of Judah made idolatrous altars to the sun and heavenly hosts (2 Kings xxiii. 12; Jer. xiv. 13, xxxiii. 20). Retributively in kind, as they burnt incense to Baal the god of fire, the Chaldeans should burn the houses, the scene of his worship, with fire (Zeph. i. 5). On the top of the house the tent was spread for Absalom's incestuous act with his father's concubines, to show the breach with David was irreparable (2 Sam. xvi. 21, 22). On the housetop publicly the disciples should proclaim what Jesus privately taught them (Matt.

PRAYING ON THE HOUSETOP.

x. 27, Luke xii. 3). Here Peter in prayer saw the vision (Acts x. 9). From the balustraded east roof of Dagon's temple the 3000 Philistines witnessed Samson's feats (Jud. xvi. 27). By pulling down the two central pillars on which in front the roof rested, he pulled down the whole edifice. Here the people erected their booths for the feast of tabernacles (Neh. viii. 16). The partly earth materials gave soil for grass to spring in rain, speedily about to wither, because of the shallowness of soil, under the sun's heat like the sinner's evanescent prosperity (2 Kings xix. 26; Ps. cxxix. 6). Though pleasant in the cool evening and night, at other times the housetop would be anything but pleasant; so "it is better to dwell in a corner of the housetop (though there exposed to wind, rain, heat, and cold) than with a brawling woman in a wide house" (a house of community, i.e. shared with her) (Prov. xxi. 9). (6) The "inner chamber." 1 Kings xx. 30, xxii. 25 should be transl. (fleeing) "from chamber to chamber." The "guest chamber" was often the uppermost room (Gr. hyperoon, Heb. 'atliyah), a loft upon the roof (Acts i. 13, ix. 37, xx. 8, 9), the pleasantest room in the house. Entychus from "the third loft" fell down into the court. Little chambers surround the courtyard, piled upon one another, the half roof of the lower forming a walking terrace of the higher, to which the ascent is by a ladder or flight of steps. Such "a little chamber" the Shunammite woman made (built) "on the wall" of the house for Elisha (2 Kings iv. 10, comp. 1 Kings xvii. 19). Ahaziah fell down from such an "upper chamber" with a projecting latticed window (2 Kings i. 2). The "summer house" was generally the upper room, the "winter house" was the lower room of the same house (Jer. xxxvi. 22, Amos iii. 15); or if both were on the same floor the "summer house" was the outer, the "winter house" the inner apartment. An upper room was generally over gateways (2 Sam. xviii. 33). Poetically, "Go! layeth the beams of His upper chambers (Heb.) in the waters," whence "He watereth the hills" (Ps. civ. 3, 13).

(7) Fireplaces are seldom in the houses; but firepans in winter heated the apartment. Jer. xxxvi. 22 transl. "the stove (a brazen vessel, with charcoal) was burning before him." Chimneys were few (Hos. xiii. 3), simple orifices in the wall, both admitting the light and emitting the smoke. Kitchens are first mentioned in Ezek. xlvi. 23, 24. A fire was sometimes burned in the open court (Luke xxii. 55, 56, 61); Peter warmed himself at such a fire, when Jesus on His trial in the large hall, open in front to the court, with arches and a pillar to support the wall above, "turned and looked" on him. Cellars often were made under the ground floor for storage, "secret chambers" (Matt. xxiv. 20). Sometimes the granary was "in the midst of the house" (2 Sam. iv. 6).

(8) The cisterns cut in the limestone rock are a leading feature in the houses at Jerusalem, varying from 4 to 30 ft. in breadth, 8 to 30 in length, 12 to 20 in depth. Almost every house has one, and some as many as four. The rain water is conducted from the roofs into them. Hence the inhabitants within Jerusalem never suffered from want of water in the longest sieges, whereas the besiegers have often suffered. So Neh. ix. 25, "cisterns hewn" marg., comp. 2 Kings xviii. 31, 2 Chron. xxvi. 10 marg., "Uzziah cut out many cisterns." Israel's forsaking God for earthly trusts is called a "forsaking of the fountain of living waters" for "broken cisterns that can hold no water" (Jer. ii. 13). Prov. v. 15, "drink waters out of thine own cistern," means, enjoy thine own wife's love, seek none else. So the heavenly spouse is called "a fountain sealed" (S. of Sol. iv. 12).

(9) The foundation was an object of great care. "Great stones" were brought for that of the temple. Often they dug down to the rock and by arches (though not mentioned in Scripture, Ezek. xl. 16 should be transl. "porches") built up to the surface. Metaphorically, man's foundation is in the dust (Job iv. 10). The wise man digs down to the rock (Luke vi. 48), hearing and doing Christ's sayings. Christ is the only foundation (1 Cor. iii. 11, etc.). The apostles become "foundations" only by identification with Him, confessing and building themselves and others on Him (Eph. ii. 20). Simon became the "rock" by identifying himself with Him; but when he identified himself with "Satan" in his dislike of the cross, Jesus called him so (Matt. xvi. 16-19, 22, 23).

(10) The windows were small and latticed, in the absence of glass. Metaphorically the eyes, looking out from the eyelids which open and shut like the casement of a window (Eccles. xii. 3). Christ "looketh forth at the windows . . . showing Himself through the lattice," the types and prophecies were lattice glimpses of Him to the O. T. church (S. of Sol. ii. 9, John viii. 56). The legal "wall of partition" was only removed by Christ's death (Heb. x. 20). Even still He shows Himself only to faith, through the windows of His word and the lattice of ordinances and sacraments (John xiv. 21), not full vision (1 Cor. xiii. 12); an incentive to our looking for His coming in person (Isa. xxxiii. 17).

(11) The walls being often of mud can be easily dug through by a robber (Job iv. 19, xiv. 16, xv. 28). When deserted they soon become "heaps." So hopes of peace with God which rest on no scriptural promises are like walls built with untempered mortar (tapheel) (Ezek. xiii. 10-16). The mortar with which the leper's house was to be replastered is appropriately (as leprosy would mostly appear among the poor) called "mud mortar" (aphar) (Lev. xiv. 42). In many houses the cattle are in a lower part of the same dwelling (Gen. xxiv. 32, 1 Sam. xxviii. 24, Luke ii. 7).

Drafted or bevelled stones with a rustic boss are not, as was supposed, peculiar to Jewish architecture; but stones of enormous length (as in the Haram wall, and in the base of the tower of David) compared to their height generally are. Roman work on the contrary has often the height greater than the length.

Hukkuk. On the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 34). Now Yakuk, a village W. of the upper end of the sea of Galilee. Tradition places here Habakkuk's tomb.

Hul. Aram's second son (Gen. x. 23). Colossyria may have come from Chul or Hul. Else, And el Huleh near the Jordan's source. Else Golan, Djulan.

Huldah. The prophetess consulted by JOSHUA [see] when HILKIAH [see] found the law. Wife of Shallum, keeper of the wardrobe; living in the suburbs [see COLLEGE] of Jerusalem.

Humtah. A city of Judah in the mountain district (Josh. xv. 54).

Hupham: HUPHAM. Gen. xvi. 21; 1 Chron. vii. 12, 15; Num. xxvi. 38, 39.

Huppah. 1 Chron. xxiv. 13.

Hur=hole. 1. Exod. xxxi. 2-5; 1 Chron. ii. 5, 19, 20, 50, 51; iv. 1, 4. Josephus makes him husband of Miriam (?), Ant. iii. 3, § 4. With Aaron H. held up Moses' hands in the battle with Amalek (Exod. xvii. 10-12). Again with Aaron had charge of the people in Moses' absence on mount Sinai, as his representative (xxiv. 14). "The father (founder) of Bethlehem," which as late as the 13th century A.D. was famed for tapestry weaving, the art for which Bezaleel his grandson was famed. Jesse was said to have woven veils of the sanctuary.

2. Fourth of the five Midianite kings slain with Balak after the affair of Peor (Num. xxxi. 8). These "princes" were "dukes (i.e. vassals) of Sihon king of the Amorites" (Josh. xiii. 21). Sihon "had fought against the former king of Moab, and taken all his land" (Num. xxi. 26). So Balak was not hereditary king, but probably a Midianite; as Zipor, i.e. a bird, is like the Midianite names Oreb "crow," Zeeb "wolf"; imposed upon Moab as king by Sihon. 3. 2 Kings iv. 8, marg. Benhur. 4. Neh. iii. 9.

Huram. 1 Chron. viii. 5. [See HIRAM.]

Huri. 1 Chron. v. 14.

Hushai. 1 Chron. iv. 4. Of Judah.

Hushai. "The Archite" (Josh. xvi.

2; Archi, or Erech, belonging to the children of Joseph, on the S. bound of Ephraim, between Bethel and Ataroth). "Friend," "companion" or privy councillor of David. Probably aged, as David says (2 Sam. xv. 32-34, 37; xvi. 16; 1 Chron. xxvii. 33) "if thou passest on with me, thou shalt be a burden unto me" (comp. xix. 35). By DAVID'S [see] suggestion he returned to the city, and feigned to be now ABSALOM'S [see] friend, as he had been that of his father. The policy was crooked and dishonourable; but it was overruled to Absalom's ruin by adopting H.'s sinister counsel, rather than ANTHIOPEL'S [see] satanically wise advice. He voiced his treachery with religious hypocrisy, saluting Absalom twice with "God save the king," and justifying his seeming desertion of "his friend" David, which surprised even Absalom, with the pretence so flattering to Absalom's vanity, "nay, but whom Jehovah and this people and all Israel choose, his will I be"; i.e., Jehovah's choice and the whole people's is so clear, that I had no alternative left but to accept it as a matter of duty (!); and inspiring confidence by reminding him how faithfully he had served his father, and that "as I have served in thy father's presence, so will I be in thy presence." How little usurpers can trust the sincerity of their courtiers! God punished Absalom's own treachery to his father, and religious hypocrisy, in kind (2 Sam. xv. 7, 8). God does not sanction evil, and condemns those who "do evil that good may come," but allows evil to be punished by evil. H. spoke in hyperboles, as suited to the shallow man he was addressing, of the irresistible might with which the whole nation would light upon David "as the dew falleth on the ground," so that "of the men with him there should not be left so much as one." Fear of his father's valour, indecision, and vanity were all acted on by H.'s plausible counsel that, instead of pursuing David at once, Absalom should wait to collect all Israel, and lead them to battle in person. The counsel seemed safe, and at the same time gratified Absalom's boasting spirit. H. artfully assumed that all Israel "from Dan to Beersheba" would follow him; whereas it was much more likely that after the first surprise of the rebellion gave place to greater deliberation, a large force would gather round the rightful king. H. communicated Absalom's decision to Zadok and Abiathar, and these through Jonathan and Ahimaz to David. H. probably died before Solomon's reign, for Zadok son of Nathan was "the king's friend" under Solomon. But Bannah son of H. was a commissariat officer of Solomon in Asher and Aloth (1 Kings iv. 5, 16).

Husham. Gen. xxxvi. 24, 35.

Hushim. I. "Children of Dan" (Gen. xlv. 23); a clan, for the word is plural. In Num. xxvi. 42 SHUHAM. 2. 1 Chron. vii. 12. 3. 1 Chron. viii. 8, 11.

Husks. Gr. keratia ("horas"), the hornlike pods of the carob tree, abounding in Syria and Egypt, Ceratonia siliqua (Luke xv. 16). The sweet pithy pulp affords food for pigs, and also for very poor men. Tradition makes it the Baptist's food in the wilderness; whence it is called also St. John's bread. It is exported to England for feeding cattle.

Huz. Uz (Gen. xxii. 21).

Huzzab. Commonly represented as queen of Nineveh. Rather the Zab country, E. of the Tigris, watered by the upper and lower rivers, Zab Ala and Zab Asfal. A-diab-ene, the best part of Assyria representing the whole. The "Zab" is named in the inscription of Tiglath-Pileser I. in the 12th century B.C. (Nah. ii. 7.) Gesenius connects it with ver. 6, "the palace shall be dissolved, and shall flow away" (Henderson) "... though firmly established" (see marg.).

Hyena. Jer. xii. 9, "speckled bird." But LXX. "the hyena," in parallelism to the "lion" in ver. 8; tzabua the Arabic word for hyena corresponds. Zaboim (1 Sam. xiii. 18) means "the valley of hyenas." But the Heb. ai' j joined to it always means a bird; and "speckled" symbolises the blending of paganism with the utterly diverse, divinely ordained, law.

Hymenæus. "Having put away a god conscience," and so "concerning faith having made shipwreck" (for when one's faith does not better his morals, his moral defects will corrupt his faith), therefore "delivered (by Paul) to Satan to learn not to blaspheme" (1 Tim.

i. 20). "Erred concerning the truth, saying that the resurrection is past already, overthrowing the faith of some" (2 Tim. ii. 17, 18). Satan is lord of all outside the church (Acts xxvi. 18); he, by God's permission, afflicts saints and executes wrath on the disobedient (1 Cor. v. 5, 2 Cor. xii. 7, Eph. iv. 27, Job i. ii.). Paul, as an infallible apostle, had powers not transmitted to fallible successors (2 Cor. x. 8; Matt. xviii. 17, 18). His sentence pronounced at Rome took effect on H. at Ephesus, in the form of some bodily sickness (so Acts v. 5, 10, xiii. 11; 1 Cor. xi. 30), that he should learn not to blaspheme. [See EXCOMMUNICATION.] H. after excommunication was probably restored in the interim between 1 and 2 Tim., and troubled the church again.

Gnosticism, or the pretension to extraordinary spiritual knowledge above what is written, was H.'s heresy, in concert first with Alexander, afterwards with Philetus. The gnostics (2 Pet. iii. 16) "wrested Paul's words" (Rom. vi. 4, Eph. ii. 6, Col. ii. 12) as though the resurrection was merely the spiritual raising of souls from the death of sin (John v. 24, 25). The difficulties of the resurrection (Acts xvii. 32, xxvi. 8), the supposed evil inherent in matter, and the disparagement of the body, tended to this error (Col. ii. 23). Paul confutes this by showing that, besides the raising of the soul now from the death of sin, there shall be also hereafter a raising of the saint's body from the grave (John v. 28, 29), as the fruit of Jesus' bodily resurrection (1 Cor. xv.).

Hymns. Heb. tehillim: in direct praise to God (Acts vi. 25, Jas. v. 13). Not restricted to church worship; but used to exhilarate Christians in social parties. "Psalms," mizmor, were accompanied with an instrument, carefully arranged. "Songs," Gr. odai, Heb. shir, were joyous lyric pieces on sacred subjects; contrast the revelling, licentious songs of heathen feasts (Amos viii. 10). The accompaniment is the "melody of the heart," not the lyre. Tertullian (Apology, 39) records that at the lovefeasts (agape), after the water was furnished for the hands and the lights lit, according as any remembered Scripture or could compose (comp. 1 Cor. xiv. 26, improvised psalms), he was invited to sing praises to God for the general good. The heart is the seat of true psalmody, "singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord" (Col. iii. 16, Eph. v. 19). Some generally accepted confession, in the form of a hymn, appears in 1 Tim. iii. 16; the short unconnected sentences, with words similarly arranged, almost in the same number of syllables, the clauses in parallelism (the principle of Heb. versification) antithetically arranged, each two forming a pair which contrasts heaven and earth, the order reversed in each new pair, flesh and spirit, angels and Gentiles, world and glory; the first and the last clauses correspond, "manifested in the flesh ... received up into glory." So Pliny, i. 20, ep. 97: "the Christians are wont on a fixed day, before dawn, to meet and sing a hymn in alternate responses to Christ as God." Christ and His disciples sang a hymn after the passover and the Lord's supper (Matt. xxvi. 30, Mark xiv. 26). Probably it was the Great Hallel or paschal hymn, usually sung after the passover by the Jews, viz. Ps. cxiii.—cxviii.

Hyssop. ezob. Not our "hyssop," the Hyssopus officinalis, which is not found in Syria or Arabia. "The hyssop that springeth out of the wall," being the smallest of plants, can hardly be the one used for sprinkling, but is a tufted wall fern, a miniature hyssop with lance-shaped leaves (1 Kings iv. 33). Maimonides makes the sprinkling hyssop to be the marjoram (origanum) with long, straight stalk, downy leaf, and white blossom (Exod. xii.

22); common in Palestine and near mount Sinai; an aromatic plant. J. F. Royle thought that the caper plant (Capparis spinosa) meets all the requirements of Scripture: 1. It is found in Egypt, the desert, and Palestine. 2. It grows among stones and upon walls, and trails like a bumble, in contrast to the stately cedar of Lebanon (comp. Jud. ix. 15). 3. It has a long stick or stem (John xix. 20, comp. Matt. xxvii. 48) where-with the sponge of vinegar might be lifted to our Lord. 4. It has the requisites needed for purifying. Its Arab name asuf is akin to ezob. It is "a bright green creeper which climbs out of the fissures of the rocks" (Stanley). It is used medicinally for cleansing, as in ulcers, leprosy, etc. (Pliny H. N., 20, § 59). However, the "scarlet" band may have tied the hyssop on the cedar to make it convenient for sprinkling. LXX. and Heb. ix. 19 transl. ezob "hyssop." Maimonides says the legal hyssop was used as a condiment. Porphyry (De Abst., iv. 7) says the Egyptian priests ate it mixed with their bread; so the marjoram (scatur) is used in a mixture, dukkah, a food of the poorer classes (Lane, Mod. Eg., i. 200; Exod. xii. 22; Lev. xiv. 4, 51; Num. xix. 6, 18; Ps. li. 7). The reason why the soldiers presented to Christ a sponge attached to the end of a "reed" (calamus), with hyssop, was, as the vinegar would quench His thirst, so the aromatic scent of the hyssop would refresh Him. So it is associated with the fragrant "cedar wood" in Lev. xiv. 4, 6, 51. So that the Greek "hyssop" and the origanum or marjoram of the Jewish tradition seem the plant intended. Gesenius includes under ezob the hyssop of the shops, and other aromatic plants, mint, wild marjoram, etc.; so that a suitable sprinkler could be always found, whether in Jerusalem or the desert.

I

Ibhar. David's next son after Solomon (2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chron. iii. 6, xiv. 5); born in Jerusalem.

Ibleam. A city with dependent villages, belonging to Manasseh, yet situated in Asher or Issachar (probably the latter). [See GUR.] Near Jenin (Jud. i. 27, Josh. xvii. 11, 2 Kings ix. 27). Perhaps the BILEAM of 1 Chron. vi. 70 [which see, and GATHRIMMON].

Ibneiah. 1 Chron. ix. 2, 3, 8, 9. A chief man in Benjamin at their first settlement in Jerusalem.

Ibri. 1 Chron. xiv. 27. Elsewhere transl. "Hebrew."

Ibzan. Of Bethlehem (probably in Zebulun, as "Ephrathah" or "Judah" is not added, Josh. xix. 15). Judged Israel for seven years after Jephthah (Jud. xii. 8, 10). He took in 30 daughters in law from abroad for his 30 sons, and sent abroad (i.e. gave away in marriage) his 30 daughters, which is an additional reason for Phoenicians not Philistines having been his neighbours.

Ichabod = where is the glory? (1 Sam. iv. 19-22.) Born at the time of Israel's defeat by the Philistines, and his father Phinehas' death; named accordingly by his dying mother. "When she heard that the ark of God was taken, and that her father in law and her husband were dead, she bowed herself and travailed." In vain did the women by her cheer her, "Fear not, for thou hast borne a son." "She answered not, neither did she regard it." As in the case of her pious and patriotic father in law, Eli, the overwhelming sorrow that caused her death was "because the ark of God was taken," hence this is thrice repeated. She felt God's presence is a nation's only true "glory" (Jer. ii. 11; Ps. lxxviii. 61, cvi. 20; Hos. ix. 12).

Iconium. Now Konieh, N. of mount Taurus, in the central table land of Asia Minor, Lycaonia. On the route between western Asia and Ephesus on one side, and Tarsus, Antioch, and Ephraim on the other. An admirable centre for missionary labours, as several great roads intersected one another here. Paul with Barnabas first visited it from Antioch in Pisidia which lay on the W. (Acts xiii. 50, 51; xiv. 1, 21, 22.) They preached in the synagogue first, as was Paul's wont, and with such power of the Holy Spirit "that a great multitude both of Jews and also of Greeks believed." The Lord attested "the word of His grace," moreover, with "signs and wonders done by their hands," whilst "they abode long time speaking boldly in the Lord." But the unbelieving Jews stirred up the Gentiles so as to be "evil affected against the brethren." An assault of Jews and Gentiles with their rulers, to stone them, being threatened, they withdrew to Lystra and Derbe in the eastern and wilder parts of Lycaonia. Paul revisited I. to "confirm their souls in the faith," and to remind them as a motive to continuing endurance that "we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God." In undesigned coincidence Paul incidentally alludes (2 Tim. iii. 11) to "persecutions, afflictions, which came unto me at Antioch, at I., at Lystra, what (how grievous) persecutions I endured . . . but out of them all the Lord delivered me." On his second missionary circuit Paul with Silas came from Syrian Antioch through Cilicia, and up through the Taurus passes into Lycaonia, and by Derbe and Lystra proceeded westward to I. (Acts xvi. 1-3.) In this neighbourhood he took Timothy as his associate, on the recommendation of the brethren at Lystra and I., and here probably took place Timothy's circumcision and ordination (1 Tim. i. 18, iv. 14, vi. 12; 2 Tim. i. 6).

Idalah. A city of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15).

Iddo. 1. 1 Kings iv. 14. 2. 1 Chron. vi. 21. ADAIAH in ver. 41, 39. 3. 1 Chron. xxvii. 21. 4. Yadoi or Yado. A "seer" whose "visions against Jeroboam the son of Nebat" contained notices of Solomon's life (2 Chron. ix. 29). His work "concerning genealogies" recorded "acts of Rehoboam" (xii. 15). His "story" or commentary recorded the "acts, ways, and sayings of Abijah" (xiii. 22). His writings doubtless are embodied in Chronicles, so far as the Spirit of God saw them suited to form part of the inspired word. Tradition identifies him with the "man of God" who denounced Jeroboam's calf altar at Bethel (1 Kings xiii.), which 2 Chron. ix. 29 favours; also with Oded which resembles his name (xv. 1). 5. Grandfather of Zechariah (i. 1, 7; Ezra v. 1, vi. 14, "son" here means grandson). Returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 1, 12, 16). 6. Chief of those who met at Casiphia to join in the second caravan returning under Ezra (viii. 17, 20) in the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, 458 B.C. Iddo was one of the 220 Nethinims who joined in the return.

Idol; idolatry. Of the 19 Heb. words for it and IMAGE many express the abhorrence which idolatry deserves and the shame and sorrow of the idolater. (1) Aren, "vanity," "nothingness," "wickedness," "sorrow" (Isa. lxxvi. 3, xli. 29; Deut. xxxii. 21; 1 Kings xvi. 13; Ps. xxxi. 6; Jer. viii. 19, x. 8; Zech. x. 2; 1 Sam. xv. 23). "Beth-el," the house of God, is named "Beth-aven," house of vanity, because of the calf worship. (2) Elil, either a contemptuous diminutive of El, God, godling; or from al "not," a "thing of naught." There is a designed contrast between the contemptible elilim and the Divine Elohim (Ps. xlvii. 7; Isa. xix. 3, "non-entities" marg. Ezek. xxx. 13). (3) Eemah, "terror," (Jer. i. 38) "they are mad after their idols," hideous forms more fitted to frighten than to attract, hushes to frighten children with. (4) Miphletzet, "a fright": Maachah's idol which Asa cut down (1 Kings xv. 13, 2 Chron. xv. 16); the phallus, symbol of the generative organ, the nature goddess Asherah's productive power. Jer. x. 2-5 graphically describes the making of an idol and its impotence. (5) Bosheth, "shame"; not merely shameful, but the essence of shame, bringing shame on its votaries and especially expressing the obscenity of Baal's and Baal Peor's worship (Jer. xi. 13, Hos. ix. 10). (6) Gillulim, from gal "a heap of stones" (Gese-nus): Ezek. xxx. 13, xvi. 36; Dent. xxxi. 17, "dungy gods" marg. (7) Shiquqim, ceremonial "unclean-ness" (Ezek. xxxvii. 23). The worshippers "became loathsome like their love," for men never rise above their object of worship; "they that make them are like unto them, so is every one that trusteth in them" (Ps. cxv. 4-8).

(8) Seemel, a "likeness" (Deut. iv. 16). (9) Tzelem, from tzel "a shadow" (Dan. iii. 1, 1 Sam. vi. 5), "the image" as distinguished from the demuth, "likeness," the exact counterpart (Gr. eikōn, Col. i. 15, Gen. i. 27). The "image" presupposes a prototype. "Likeness" (Gr. homoiosis) implies mere resemblance, not the exact counterpart and derivation, hence the Son is never called the "likeness" of the Father but the "Image" (1 Cor. xi. 7; John i. 18, xiv. 9; 2 Cor. iv. 4; 1 Tim. iii. 16, vi. 16; Heb. i. 3). The idol is supposed to be an "image" exactly representing some person or object. (10) Temunah, "similitude," "form" (Deut. iv. 12-19, where Moses forbids successively the several forms of Gentile idolatry: ancestor worship, as that of Terah (Josh. xxiv. 2), Laban (Gen. xxxi. 19, 30, 32), and Jacob's household (xxxv. 2-4), to guard against which Moses' sepulchre was hidden; hero worship and relic worship (Jud. viii. 27, xvii. 4; 2 Kings xviii. 4); nature worship, whether of the lower animals as in Egypt, or of the heavenly bodies, the sun, moon, and stars, as among the Persians). (11) Atzab, etzeb, otzeb, "a figure," from atzab "to fashion"; with the additional idea of sorrowful labour (Isa. xlviii. 5, Ps. cxxxix. 24), "see if there be any wicked way (way of pain, way of an idol, Isa. xlviii. 5) in me, and lead me in the way everlasting." The way of idolatry, however refined, proves to be a way of pain, and shuts out from the way everlasting (1 John v. 21, Rev. xxi. 8, 1 Cor. x. 20, 21).

Tacitus the Roman historian (Hist. v. 4) notices the contrast between Judaism and the whole heathen world, which disproves the notion that it borrowed from the latter and consecrated several of their rites. "The Jews conceive the Divinity as One, and to be understood only by the mind; they deem those profane who form any image of the gods, of perishable materials and after the likeness of men; the Divinity they describe as supreme, eternal, unchangeable, imperishable; hence there are no images in their cities or their temples, with these they would not flatter kings nor honour Cæsars." (12) Tzir, "a pang," also "a mould" or "shape" (Isa. xlv. 16). (13) Matzzebah, a "statue" set up (Jer. xliii. 13 marg.). Obelisks to the sun god at the city (house) of the sun, as Beth-shemesh or Heliopolis mean; "On" in Gen. xli. 45, 2 Kings iii. 2, x. 26, 27 marg. The "images" or standing columns of wood (subordinate gods worshipped at the same altar with Baal) are distinct from the standing column of stone or "image" of Baal himself, i.e. a conical stone sacred to him. The Phoenicians anointed stones (often arolates, as that "which fell down from Jupiter," sacred to Diana of Ephesus, Acts xix. 35) to various gods, like the stone anointed by Jacob (Gen. xxviii. 18, 22) at Beth-el, called therefore Betylia (comp. also xxxi. 45). The black pyramidal stone in Juggernaut's temple, that of Cybele at Pessinus in Galatia, the black stone in the Kaaba at Mecca reported to have been brought from heaven by the angel Gabriel, all illustrate the wide diffusion of this form of idolatry. So the lingam in daily use in the worship of Siva in Bengal, and the black stone daily anointed with perfumed oil in Benares. (14) Chammania, "sun images." The Arabic Chammas is the planet Mercury or Venus. The symbol of the Persian sun god was the sacred fire, Amanus or Omanus, Sanskrit homa (2 Chron. xxiv. 4, 7, xiv. 3, 5). Chamman is a synonym of Baal the sun god in the Phoenician and Palmyrene inscriptions, and so is applied to his statues or lofty, obelisk like, columns (Isa. xvii. 8, xxvii. 9 marg.). These "statues" are associated with the Asherim ("groves" A. V.), just as Baal is associated with Asherah or Astarte (1 Kings xiv. 23, marg. 2 Kings xxiii. 14). The Palmyrene inscription at Oxford is, "this chamman the sons of Malchu have dedicated to the sun." Ezek. vi. 4, 6: sun worship and Sabaeism or worship of the heavenly hosts (Saba-oth) was the oldest idolatry. Job, one of the oldest books in the Bible, alludes to it (xxxi. 23), "if I beheld the sun when it shined or the moon . . . and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand, this were an iniquity," etc. In opposition to this error God is called "Lord God of Sabaoth." The tower of Babel was probably built so that its top should be secret to the heavens, that its top should reach heaven, Gen. xi. 4, the common temple and idolatrous centre of union. The dispersion defeated the purpose of the builders, but still they carried with them the idolatrous tendency, attributing their harvests, etc., to the visible material causes, the sun, moon, air, etc. (Jer. xlv. 17.) Soon a further step was deifying men, or else attributing every human vice, lust, and passion to the gods. Clerus ridicules this grovelling anthropomorphic worship, yet was himself a priest and worshipper! These sun columns towering high above Baal's altars (2 Chron. xxiv. 4, 7) were sometimes of wood, which could be "cut down" (Lev. xxvi. 30). The Phoenician Adon or Adonis, the Ammonite Moloch or Milcom, the Moabitic Chemosh, the Assyrian and Babylonian Bel, and the Syrian Hadad, the Egyptian Ra, are essentially the same sun god. Adrammelech was the male, and Anammelech the female, power of the sun. Gad was the sun, or Jupiter, representing fortune, Meni the moon or Venus, representing fate (Isa. lvi. 11). As the sun represents the active, so the moon the passive powers of nature. The two combined are represented as at once male and female, whence in the LXX. Baal occurs with masculine and feminine articles, and men worshipped in women's clothes, and women in men's clothes, which explains the prohibition Dent. xxii. 5. Magic influences were attributed to sowing mingled seed in a field and to wearing garments of mixed material; hence the prohibition Lev. xix. 19. In Ezek. viii. 17, "they put the branch to their nose" alludes to the idolatrous usage of holding up a branch of tamarisk (called barsom) to the nose at daybreak whilst they sang hymns to the rising sun (Strabo, 15, § 733). Baal or sun worship appears indicated in the names Bethshemesh, Baal Hermon, Mount Heres ("sun"), Belshazzar, Hadadezer, Hadad Rimmon (the Syrian god).

(15) Mashith (Lev. xxvi. 1, Num. xxxiii. 52): "devices"; with eben "stones of device," viz. with figures or hieroglyphics sacred to the several deities on them; "effigied stones" (Minucius Felix, 3). Like "the chambers of imagery" or priests' chambers with idolatrous pictures on the walls as seen in vision (Ezek. viii. 12), answering to their own perverse imaginations. Gesenius, "a stone with an idol's image, Baal or Astarte." (16) TERAPHIM [see]. (17) Pesel. The process by which stone, metal, or wood was made into a graven or carved image (lit. one trimmed into shape and having had the finishing stroke) is described Isa. xli. 10-20. It was overlaid with gold or silver, and adorned with chains of silver (worn lavishly by rich orientals) and embroidered robes (Jer. x. 8, 9). "Fastened with nails that it should not be moved" (Isa. xli. 7), to keep the god steady! and that his influence might be secured to the spot (xl. 19, 20, xlv. 20; Ezek. xvi. 16-18; marg. Jud. iii. 19, 26 [see Eglon, Ehup]; Deut. vii. 25.) (18) Pesilim. (19) Nesek, masserah (Isa. xli. 29). "Molten images" (Deut. xxvii. 15). In Exod. xxxii. 4 "Aaron fashioned it with a graving tool (cheret) after he had made it a golden calf." The sense is, he formed it first of a wooden centre, then covered it with a coating of gold, the image so formed being called masserah. The mode of its destruction shows this; the wooden centre was first burnt, then the golden covering was beaten or rubbed to pieces (Deut. ix. 20, 21). So LXX., Keil, etc. The rendering "he bound it (the gold) up in a bag" is less probable.

In Gen. xxxv. 2, Jacob's charge to "his household and to all that were with him, Put away the strange gods ('the gods of the foreigner,' the Canaanites) among you, and be clean and change your raiment," it seems surprising that idols should have had place in his household. The explanation is gathered from what went before, but the connection is so little obvious that it can only be the result of truth not contrivance. Rachel had stolen Laban's images (teraphim) without Jacob's knowledge (xxx. 32); perhaps not for worship but for their gold and silver, to balance what was withheld by him from her. Laban had divined by them, as xxx. 27, "I have learned by experience," ought to be transl. "I have learned by divination," lit. I have hissed, "I have divined by omens from serpents." Moreover the sons of Jacob had just before (xxxiv.) carried away all the spoils of Shechem's city, and among them doubtless their gold and silver idols. The words "all that were with him" point to the captured wives and women, etc. "Change your raiment" was a charge needed for all who had taken part in the slaughter, and so were ceremonially defiled.

There are two degrees in idolatry. Against the worst, that of having other gods besides Jehovah the one only God, the first commandment is directed. Against the less flagrant degree, worshipping the true God under the form of an image or symbolic likeness, representing any of His attributes, the second is directed. The Baal and Asheerah ("groves") worship violated the first commandment; Aaron's calf worship and Jeroboam's violated the second. Comp. 1 Kings xvi. 30; 2 Kings x. 26, 28, 31, xvii. 7-23. So the Roman and Greek Catholics violate the second commandment in the adoration of the eucharistic mass, the bowing before images, etc., and go perilously near violating the first in the Divine titles where they invoke the Virgin Mary. Jeroboam's calves paved the way for Baal worship. Transl. Exod. xx. 3, "thou shalt have no other gods before My face." Polytheism ancient and modern is willing to grant Jehovah the first place among deities; but He will have none "in His presence" which is everywhere (Ps. cxxxix. 7). Again no outward form can image God, it only debases instead of helping the worshipper. The principle involved is stated by Paul on Mars' hill, surrounded by the choicest works of genius representing deity (Acts xvii. 20), "forasmuch as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device." Once that the first visible representation of God is made, or adopted, it entails another and another endlessly, no one or more idols or symbols ever adequately representing all the countless attributes of God. Hence a female deity was added to the male; an Apollo, Venus, Mercury, Diana, etc., etc., must be added to Jupiter; and, instead of one omnipresent God, deities whose power was restricted to localities were worshipped (1 Kings xx. 23, 28; 2 Kings xvii. 26).

Like all deviations from truth, the first licence necessitates countless others. "The express image of the Father's person" is the incarnate God Jesus. He alone (not visible images and pictures of Him), as represented in the written word, is the appointed revealer of the unseen God (John i. 18). Israel was God's representative and "peculiar treasure above all people, a kingdom of priests and an holy nation"; the same relation Christ's church now holds (1 Pet. ii. 5, 9).

Israel's kings (when Israel had chosen a visible head instead of the invisible King alone) were under God as their feudal superior (1 Kings iii. 14, xi. 11). The penalty of overt idolatry, as being treason against the Divine King, was death. The offender's nearest relatives must denounce him, and even be first to stone him (Exod. xxii. 20; Dent. xiii. 2-10, xvii. 2-5). Especially Moloch's worship with human sacrifices and passing through the fire entailed death as the penalty. The Canaanites were exterminated for it (Exod. xxxiv. 15, 16; Dent. vii, xii. 29-31, xx. 17). Israel's disasters were the punishment of their idolatry (Jer. ii. 17). Saul lost his throne, Achan his life, and Hiel his family, for retaining or restoring aught of a people doomed for idolatry (1 Sam. xv., Josh. vii., 1 Kings xvi. 34). God works out His ends, even His judgments, in the way of natural consequence. The calves of Jeroboam and Baal's groves were the sin. The disgust of all godly Israelites, intestine divisions, a perpetual conflict between the Mosaic law, still in force, and the established national idolatry, and the immorality which results from idolatry, were the natural and penal consequence, bringing ruin finally on the state. Israel, foremost in the offence under Jeroboam and then Ahab, is first to have prophets sent as censors and seers to counteract the evil, but proving refractory is the first to be carried into captivity. Judah, following the bad example in her turn, has prophets sent whom she rejects and even kills, and at nearly the same interval between the sin and the punishment follows Israel into captivity. Idolatry on the part of the O. T. Israel, and the spiritual Israel, is high treason against the heavenly King (1 Sam. vii. 7) whose direct subjects we avowedly are. The punishments were then temporal (Dent. xvii. 2-13). Israel's original contract of government is in Exod. xix. 3-8, xx. 2-5; Dent. xxviii., xxix., xxx. Often Israel fell from the covenant, and at intervals renewed it. The remarkable confirmation of the Divine authority of the law is, it was only in prosperity Israel neglected it, in distress they always cried to God and returned to the law, and invariably received deliverance (Jud. x. 10, 2 Chron. xv. 12, 13); especially at the return from Babylon (Neh. ix. 38). Israel's idolatry was not merely an abomination in God's sight, as that of the Gentiles, but spiritual "adultery" against Jehovah her Husband (Isa. lv. 5, Jer. iii. 14, Ezek. xvi.). Hos. ii. 16, 17: "thou shalt call Me Ishi (my Husband, the term of affection), no more Baali" (my Lord, the term of rule, defiled by its application to Baal, whose name ought never to be on their lips; Exod. xxxiii. 13, Zech. xiii. 2), etc. Fornication formed part of the abominable worship of the idols, especially Baal Peor and Ashtoreth or Astarte, who represented nature's generative powers and (Num. xxv. 1, 2) to whom quadeeshim and quadeeshoth, public male and female prostitutes, were "consecrated" (as the Heb. means: Dent. xxiii. 17, etc.; 2 Kings xxiii. 7; Hos. iv. 14), "separated with whores (withdrawn from the assembly of worshippers for carnal connection with them) . . . sacrifice with the harlots" (so Heb.) (Herod. i. 190). This horrid consecrated pollution prevailed in Phœnicia, Syria, Phrygia, Assyria, and Babylonia, and still in Hindoo idolatry. Man making lust a sacred duty! This is the force of the phrase, "Israel joined himself unto Baal Peor," as appears in 1 Cor. vi. 16, 17, "He which . . . is joined to an harlot is one body; for two, saith He, shall be one flesh. But he that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit."

God chose Egypt as Israel's place of training, though an idolatrous country, but took every precaution, if they would only have heeded Him, to save them from the contagion. He placed them in a separate province; as shepherds they were an abomination to Egyptians, and sacrificed to God the very animals Egypt worshipped (Exod. viii. 26). Finally, the Egyptians bitterly oppressed them. Yet the fascinations of idolatry spellbound Israel during their long stay in Egypt (Josh. xxiv. 14, Ezek. xx. 7), and led them to relapse into the sin from which Abram had been rescued by his call from Ur. God by Moses smote the symbols of Egyptian idolatry with the ten plagues, "executing judgment against all the gods of Egypt" (Exod. xii. 12), the river, the wind bringing locusts, the dust of the earth, the cattle, the symbol of Apis (Num. xxxiii. 4). [See EGYPT.] Yet Israel in all their history showed a continual tendency to adopt the idols of the neighbouring nations; in the desert they "sacrificed unto devils" (sa'eer, a shaggy goat, worshipped with the foulest rites at Mendes in Lower Egypt. Speaker's Comm. transl. "to the evil spirits of the desert": Lev. xvii. 7, comp. Isa. xiii. 21, xxiv. 14; 2 Chron. xi. 15). Behind the idols, though nonexistent in themselves, lurk real demons, to whom consciously or unconsciously the worship is paid, as inspiration declares (Dent. xxxii. 17), "devils" lashedim, "destroyers"; as Satan's name Apollyon means; slavish fear being the prompting motive, not love, the idol feaster has his fellowship with demons (1 Cor. x. 20), even as the communicant in the Lord's supper has by faith real fellowship with the Lord's body once for all sacrificed, and now exalted as the Head of redeemed mankind. In the northern kingdom of Israel, from Jeroboam down to Hoshea whom Shalmaneser dethroned, no one royal reformer appeared. In Judah several arose, Asa, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, Josiah. The Babylonian captivity almost thoroughly purged the Jews from their proneness to idols (Jer. xlv. 17, 18, contrast Hos. iii. 4). But traces appeared still in their partially adopting Greek idolatry and usages for worldly compromise, just before Antiochus Epiphanes' attempt to overthrow Jehovah's worship (1 Macc. i. 43-54). The heroic resistance of the Maccabees, besides their contact with the Persians who rejected images, and especially the erection of synagogues and the reading the law every sabbath in them, gave them the abhorrence of idols which now characterizes them.

In the Christian church "the deadly wound" that was given to "the beast" (the God-opposed world) by Christianity (Minucius Felix, A.D. 180, and Arnobius adv. Gent. iv. 1, mention that the Romans were shocked to find among Christians "no altars, no temples, no images") was speedily "healed" by image worship being revived in the Roman and Greek churches (Dan. vii. 8, 11, 24, 25; 1 Tim. iv. 1-3), so that "the beast that was, and is not (during the brief continuance of the deadly wound), yet is" (Rev. xvii. 8); and in spite of God's judicial plagues "men repented not of the works of their hands, that they should not worship devils, and idols of gold and silver and brass and stone and wood, which neither can see, nor hear, nor walk" (Rev. ix. 20). The deadly wound is healed also by the prevalence of "covetousness which is idolatry" (Eph. v. 5, Col. iii. 5) in all Christendom, reformed and unreformed, and the "form of godliness without the power"; culminating in the wilful king of the third kingdom (Dan. vii. 11, 12, xi. 36; 2 Tim. iii. 1-9 describes the hothed from which the last anti-christianity shall spring). Probably the second beast is the same, the false prophet who causes an image to be made to the first beast (Dan. vii. 8-26), and all who will not worship it to be killed, after the harlot has been unseated and judged (Rev. xiii. 14-18, xvi. 13-16, xvii.). The Lord will come "utterly to abolish the idols," and all "idolaters shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone" (Rev. xxi. 8; Isa. ii. 18, 19; Zech. xiii. 2, 3). Self idolatry, self will, and self sufficiency must be subdued, if God is to be our God. 1 Sam. xv. 23 implies that "conscious disobedience is idolatry, because it makes self will, the human I, into a god" (Keil).

Idumea. [See EDOM.]

Igal. 1. Num. xiii. 7. 2. Son of Nathan of Zobah (2 Sam. xxiii. 36); in 1 Chron. xi. 38 "Joel, the brother of Nathan."

Igdaliah. The "man of God" (i.e. a prophet, one not his own; having parted with all right in himself, to be wholly God's; Dent. xxxiii. 1, Moses, Eli-sha, 2 Kings iv. 7; Timothy, 2 Tim. iii. 17). Father of Hanan, in the chamber of whose sons Jeremiah (xxxv. 4) met the Rechabites; as consecrated by its association with his name, it was a fit scene for the Divine communication.

Igeal. 1 Chron. iii. 22. Fourth in descent from Zerubbabel; but, according to Lord A. Hervey, son of Shimei, brother to Zerubbabel.

Iim. 1. Contracted fr. in Ije Abarim, a late stage of Israel's wilderness journey (Num. xxxiii. 45, xxi. 11), = ruinous heaps. On the S.E. border of Moab, in the midbar or "wilderness," unenclosed uncultivated land, verdant in spring, but parched and dreary in summer. The "Abarim" distinguishes it from (2.) Another I. in S.W. Canaan (Josh. xv. 20). Abarim = farther regions or coast regions, viz. the hills facing Jericho, the whole upland E. of Jordan, the Gr. "Peraia." Between Ije Abarim and Dibon Gal were the rivers Zared and Arnon. Comp. Deut. ii. 9-12; 13, "ris' up," implies the Israelites remained at 1. some time; they were forbidden to assail Moab.

Ijon=ruin. A store city of Naphtali in N. Palestine. Captured by Ben-hadad's captains, at Asa's request for help against Baasha, king of Israel (1 Kings xv. 20. 2 Chron. xvi. 4). Taken also by Tiglath Pileser (2 Kings xv. 20). The lovely little plain N.W. of Dan, at the foot of the hills of Naphtali, Mery Agun, is probably the site.

Ikkelesh. 2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Chron. xxvii. 1, 9.

Ilai. 1 Chron. xi. 29. In 2 Sam. xxiii. 23 Zalmoun.

Illyricum. The region stretching from Italy to Epirus, along the N.E. of the Adriatic. The extreme limit (probably about Dyrrachium) unto which Paul had preached the gospel, towards Rome, when he wrote the epistle to Romans (xv. 19). "Dalmatia" is applied to the same region.

Imla, Imlah. 2 Chron. xviii. 7, 8; 1 Kings xxii. 8, 9.

Immanuel = God with us. Isa. vii. 10-16, viii. 8; Matt. i. 23. "Behold (arresting attention to the extraordinary prophecy) a (Heb. the) virgin (primarily the woman [the foreappointed mother of Messiah is ultimately meant by the Spirit]; then a virgin, soon to become the proph. t's second wife) shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel. . . . Before the child (Isaiah's) shall know to refuse the evil and choose the good (i.e. before he reaches the age of discrimination, three years), the land (Syria and Israel then leagued in one) that thou abhorrest," etc. (rather, "the land before the face of whose two kings thou shrinkest shall be forsaken" or "desolate"). Ahaz, king of Judah, received this as a sign given by the Lord Himself, when the king refused to ask one, that Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Damascus, who had already "smitten him with a great slaughter," so that "his and his people's heart was moved as the trees of the wood with the wind" (2 Chron. xxviii. 1, 2), should nevertheless not subdue Jerusalem, but be themselves and their land subdued. Just two years after Pekah of Israel was slain by Hoshea, and Rezin of Damascus by Tiglath Pileser king of Assyria. Like many typical prophecies, having a primary and an ulterior fulfilment (the one mainly aimed at), this has only a partial realization in the circumstances of Isaiah's age; these are only suggestive of those which form the consummation of all prophecy (Rev. xix. 10), Messiah's advent. Thus "the virgin" has its full meaning only in the virgin mother of whom Jesus was born, having been conceived by the Holy Ghost. Jer. xxxi. 21, 22: "O virgin of Israel . . . the Lord hath created a new thing in the earth, a woman shall compass a man." Mic. v. 3: Israel's and Judah's deliverance is ensured by the birth of Immanuel, "He will give them up, until . . . she which travaileth hath brought forth." The N. T. application is not an "accommodation," for Matthew (i. 23) expressly states that Jesus' birth of the virgin "was done that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, Behold," etc., "and they (no longer she) shall call His name Emmanuel." When the prophecy received its full and exhaustive accomplishment, no longer is the sense of Immanuel restricted to the prophet's view of it, in its partial fulfilment in her son; all then call or regard Him as peculiarly and exclusively characterized by the name "Immanuel." 1 Tim. iii. 16: "God was manifest in the flesh" (Col. ii. 9). Matt. xxviii. 20: "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." John i. 14, 18: His full manifestation as "God with us" shall be in the "new heavens and new earth." Rev. xxi. 3: "behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them . . . and God Himself shall be with them, and be their God." Immanuel cannot in the strict sense apply to Isaiah's son, but only to the "CHILD . . . SON . . . Wonderful, the mighty God," as Isaiah expressly says ix. 6, declaring moreover that his children (vii. 3, 14, etc.) are types of Him. Isa. viii. 18: "behold, I and the children whom the Lord hath given me are for signs . . . in Israel from the Lord of hosts," which Heb. ii. 13 quotes to prove the manhood of Messiah. Isaiah (i.e. Jehovah's salvation) typically represents Messiah as "the mighty (Hero) God," "the everlasting Father"; Isaiah's children represent Him as "Child" and "Son." Local and temporary features (as Isa. vii. 15, 16) are added in every type, otherwise it would be no type, but the Antitype itself.

"Call His name Immanuel" means not mere appellation, for this was not the designation by which men ordinarily named Him, but His revealed character shall be what Immanuel means. Sin destroyed the faculty of intuitively perceiving, as Adam once did, the characteristics; hence the name is now generally arbitrary, and not expressive of the nature. In the case of Jesus Christ, and many in Scripture, the Holy Ghost supplies this want. The promised birth of Messiah involved the preservation of Judah and of David's line, from which God said He should be sprung. Others explain Isa. vii. 14 to refer to the Messiah Immanuel, strictly born of the virgin. "The child" in ver. 15, 16, refers to the child Shear-jashub at Isaiah's side (ver. 3). The purpose of the two smoking firebrands (ver. 4) shall come to nought, for before this child shall grow up, the two shall be extinguished. But God's purpose concerning the house of David shall stand, for the virgin shall bring forth Immanuel.

Immer. 1. 1 Chron. ix. 12. Neh. xi. 13; 1 Chron. xxiv. 14. Ezra ii. 37. Neh. vii. 40. 2. A place in Babylonia from which went, with the first caravan, men who could not prove their Israelite birth (Ezra ii. 59, Neh. vii. 61).

Imna. 1 Chron. vii. 35, 40. IMNAH: Asher's firstborn (1 Chron. vii. 50).

Impute. Heb. chashab, Gr. logizomai; to count, reckon (Rom. iv. 2-8), viz. unrighteousness (whether one's own or another's) to one's discredit; or righteousness (whether one's own or another's) to one's credit whether in man's account or in the judgment book of God (Rev. xx. 12, Num. xviii. 27). Philm. 18: "if Onesimus hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought, put that on mine account." In Rom. iv. 6 righteousness imputed without works must mean a righteousness not our own, yet reckoned as ours, viz. "the righteousness of (Him who is both) God and Saviour Jesus Christ" (the Gr. 2 Pet. i. 1). The gospel sets forth God's righteousness which is Christ's. Christ's is imputed to us; so that God is at once "just and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus" (Rom. iii. 25, 26). God in accepting the believer is therefore not only merciful but just. Our advocate is not merely the gracious but "Jesus Christ the righteous" (1 John ii. 1). "God is well pleased," not merely for mercy's sake, but "for His righteousness sake" (Isa. xlii. 21, xlv. 21 and; Jer. xxiii. 6). "The righteousness of God, by faith of Jesus Christ, is unto all and upon all them that believe" (Rom. iii. 22; iv. 5, 6), "faith (not for its own worthiness, but for that of Him on whom it rests) is counted for righteousness" (x. 4; 1 Cor. i. 30).

There is a threefold imputation: I. That of Adam's sin to all his posterity; that it is so, Paul proves by the fact of all, even infants who have never actually sinned, suffering its penalty death (Rom. v. 12-14, 19), even as all inherit his corrupt nature. God, in fact, deals with us all as a guilty race; for we are all liable to suffering and death; the doctrine of imputation of Adam's sin accounts for it. Yet imputation is not infusion; Adam's sin is not ours in the same sense as our own personal sin; nor is imputation the transfer of his character to us. II. That of our sins to Christ (Isa. liii. 6). III. That of Christ's righteousness to us (Rom. v. 19; 2 Cor. v. 19, 21). Instead of "imputing their trespasses to men," God "hath made Him to be sin for us who know no sin, that we might be made (Gr. that we may become) the righteousness of God in Him," i.e. in union with Him by faith. "Such are we in the sight of God the Father as is the very Son of God Himself" (Hooker). In JUSTIFICATION [see] Christ's righteousness is imputed to us; in sanctification Christ's righteousness is imparted to us, in vital union with Him the Head from whom the life flows into the members.

Imrah. 1 Chron. vii. 36, 40.

Imri. 1. 1 Chron. ix. 4. 2. Neh. iii. 2.

Incense. Exod. xxx. 1, 9, 34, etc.

The altar of incense was more closely connected with the holiest place than the other things in the holy place, the shewbread table and the candlestick. The incense consisted of four aromatic ingredients (representing God's perfections diffused throughout the four quarters of the world): stacte (Heb. nataph, "a drop," the gum that drops from the storax tree, Styrax officinalis, found in Syria; the benzoin, or gum benjamin, is from Java and Sumatra; the liquid storax of commerce is from a different tree, the Liquidambar Syraciflua, onycha (Heb. shecheleth, probably the cap of the wing shell, strombus, abounding in the Red Sea, used for making perfumes), galbanum (a yellowish brown gum, imported from Persia, India, and Africa), and pure frankincense (the chief of the aromatic gums: S. of Sol. iii. 6, Matt. ii. 11; obtained from India through the Sabaeans of S. Arabia; the tree is Boswellia thurifera, the native salai; the gum is called oliban, Arabic loban, whence Heb. lebonah comes). These were "tempered together," Heb. "salted"; comp. Lev. ii. 13, but that was in the case of offering what was used as food, and salt is not used in compounding the incense of any other people; still God might herein designedly distinguish Israel from other peoples. Salt symbolised incorruptness; the wine of drink offerings, the blood, and the wood, were the only offerings without it. A portion beaten small was to be "put before the testimony in the tabernacle," i.e. outside the veil, before the golden altar of incense; from its relation to the ark thus it became "most holy," as was also the altar of incense (Lev. xxx. 10). This incense was to be kept exclusively for Jehovah; the penalty of making like incense for ordinary perfume was "cutting off." Incense of other ingredients ("strange," xxx. 9) was forbidden to be offered. A store of it was constantly kept in the temple (Josephus, B. J., vi. 8, § 3).

Aaron originally offered it, but in the second temple one of the lower priests was chosen by lot to offer it daily morning and evening (Luke i. 9). King Uzziah for usurping the office was smitten with leprosy (2 Chron. xxvi. 16-21). The morning incense was offered when the lamps were trimmed in the holy place, before the sacrifice. Between the earlier and later evenings, after the evening sacrifice and before the drink offerings, the evening incense was burnt (margin. Exod. xxx. 7, 8; Rev. viii. 1, 3-5). A part of the temple was devoted to a family, "the house of Abtines," whose duty it was to compound the incense, according to the rabbins. One of the memunim, or 16 prefects of the temple, had charge of the incense, that it might be always ready.

When the priest entered the holy place with the incense, the people were all put out of the temple, and from between the porch and the altar (Maimonides); Luke i. 10, "the whole multitude . . . were praying without, at the time of incense," silently, which accords with Rev. viii. 1, 3. The priest avoided lengthening his stay within, lest the people outside should fear he had been struck dead for some defect in his offering (Lev. xvi. 13). This gives point to Luke i. 21, "the people waited for Zacharias, and marvelled that he tarried so long in the temple." On coming forth he pronounced the blessing (Num. vi. 24-26); the Levites broke forth into sacred song, accompanied by the temple music (Mishna); comp. Rev. viii. 5.

On the day of atonement the highpriest, after offering the bullock for himself, took incense in his left hand and a golden shovel full of live coals from the western side of the brazen altar in his right, and went into the most holy place, his first entrance there (Lev. xvi. 12, 13). "He shall take a (Heb. the) censer (see Heb. ix. 4) full of burning coals of fire from off the altar before the Lord, and his hands full of sweet incense beaten small, and bring it within the veil; and he shall put the incense upon the fire before the Lord, that the cloud of the incense may cover the mercyseat that is upon the testimony, that he die not." In the second temple, where there was no ark, a stone was substituted.

The truth symbolised by "incense" is the merit of Christ's obedience and atoning death. It is this, when it is by faith made the accompanying foundation of our prayers, which makes them rise up to God as a sweet and acceptable perfume (see CENSER) (Rev. viii. 1-5). The incense of the golden altar of incense within the sanctuary had to be lighted from the fire of the atoning altar of burnt offering outside, otherwise the fire was "strange fire" (see ALTAR, ABTHU, NADAB). So Christ intercedes now in the heavenly sanctuary as He did for us outside; and the believer's prayer ascends from his inner heart to God within the heavenly veil, because it rests on Christ's atoning sacrifice once for all offered "without the gate" (Heb. xiii. 12). The altar of incense was connected with the altar of burnt offering by its horns being sprinkled with the blood of the sin offering on the altar of burnt offering on the day of atonement (Lev. xvi. 16, 18; Exod. xxx. 10). Incense symbolises not merely prayer, but prayer accepted before God because of atonement: "let my prayer be set forth before Thee as incense, and the lifting up (answering to the rising up of the incense smoke) of my hands as the evening sacrifice" (Ps. cxli. 2). For prayer was offered by the pious Jews at the times of the morning and evening sacrifices on the altar of burnt offering, which were accompanied with the incense on the altar of incense, thus marking that prayer rests upon propitiation by sacrifice.

In Mal. i. 11 there is no "shall be" in

Heb. Probably then the ellipse is to be filled up with is as much as shall be. By the Jews' wide dispersion already some knowledge of Jehovah was being imparted to the Gentiles, and an earnest existed of the future magnifying of Jehovah's name among the Gentiles "from the rising of the sun unto the going down of the same." The Gentiles already were having glimmerings of the true light, and in every nation a few were heartily trying to serve God so far as they knew. Their worship, as yet imperfect but sincere, is "pure" in comparison with your "polluted bread" (ver. 7, 12-15; Acts x. 34, 35, xvii. 23; Rom. ii. 14, 15, 27-29). The incense which shall yet be offered "in every place" is prayer accepted through Christ (1 Tim. ii. 8). This shall be consummated at Christ's appearing (Zech. xiv. 9, Zeph. iii. 9). The "pure offering" is the "body, a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God" (Rom. xii. 1); the "broken and contrite heart" (Ps. li. 17); "praise, the fruit of the lips"; "doing good," and imparting to the needy (Heb. xiii. 10, 15, 16; 1 Pet. ii. 5, 12).

In Rev. v. 8 it is the golden vials not the incense odours (not thumiamata but phialas, hai) which are the prayers of saints. In Rev. viii. 3, 4 the incense is distinct from, yet offered with, their prayers, the angel presenting them before God. It is not said he intercedes for us, still less that we should pray to him to do so; nay this is expressly forbidden (Rev. xix. 10, xxii. 8, 9).

India. (Esth. i. 1, viii. 9.) Ahasuerus' (Xerxes') easternmost dominion, as Ethiopia was the westernmost. The country round the Indus, the Panjab, and Scinde, which Alexander the Great afterwards conquered. Heb. Hoddu, i.e. Honadu, Hindu; occurring in the Persepolitan inscriptions. Solomon imported through the Red Sea from Ophir Indian articles, of which some have Indian names; algumim "sandal wood," kophim "apes," thuccim "peacocks," pidah "topaz," Sanskrit pita.

Inn. Heb. lia. A lodging place for the night. Khans or caravanserais, the halting places of caravans or travelling companies, are places where men and cattle have room to rest, but no food is provided in them. In the times of the pentateuch they were not buildings but resting places where tents might be spread near water and pasture (Exod. iv. 24, Gen. xlii. 27). The caravanserai, a square building enclosing an open court, with arcades around and a terrace over them, is alluded to in Jer. ix. 2. Though loudly and often filthy, the terrace is tolerably clean, but the court and stabling littered with chopped straw and dirt. The prophet would prefer even it to the comforts of Jerusalem, so as to be away from its pollutions. Christian hospitals (whence came hostel, hotel) were originally halting places built for pilgrims. Paula, Jerome's friend, built several on the way to Bethlehem; the Scotch and Irish built some for pilgrims of their nation going to Rome.

The "manger" in Luke ii. 7 was a crib in a stable attached to a khan (kati-luma, having cells or apartments above for travellers as well as stalls below for the cattle) where there was no host. The inn (pandokion) in Luke x. 34, 35 had a "host," and so resembled our "inn" with its "inn-keeper"; the women connected with such halting places were often of a loose character (Josh. ii. 1). However, Justin Martyr (Tryph. 78. A.D. 163), who was born only 40 miles off, says Jesus was born in a cave near Bethlehem, one of the caverns in the narrow long grey hill on which it stands, for caves in rocky countries are often used as stables; in the manger in it Jesus was laid.

"The habitation of Chimham by Bethlehem" (geruth Chimham) (Jer. xli. 17) was a halting place or station in or at the patrimony of David, made over to Barzillai's son Chimham for his father's loyalty (2 Sam. xiv. 34, 100).

Inspiration. The supernatural action of the Holy Spirit on the mind of the sacred writers whereby the Scriptures were not merely their own but the word of God. Scripture not merely contains but is the word of God. As the whole Godhead was joined to the whole manhood, and became the Incarnate Word, so the written word is at once perfectly Divine and perfectly human; infallibly authoritative because it is the word of God, intelligible because in the language of men. If it were not human we should not understand it; if it were not Divine it would not be an unerring guide. The term "scriptures" is attached to them exclusively in the word of God itself, as having an authority no other writings have (John v. 39, x. 34, 36). They are called "the oracles of God" (Rom. i. 2), i.e. Divine utterances. If Scripture were not plenary and verbally sanctioned by God, its practical utility as a sure guide in all questions directly or indirectly affecting doctrine and practice would be materially impaired, for what means would there be of distinguishing the false in it from the true?

Inspiration does not divest the writers of their several individualities of style, just as the inspired teachers in the early church were not passive machines in prophesying (1 Cor. xiv. 32). "Where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty" (2 Cor. iii. 17). Their will became one with God's will; His Spirit acted on their spirit, so that their individuality had free play in the sphere of His inspiration. As to religious truths the collective Scriptures have unity of authorship; as to other matters their authorship is palpably as manifold as the writers. The variety is human, the unity Divine. If the four evangelists were mere machines narrating the same events in the same order and words, they would cease to be independent witnesses. Their very discrepancies (only seeming ones) disprove collusion. The solutions proposed in Harmonies, being necessarily conjectural, may or may not be the true ones; but they at least prove that the differences are not irreconcilable and would be cleared up if we knew all the facts. They test our faith, whether on reasonable evidence we will unreservedly believe His word in spite of some difficulties, designedly permitted for our probation. The slight variations in the decalogue between Exod. xx. and its repetition Deut. v., and in Ps. xviii. compared with 2 Sam. xxii., in Ps. xiv. compared with Ps. lxxi., and in N.T. quotations of O.T., (sometimes from LXX. which varies from Heb., sometimes from neither in every word,) all prove the Spirit-produced independence of the sacred writers who under Divine guidance and sanction presented on different occasions the same substantial truths under different aspects, the one complementing the other. One or two instances occur where the errors of transcribers cause a real discrepancy (2 Kings viii. 26, compared with 2 Chron. xxii. 21). A perpetual miracle alone could have prevented such very exceptional and palpable copyists' mistakes. But in seeming discrepancies, as between the accounts of the same event in different Gospels, each account presents some fresh aspect of Divine truth; none containing the whole, but all together presenting the complete exhibition of the truth. Origen profoundly says: "in revelation as in nature we see a self concealing, self revealing God, who makes Himself known only to those who earnestly seek Him; in both we find stimulants to faith and occasions for unbelief."

The assaults of adversaries on seemingly weak points have resulted in the eliciting of beautiful and delicate harmonies unperceived before; the gospel defences have been proved the more impregnable, and the things meant to injure "have fallen out rather unto the furtherance of the gospel." When once it is admitted that the N.T. writers were neither fanatics nor enthusiasts, (and infidelity has never yet produced a satisfactory theory to show them to have been either,) their miracles and their Divine commission must also be admitted, for they expressly claim these. Thus Paul (1 Cor. xiv. 37), "if any man think himself a prophet, let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord." And not only the things but the words; (ii. 13) "we speak not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth." The "discerning of spirits" was one of the miraculous gifts in the apostolic churches. His appeal on the ground of miracles (ii. 4) which are taken for granted as notorious rather than asserted, (the incidental mention being a clear mark of truth because it excludes suspicion of design,) and to persons whose miraculous discernment of spirits enabled them to test such claims, is the strongest proof of the Divine authority of his writings. Peter (2 Pet. iii. 16) classes Paul's epistles with "the other Scriptures"; therefore whatever inspiration is in the latter is in the former also.

That inspiration excludes error from Scripture words, so far as these affect doctrine and morals, appears from Ps. xii. 6, "the words of the Lord are pure words, as silver tried in a furnace of earth, purified seven times." As our Lord promised the disciples His Holy Spirit, to teach them how and what they should say before magistrates (Matt. x. 19, 20), much more did the Spirit "abiding" with the church "for ever" (John xiv. 16) secure for the written word, the only surviving infallible oracle, the inspiration of the manner as well as the matter. So (xvi. 13) "the Spirit of truth will guide you into all (the) truth," viz. not truth in general but Christian truth. Also (xiv. 26) "the Holy Ghost shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance whatsoever I have said unto you." "He shall testify of Me" (xv. 26). "He will show you things to come . . . He shall receive of Mine and shall show it unto you" (xvi. 13, 14).

Paul (2 Tim. iii. 16) declares that no part of the written word is uninspired, but "ALL" (lit. "every scripture," i.e. every portion) is "profitable" for the ends of a revelation, "doctrine, reproof (containing error: the two comprehending speculative divinity; then follows practical), correction (setting one right, 1 Cor. x. 1-10), instruction (disciplinary training; Deut. xiii. 5, 1 Cor. v. 13) in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works"; as it makes him "perfect" it must be perfect itself.

Some parts were immediately communicated by God, and are called "apocalypse" or "revelation," as that to John, and to Paul (2 Cor. xii. 1, Rom. xvi. 25). Others, as the historical parts, are matter of human testimony. But inspiration was as much needed to write known facts authoritatively as to communicate new truths; else why should certain facts be selected and others be passed by? Inspired prohibition is as miraculous as inspired utterance. Had the evangelists been left to themselves, they doubtless would have given many details of Jesus' early life which our curiosity would have desired, but which Divine wisdom withheld, in order to concentrate all our attention on Christ's ministry and death. The historical parts are quoted by Paul as God's "law," because they have His sanction and contain covert lessons of God's truth and His principles of governing the world and the church (Gal. iv. 21). Considering the vast amount of Mariolatry and idolatry which subsequently sprang up, the hand of God is marked in the absence from the Gospel histories of ought to countenance these errors.

Sacred history is like "a dial in which the shadow, as well as the light, informs us" (Trench). The Spirit was needed to qualify the writers for giving what they have given, a condensed yet full and clear portraiture of Messiah, calculated to affect all hearts in every nation, and to sow in them seeds of faith, hope, and love. The minor details, such as Paul's direction to Timothy to "bring his cloth and parchments," and to "drink a little wine for his stomach's sake and his infirmities," are vivid touches which give life and nature to the picture, making us realize the circumstances and personality of the apostle and his disciple, and have their place in the inspired record, as each leaf has in the tree. The genealogies, as in Gen. x., Matt. i., form most important links between the progressive stages in the sacred history, and are anything but dry and profitless to the diligent student. There is a progress in the manifestation of the eternal and unchangeable principles of morality, in the N. T. as compared with the O. T. God never sanctioned evil, but dealt with the iniquity of the world as to REVENGE, DIVORCE, etc. [see] as its case required, less strictly marking sin than under the clear light of N. T.

ANCIENT SCROLLS.

The mode of God's inspiring the writers it is not essential for us to know; the result is what momentously concerns us, viz. that their writings are our sure guide; for (2 Pet. i. 21) "the prophecy of Scripture (the written word of men inspired, as 'prophet' means 1 Cor. xiv. 29, not merely a foreteller) came not by the will of man, but holy men spake as they were moved (lit. borne along, Acts ii. 2; rapt out of themselves, yet not losing self control, 1 Cor. xiv. 32) by the Holy Ghost." Every word of inspiration is equally the word of God; but there is a progress in the mode of revelation, and there are degrees in the importance of the words uttered. With the prophets God spoke in vision, but with Moses "face to face" and "mouth to mouth" (Exod. xxxiii. 11, Num. xii. 6-8). The highest revelation of all is that of God manifest in the flesh. But, however varied the mode, the result is that all Scripture alike is sanctioned as the word of God.

Camphas is an instance showing that the words were sanctioned as divinely inspired; whilst the speaker himself did not know the deep significance of his own words (John xi. 50), "he spake not of himself." So (1 Pet. i. 11) the O. T. prophets "searched what, or what manner of time, the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ and the glory, . . . unto whom it was revealed, that not unto themselves but unto us they did minister," etc. They too knew not the full meaning of their own words. For

"no prophecy of Scripture proves to be of private solution" (Gr. 2 Pet. i. 20), i.e. it is not the utterance of the mere individual, and so to be solved or interpreted by him, but of "the Holy Ghost" by whom the writer was "moved"; Scripture is not restricted to the immediate sense in the mind of the individual writer, but has in view "the testimony of Jesus," which is "the spirit of prophecy" in the "holy men moved by the Holy Ghost." The words of one compared with those of another from whom the former may be separated in age and in country often bring forth some truth evidently not contemplated by the writer, but designed by the ONE MIND who inspired, overruled, and sanctioned both. There is throughout the whole a consistently developed scheme, too grand for the mind of any one writer.

Our Lord and His apostles make vital truths hinge on single words. The force of Jesus' three answers, "It is written," to Satan's three temptations lies in single words (Matt. iv.). So in chap. xix. 4. Also He confutes the Sadducees and proves the resurrection of the body from words which otherwise we should scarcely have regarded as proving it (Matt. xxii. 32), "I am (not I was) the God of Abraham" (viz. the man in his integrity, body, soul, and spirit). The one word My is Christ's proof of His Godhead (Matt. xxii. 43), "the Lord said unto My Lord (Ps. xc. 1): if David call Him Lord, how is He His Son?" David could not have understood the full force of his own words (Ps. xxii.) as to the "gall," the "vinegar," the "parting of His garments," and "casting lots for the vesture," and other minute details fulfilled in Messiah. He who, working through means, creates the minute leaf as well as the mighty forest, saith of all His word, "till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled" (Matt. v. 18; "law" means the whole O. T., as John (x. 35) uses "law" of the psalms). Christ's argument, "if He called them gods, unto whom the word of God came, say ye of Him whom the Father hath sanctified and sent, Thou blasphemest, because I said, I am the Son of God?" rests on the one word "gods" being applied to rulers, as types of the Son of God, therefore still more applicable to the Antitype Himself. Our Lord makes it a fundamental principle "the Scripture cannot be broken," even as to one word (John x. 35). So also Paul shows unhesitating confidence in the Divine authority of special words, as "seed" not "seeds" (Gal. iii. 16), "all" (Heb. ii. 8), "brethren" (11), "to-day," and "My rest" (iv. 1-11). To crown all, Revelation (xxii. 19) at its close declares, "if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life."

Often it is a single verse that, by the same Spirit as inspired the word, has breathed new life into the sinner. The diligent student too is often struck by the unexpected light which one expression on examination affords, as in some masterpiece of art a single touch can impart life and meaning to the whole.

Verbal inspiration does not require that every saying reported in Scripture should be a literal transcript of the speaker's words, but that it should be substantially a true statement, and such a one as the Spirit of God sanctions for the ends of the revelation. Moreover, in recording wicked men's sayings or doings, Scripture does not sanction but simply records them. So in the case of merely human utterances. In 1 Cor. vii. 5, 6, Paul distinguishes his words "by permission" from those "of commandment"; and in ver. 25-38 he gives his "judgment" as one faithful, but as having on the point "no commandment of the Lord." Here his inspiration appears in his expressly declining to command as divinely authoritative a certain course as an apostle, and merely advising it as a Christian friend. How important it was to make this distinction appears from the subsequent error of the church in imposing vows of perpetual celibacy. So in ver. 12-15 (contrast 10) he says on a particular case, "I, not the Lord," whereas he had on the main point said, "not I, but the Lord." Every word employed by the sacred writer in all cases is sanctioned as suited in its place for the Holy Spirit's purpose.

Various readings in MSS. do not invalidate verbal inspiration. It is the original Scriptures whose words have inspired authority, not the subsequent copies or versions. The words of the decalogue were written by the finger of God, though the MSS. transmitting them to us contain variations. Like other gifts of God, this may be lost in whole or part by man's carelessness. Yet a remarkable providence has watched over Scripture, keeping the Jews from mutilating the O. T. and the Roman and Greek Catholics from mutilating the N. T. though witnessing against themselves [see CAXON]. Moreover God has preserved by human means a multitude of MSS., patristic quotations, and ancient versions, enabling us to restore the original text almost perfectly for all practical purposes. The range of doubt remaining is confined within narrow limits. Exemption from all transcriptional errors would have needed a perpetual miracle, which is not God's mode of dealing with us. Whilst some passages affecting vital doctrines are on examination rejected as not in the original, the doctrines themselves stand firm as ever, because they rest on the agreeing testimony of the whole of God's word; in other passages the orthodox truths are confirmed more fully by restoring the original text. Irenaeus (Adv. Haeres., ii. 47) says, "in the many voiced tones of Scripture expressions there is one symphonious melody"; Origen (Hom. 39), "as among plants there is not one without its peculiar virtue . . . so the spiritual botanist will find there is nothing, in all that is written, superfluous."

The prophets preface their prophecies with "thus saith the Lord," "the burden (weighty utterance) of the world of the Lord" (Zech. ix. 1, xii. 1; Mal. i. 1). The apostles declare of them, "the Scripture must needs have been fulfilled which the Holy Ghost by the mouth of David spake," "God showed by the mouth of all His prophets that," etc. (Acts i. 16; iii. 18, 21; iv. 25). They rest the truth of the Holy Spirit's outpouring, Christ's resurrection, and the mystery of the admission of the Gentiles to be fellow heirs in the gospel, on the O. T. as infallible (Acts ii. 16, 25-33; 1 Cor. xv. 3, 4; Rom. xvi. 26). If then the O. T. prophets were infallible, much more the apostles in their N. T. Scriptures; as these and even the least in the gospel kingdom rank above those (Matt. xi. 11; Eph. iii. 5; 1 Cor. ii. 9, 10). Paul received the gospel which he preached, by extraordinary revelation; therefore he claims for it Divine authority (Gal. i. 11, 12; Eph. iii. 3). His word is "the word of God" which "he speaks in Christ," also "Christ speaking in Him" (2 Cor. ii. 17, xiii. 3). Just as Haggai was "the Lord's messenger in the Lord's message" (i. 13), i.e. invested with His commission; and Neh. ix. 30, "by Thy Spirit in Thy prophets"; and David (2 Sam. xxiii. 2), "the Spirit of the Lord spake by me, and His word was in my tongue."

Intercession. 1. Christ's: (1) In a general sense, for transgressors: Isa. lii. 12; Luke xxiii. 34, for His murderers. (2) In a special sense, for His believing people alone: "I pray not for the world, but for them which Thou hast given Me" (John xvii. 9). His prayer of compassion is for self destroying sinners. His pleading as Advocate is for His believing people, claiming their justification as a matter of right, on the ground of His righteousness. "We (who walk in the light as He is in the light) have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ, the righteous" (1 John ii. 1, comp. i. 7; Rom. viii. 33, 34; Heb. vii. 25). He died once for all, atoning for all sin; but "He ever liveth to make intercession for them that come unto God by Him," and for them alone. As examples of His intercession comp. Isa. lxii. 1, for Zion; Zech. i. 12, 14; Ps. lxx. 6, 7, "let not them that wait on Thee, O Lord God of hosts, be ashamed, for My sake," etc. 11. The Holy Spirit's: Rom. viii. 26, 27. Christ intercedes for us above; the Holy Spirit, in Christ's personal absence, intercedes on earth in us. Hence the Holy Spirit has the same title as Christ, the Paraclete (which in A. V. is transl. "Advocate" in the case of Christ, "Comforter" in the case of the Holy Spirit; the original word is the same for both). The Holy Spirit is the Spirit of prayer in every one below for whom Christ pleads above. The Holy Spirit is said to intercede for us with groanings, because He makes us to "groan" or "sigh." Knowing our needs better than we, He breathes in our prayers spiritual desires which find utterance in inarticulate sighings; these the Searcher of hearts knoweth, and interprets and answers accordingly; for whatever aspirations the Holy Spirit breathes in us are "according to the will of God." 11. Man's: Rom. xi. 2, Elijah interceding against Israel, as elsewhere for the people (Jas. v. 17, 18). Paul often asks the prayers of Christians in behalf of himself and other ministers, and the extension of Christ's kingdom (2 Thess. iii. 1; Eph. vi. 18, 19).

Iphedeah. 1 Chron. viii. 25, 28.

Ira. 1. The Jairite (2 Sam. xxi. 26).

2. "Ira the Ithrite," i.e. of Jattir, a town in the mountainous region of Judah, which David haunted in the time of Saul's persecution, and to which he sent presents for his friends from the Amalekite spoil (1 Sam. xxx. 27). One of David's guard (2 Sam. xxiii. 38). 3. 2 Sam. xxiii. 26. Sixth captain of the sixth month of the 12 courses, 2400 in each (1 Chron. xxvii. 9).

Irad. Son of Enoch, grandson of Cain, father of Methuselah (Gen. iv. 18). The similarity of the names to those in Seth's line, Enoch, Cainan, Jared, Mahalalel, arose from the paucity of names at first, the relationship of Seth's and Cain's families, and their occasional intercourse. Still there is difference enough in the names to distinguish them.

Iram. Gen. xxxvii. 43. The "kings" of Edom there enumerated (ver. 31-39) did not precede the "dukes" (10-13), but reigned contemporaneously with them, and were elected by them at every vacancy in the throne. The names (31-39) are probably those of the cities where the "dukes" named before (15-19) had their seat of government; so that we should transl. "duke of Magdiel, duke of Iram," etc. Timnah and Kenaz called their cities after their own names. The Horites were probably not finally destroyed immediately after Esau's settlement in their land, if we judge by the analogy of the conquest of Canaan (Deut. ii. 12, 22).

Ir-ha-heres. "The city of destruction" (Isa. xix. 18). Smitten with "terror" at Jehovah's judgments, Egypt shall be converted to Him. "Five cities shall speak the language of Canaan, and swear to the Lord of hosts." Some think the five are Heliopolis, Leontopolis, Migdol, Daphne (Tahpanhes), and Memphis. Leontopolis is perhaps "the city of destruction," so called in disparagement, because here Onias, who had failed to get the highpriesthood at Jerusalem, built a temple in rivalry of that at Jerusalem which was the only lawful one. Onias read "city of the sun" (Ir-ha-heres), i.e. On or Heliopolis, in the nome (prefecture) of which he persuaded Ptolemy Philometer (149 B.C.) to let him build the temple, in order to tempt the Jews to reside there. He alleged that this site was foreappointed by Isaiah's prophecy 600 years before. S. 16 MSS., also Vulg. The conversion (through the Jewish settlement in Egypt and the Gr. LXX. transl. of O. T.) of many Ethiopians to the God of the Jews (Acts ii. 6, 10, 11), e.g. Queen Candace's chamberlain whom Philip met on his return from worshipping at Jerusalem, is an earnest of a fuller conversion to come (Zeph. iii. 9; Zech. xiv. 9; Rev.

vii. 9). The "altar" and "pillar" foretold (Isa. xix. 19, 20) are memorial and spiritual (Josh. xxii. 22-26; Gen. xxviii. 18; Mal. i. 11); for one only sacrificial altar was lawful, viz. that at Jerusalem. Alexander the Great, the temporal "saviour" of Egypt from the Persians, was type of the true Saviour, Onion, a Jewish city in Egypt, is supposed in Smith's Bible Dict. to be "the city of destruction"; its destruction by Titus being thus foretold.

Iri. 1 Chron. vii. 7, 12.

Irijah. Son of Shemeiah, "captain of the ward"; met Jeremiah at the Jerusalem "gate of Benjamin," accused him of deserting to the Chaldees, and brought him to the princes (Jer. xxxvii. 13, 14). The death of Hananiah, I's grandfather, for false prophecy, was foretold by Jeremiah; the grandson now takes his revenge (xxviii. 16).

Irnahash = serpent city. 1. Perhaps a trace of primitive serpent worship. Jerome thought I. to be Bethlehem, Nahash being Jesse. 2. One of Esau's sons, descended from Chelub (1 Chron. iv. 11, 12).

Iron. City of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 38).

Iron. [See CIVILIZATION.] Tubalcain, 500 years after Adam according to Heb. chronology, 1060 according to LXX., was the first "instructor of every artificer in brass and iron." Previously flint, bone, and wood had been used for instruments and weapons. When nations by isolation from the centres of civilization retrograded, they fell back to a flint age, then ascended to bronze, so lastly to iron; as we trace in antiquarian relics in many European countries. The use of iron is of extreme antiquity. The Hindoos have had for ages a process of smelting, simple and rude but effective. Canaan is described as "a land whose stones are iron" (Deut. vii. 9). Traces of iron-works are found on Lebanon. Argob contains abundant ironstone. Iron was among the spoils taken from Midian (Num. xxxi. 22), and was common in Egypt centuries before the exodus. Axes, harrows, saws, nails, weapons, bars, gates, rods, pillars were of iron (2 Kings vi. 5, 6; 2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 Chron. xxii. 3; 1 Sam. xvii. 7). In the tombs of Thebes butchers are represented sharpening their knives on a blue bar of metal. The blue blades and the red bronze in the tomb of Ramesses III. imply that iron and steel were very anciently known in Egypt. The Philistines allowed no iron smiths in the land of the Hebrews, just as Persia forbade iron, except for agriculture (Pliny, xii. 39), to the Romans when subject to him (1 Sam. xiii. 19-22). Merchants of Dan and Javan (perhaps rather Eden, now Aden, a Greek settlement in Arabia) supplied Tyre with polished or "bright iron." "Dan and Javan" may mean all peoples, whether near, as the Israelite Dan, or far off; as the Greeks or Iron workers.

"Javan" conveyed these products to Tyre's markets. [See DAN.]

In Jer. xv. 12 "shall iron break the northern iron and the steel?" Rather "can common iron break the northern iron and copper combined into the hardest metal?" The northern Chalybes near the Euxine Pontus made this mixture like our steel. Jeremiah means, can the Jews, hardly though they be, break the still harder Chaldeans of the N.E. The smith's work is described Isa. xlv. 12. A "rod of iron" symbolises the holy sternness with which the coming Judge and the saints with Him shall punish the wicked (Ps. ii. 9, Rev. ii. 27). Job xxviii. 2 marg. suith, "iron is taken out of the earth" or "dust," for ore looks like mere "earth."

Iron symbolises the fourth kingdom in Nebuchadnezzar's vision (Dan. ii.), viz. Rome. The metals of the image lessen in specific gravity as they go downwards. Silver (Medo-Persia) is not so heavy as gold (Babylon), brass (Greece) not so heavy as silver, and iron not so heavy as brass; and the weight being arranged in the reverse of stability. Like iron, Rome was strongest and hardest in treading down the nations, but less kindly, the government depending on popular choice. As it "breaketh in pieces," so, in righteous retribution, itself will be "broken in pieces" at last by the kingdom of the Stone, Messiah the Rock (ver. 40, 44; Rev. xiii. 10).

Irpeel = restored by God. A city of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 27). (? Ra-fit.)

Irshemesh = city of the sun. In Dan (Josh. xiv. 41). Afterwards Beth-shemesh; connected with mount Heres (sun) (Jud. i. 35).

Iru. Caleb's eldest son. Others read Ir with conjunction "and" at the end.

ISAAC [see ABRAHAM and ISHMAEL] = laughter, because Abraham laughed in joy at the promise of his birth, type of the annunciation of Messiah's birth (Gen. xvii. 17); and Sarah too, with some degree of incredulity because of the improbability at her age (xviii. 12), but at his birth with thankful joy towards God, saying "God hath made me to laugh, so that all that hear will laugh with me" (xxi. 6, 7; comp. Isa. liv. 1). His miraculous conception and naming before birth typify Messiah (Luke i., Matt. i.). Born at Gerar when Abraham was 100 years old. "Mocked" by Ishmael (who was "born after the flesh") at the weaning feast; the mocking, as Paul implies, containing the germ and spirit of persecution, pre-fantly sneering at the object of the promise. The child of the bondswoman must therefore give place to the child of the free-woman born "by promise." Whilst the believing parents "laughed" Ishmael "mocked" with the laugh of derision and spite. I. is type of the believing "children of the promise," "born after the Spirit," therefore "children of the free" church, "heirs according to the promise," persecuted by the children of legal and carnal bondage, but ultimately about to "inherit all things" to the exclusion of the carnal (Gal. iv. 22-31, v. 1, iii. 29; Rev. xxi. 7, 8). I.'s submission (at 25 years of age; Josephus, Ant. i. 13, § 2) to his father's will when binding him, and his bearing the wood for his own intended sacrifice, make him a lively type of Him who bore His own cross to Calvary (John xix. 17), and whose language was, "Lo I come to do Thy will O God" (Ps. xl. 7, 8; Heb. x. 7). His living still after the three days (Gen. xxii. 4) in which he was dead in Abraham's purpose prefigures Messiah's resurrection on the third day. The scene of the sacrifice, mount Moriah, was probably that of Christ's suffering. What I.'s sacrifice wanted to perfect the type was actual death and vicarious substitution; the offering of the ram's life instead of the human life, hereby saved, supplied the defect; the ram and I. jointly complete the type. I. typifies Christ's Godhead, the ram His manhood (Theodoret) "caught in a thicket by his horns" as Jesus was crowned with thorns. I. was of too excellent a nature to be slain, for God's law gives no sanction to human sacrifices. The Father, in love to us, prepared a human body (Heb. x. 5) for His Son, which can suffer death, the penalty which Divine righteousness required for our sin; Christ's Godhead could not suffer. The manhood and Godhead formed one Christ, at once the Son of man and the Son of God, as I. and the ram formed one joint type. Thus Abraham had the wonderful honour of representing the Father, and I., the only son of the promise, was the most remarkable of all the types of the Son Messiah. Abraham herein had the glimpse which he had desired of Messiah's day "and was glad" (I. meaning laughter flowing from gladness) (John viii. 56); not that he fully comprehended the anti-typical meaning. So Heb. xi. 19, "from whence (from the jaws of death, comp. 2 Cor. i. 9, 10) he received him back in a parable," i.e. in the way of a typical representation of Christ's death and resurrection. So the slain goat and the scapegoat jointly on the day of atonement represented Christ's death and resurrection. By this work "Abraham's faith was made perfect" (Jas. ii. 21-23), not was revived, but attained its crowning development. His "faith" alone was "counted for righteousness" long before, and he was justified before God (Gen. xv. 6). By this work he was also "justified" evidently before men. Philo Byblius preserves from Sanchoniatho the Phœnician tradition, "Cronus, whom the Phœnicians call Israel, being king, having an only son by a nymph, Anobret, called Jahoud (Heb. Jahid), even now the Phœnician name for only begotten, when perils from wars were impending, having clothed his son in royal apparel, offered him upon an altar which he built" (Euseb. Præp. Evang., i. 10). This corruption of the Scripture history of I.'s sacrifice was based on the heathen idea of the most precious human sacrifice being needed to appease the gods in times of calamity. So the king of Moab sacrificed his son to Chemosh when sore pressed by Israel, Judah, and Edom (2 Kings iii. 27). The idea, though wrong in its application, rested on a primeval tradition of God's justice having appointed the sacrifice of precious life as the atonement for sin. Abraham's trustful loving obedience to the true God, at the cost of the greatest self sacrifice, was by the test shown to be at least equal to that of idolaters to their false gods. The angel's intervention, the ram's substitution, and the prohibition of the human sacrifice prevent the possibility of supposing God sanctions any human sacrifice save that of the Antitype. Not in blind credulity, for Abraham had now long experience that God can order nothing wrong or harsh to His people, but in faith "accounting that God was able to raise His son even from the dead," he obeyed.

At 40 I. married his cousin Rebekah, daughter of Bethuel, Nahor's son, by whom at 60 he had twin sons, Esau and Jacob. His contemplative character appears in his "going out to meditate" or pray "in the field at the eventide." The death of his mother Sarah just before (Gen. xxiii.) naturally pressed upon his spirit, and his resource in affliction was prayerful meditation, a type of Him who "went out into a mountain apart to pray" (Matt. xiv. 23), his calm and submissive temper also prefiguring the meek and lowly Lamb of God (Isa. liii. 7). Solitude and prayer suit best the wounded spirit. That Sarah's death was uppermost in his meditation is implied most artlessly in what follows: I. "brought Rebekah into his mother Sarah's tent, and he loved her, and was comforted after his mother's death." Rebekah supplied the void in his heart and home.

Weakness and partiality for Esau, probably owing to the contrast which Esau's bold spirit presented to his own gentle unadventurous character, were his failings; his partaking of his favourite dish, venison, the produce of his son's hunting, confirmed his selfish partiality. The mother loved the steady, quiet Jacob. The gift from God of the twin sons was the answer to I.'s prayer, after 20 years of childless marriage; for God in giving the greatest blessings delays fulfilling His promise in order to call forth His people's persevering, waiting, prayerful faith (Gen. xxv. 21). When I. was 137, the age at which Ishmael died 14 years before, the thought of his brother's death at that age suggested thoughts of his own, and the desire to bless his favourite before dying. As he lived 43 years afterwards, to see Jacob return from Mesopotamia, he probably was now dangerously sick; hence, loathing ordinary food, he longed to have "savory meat such as he loved." Esau invited him to "arise and sit" to eat of his venison; implying that he was laid in his bed. Moreover "he trembled exceedingly" when Esau came in. Esau's words imply his thinking I. near death, "the days of mourning for my father are at hand." I.'s unexpected prolongation of life probably deterred Esau from his murderous purpose against Jacob for having stolen his blessing. He revered his father amidst all his wildness, and finally joined with Jacob in paying the last mark of respect at his father's grave, even as I. and Ishmael had met at Abraham's burial. I's carnal partiality and Rebekah's tortuous policy eventuated in their being left in their old age by both children, Esau disappointed and disinherited, Jacob banished to a long and distant servitude; the idols of God's children becoming their scourges, in order to bring them back to Himself (1 Cor. xi. 32, Jer. ii. 19). His equivocation as to his wife, as if she were his sister, through fear of Abimelech's people at Gerar, was another blemish in I. (Gen. xxi.) So Abram had erred in Egypt and in this same Philistine kingdom (xx.) under a king also bearing the common title ABIMELECH [see], i.e. my father a king. I had obeyed God's vision in not going down to Egypt, a place of spiritual danger though abundant in food, but sojourning in Gerar during the famine. Want of godly and manly firmness betrayed him into the untruth. His wife was not taken into Abimelech's house, as Sarah had been. Abimelech discovering the real state of the case reproved him, and warned his people not to touch him or Rebekah. His meek, peaceable, and non-self-assertive character appears in his successively yielding to the grasping herdmen of Gerar the wells Esek (strife) and Sitnah (hatred). So the Lord who had given him a hundredfold increase in his harvests made room for him at last; and he retained the well Rehoboth (room) with a further contention, and made a covenant with Abimelech; comp. Rom. xii. 18-21, Matt. v. 5, 23, Prov. xvi. 7. I lived to see Jacob whom he had sent with his blessing (for faith at last prevailed over his partiality, and he gave Jacob the blessing of Abraham, Gen. xxviii. 1, 4) to seek a wife in Padanaram return with a large family to him at Hebron (xxxv. 27), before he died at 180; the longest lived of the three patriarchs, the least migratory, the least profane, and the least favoured with revelations. II.

MAUSOLEUM OF HEBRON.

was buried in the cave of Machpelah. His blessing Jacob and Esau "even (Gr.) concerning things to come," as if they were actually present, and not merely concerning things present, is quoted (Heb. xi. 20) as evidencing his faith; as similar dying charges evidenced Jacob's and Joseph's faith. A faithful husband of one wife (comp. Eph. v. 23, etc.), unlike Abraham and Jacob, of tender affections, he was a man of suffering rather than action; having the Divine favour so markedly that Abimelech and his wife said, "we saw certainly that the Lord was with thee" (Gen. xxvi. 28). As Abraham foreshadowed the unclouded early history of the nation, and Jacob their commercial unwarlike later course, so I. their intermediate days of peace and separation from the nations in their fertile land of promise. As Abraham is associated with morning prayer, and Jacob with night prayer, so I. with evening prayer (xix. 27, xxviii. 11, xxxiii. xiv. 63). God is still "the God of I.," who is one of the triad with whom the children of the kingdom shall sit down at the resurrection of the just (Luko xx. 37, 38, etc.; Matt. viii. 11, etc.). Isaiah: Isaiahu, Heb. "the salvation of Jehovah," his favourite expression, which means the same as the name Jesus, who is the grand subject of his prophecies, and in whom in the N.T. the name Jehovah merges, being never found in Scripture after the O.T. The Jahu in Isaiahu shows that Jahveh is the more correct form than Jehovah. Son of Amoz (not Amos), a younger contemporary of Jonah, Amos, and Hosea in Israel, and of Micah in Judah. His call to the full exercise of the prophetic office (vi.) was in the same year that king Uzziah died, probably before his death. 754 B.C., the time of the building of Rome, Judah's destined scourge, whose kingdom was to stretch on to the Messianic times which form the grand subject of I's prophecies. Whatever prophecies were delivered by I. previously were oral, and not recorded because not designed for all ages.

(1) Chaps. i.-vi. are all that were written for the church universal of the prophecies of the first 20 years of his ministry. New epochs in the relations of the church to the world were fittingly marked by revelations to and through prophets. God had given Judah abundant prosperity during Uzziah's reign of 52 years, that His goodness might lead the people to loving obedience, just as in northern Israel He had restored prosperity during the brilliant reign of Jeroboam II. with the same gracious design. Israel was only hardened in pride by prosperity, so was soon given over to ruin. I. comes forward at this point to warn Judah of a like danger. Moreover, in the reigns of AHAAZ and HEZEKIAH [see both] Israel and Judah came into conflict with the Asiatic empires. The prophets were now needed to interpret Jehovah's dealings, that the people might recognise His righteous judgments as well as His merciful long-suffering. (2) Chaps. vii.-x. 4 relate to Ahaz' reign. (3) Chap. x. 5-xii. to the first 15 years of Hezekiah's reign probably. As also (1) chaps. xiii.-xxiii. as to foreign nations. (5) Chaps. xxiv.-xxvii. on the last times of the world, and of Judah, the representative and future head of the churches. (6) Chaps. xxviii.-xxxiii. concern Ephraim's overthrow, Judah's impious folly, the danger of the league with Egypt, their straits and deliverance from Assyria; chap. xxviii. before the sixth year of Hezekiah, when Israel fell; the rest before his 14th year of reign. (7) Chaps. xxxiv., xxxv., denounce God's judgments against His people's enemies of whom Edom is representative, and the blessed state that shall follow.

The historical section (chap. xxxvi.-

xxxix.) as to Sennacherib, Assyria, and Babylon, forms the fitting appendix to the prophecies concerning Assyria mainly, and the preface to the latter portion of the book, concerning the deliverance from Babylon. I's generation had before their eyes the historical fact of the Assyrian invasion, and the extraordinary deliverance from it, as recorded by I. The prophet further announced to Hezekiah that all his treasures which he had ostentatiously shown to the Babylonian ambassadors should be carried off to that very land, and his descendants be made eunuchs in the Babylonian king's palace, the world on which Judah rested instead of on God being made her scourge. Fittingly then followed the cheering prophecy, "Comfort ye My people," etc. Ages should elapse before the realization of this comforting assurance of deliverance. The history of the deliverance from Assyria, accomplished according to the previous prophecy, was the pledge that the far off deliverance from Babylon also, because foretold, would surely come to pass. Thus the historical section, midway between the earlier and later parts of I's book, forms the connecting link spiritually and historically between the two; it closes the one epoch, and introduces the other, so combining all I's prophecies in one unity. The fulfilment of his past prophecies constituted the prophet's credentials to the unborn generation on which the Babylonian captivity should fall, that they might securely trust his word foretelling the future deliverance by Cyrus. "It is incredible that the latter chapters, if not I's but of a later date, should have been tacked on to his existing prophecies with the interval of the four historical chapters thrown in as a connecting link to complete the unity of his alleged writings as a whole" (Stanley Leathes). The "comfort" applies mainly to ages subsequent to his own; this accords with the principle stated 1 Pet. i. 10-12, 2 Pet. i. 20, 21. But it also applied to his own and all ages before Christ's consummated kingdom. For the law of prophetic suggestion carried him on to the greater deliverance from the spiritual Babylon and the God-opposed world power and Satan, by Cyrus' Antitype, Messiah, the Saviour of the present elect church gathered from Jews and Gentiles, and the Restorer of Israel and Head of the worldwide kingdom yet to come. Even in the former part Babylon's downfall through Elamite and Persian assailants is twice foretold (xiii. and xxi.). The mellowness of tone in the second part implies that it was the ripe fruit of his old age, some time after the beginning of Hezekiah's last 15 years. He is no longer the godly politician taking part in public life in vindication of the truth, but is far away in the spirit amidst the Babylonian exiles whom he cheers. More contemplative and ideal in this part, he sears aloft in glorious visions of the future, no longer tied down to the existing political circumstances of his people, as in the former part. The threefold theme of this latter part is stated at the outset (xl. 2). (1)

Jerusalem's warfare is accomplished; (2) her iniquity is pardoned; (3) she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins. The divisions are marked by the ending twice [the "salvation" foretold is not for the unfaithful, but for the believing and waiting true Israelites; for] "there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked" (1) xl.—xlviii. 22; (2) xlix.—lvii.; (3) lviii.—lxvi., which exchanges the previous refrain for the awful one that with moving pathos describes the apostates' final doom, "their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched, and they shall be an abhorring to all flesh!" The first of the three concerns the outward deliverance from Babylon by Cyrus. The second, Messiah's advent prefigured by Cyrus. The third, the coming glory of God's kingdom on earth, along with judgments on the ungodly. The contemporary Micah (iv. 8-10) foretells the same exile in Babylon and the return from it, so that it is no objection to the genuineness of xl.—lxvi. that herein I. passes from Assyria to the restoration from Babylon much more than a century later. Moses' general prophecy (Lev. xxvii. 33, Dent. xxviii. 64) had assumed more definiteness in Ahijah's specification of the direction of the exile, "beyond the river," in Jeroboam's time (1 Kings xiv. 15), and Amos v. 27, "beyond Damascus"; and now the place is defined, Babylon. Moreover, I.'s reproof of the prevailing neglect of the temple worship, and his allusion to the slaying of children in the valleys (Isa. lviii. 5), and mention of Hephzibah (Hezekiah's wife) in lxii. 4, all accord with the times of I. The former part ends with the Babylonian exile (xxxix. 6); the latter part begins with the deliverance from it, to remove the deep gloom which the prophecy of the captivity caused to all who looked for redemption in Israel. The portion xl.—lxvi. has no heading of its own, which is accounted for best by its connection with the previous part, bringing it under the same heading, i. I.

The whole book falls into the sacred seven divisions: (1) I.—xii.; (2) xiii.—xxvii., the burdens and their sequel; (3) xxviii.—xxxv.; (4) xxxvi.—xxxix.; and the three divisions (a sacred ternary) of xl.—lxvi. The former part itself also, before the historic, may be divided into seven; see above. The return of the Lord's ransomed with everlasting joy in the last chapter of the former part (xxxv. 10) is the starting point of and the text expanded in the latter part; comp. li. 11. Josephus (Ant. xi. 1, § 1, 2) says that Cyrus was induced by I.'s prophecies (xlv. 33, xlv. 1, 13) to help the Jews to return and rebuild their temple. Ezra i. confirms this. Cyrus in his edict refers to the prophecies of the latter portion, which assign him the kingdoms from Jehovah and the duty of rebuilding His temple. Probably he adopted from them his historical name Cyrus (Coresch). Subsequent prophets imitate the latter portion (Jer. i. 34, comp. Isa. xlvii. 4; Jer. li. 6, 45 with Isa. xlviii. 20). "The Holy One of Israel" is a characteristic phrase in the latter as in the former parts, and occurs but three times elsewhere in O.T. It marks God's holy faithfulness to His covenanted promises. Jeremiah borrows it. Luke (iv. 17) quotes lxi. as I.'s, the passage read by Jesus Christ in the Nazareth synagogue.

The definiteness of the prophecies makes it impossible that they were shrewd political guesses from probabilities. Thus I. foretells Judah's deliverance from the Assyrian invasion, not by Egyptian aid (the only seeming possible deliverer), but by the Lord directly. On the other hand I. announces the captivity in Babylon when as yet it was but a secondary power and moreover in alliance with Judah, and further the return of the exiles. Eichhorn admits that they are not vague poetical fancies, but "veiled historical descriptions." Blunt (Undesigned Coinc.) notices the absence of such allusions as one in the Babylonish captivity would have made and the presence of allusions to idolatry which had almost no place in Judah after the captivity. This and such allusions as that to the stopping of the water fountains outside the city, the display of Hezekiah's treasure, all accord with I.'s prophesying under Hezekiah. Chap. liii. minutely depicts Messiah's sufferings ages before the event, as Jews, unwilling witnesses, admit, whilst evading the acceptance of Jesus by various makeshifts. Its testimony convinced the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts viii.) and must convince all who seek the truth. Israel in the Babylonian exile, suffering as God's representative amidst heathen conquerors, is viewed as "the servant of Jehovah"; but as the mass of Jews were suffering for their sins the idea of "servant of Jehovah" limited itself to the elect, the holy seed of Israel's future. Then in the fullest sense Israel, the "elect servant of Jehovah," becomes concentrated in MESSIAH, the innocent sufferer atoning for the guilty, the seed of an everlasting and holy generation (xlii. 1-7, xlv. 1, xlix. 3-25, lii. liii.). Messiah appears as Prophet xlii. 4, as Priest liii., as King xlix. 7, lii. 15. His sufferings are the appointed path to His glory (liii. 11, 12). They are borne as a vicarious penalty for us: "the chastisement of our peace was upon Him; . . . the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all" (4-6). The mystical union of Messiah the Head and the members is implied in His being called "Israel," just as the N. T. church is called "Christ" (1 Cor. xii. 12, Rom. xvi. 7). He is the topmost "Branch" of which Israel is the body of the tree. He is also "the Root of David" as well as the "rod out of the stem of Jesse" (xi. 1, Rev. xxii. 16), "a tender plant, a root out of a dry ground" (liii. 2). Prophecy is not soothing at random. It rests on law, and that law the character of God. Having deep insight into the eternal principles on which God governs the world, that sin entails judgment but that God's covenant mercy to His people is unchangeable, the prophets speak accordingly. Babylon was then under Assyria. It had revolted unsuccessfully, but the elements of its subsequent greatness were existing. The Holy Spirit enlightened I.'s natural powers to foresee its rise and his spiritual faculties to foresee its fall, the sure result, in God's ways, of the pride which pagan success generates; also Judah's restoration as the covenant people with whom God according to His immutable faithfulness would not be writh for ever. I.'s politics consisted in insisting on conversion as the only remedy for the nation's disorders. Rebuke, threatening, invitation, and promise succeed in regular order. The fundamental idea is in xxvi. 7-9; comp. Lev. x. 3, Amos iii. 2.

His wife is called "the prophetess," and must therefore have had the prophetic gifts. His children "were for signs" [see IMMANUEL]. Shear-jashub, "the remnant shall return," and Maher-shalal-hash-baz, "speeding to the spoil he hasteth to the prey," intimate the two chief points of his prophecies. Jehovah's judgments on the world yet His mercy to the elect. I.'s garment of sackcloth was a silent preaching by action, he embodied the repentance he taught. History as written by the prophets is retroverted prophecy. Spiritual insight into the past, inspired by God, implies insight into the future and vice versa. Hence the O. T. histories (1 and 2 Sam. and 1 and 2 Kings) were written by contemporary prophets, Samuel, Nathan, Iddo, I., etc., and are classed with the prophetic books. The CHRONICLES [see] are not classed so, and therefore can hardly be their composition, but probably Ezra's, gathered from the public records and historical monographs of the prophets (as I.'s life of Uzziah and of Hezekiah: 2 Chron. xxvi. 22, xxxii. 32). The historical books from Joshua onwards and the prophetic books from I. form a bipartite whole of prophetic writings called "the prophets"; for the history of the past in the former part is as prophetic as the history of the future in the latter part.

His ministry was exercised at Jerusalem. "The valley of vision" (xxii. 1) may imply that it was in "the lower city" he resided and saw visions, though "valley" may refer to Jerusalem generally, surrounded by hills higher than Zion and Moriah. The Talmud, from an old genealogical roll found in Jerusalem, and from the Palestinian Targum on 2 Kings xxi. 16, states that king Manasseh "sawed I. asunder" with a wooden saw, to which the allusion may be in Heb. xi. 37. Chap. i. 1 shows that none of the collection of prophecies of which that is the heading were written under Manasseh. They were collected by I. himself in the close of Hezekiah's reign. Then at the beginning of Manasseh's reign I. fell a victim to the persecuting idolatry which superseded Jehovah's worship. The pretext was that I. had said he had seen Jehovah (vi.), in opposition to Exod. xxxiii. 20. This accords with 2 Kings xxi. 16, "Manasseh shed innocent blood very much." That I. served Hezekiah appears implied in 2 Chron. xxxii. 32.

The chronological arrangement favours

the view that I. himself collected his prophecies into one volume. Excepting a few of similar contents grouped together, the several portions are placed according to their dates. The former part ending with the historical section was more for the public in general; the latter part is his prophetic legacy to the faithful few, analogous to Moses' last speech and our Lord's closing discourses to His chosen disciples.

The Messianic hopes in I. are so vivid that Jerome (Ad Paulinum) calls his book not a prophecy but the "Gospel," "he is not so much a prophet as an evangelist." The "Shiloh" (tranquilliser) of Gen. xlix. 10 appears in I. as "the Prince of peace" (Isa. ix. 6). He is represented as "King" in Ps. ii., xlv., lxxii., ex. I. develops most His priestly and prophetic offices; Ps. ex. His royal priesthood, I. His suffering priesthood; this last, especially in the latter portion, addressed to the faithful elect, whereas in the former part, addressed to the whole people, he dwells on Messiah's glory, the antidote to the fears of the people and the pledge to assure them that the kingdom of God, represented by Judah, would not be overwhelmed by Syria, Israel, and Assyria; so that they should trust wholly in Him and not in Egypt.

His style is simple and sublime, intermediate between the lowly tenderness of Jeremiah and the bold exuberance of Ezekiel. The variation of style in the latter portion proves, not its spuriousness, but I.'s power to vary his style with his subject. In it he is tender, and abounds in repetitions such as suit comforting exhortations. The many epithets attached to God's name are designed as so many stays whereon faith may rest and repel despair. Peculiarities characteristic of I. occur in the latter portion as in the former, e.g. "to be called," i.e. to be; instead of synonyms the same words repeated in the parallel members of verses; hymns interspersed; "the remnant of olive trees," etc., for the remnant of people who escape judgments. Comp. also lxx. 25 with xi. 6, li. 11 with xxxv. 10. The form is Heb. poetical parallelism, varied however according to the subject. Judah and Jerusalem, not the more apostate and doomed Israel, are the people addressed. No prophet is quoted so frequently by our Lord and His apostles.

His secret songs are a prominent feature. Thus chap. xii., closing the section vii.—xii., aptly called "the book of Immanuel," is the future song of redeemed Israel, answering to that at the Red Sea (Exod. xv.; comp. Rev. xv. 2, 3). A zinn xxv.—xxvii. is the lyric prophecy of the downfall of the world city, the coming blessed personal epiphany of the Lord to His people, and the destruction of the foe (xxv.), Judah's and Israel's resurrection politically and spiritually (xxvi.), the church vineyard ever kept by Jehovah (xxvii.); it forms the finale to xiii.—xxiii. concerning the heathen foes of Israel. The frequent alliteration of like sounds in xxv.—xxvii. effectively realises to the ear, as well as the eye and the understanding, the deeply moving finale. His elegant power appears in xv., xvi., concerning Moab.

Iseah. Daughter of Haran, Abram's brother; sister of Milcah and Lot. Same as SARAI [see, and ABRAHAM], according to Jewish tradition (Josephus, Ant. i. 6, § 5).

Ishbah. (1 Chron. iv. 17.) Thought to be one of Mered's sons by BITIMAH [see].

Ishbak=leaving behind. Son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2, 1 Chron. i. 32). From him sprang the N. Arabians. There is a valley "Salak" akin to the name. The Keturahites extended from the borders of Palestine to the Persian gulf. I., as his name implies, left behind his brethren, having gone forth first. His dwelling was probably far away towards the Persian gulf, and also reaching into the peninsula.

Ishbi-benob. Son of Rapha. A Philistine giant, who attacked David and was slain by Abishai (2 Sam. xxi. 16, 17).

Ishbosheth=man of shame; substituted for his original name Esh-baal (1 Chron. viii. 33, ix. 39) in contempt of Baal, from some connection of the family with whom he had been named; so Jerub-baal, Jerub-besheth (Jud. viii. 35, Hos. ix. 10). [See ARNER and DAVID.] Youngest of Saul's four sons, and his successor according to eastern usage, though Mephishosheth (whose name was similarly changed from Meribbaal), son of his eldest brother Jonathan, was alive. At Mahanaim, the ancient sanctuary E. of Jordan, beyond the reach of the Philistine conquerors, he was raised to the throne by Abner his valiant kinsman (2 Sam. ii. 8). This was after a five years' interregnum during which the Philistines and David had the country divided between them; for David had reigned according to 2 Sam. ii. 10, 11 "seven years and six months" over Judah in the old capital Hebron, whilst I. reigned only "two years." Even northern and eastern Israel, but for Abner, was inclined to have accepted David (ii. 7, iii. 17). I. was 35 at the battle of Gilboa, and 40 when, by Abner's influence, after a five years' effort he ascended the throne "over all Israel" except Judah. His charge against Abner of connection with his father Saul's concubine Rizpah was, in eastern usage, tantamount to a charge of treasonously aspiring to the throne (iii. 7; comp. 1 Kings ii. 13-22). Abner in a passion vowed to transfer the kingdom to David. I. durst not answer; and when David, sending the message to I. direct, required him to restore his former wife Michal, I., constrained by Abner, forced his sister to leave her weeping husband Phaltiel and accompany Abner to David (13-16), for her restoration was demanded by David as the first preliminary in treating with Abner. Abner's death deprived I. of the last prop of his throne; "his hands were feeble, and all the Israelites were troubled" (iv. 1). Two sons of Rimmon of Beeroth, formerly a Canaanite city leagued with Gibeon (Josh. ix. 17). Baana and Reebab, captains of marauding "bands" which used to make raids on Judah (iii. 22, iv. 2), took this opportunity of revenging Saul's slaughter of their kinsmen the Gibeonites (2 Sam. xxi. 1). Pretending to fetch wheat from the inner court for their men, in the still noon when I. was taking his midday sleep on his bed, they smote and took away his head, making their escape all that night through the valley of the Jordan. Presenting it to David, as though it would be a welcome gift because Saul the father had been David's "enemy who sought his life," and suppressing mention of their own murderous treachery, they with hypocritical profanation of God's name said: "Behold . . . the Lord hath avenged my lord the king this day of Saul and his seed." But David reproached them with their wicked murder of "a righteous person in his own house upon his bed," and commanded his young men to slay them, and to hang up over the pool in Hebron their severed hands and feet. The head of I. was duly buried in the sepulchre of Abner in Hebron.

Ishmael. 1 Chron. iv. 3, 4.

Ishmael [see HAGAR, ISAAC, ABRAHAM]=God hears; the name of God is El, the God of might, in relation to the world at large; not Jehovah, His name in relation to His covenant people. 1. Born of Hagar when Abraham was 86 (Gen. xvi. 15, 16), dwelling at Mamre. "Jehovah," in covenant with Abraham her husband, "heard her affliction" in the wilderness whither she had fled from Sarah. The angel of Jehovah described I. in a prophecy which history is continually verifying, "he will be a wild man," Heb. a wild ass man, i.e. fierce and wild as the ass of the desert, the type of restless unbridled lawlessness. Job xi. 12, xxiv. 5: "behold, as wild asses in the desert, so they forth to their work, rising betimes for a prey (for travelling in the East is at an early hour, to be before the heat): the wilderness yieldeth food for them and for their children"; i.e., these Bedouin robbers, with the unbridled wildness of the beast of the desert, go thither. Robbery is "their work"; the wilderness which yields no food to other men "yieldeth food for them" by the plunder of caravans. "His hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him"; an exact picture of Bedouin life. Many conquerors have marched into the Arabian wilderness, but they have never been able to catch this wild ass and to tame him" (Baumgarten). "And he shall dwell in the presence of (in front of) his brethren," in close proximity to their kindred races, hovering round, but never mingling with them, never disappearing by withdrawal to some remote region, but remaining in that high table land S.E. of Judæa to which Judæa may be said to look. Or else "to the E. (for as the orientals faced towards the E. in taking the points of the compass, the front meant the E.) of his brethren." In Job i. 3 the Arabs are called "the sons of the East."

BEDOUIN ARAB.

I. was circumcised at 13 (Gen. xvii. 25), at which age Arabs and Mahometans therefore still circumcise. Abraham's love for him appears in his exclaiming, upon God's giving the promise of seed by Sarah, then 90, Abraham himself being 100, "Oh that I might live before Thee!" whether the words mean that he desires that I. (instead of the seed promised to Sarah) might be heir of the promises, or, as is more consonant with Abraham's faith, that I. might be accepted before God so as to share in blessings. Then God promised: "I have blessed him, . . . twelve princes shall he beget, and I will make him a great nation" (comp. xxv. 12-17). (See ISAAC on I.'s expulsion for "mocking," and HAGAR on I. being called a "child," or "lad" (ver. 14, 15, 17), being at the time 15 or 16; the bread and bottle, but not the child, were "put on her shoulder.") After God's saving them they "dwelt in the wilderness of Paran," the El Tih, the desert of Israel's wanderings; stretching from the wady Arabah on the E. to the gulf of Suez on the W., and from Sinai on the S. to Palestine on the N. According to eastern usage she, as a parent, chose a wife for her son, an Egyptian, possibly the mother of his 12 sons; rabbinical and Arab tradition give him a second wife; the daughter being termed "sister of Nebaioth" implies probably that the other brothers had a different mother. Esau married his daughter Mahalath before I.'s death, for it is written "Esau went unto I." (xxviii. 9). At 137 I. "died in the presence of all his brethren" (xxv. 17, 18); i.e., fulfilling the prediction of the angel of Jehovah to Hagar (see above), I. died, his nomad descendants stretching from Havilah S.E. and Shur S.W. towards the N.E., i.e. Assyria, in fact traversing the whole Arabian desert from the Euphrates to the Red Sea. I. himself cannot have settled far from Abraham's neighbourhood, for he joined with Isaac in the burial of his father (xxv. 9), and burial in the East follows a few hours after death. I. first went into the wilderness of Beersheba, then into that of Paran. "The East country" unto which Abraham sent away his sons by concubines, not to be in the way of Isaac, must therefore have been in those regions (Gen. xxv. 6, 18). The people of Arabia are called "children of the East," Bene Kedem (Jud. vi. 3, Job i. 3), in modern times Saracens, i.e. "Easterns" [see EAST]. I.'s 12 sons enumerated Gen. xxv. 13-15 were fathers of tribes, as "their towns and their castles," or rather "hamlets," called after them, imply (Num. xxxi. 10). These "hamlets" were collections of rude dwellings of stones piled on one another and covered with tent cloths, often ranged in a circle [see HAZEROH].

The Bible does not, as scepticism asserts, state that all the Arabs sprang from I. Nay, Joktanites and even Onshites in the S. and S.E. form a large element in Arab blood. In all the northern tribes which are of Ishmaelite descent, the characteristics foretold appear, they are "wild . . . their hand against every man, and every man's hand against them"; but in S. Arabia, where Joktanite and other blood exists, these characteristics are less seen. The Ishmaelite element is the chief one of the Arab nation, as the native traditions before Mahomet and the language concur with the Bible in proving. The pagan law of blood revenge necessitates every Arab's knowing the names of his ancestors for four generations, so that the race is well defined. The term "Ishmaelites" was applied in course of time to the Midianites, sprung from Abraham and Keturah, and not from I., because the Ishmaelites being the more powerful tribe gave their name as a general one to neighbouring associated tribes (Gen. xxxvii. 25, 28, 36; Ps. lxxxiii. 6), the nomad tribes of Arabia (Jud. viii. 24). Before Mahomet, religion in the middle and S. of Arabia was fetish and cosmic worship, but in the N. relics of the primitive faith of I. survived, and numbers became Karaite Jews or held the corrupt form of Christianity which was all they knew of it. The dissatisfaction felt with both of these creeds pioneered the way for Mahomet's success. The Arab conquerors have won a hundred thrones and established their Mahometanism from the Senegal to the Indus, from the Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

2. 1 Chron. viii. 28, ix. 44. 3. 2 Chron. xix. 11. 4. 2 Chron. xxiii. 1. 5. 2 Chron. x. 22.

6. Son of Nathaniah, son of Elishama of the seed royal of Judah (Jer. xl. 7-xli. 15; 2 Kings xxv. 23-25). Possibly descended from Elishama, David's son (2 Sam. v. 16). During the siege of Jerusalem I. had fled to Baalis, king of Ammon, E. of Jordan. Probably I. was of Ammonite blood on the mother's side, as some Jewish kings had Ammonite women in their harems (1 Kings xi. 1). Baalis (called from the idol Baal) his host urged him to slay Gedaliah who under the Babylonian king governed Judæa and the population which had not been carried away. I.'s royal descent fired his envy and ambition; hence he lent a ready ear to the plot proposed by the ancient foe of Judah. I. as well as the brothers Johanan and Jonathan, sons of Kareah, had commanded separate bands which watched the issue of the siege from the S.E. side of Jordan; "the forces in the fields," i.e. the pasture grounds of Moab (Jer. xl. 7, 13), the modern Belka. These captains crossed the Jordan to pay their respects to Gedaliah at Mizpah, N. of Jerusalem, upon his appointment. In spite of Johanan's open warning of I.'s intention, and even private offer to slay I. in order to avert the death of Gedaliah and its evil consequences to the Jewish remnant, the latter in generous unsuspiciousness refused to believe the statement. Thirty days after, in the seventh month I. and "ten men, princes of the king," at an hospitable entertainment given them by Gedaliah slew him with such secrecy that no alarm was given (comp. Ps. xli. 9), and then slew the Jews and Chaldeans, the men of war immediately about his person (not the rest, Jer. xl. 16), with him. Jeremiah, who usually was residing there, was providentially elsewhere. No man knew it outside Mizpah for a time. So on the second day fourscore devotees with shaven beards, rent clothes, having cut themselves with heathen mutilations (see Lev. xix. 27, 28; Deut. xiv. 1), were seen by I. from the higher ground on which he was, advancing from the N. with offerings and incense in their hand, to bring them to "the house of the Lord," i.e. to the place where the temple had stood, and which was still sacred. They came from Shechem, Shiloh, and Samaria, where such heathen usages prevailed, expressive of sorrow; they hereby indicated their grief at the destruction of the temple and city. I. met them, pretending to weep like themselves, and said, "Come to Gedaliah," as if he were one of his retinue. When they came into the midst of the city, or of the courtyard (Josephus), he closed the entrances and butchered all, except ten who promised, if spared, to show him treasures of wheat, barley, oil, and honey. His greediness and needs overcame his cruelty, or he would not have spared even the ten. The 70 corpses he threw into the pit or cistern made by Asa to have a water supply when Baasha was about to besiege the city (1 Kings xv. 22); as Jehu did to Abaziah's 42 relatives, and as Nana Sahib did in our own times at Cawnpore. Next he carried off king Zedekiah's daughters, with their eunuchs and Chaldean guard; and, doubtless being largely reinforced, carried away all the remaining people at Mizpah by way of Gibeon on the N. (Josephus says by Hebron round the S. end of the Dead Sea) towards Ammon, where probably he meant to sell them as slaves (Jer. xli. 10, 16). Johanan pursued and overtook him at the great waters in Gibeon (2 Sam. ii. 13). His captives gladly "cast about," i.e. came round and joined Johanan, who slew two of the ten princes (Jer. xli. 1, 2, 15), leaving I. with but eight to escape to Ammon. The result was a panic among the Jewish remnant in Judæa, as Johanan had foreseen when he warned Gedaliah. But now, in spite of Jeremiah's remonstrance from the Lord, he, instead of checking, promoted the panic, and led all the recovered captives, Jeremiah included, into Egypt (xli. 16, 17; xlii.; xliii. 5-7). The calamity, Gedaliah's murder and the consequent dispersion of the Jews, was and is commemorated by the fast of the seventh month (Zech. vii. 5, viii. 19), the third of Tisri. Ammon's share in this tragedy was avenged in accordance with the Lord's word (Jer. xlix. 1-6, Ezek. xxv. 1-7). The lessons from the history are, so long as pride, ambition, and revenge are harboured, men will ever scheme afresh to their own hurt. Scarcely had Jerusalem paid the awful penalty of her sin than her princes began new plots of violence and bloodshed. Zedekiah's perfidious rebellion had hardly been crushed when I. devised a fresh conspiracy. Nothing short of God's grace can correct the desperate depravity of man. The mystery that men of guileless simplicity fall victims to murderous treachery is one of many proofs that there is an enemy disordering the present world course. Faith looks above the cloud, and sees God ordering all things for the good of His people and for the punishment of the transgressors at the last. The coming judgment will vindicate God's ways, glorify the saints with Christ their King, deliver the earth from the ungodly and Satan their prince, who shall be cast out for ever. Even now one bad man is made the scourge of another. The nemesis of crime is sure to overtake the guilty at last. However cunningly and laboriously he weaves iniquity, the web which was on the point of success is in a moment scattered to the winds by the breath of God, and the victims escape. The only fruit I. derived from his crimes was being forced to flee as an outlaw, bearing about, Cain-like, the murderer's brand, and a self-torturing conscience, the earnest of the worm that never dieth.

Ishmaiah. 1 Chron. xxvii. 19.

Ishmerai. 1 Chron. viii. 18.

Ishod. Son of HAMMOLEKETH [see], i.e. the queen, sister of Gilead (1 Chron. vii. 18).

Ishpan. 1 Chron. viii. 22.

Ishbosh. A petty kingdom, part of Aram (2 Sam. x. 6, 8). Omitted in 1 Chron. xix. The sense probably is "the men of Tob" (Jud. xi. 3).

Ishuah. Gen. xli. 17, 1 Chron. vii. 30.

Ishuai. Num. xxvi. 41.

Ishui. Saul's second son by Ahinoam (1 Sam. xiv. 49, 50). The same as Abinadab, since his name does not appear in 1 Chron. viii. 33, ix. 39, nor in the battle of Gilboa (1 Sam. xxxi. 2), where Abinadab takes his place.

Isles. Heb. ayim, from orah "to inhabit," Shore land as opposed to sea, dry land as opposed to rivers. Isa. xlii. 15, "I will make the rivers islands." God will dry up the fountains of the heathen idolatry and oracles, i.e. their schools, doctrines, and institutions, the symbol of which is water (Vitrings). So the word is applied to all lands reached from Palestine by sea. Jer. xxv. 22, "the isles which are beyond the sea." Gen. x. 5, "the isles of the Gentiles" (Ps. lxxvii. 10, Isa. xli. 5, Zeph. ii. 11). Also Chittim, i.e. Cyprus and Mediterranean coasts (Jer. ii. 10; Num. xxiv. 24; Jer. xlvii. 1 marg., "the isle of Caphtor," i.e. Crete).

Ismachuah. 2 Chron. xxvi. 13.

Ismahiah. A Gibeonite chief of the men who left Saul, the head of their tribe, to join David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 1-4); "a mighty man among the 30 and over the 30."

Ispah. 1 Chron. viii. 16.

Israel. "soldier of," or "contender with, God." 1. The name given by the angel of Jehovah to Jacob, after by wrestling he had prevailed and won the blessing (Gen. xxxii. 26-28), "for thou hast contended with God and with men, and hast prevailed" (Hos. xii. 4). Sarah and Sur mean also to be a prince. A. V. combines both meanings: "as a prince hast thou power with God and with men," etc. 2. The name of the nation, including the whole 12 tribes. 3. The northern kingdom, including the majority of the whole nation, viz. ten tribes; or else all except Judah, Benjamin, Levi, Dan, and Simeon (1 Sam. xi. 8; 2 Sam. xx. 1; 1 Kings xii. 16). In 1 Kings xi. 13, 31, 32 Jeroboam was appointed by God to have ten tribes, Solomon's seed one; but two were left for David's line when Abijah gave ten out of the 12 pieces of his garment to Jeroboam. The numbers therefore must be understood in a symbolical rather than in a strictly arithmetical sense. Ten expresses completeness and totality in contrast with one, "the tribe of Judah only" (xii. 20); but "Benjamin" is included also (21; 2 Chron. xi. 3, 23). Levi was not counted in the political classification, it mainly joined Judah. Ephraim and Manasseh were counted as two. Judah included also Simeon, which was so far S. and surrounded by Judah's territory (Josh. xix. 1-9) that it could not have well formed part of the northern kingdom. Moreover several cities of Dan were included in "Judah," viz. Ziklag, which Achish gave David, Zorea, and Ajalon (2 Chron. xi. 10, xxviii. 18). These counterbalanced the loss to Judah of the northern part of Benjamin, including Bethel, Ramah, and Jericho, which fell to "I." (1 Kings xii. 29, xv. 17, 21, xvi. 34). Thus only nine tribes, and not all these, wholly remained to the northern kingdom. The sea coast was in the hands of I. from Acco to Japho, S. of this the Philistines held the coast. It is estimated Judah's extent was somewhat less than Northumberland, Durham, and Westmoreland; I.'s as large as Yorkshire, Lancashire, and Cumberland; and I.'s population in 957 B.C. 3,500,000 (2 Chron. xiii. 3).

The division was appointed by God as the chastisement of the house of David for the idolatries imported by Solomon's wives. The spreading of the contagion to the whole mass of the people was thus mercifully guarded against. Jeroboam's continued tenure of the throne was made dependent on his loyalty to God. Rehoboam's attempt to reduce the revolting tribes was divinely forbidden. JEROBOAM [see] recognised the general obligation of the law whilst he violated its details. His innovation was in the place of worship (Bethel and Dan instead of Jerusalem), and in the persons by whom it was to be performed (priests taken from the masses instead of from Levi), also in the time of the feast of tabernacles (the eighth instead of the seventh month). In the symbols, the calves, he followed Aaron's pattern at Sinai, which he himself had been familiarized to in Egypt; at the same time recognising the reality of God's deliverance of Israel out of Egypt in saying like Aaron, "Behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of Egypt" (1 Kings xii. 28; Exod. xxxii. 4, 8). His own miraculous punishment (1 Kings xiii.), the death of his son, the overthrow of the three royal dynasties, Jeroboam's, Baasha's, and Ahab's, as foretold by the prophets (Isa. viii., ix., xxviii.; Hosea; and Amos), the permanent removal of I. by Assyria, all attested God's abhorrence of idolatry. The wise design of God in appointing the separation between I. and Judah appears in its effect on Judah. It became her political interest to adhere to the Mosaic law. This was the ground of confidence to Abijah in battle with Jeroboam (2 Chron. xiii. 9-11). The Levites being cast out of office by Jeroboam left their suburbs and came to Judah. Rehoboam's chastisement for forsaking God's law, Judah also making high places, images, and groves (2 Kings xiv. 22, 23; 2 Chron. xii. 1, etc.), had a salutary effect on Aza and Jehoshaphat in succession. Excepting the period of apostasy resulting in the first instance from Jehoshaphat's unfortunate alliance with Ahab's family, a majority of Judah's kings were observers of the law, whereas there was not one king faithful to Jehovah in I.'s line of kings. Shechem, the original place of meeting of the nation under Joshua (xxiv. 1), was the first capital (1 Kings xii. 25); then Tirzah, famed for its loveliness (S. of Sol. vi. 4; 1 Kings xiv. 17, xv. 33, xvi. 8, 17, 23). Omri chose Samaria for its beauty, fertility, and commanding position (24); after a three years' siege it fell before the Assyrian king. Jezreel was the residence of some kings. Shiloh in Ephraim was the original seat of the sanctuary (Jud. xxi. 19, Josh. xviii. 1) before it was removed to Jerusalem. The removal was a source of jealousy to Ephraim, to obviate which the Maschil (instruction) of Asaph (Ps. lxxviii.) was written (see ver. 60, 67-69). Jealousy and pride, which were old failings of Ephraim, the leading tribe of the N. (Jud. viii. 1, xii.), were the real moving causes of the revolt from Judah, the heavy taxation was the ostensible cause. Joshua and Caleb represented Ephraim and Judah respectively in the wilderness, and Joshua took the lead in Canaan. It galled Ephraim now to be made subordinate. Hence flowed the readiness with which they hearkened to Absalom and their jealousy of Judah at David's restoration (2 Sam. xix. 41-43) and their revolting at the call of Sheba (xx. 1). The idolatry of Solomon alienated the godly; his despotic grandeur at the cost of the people diminished his general popularity (1 Kings xi. 14-40). The moment that God withdrew the influence that restrained the spirit of dissension, the disruption took place. Jeroboam adopted the calf idolatry for state policy, but it eventuated in state ruin. God made I.'s sin her punishment. Degradation of morality followed apostasy in religion and debasement of the priesthood. God's national code of laws, still in force, and the established idolatry were in perpetual conflict. The springs of national life were thereby poisoned.

Eight houses occupied the throne, revolution ushering in each successively. The kingdom's duration was 254 years, from 975 to 721 B.C. I's doom acted in some degree as a salutary warning to Judah, so that for more than a century (133½ years) subsequently its national existence survived. The prophets, extraordinarily raised up, were the only salt in I, to counteract her desperate corruption: Abijah, Elijah, Micaiah, Elisha, and Jonah, the earliest of the prophets who were writers of Holy Scripture. In the time of this last prophet God gave one last long season of prosperity, the long reign of Jeroboam II., if haply His goodness would lead the nation to repentance. This day of grace being neglected, judgment only remained. Revolt of Edom, Moab, and Ammon, the assaults of Syria under Benhadad and Hazael, and finally Assyria, executed God's wrath against the apostate people. Pul, Tiglath Pileser, Shalmaneser, Sargon, and Esarhaddon were the instruments (2 Kings xv., xvi., xvii.; Ezra iv. 2, 10; Isa. xs. 1). Abijah first foretold to Jeroboam at the beginning of the kingdom, "Jehovah shall root up I, and scatter them beyond the river" (1 Kings xiv. 15, Amos v. 27).

This kingdom was sometimes also designated "Ephraim" from its leading tribe (Isa. xvii. 3, Hos. iv. 17), as the southern kingdom "Judah" was so designated from the prominent tribe. Under Messiah in the last days Ephraim shall be joined to Judah; "the envy of Ephraim shall depart, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim" (Isa. xi. 13, Ezek. xxxvii. 16-22).

4. After the return from Babylon the nation was called "I," the people "Jews," by which designation they are called in Esther. The ideal name for the twelve tribes regarded as one whole even after the division (1 Kings xviii. 30, 31). The spiritual I., the church of the redeemed (Rom. ix. 6, Gal. vi. 16). What became of the scattered people is hard to discover. Many joined Judah, as Anna of Asher is found in Luke ii. 36. The majority were "scattered abroad" with the Jews, as James addresses "the twelve tribes." The Jews in Bokhara told Jos. Wolff "when the God of I. stirred up the spirit of Pul, king of Assyria, and Tiglath Pileser, they were carried away . . . even the Reubenites, Gadites, and half Manasseh, to Halab (now Balkh) and Habor (now Samarcand) and Hara (now Bokhara), and to the river Guzan (the Amos, Jehron, or Oxus). They were expelled by the Taghatay, the people of Genghis Khan; then they settled in Sabr Awar and Nishapoor (except some who went to China), in Khorasan. Centuries afterwards most returned to Bokhara, Samarcand, and Balkh. Timoor Koorckan (Tamerlane) gave them many privileges. The Jews of Bokhara said that many of Naphtali wander on the Aral mountains, and that the Kafir Secahpoosh on the Hindoo Koosh or Indian Caucasus are their brethren."

The Afghans style themselves the Bani Israel, "the sons of Israel," and by universal tradition among themselves claim descent from Saul, or Malik Twalat, through Afghana, son of Jeremiah, Saul's second son. When Bakht-u-nasr (Nebuchadnezzar) took Israel into captivity, the tribe of Afghana, on account of their clinging to the Jewish religion, were driven into the mountains about Herat, whence they spread into the Cabool valley along the right bank of the Indus to the borders of Scinde and Beloochistan. Subsequently they fell into idolatry, and then Mahometanism. But they have a tradition that the Kyber hills were inhabited till recently by Jews. Similarly the Santhals on the W. frontier of lower Bengal derive themselves from the Horites who were driven out of mount Seir by the Edomites. Their traditions point to the Panjab, the land of the five rivers, as the home of their race. They say their fathers worshipped God alone before entering the Himalayan region; but when in danger of perishing on those snowy heights they followed the direction whence the sun rose daily, and were guided safe; so they hold a feast every five years to the sun god, and also worship devils. They alone of the Hindoo races have negro features, and the lightheartedness and also the improvidence of the race of Ham.

God will yet restore I.; He alone can discriminate them among the Gentiles. "Ye shall be gathered one by one, O ye children of I. . . . In that day the great trumpet shall be blown, and they shall come which were ready to perish . . . and the outcasts . . . and shall worship the Lord in the holy mount at Jerusalem" (Isa. xxvii. 13). Jer. iii. 14 18: "I will take you one of a city and two of a family, and I will bring you to Zion." The rabbins ordain that when one builds a new house he should leave part unfinished "in memory of the desolation" (zecher lachorchan); and when a marriage takes place the bridegroom ends the ceremony by trampling the glass to pieces out of which he has drunk. Yet still they look for the restoration promised in Dent. xxx. 1-6, Isa. xi. 10-16. David Levi infers from Isaiah (1) God's coming vengeance on I.'s foes; (2) especially on Edom, i.e. Rome; (3) I.'s restoration; (4) that of the ten tribes; (5) like the deliverance from Egypt (but exceeding it in the greatness of God's interposition: Jer. xxiii. 5-8); (6) not to be prevented by the Jewish sinners who shall be cut off; (7) not till after a long time; (8) the shekinah and spirit of prophecy will return (Ezek. xi. 23, xlii. 2); (9) the apostatized from the nation will be restored to it; (10) a king of David's line and name will reign (Ezek. xxxiv. 23, 24); (11) they will never go into captivity again [see for the permanence and full bliss of their restoration Isa. xxxv. 12, liv. 7-11]; (12) the nations will generally acknowledge one God and desire to know His law (Isa. ii. 3, lx. 3, lxi. 23; Zech. viii. 21-23, xiv. 16-19); (13) peace will prevail (Isa. ii. 4, Zech. ix. 10); (14) a resurrection of those prominent for piety or wickedness (Dan. xii. 2). See Isa. xi. lx. 8-10, xlii. 13-16, lxi. 1-8, where "the desolations of many generations" cannot be merely the 70 years' captivity. After abiding many days without king, priest, sacrifice, altar, ephod, and teraphim, I. shall seek the Lord their God and David their king (Hos. iii. 4, 5). The blessing to all nations through I. will fulfil the original promises to Adam (Gen. iii. 15) and Abraham (xxii. 18; Rom. xi. 25, 26, etc.). Providential preparations for their restoration are already patent: the waning of Turkish power; the Holy Land unoccupied in a great measure and open to their return; their mercantile character, to the exclusion of agriculture, causing their not taking root in any other land, and connecting them with such mercantile peoples as the English and Americans, who may help in their recovering their own land (Isa. lx. 9, lxi. 19, 20); their avoidance of intermarriage with Christians. The Israelites when converted will be the best gospel preachers to the world (Zech. viii. 13, 23; Mic. v. 7), for they are dispersed everywhere, familiar with the language and manners of all lands, and holding constant correspondence with one another (comp. the type, Acts ii. 11); and as during their alienation they have been unapproachable, because hostile, witnesses of the Divine origin of the Messianic prophecies to which Christ-ianity appeals, so when converted from hostility they would be restless preachers of those truths which they had rejected (Rom. xi. 15). Outrage is that of the 42 months during which the court without the temple is given unto the Gentiles, and they tread under foot the holy city (Rev. xi. 2, 3), and God scatters the power of the holy people (Dan. xii. 7, Luke xxi. 24). At its close I's times begin. The 1230 years may date from A.D. 754, when Pepin granted temporal dominion to the popes; this would bring its close to 2014. The event alone will clear all (Dan. vii. 25, viii. 14, xii. 11, 12; Rev. xii. 6, 14; Lev. xxvi. 14, et c.). (Graves, Pentateuch, closing lecture.)

Issachar. Heb. text Issacar, "he is hire"; but the Masorets as A.V. Issachar, "the hired one." I. Leah's eldest son, Reuben, by presenting to Rachel MANDRAKES [see] (supposed to produce fertility), hired Jacob for Leah, the fruit of which intercourse was a fifth son by her, the first born after the interval from Gen. xxix. 35 to xxx. 17; the ninth son of Jacob. Two reasons for his name are assigned: first, because she hired Jacob by the self-denying gift of the mandrakes; secondly, as she says "God hath given me my hire, because I have given my maiden (Zilpah, ver. 9) to my husband." Both, in her view, were successive parts of one self-denial (her aim being the multiplication of offspring) and the ground for naming him I. His sons Tola, Phurah, Job (or Jashub, Num. xxvi. 24), and Shimron, were heads of the four chief families of the tribe (Gen. xli. 13).

Jacob prophetically describes the tribe, "I. is a strong ass crouching down between two burdens (the cattle pens or sheepfolds, Speaker's Comm.; 'the hurdles,' Keil; found only in Jud. v. 16); and he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant; and bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant (slave) unto tribute" (Gen. xlix. 14, 15), viz. unto the tribute imposed by the various invaders attracted to his land by the abundant crops. The strong boned he-ass used for field work (not the lighter and swifter she-ass for riding), crouching down between panniers or amidst sheepfolds, symbolises a race content with agricultural labours instead of aspiring to political rule; a robust race, with a pleasant inheritance inviting to ease, as not requiring such toil as less fertile lands; ease at the cost of liberty. Pleasant servitude, however suitable to Canaanites, was unworthy of Israelites, called of God to rule not serve (Deut. x. 14, 1 Kings ix. 21, Isa. x. 27). The name I. is akin to the Heb. "daily labourer." But in the conflict with Jabin and Sisera "the princes of I. were with Deborah, even I. and also Barak"; indeed the battle was perhaps on I.'s territory, "by Tannach at the waters of Megiddo" (Jud. v. 15, 19). Consider however suggests that the whole scene of the battle was near Tabor, within a radius of five or six miles. The kings assembled at Tannach, by the waters of Megiddo; but their fall was at Endor, according to Pal. lxxxi.

10. Barak would not belikely to desert the fastnesses of Tabor and march 15 miles over the boggy plain to attack the Canaanites strongly placed on the sides of the low hills at Tannach. Scripture says, "I will draw unto thee Sisera . . . unto the river Kishon." From Endor the kings ventured into the open plain S.W. of Tabor. Megiddo thus answers to Najedda, a mound with ruins in the Jordan valley. From it flowed "the waters of Megiddo" in the valley of Jezreel. The defeat of Sisera drove his host into "that river of battles (so Gesenius transl. for 'ancient'), the river Kishon." Harosheth of the Gentiles answers to El Harathayeh. The "wooded country" answers to the oak woods on the hills W. of Kishon, to which those Canaanites who went through the swamps fled. The Kedesh in Jud. iv. 9 is not that of Naphtali 30 miles off, but that on the sea of Galilee 16 miles from Tabor, a place suited for a gathering of the tribes, and within Naphtali's boundaries. Between this Kedesh and Tabor there is a broad plain in which is a place called Bessum = Bitzanaim, the plain to which Sisera fled (Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., Oct. 1877, p. 191).

On the march in the desert I. was on the E. with Judah and Zebulun his brothers, the foremost in the march (Num. ii. 5, x. 14, 15); Nethaneel was their commander. Igal represented I. among the spies (xiii. 7). Paltiel, I.'s representative, was divinely appointed to take part in dividing Canaan (xxxiv. 26). I. was appointed to stand on Gerizim to bless (Deut. xxvii. 12). The tribe's number at Sinai was 54,400 (Num. i. 29); at the close of the wilderness march it reached 61,300, inferior to Judah and Dan alone. In Canaan I.'s proximity to Zebulun continued.

"Of Zebulun Moses said, Rejoice, Zebulun in thy going out (enterprise), and Issachar in thy tents" (comfortable enjoyment): i.e., not merely Zebulun was to be noted for "going out" in maritime traffic and I. for nomad life "in tents," and grazing, and agriculture; but, according to poetical parallelism, the whole is meant of both tribes, Rejoice Zebulun and I. in your labour and your rest, in your undertakings at home and abroad, both alike successful. The thought is individualized by its distribution to parallel members. "They shall call the people unto the mountain (they will not make their riches into selfish mammon, but will invite the nations to 'the mountain of the Lord's inheritance': Exod. xv. 17; a moral not physical elevation, the Holy Land and its sanctuary), there they shall offer sacrifices of righteousness (not merely outwardly legal sacrifices, but also in a right spirit of faith and loving obedience: Ps. iv. 6, li. 21; inviting all men to the sacrificial feast, and to join them in the happy worship of Jehovah: Ps. xxii. 28-31; Isa. lx. 5, 6, 16, lvi. 11, 12), for they shall seek of the abundance of the seas, and of treasures hid in the sand" (not merely the fish, purple dye, sponges, and glass; but the richest treasures of sea and land shall flow into Israel, of which Zebulun and I. were to be flourishing tribes. Here in Galilee Jesus imparted the spiritual riches, to which the Galilean apostles in due time "called" all "peoples": Dent. xxxiii. 18, 19; Matt. iv. 13-16. Its inheritance extended in length from Carmel to the Jordan; in breadth to mount Tabor on the N. (Josephus, Ant. v. i. § 22); it consisted of the very rich plain of Jezreel or Esdraelon. Jezreel (whose name = "the seed plot of God" implies fertility) stood in the centre, with mount Gilboa on one hand and Little Hermon (Ed Duhy) on the other (Josh. xix. 17-23). It is the thoroughfare from E. to W. and from N. to S. Here Abab had his palace, selecting the site doubtless for its beauty. D. Kerr thinks that I. lay to the E. of Manasseh and Ephraim, along the entire line of the Jordan from the sea of Chinneroth on the N. to nearly the Salt Sea on the S. Its lot thus was of a triangular form, having its apex at Jericho and its base to the N. of the plain of Jezreel, where it was met by Zebulun (Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., Jan. 1877, p. 47).

Tola the judge was of I., though his abode was at Shamir in mount Ephraim. The nomadic character of I. appears in 1 Chron. vii. 1-5; no less than 35,000 of its men were marauding mercenary "lands (gedudim) of soldiers for war," a term applied elsewhere only to Gad's "troops" and to the irregular bodies of Bedouin-like tribes round Israel. Two hundred "heads" (not as A. V. "bands," for it is roshee not gedudim) of I. came to Hebron to help in "turning the kingdom of Saul to David"; they were "men that had understanding of the times, to know what Israel ought to do . . . and all their brethren were at their commandment" (1 Chron. x. 14 end; xii. 23, 32). Spiritually, Christians are men "knowing the time, that now it is high time to awake out of sleep, for now is our salvation nearer than when we believed" (Rom. xiii. 11, Eph. v. 16; see 1 Pet. iv. 1-4). We should help to transfer the kingdom from Satan to its coming rightful Lord (Luke xix. 12-27, 44). Jerusalem fell "because she knew not the time of her visitation." They are truly "wise" who "turn many from the power of Satan unto God" (Dan. xii. 3, Acts xxvi. 18).

Omri of the great family of Michael ruled I. in David's time; possibly forefather of Omri who usurped the Israelite throne (1 Chron. xxvii. 18), and built Samaria (perhaps on the same hill Shamir on which Tola of I. judged). Baasha son of Abijah, another usurper, was also of I. (1 Kings xv. 27-29, xvi. 2, 11), of lowest birth; his son Elah and all his kindred were murdered by Zimri, even as Baasha had slain Jeroboam's house, "not leaving to him any that breathed." Retributive justice pays blood with blood (Rev. xvi. 6). The last glimpse of I. we have is, when many of the tribe joined in Hezekiah's passover and religious revival (2 Chron. xxx. 18), though unavoidably not cleansed in legal order; for these Hezekiah prayed "the good Lord pardon every one that prepareth his heart to seek God, the Lord God of his fathers, though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the sanctuary." But I. shall again come forth with his 12,000 sealed ones, when the Lord shall restore again the kingdom to Israel (Acts i. 6; Rev. vii. 7, xiv. 1). 2. Obed Edom's seventh son, doorkeeper of the sanctuary (1 Chron. xxvi. 5), one of the eight sons given Obed Edom, "for God blessed him."

Isshiah, or Jeshaiah. 1. 1 Chron. xxiv. 21, xxiii. 17, xxvi. 35. 2. 1 Chron. xxiv. 25.

Issue out of the flesh: i.e. from the generative organ; the result of undue indulgence of lust, enervating the organs (Lev. xv. 1-15, xxii. 4; Num. v. 2). For seven days after its cessation the man was unclean, and then must bathe, wash his clothes, and offer sacrifice. The severe form of the disease is modern, appearing first in the 15th century and more virulently in the West than the East.

Italy. The peninsula from the Alps to the straits of Messina (Acts xviii. 2, xxvii. 1; Heb. xiii. 21).

Ithai. 1 Chron. xi. 31. Irtai 2 Sam. xxiii. 29. [See IRTAI.]

Ithamar. Aaron's youngest son (Exod. vi. 23). With Eleazar the elder he succeeded to the priestly offices vacated by the death of Nadab and Abihu, which he and Eleazar were forbidden to mourn (Exod. xxviii. 1, 40, 43; Lev. x. 1, 2, 6, 7; Num. iii. 3, 4; 1 Chron. xxiv. 2). 1. superintended the Gershonites who had charge of the curtains and hangings, and Merari who had charge of the pillars, cords, and boards, on the march (Exod. xxxviii. 21, Num. iv. 21-33). Eleazar's family and chief men were more numerous than those of I. The highpriesthood in Eli's person (probably on account of the high qualities for which he was made judge) passed to the line of I., but reverted to Eleazar's line in Zadok, because of ABITHAR's [see] share in Adonijah's rebellion; thus the prophecy against Eli [see] was fulfilled (1 Sam. ii. 31-33, iii. 12-14; 1 Kings ii. 26, 27, 35).

Ithiel. 1. Neh. xi. 7. 2. One of the two to whom AGUR [see] spake by inspiration (Prov. xxx. 1), meaning "God with me"; perhaps a symbolical name [see UCAL].

Ithmah. A Moabite of David's guard (1 Chron. xi. 46). Probably joined David during his sojourn in Moab (1 Sam. xxii. 3, 4).

Ithnan. A town in the far S. of Judah, bordering on the desert (Josh. xv. 23, 24; 1 Sam. xv. 4).

Ithra. Father of AMASA [see] by ABIGAIL [see], David's sister (2 Sam. xvii. 25, 1 Chron. ii. 17). "An Ishmaelite" is the true reading; for why state that he was an "Israelite"? That he was an Ishmaelite would be something exceptional, and fitly mentioned in the genealogy. Jether or Ithra had "gone in to," i.e. seduced, Abigail, daughter of Nabal and sister of Zeruiah, Joab's mother [see ABSALOM], probably during the sojourn of David's family with the king of Moab (1 Sam. xxii. 3, 4).

Ithran. 1. Gen. xxxvi. 25, 26, 30. 2. 1 Chron. vii. 30-10, 37.

Ithream. Sixth son of David; by Eglah, whom Jewish tradition identifies with Michal (since she is emphatically designated "David's wife"), adding that she died at I.'s birth (2 Sam. iii. 5).

Ithrite. Designation of two of David's guard, Ira and Gareb (2 Sam. xxiii. 33; 1 Chron. xi. 49, ii. 53). Jattir was in the mountains of Judah, one of David's "haunts," where he had "friends" to whom he sent of the Amalekite spoils (1 Sam. xxx. 25, 27, 31).

Ittah Kazin. On Zebulun's boundary (Josh. xix. 13). Meaning "time," or "people, of a judge."

Ittai. 1. "The Gittite" of the Philistine Gath. Last in the host that defiled past David, while standing beneath the olive tree below Jerusalem (2 Sam. xv. 18, LXX.) on the morning of his flight from Absalom, were 600 Gathites who had emigrated with him to Gath (1 Sam. xxvii. 2, 3, 8; xxx. 9, 10), and returned thence. Possibly vacancies in the body had been filled up with men of Gath, who had joined him with I. their countryman. This accounts for the command being given to a Gittite, I., which would be strange if he had no tie of connection with the 600 veterans of the body guard (xxviii. 2, where I. appears in command of a third of the army). The reading gibborim (heroes) for Gittim, "Gittites," is therefore needless. David with characteristic generosity said to I.: "Wherefore goest thou also with me? return to thy place, and abide with the king (not that David recognises Absalom as king, but he means 'with whoever shall prove king; with the king de facto;' whether he be rightful king you as a recent settler here are not called on to decide), for thou art a stranger (not an Israelite) and also an exile (not yet having a fixed fatherland) . . . Seeing I go whither I may (not yet knowing where it shall be: 1 Sam. xxii. 13) . . . return and take back thy brethren," implying that I. as a Philistine general brought with him a body of his fellow countrymen. I. with undimmed loyalty, which David's misfortunes could not shake, replied: "As the Lord liveth . . . surely in what place my lord the king shall be, whether in death or life, even there also will thy servant (slave Heb.) be." So David desired him to pass forward over the Kedron, and I. the Gittite, and all his men, and all the little ones with him (for he and his men brought their whole families: 1 Sam. xxvii. 3, xxx. 3, 6), passed on.

His resolution foreshadows the like resolution, though not so faithfully kept, of the disciples of the Son of David almost on the same spot (Matt. xxvi. 30, 35). At the battle of Mahanaim I. had equal rank with Joab and Abishai (2 Sam. xviii. 2, 5, 12). I. typifies the gospel truth that from the Gentile world some of the most devoted heroes of the cross should join the Son of David, and so share in His triumphs (Mark x. 29, 30; Matt. viii. 11, 12).

2. I. or Ithai, of the heroes of David's body guard; from the Benjaminite Gibeah, son of Ribai (2 Sam. xxiii. 29, 1 Chron. xi. 31).

Ituræa. The region N. of Palestine. With Trachonitis I. formed the tetrarchy of Philip (Luke iii. 1). Stretching from mount Hermon towards the N.E., i.e. towards Hamran, and from Damascus to northern Bashan. Called from Jetur, Ishmael's son (Gen. xxv. 15, 16). The tribe of Manassah wrested it from the Hagarites (Ishmaelites), Jetur, Nephish, and Nodab, and "increased from Bashan unto Baal Hermon and Senir, and unto mount Hermon"; i.e., they added I. to Bashan, Gaulonitis, and Trachonitis, which they already possessed (1 Chron. v. 19-23). Rome gave I. to Herod the Great, 20 B.C., who bequeathed it to his son Philip. Now Jedâr, with 33 towns and villages, of which ten are desolate and the rest very poor. Trachonitis was on its E., Gaulonitis on its S., Hermon on its W., and the Damascus plain on its N. An undulating table land with conical hills; the southern portion watered by streams from Hermon; the N. covered with jagged rocks of basalt seamed by chasms or sunk into pits, the molten lava having become fissured in cooling.

Ivah: AVA. 2 Kings xviii. 34, xix. 13, xvi. 21; Isa. xxxvii. 13. Now Eit, on the Euphrates, between Sippar (Sepharvaim) and Anah (Hena), with which it was apparently mited politically. Probably the Abava of Ezra viii. 15. Iva was a Babylonian god representing the sky; to it the town was sacred. Sennacherib boasts that the gods of Sepharvaim, Hena, and Ivah, were powerless to resist him. The Egyptian inscriptions in the time of Thothmes III., 1450 B.C., mention a town Ist, whence tribute of bitumen was brought to Thothmes. From the bitumen springs of Is, Herodotus says (i. 606) the bitumen was brought to cement the walls of Babylon. These springs are still found at Hit. From I., along with Babylon, Cuthah, Hamath, and Sepharvaim, which the king of Assyria (Esarhaddon) brought people to colonise Samaria.

Ivory: shen, "tooth" or tusk, viz. of the elephant. There is no Heb. word in Scripture for the elephant, for the Israelites knew of the elephant first only by its ivory, which was imported from Africa and India. The African elephant exceeds the Indian in the size of the ear and of the tusks, the latter of which are often eight or ten feet long and weigh from 100 to 120 lbs. From the resemblance of its tusks to horns Ezek. xxvii. 15 has "horns of ivory." "Palaces of ivory" mean ornamented with ivory (Is. xlv. 8). So Ahab's palace (1 Kings xxii. 39). Amos (iii. 15) foretells the destruction of the luxurious "houses of ivory" having their walls, doors, and ceilings inlaid with it; also "beds of ivory" (vi. 4), i.e. veneered with it. In 1 Kings x. 22 and 2 Chron. ix. 21 shen-kabbim is the term "the teeth of elephants"; Sanskrit ibhas, Coptic ebay, Assyrian habba in the inscriptions. Gesenius would read shen-labenim, "ivory (and) ebony." On the Assyrian obelisk in the British Museum tribute bearers are seen carrying tusks; specimens of carvings in ivory were found in Nimrud, and tablets inlaid with blue and opaque glass. "All manner vessels of ivory" are in mystic Babylon (Rev. xviii. 12). Solomon made a great throne of ivory overlaid with gold (1 Kings x. 18, 20); the ivory was brought in the navy of Tharshish, probably from the S. coasts of Arabia, which maintained from ancient times commercial intercourse with both India and Ethiopia. In Ezek. xxvii. 6 we read "the Ashurites have made thy (Tyre's) benches of ivory brought out of the isles of Chittim"; rather, as the Heb. orthography requires, "they have made thy (rowing) benches of ivory, inlaid in the daughter of cedars" or "the best boxwood" (bath ashurim), from Cyprus and Macedonia, whence the best boxwood came (Pliny).

Izhar, Izehar. Num. iii. 19, 27; Exod. vi. 18, 21; Num. xvi. 1. Aminadab is substituted by mistake in 1 Chron. vi. 22, as appears from ver. 38. Head of one of the four Kohathite families (1 Chron. xxvi. 23, 29).

Izrahiah. 1 Chron. vii. 3.

Izri. 1 Chron. xxv. 1-11; ZERI, ver. 3.

J

Jaakan. Forefather of the Bene-jaakan, "the children of Jaakan," who gave their name to one stage of the Israelites' journeyings. In Num. xxxiii. 31 the order is "from Moseroth to Benejaakan"; in Deut. x. 6 it is "from the wells (beeroth) of the children of Jaakan to Mosera." Probably Israel visited the two places twice: on the first march towards Canaan, from Mosera to Benejaakan (Num. xxxiii. 31); the reverse order in Deut. x. 6, the 40th year, when the march was differently directed.

Jaakobah. 1 Chron. iv. 24, 36, 38.

Jaala, Jaalah. Neh. vii. 58; Ezra ii. 56.

Jaalam=hēbden by Jehovah. Gen. xxxv. 5, 14, 18; 1 Chron. i. 35. A duke or tribal chief of Edom.

Jaanaï. 1 Chron. v. 12.

Jaure-oregim. 2 Sam. xxi. 19. Father of Elhanan, a Be'elchaneite, who slew Goliath (A. V. "the brother of Goliath," to accord with 1 Chron. xx. 5 and not to contradict 1 Sam. xvii. where Dag kills Goliath). But the true reading is 1 Chron. xx. 5: "Elhanan, the son of Jaïr, slew Lahmi (the Lahmi being altered into Be'elchaneite), the brother of Goliath (the Goliath being substituted for ahli Goliath)." The change was the more readily made as Lahmi's spear is described exactly as Goliath's (1 Sam. xvii. 7). See ELHANAN. Oregim, "weavers," is a transcriber's accidental interpolation after "Jaïr," taken from the latter part of the verse. The ancient versions agree with the present Heb. text, which shows the error is of very ancient date.

Jaasan. Ezra x. 37.

Jaasiel. 1 Chron. xxvii. 21.

Jaazaniah, or Jezaniah. 1. "Son of the Maacathite," a "captain of the forces" who accompanied Johanan in waiting on Gedaliah, the governor over the Jewish remnant after the capture of Jerusalem, and afterwards in rescuing them from Ishmael, and in going to Egypt in spite of the Lord's prohibition (2 Kings xxv. 23; Jer. xli. 11, xliii. 4, 5). 2. Son of Shaphan. Stood as leader in the midst of the 70 ancients (elders) of Israel with censers in their hands, worshipping idols portrayed on the wall of the court of Jehovah's house; seen by Ezekiel (viii. 11). Shaphan was the scribe who read to Josiah the law. The son's spiritual privileges increased his guilt (2 Kings xxii. 10-11). His very name, meaning "Jehovah hears," gave the lie to the unbelief which virtually said "Jehovah seeth not" (Ezek. ix. 9; Ps. x. 11, 14; l. 21; xiv. 7, 9). The elders incurred further guilt in usurping the priests' office by offering incense. 3. Son of Azur, leader of the 25 priests (Ezek. xi. 1). Azur means help, their names reminding them, if they would have heeded it, that God would have "help" if they had sought His "help" to save the city. 4. Jer. xxv. 3.

Jaazer, Jazer. Heb. Jaazzeer. A town E. of Jordan in Gilead (Num. xxxii. 1, 3, 35; 1 Chron. xxvi. 31). Taken by Israel from the Amorites on the way to Bashan (Num. xxi. 32, 33). Now the ruins es Szir, ten miles N.E. of Heshbon; a castle and a large walled pool, the "sea" of Jer. xlviii. 32; but LXX. reads "the cities of J." Some error may be in the present text. The town gave its name to the surrounding district (Josh. xiii. 25, 2 Sam. xxiv. 5). This conquest completed their acquisition of the Amorite kingdom. Soon after, Gad occupied it pastorally. Assigned to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 39), but occupied by Hebronites (Kohathites) in David's time (1 Chron. xxvi. 31).

The plants of the Sibmah vine are said in Isa. xvi. 8 to have come even unto J., 15 miles from Heshbon, near Sibmah, "they wandered through the wilderness in wild luxuriance," viz. that encompassing Moab, "they are gone over the sea," viz. the sea of J., but others the Dead Sea (Ps. lxxx. 8-11). The vine spread itself round the margin of the sea, and reached beyond to the other side; a sad contrast to the coming desolation, when "the heathen lords" should "break down the principal plants"! "Therefore I will weep with the weeping of J.," i.e. such as J. weeps with. Isaiah is touched with pity for Moab, though an alien. Ministers, in denouncing God's wrath against sinners, should do it with tender sorrow, not exultation. At J. was the source of a river falling into Jordan, and marshes or pools still at times are at the source of the wady Szir.

Jaaziah. 1 Chron. xxiv. 26, 27; where Beno should be transl. "his (Merari's) son."

Jaaziel, contracted into AZIEL. 1 Chron. xv. 18, 20.

Jabal=flowing stream. Son of Lamech and Adah (Gen. iv. 20), "father (teacher and forerunner) of such as dwell in tents and have cattle." Abel fed sheep and goats, J. also larger animals, "cattle." Abel had a fixed dwelling, the land around which afforded sufficient sustenance for his flock. J. introduced the nomad life, in tents probably formed of skins, migrating in quest of pasture for his "cattle" from place to place (Gen. iv. 2, 20). Savages live by hunting; emerging from barbarism they become nomadic, then agricultural. But Scripture represents man as placed by God in a simple civilization, raised above barbarism and the need of living by the chase, though not a highly developed culture. Adam "dressed and kept" the garden of Eden, and his sons must have learned from him some of his knowledge.

Jabbok=pouring out or emptying. A stream which traverses Gilead, and falls into Jordan midway between the sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. Now wady Zerka. The northern bound of Sihon's kingdom, as the Arnon was the southern bound (Num. xxi. 21). The rugged territory of Ammon, the eastern defiles of Gilead, also reached the upper J. In its early course it flows eastward under Rabbah of Ammon, a strong fortress upon a tributary of the J. Then northward and westward in a curve to a short distance from Gerasa; it reaches Jordan 45 miles N. of the Arnon. Between Rabbah and Gerasa it formed the Ammonite border. W. of this the territory had been wrested from Ammon by the Amorites (Josh. xii. 25), and was still claimed by Ammon after Israel had in turn wrested it from Sihon, whence the J. is still called "the border of the children of Ammon" (Deut. iii. 16; Josh. xii. 2; Jud. xi. 13, 21, 22). Though now it is one vast pasture, the numerous ruins of cities show how thickly it was once peopled. The eastern territory to which Ammon was confined in Moses' time is as yet little known to travellers. Sihon the Amorite king was unable to pursue his conquests farther E., "for the border of the children of Ammon was strong," Rabbah was too strong for him. Israel was restricted by God's prohibition from touching the Ammonite land, which He had given to the children of Lot (Deut. ii. 19, 37). On the southern bank of the J. Jacob met Esau (Gen. xxxii. 22). Its western part was the bond between the kingdoms of Sihon and Og (Josh. xii. 2, 5). Its lower course is fringed with cane and oleander, the banks above are covered with oaks. The water is perennial towards its mouth, and there are great floods in winter. Paine objects to identifying J. with the Zerka, as there is nothing in that region to correspond with Mahanaim and Pennel; he identifies J. with the Yabis, 13 miles farther N. On a tributary of the Yabis is found a ruin, Mahana = Mahanaim.

Jabesh. 1. 2 Kings xv. 10, 13, 14. 2. = Jabesh Gilead: 1 Chron. x. 12.

Jabesh (= dry) Gilead. 1 Sam. xi. 1, 9, etc. Chief of Gilead's cities. For not having come to Mizpeh at Israel's command, under an imprecatory oath against all defaulters, when the tribes began war with Benjamin (Jud. xx. 1-3, xxi. 5), its males were all killed, and its virgins, 400 in number, were given in marriage to the 600 Benjaminites who survived the war with Israel (xxi. 1, 8-14). The carrying into execution the oath at the close of the war was mainly influenced by the desire to provide wives for Benjamin, as their oath precluded themselves from giving their daughters. Subsequently it recovered itself, and being threatened by the Ammonitings, Nahash, with the excision of its citizens' right eyes as a reproach upon Israel, was rescued by Saul. In gratitude the inhabitants, when he and his three sons were slain by the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi. 8, 13), took down by night their corpses from the walls of Bethshan, where they had been exposed; then burnt the bodies and buried the bones under a tree, and kept a funeral feast seven days. David, in generous forgetfulness of his own wrongs from Saul, blessed them for their kindness to their master, praying the Lord to requite it, and promising to requite it as if it were a kindness to himself (2 Sam. ii. 5, 6); afterwards he removed the bones to the sepulchre of Saul's father Kish at Zelah (xxi. 13, 14). The name survives in the wady Yabis, flowing from the E. into the Jordan below Bethshan; the ruin ed Deir, S. of the wady, is on the site (Robinson, Bibl. Res. iii. 319). It was six miles from Pella, on a mountain towards Gerasa.

Jabez. A town where the scribes belonging to the families of the Kenites resided (1 Chron. ii. 55; a school said by the Targum to have been founded by Othniel, called also Jabez; Rechab is made Rechabiah son of Eliezer, Moses' son); the Tirathites, Shimeathites, and Sucathites; they came of Hemath, the father of the house of Rechab. Probably in the S. of Judaea, not far from Bethlehem. Ver. 51-54: Salma possibly is Simon, Boaz' father (1 Chron. xxvi. 25).

Jabez = sorrowful. In the genealogy connected with Bethlehem his name is explained by the sorrow with which his mother bare him; also by his prayer "that evil might not grieve him," i.e., though his name expressed sorrow, that God would preserve him from it. His prayer is one of the most comprehensive in the Bible, and shines forth like a brilliant star in the midst of a genealogical catalogue of names; probably offered in setting out in life, an admirable model for youths. "Oh that Thou wouldest bless me indeed (God alone knows what is not only seemingly, but indeed, good for us, not earthly shadows but heavenly realities, and all things here that tend towards them) and enlarge my coast," not merely in temporal but in spiritual interests (1 Kings iv. 29; Ps. xviii. 19, xxxi. 8, cxviii. 5), "and that Thine hand might be with me (as 'the hand of our God is upon all them for good that seek Him': Ezra viii. 18, 22; vii. 6, 9), and that Thou wouldest keep me from evil," etc. (Matt. vi. 13; John xvii. 15; Luke xxii. 40, 46; 1 Cor. x. 13; 2 Pet. ii. 9; Rev. iii. 10.) Evil may assail, but cannot finally "grieve," the believer. J., the son of sorrow, by prayerful faith inherited joy in the end (Matt. v. 4, Ps. xc. 15, Heb. xii. 11). Prayer was the secret of his being "more honourable than his brethren" (1 Sam. ii. 30). His name may have been given to the city Jabez, famed for its scribes. The abrupt mention of him shows he was a man of note when Ezra wrote Chronicles. His prayer was to "the God of Israel" with whom Jacob wrestled in prayer, and "by his strength had power with God" (Hos. xii. 3, 4), and so got the new name "Israel." "God granted" him according to the faith of his request (Eph. iii. 20, Matt. ix. 29).

Jabin. 1. King of Hazor in northern Palestine, near the Merom waters. Headed the confederacy of northern kings (Jobab of Madon, the kings of Shimron, Achshaph, etc., N. of the mountains of Naphtali and in the Arabah S. of Chinneroth, i.e. the Ghor, S. of the sea of Galilee, etc.) against Israel: Josh. xi. 1-4. Their army was "even as the sand upon the sea shore in multitude, with horses and chariots very many." Lest Joshua should be afrighted at this formidable array, Jehovah in vision promised "I will deliver them up all slain before Israel"; I am infinitely more than a match for them, and I am on thy side. The "I" is emphatical in the Heb. Joshua suddenly fell upon them and "chased them unto great Zidon (then the metropolis of Phoenicia, but later in David's time outstripped by Tyre), and MISREPHOTH MAIM [see] and unto the valley of Mizpeh eastward, until they left them none remaining." Then he "houghed" (lamed by cutting the hoof sinew) their horses, and burnt their chariots. The cities he did not burn except Hazor, which he burnt and slew its king, probably on account of some renewed hostility (Josh. xi. 1-13). 2. The king of Hazor whose general, Sisera, was defeated by DEBORAH and BARAK [see HAROSHETH]. "For 20 years he mightily oppressed the children of Israel," until their "cry unto the Lord" brought a deliverer. (Jud. iv. v.)

Jabneel, Jabneh. [See LIBNAH.] 1.

On the northern boundary of Judah, near the sea (Josh. xv. 11); Josephus (Ant. v. 1, § 22) assigns it to Dan. That tribe and the Philistines were in constant warfare for the towns in the lowland. So in 2 Chron. xxvii. 6 it was in the Philistines' possession, and had its wall broken down by Uzziah. Its harbour, like that of Ascalon and Gaza, was called Majumas, "the place on the sea." It had a school of learned doctors at the time of the fall of Jerusalem. The burial place of Gamaliel, according to Jewish tradition. Under the crusaders it was called Ibelin, and gave a title to a line of counts. Now Yebna or Ibna, 11 miles S. of Jaffa, four from Akir (Ekron). 2. A landmark on Naphtali's boundary (Josh. xix. 33); in the hills N.W. of the lake of Galilee.

Jachan. 1 Chron. v. 13.

Jachin = he will establish, implying stability. The right hand or S. pillar of the two "in the porch of" (1 Kings vii. 21, 39), or "before," Solomon's temple (2 Chron. iii. 17).

Jacinth. 1. Gen. xlii. 10, Num. xxvii. 12. 2. 1 Chron. ix. 10, xxiv. 17; Neh. xi. 10.

Jacinth = hyacinth. A precious stone, a foundation of the New Jerusalem wall (Rev. xxi. 20). Heb. leshem, "figure" in the highpriest's breastplate (Exod. xxviii. 19). A red zircon, found in square prisms, varying from pale green to purple red. "Figure" in Speaker's Comm. is explained "amber" which, according to Pliny and Theophrastus, came from Liguria. Smith's Bible Diet. says "ligurate" is a crystallized mineral of a yellowish or apple-green hue found in Liguria, "jacinth" seems identical with Heb. leshem. In Rev. ix. 17 the "breastplates of jacinth" are of hyacinth colour, the dark blue iris colour answering to the "smoke out of their mouths." Pliny says (xxvii. 41), the violet brightness in the amethyst is diluted in the jacinth. Solinus makes the jacinth our sapphirae.

Jacob [see ESAU, ISAAC] = supplanter, or holding the heel. Esau's twin brother, but second in point of priority. Son of Isaac, then 60 years old, and Rebekah. As J. "took his brother by the heel (the action of a wrestler) in the womb" (Hos. xii. 3), so the spiritual Israel, every believer, having no right in himself to the inheritance, by faith when being born again of the Spirit takes hold of the bruised heel, the humanity, of Christ crucified, "the First-born of many brethren." He by becoming a curse for us became a blessing to the true Israel; contrast Heb. xii. 16, 17. J. was a "plain," i.e. an upright man, steady and domestic, affectionate, so his mother's favourite: Gen. xxv. 24, etc., "dwelling in tents," i.e. staying at home, minding the flocks and household duties; not, like Esau, wandering abroad in keen quest of game, "a man of the field," wild, restless, self-indulgent, and seldom at home in the tent. Having bought the birth-right from Esau, he afterwards, at Rebekah's instigation, stole the blessing which his father intended for

Esau, but which God had appointed to him even when the two sons were yet unborn; "the elder shall serve the younger" (Gen. xxv. 23, xxvii. 20; Mal. i. 3; Rom. ix. 12). His seeking a right end by wrong means (Gen. xxvii.) entailed a lifelong retribution in kind. Instead of occupying the first place of honour in the family he had to flee for his life; instead of a double portion, he fled with only the staff in his hand. It was now, when his schemes utterly failed, God's grace began to work in him and for him, amidst his heavy outward crosses. If he had waited in faith God's time, and God's way, of giving the blessing promised by God, and not unlawfully with carnal policy foiled Isaac's intention, God would have defeated his father's foolish purpose and J. would have escaped his well deserved chastisement. The fear of man, precautions ennoing, habitual timidity as to danger, characterize him, as we might have expected in one quiet and shrewd to begin with, then schooled in a life exposed to danger from Esau, to grasping selfishness from Laban, and to undutifulness from most of his sons (Gen. xxxi. 15, 12; xxxiv. 5, 30; xliii. 6, 11, 12). J.'s grand superiority lay in his abiding trust in the living God. Faith made him "covet earnestly the best gift," though his mode of getting it (first by purchase from the reckless, profane Esau, at the cost of red pottage, taking ungenerous advantage of his brother's hunger; next by deceit) was most unworthy. When sent forth by his parents to escape Esau, and to get a wife in Padan Aram, he for the first time is presented before us as enjoying God's manifestations at Bethel in his vision of the ladder set up on earth, and the top reaching heaven, with "Jehovah standing above, and the angels of God ascending and descending (not descending and ascending, for the earth is presupposed as already the scene of their activity) on it," typifying God's providence and grace arranging all things for His people's good through the ministry of "angels" (Gen. xxviii., Heb. i. 14). When his conscience made him feel his flight was the just penalty of his deceit God comforts him by promises of His grace. Still more typifying Messiah, through whom heaven is opened and also joined to earth, and angels minister with ceaseless activity to Him first, then to His people (John xiv. 6; Rev. iv. 1; Acts vi. 5; Heb. ix. 8, x. 19, 20). J. the man of guile saw Him at the top of the ladder; Nathanael, an Israelite without guile, saw Him at the bottom in His humiliation, which was the necessary first step upward to glory. John i. 51: "hereafter," Gr. "from now," the process was then beginning which shall eventuate in the restoration of the union between heaven and earth, with greater glory than before (Rev. v. 8-11, xxi., xxii.). Then followed God's promise of (1) the land and (2) of universal blessing to all families of the earth "in his seed," i.e. Christ; meanwhile he should have (1) God's presence, (2) protection in all places, (3) restoration to home, (4) unfailing faithfulness (Gen. xxviii. 15; comp. 20, 21). Recognising God's manifestation as sanctifying the spot, he made his stony pillow into a pillar, consecrated with oil [see BETHEL], and taking up God's word he vowed that as surely as God would fulfil His promises (he asked no more than "bread and raiment") Jehovah should be his God, and of all that God gave he would surely give a tenth to Him; not waiting till he should be rich to do so, but while still poor; a pattern to us (comp. xxxii. 10).

Next follows his seven years' service under greedy Laban, in lieu of presents to the parents (the usual mode of obtaining a wife in the East, Gen. xxiv. 53, which J. was unable to give), and the imposition of Leah upon him instead of Rachel; the first instalment of his retributive chastisement in kind for his own deceit. Kennicott suggested that J. served 14 years for his wives, then during 20 he took care of Laban's cattle as a friend, then during six he served for wages (xxx. 38, 41). "One (zeh) 20 years I was with thee (tending thy flocks, but not in thy house); another (zeh) 20 years I was for myself in thy house, serving thee 14 years for thy two daughters, and six years for thy cattle." The ordinary view that he was only 20 in Padan Aram would make him 77 years old in going there; and as Joseph, the second youngest, was born at the end of the first 14 years, the 11 children born before Benjamin would be all born within six or seven years, Leah's six, Rachel's one, Bilhah's two, and Zilpah's two. It is not certain that Dinah was born at this time. Zebulun may have been borne by Leah later than Joseph, it not being certain that the births all followed in the order of their enumeration, which is that of the mothers, not that of the births. Rachel gave her maid to J. not necessarily after the birth of Leah's fourth son; so Bilhah may have borne Dan and Naphtali before Judah's birth. Leah then, not being likely to have another son, probably gave Zilpah to J., and Asher and Naphtali were born; in the beginning of the last of the seven years probably Leah bore Issachar, and at its end Zebulun. But in the view of Kennicott and Specker's Comm. J. went to Laban at 37; in the first 14 years had sons, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah by Leah; Dan and Naphtali by Bilhah; in the 20 years (Gen. xxxv. 38) next had Gad and Asher by Zilpah, Issachar and Zebulun by Leah, lastly Dinah by Leah and Joseph by Rachel; then six years' service for cattle, then flees from Padan Aram where he had been 40 years, at 97. In J.'s 98th year Benjamin is born and Rachel dies. Joseph at 17 goes to Egypt, at 30 is governor. At 130 J. goes to Egypt (Gen. xlii. 1); dies at 147 (xlvii. 28). The assigning of 40, instead of 20, years to his sojourn with Laban allows time for Er and Onan to be grown up when married; their strong passions leading them to marry, even so, at an early age for that time. The common chronology needs some correction, as it makes Judah marry at 20, Er and Onan at 15.

On J. desiring to leave, Laban attested God's presence with J. "I have found by experience (Heb. by omens from serpents, the term showing Laban's heathenishness: Gen. xxx. 19, 32) that the Lord hath blessed me for thy sake." J. then required as wages all the speckled and spotted sheep and goats, which usually are few, sheep in the East being generally white, the goats black or brown, not speckled. With characteristic sharpness J. adopted a double plan of increasing the wages agreed on. Peeling rods of (Gesenius) stomix ("poplar"), almond ("hazel"), and plane tree ("chesnut") in strips, so that the dazzling white wood of these trees should appear under the dark outside, he put them in the drinking troughs; the cattle consequently brought forth spotted, speckled young, which by the agreement became J.'s. Thus by trickery he foiled Laban's trickery in putting three days' journey between his flock tended by J. and J.'s stipulated flock of spotted and speckled goats and brown put under the care of his sons. Secondly, J. separated the speckled young, which were his, so as to be constantly in view of Laban's one-coloured flock. Moreover he adopted the trick with the rods only at the copulation of the strong sheep, viz. at the summer copulation not the autumn; for lambs conceived in spring were thought stronger. Laban changed the terms frequently ("ten times") when he saw J.'s success, but in vain. J. accounted to his wives for his success by narrating his dream, which he had at the time the cattle conceived (xxxi. 10). This dream was at the beginning of the six years. "God hath taken away your father's cattle and given them to me." God's command to J. to return was in a dream at the close of the six years (xxxi. 11-13; in 12 transl. leaped for "leap," and were for "are"). In the latter God states the true cause of his success; not his trickery, but "I have seen all that Laban doeth unto thee": the repetition of "in a dream" twice implies two dreams.

J.'s polygamy was contrary to the original law of paradise (Gen. ii. 23, 24; Matt. xix. 5). Leah was imposed on him when he had designed to marry Rachel only, and the maids were given him by his wives to obtain offspring. The times of ignorance, when the gospel had not yet restored the original standard, tolerated evils which would be inexcusable now. Jealousies were the result of polygamy in J.'s case, as was sure to happen.

The most characteristic scene of J.'s

higher life was his wrestling until break of day (comp. Luke vi. 12) with the Angel of Jehovah, in human form, for blessing. "By his strength he had power with God, yea he had power over the Angel and prevailed, he wept and made supplication unto Him" (Hos. xii. 3, 4). So he received the name ISRAEL [see], "contender with God," a pattern to us (Matt. xi. 12, xv. 22; Rev. iii. 21; Luke xiii. 24). His "strength" was conscious weakness constraining him, when his thigh was put out of joint and he could put forth no effort of his own, to hang upon Him; teaching us the irresistible might of conscious weakness hanging on Almighty strength (Job xxiii. 6; Isa. xxvii. 5, xl. 29-31; 2 Cor. xii. 9, 10). "I will not let Thee go except Thou bless me" is a model prayer (Gen. xxxii. 26). Tears (recorded by Hosea under an independent Spirit of revelation) and supplications were his weapons; type of Messiah (Heb. v. 7). The vision of the two encampments of angels on either side of him [MAHANAIM, see] prepared him for the vision of the Lord of angels. Thus he saw, "they that be with us (believers) are more than they that be with" our enemies (2 Kings vi. 16, 17). Wrestling first with God, we can victoriously wrestle with Satan (Eph. vi. 12). J. like David felt "what time I am afraid, I will trust in Thee" (Ps. lvi. 3, 4, 11; 1 Sam. xxx. 6). His is one of the earliest prayers on record (Gen. xxxii. 7, 9-12). He pleads as arguments (comp. Isa. xliii. 26), first God's covenant keeping character to the children of His people, "O God of my father Abraham and Isaac"; next, His word and promises (xxxi. 3, 13), "the Lord which saidst unto me, Return . . . and I will deal well with thee"; next, his own unworthiness, "I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies," etc. (comp. xxviii. 20-22; next the petition itself, "deliver me . . . from Esau," appealing to God's known pity for the helpless, "I fear him lest he . . . smite . . . the mother with the children"; again falling back on God's own word, "Thou saidst, I will surely do thee good, and make thy seed as the sand of the sea," etc. The present, artfully made seem larger by putting a space between drove and drove, and each driver in turn saying, "they be thy servant J.'s . . . a present unto my lord Esau," was calculated by successive appeals to impress the impulsive elder brother (Matt. v. 25).

Having left Canaan in guilt, now on his return J. must re-enter it with deep searchings of heart and wrestlings with God for the recovery of that sinless faith which he had forfeited by deceit and which lays hold of the covenant. J. is made to know he has more to fear from God's displeasure than from Esau's enmity. Once that he stands right with God he need not fear Esau. There followed therefore the wrestling "alone" with Jehovah (comp. Matt. xiv. 23, Mark i. 35); his being named "Israel"; and his asking God's name, to which the only reply was, God "blessed him there." Blessing is God's name, i.e. the character wherein He reveals Himself to His people (Exod. xxiv. 5-7). J. called the place Peniel, "the face of God." Next J. came to Succoth, then crossed Jordan, and near Shechem bought his only possession in Canaan, the field wherein he tented, from the children of Hamor, Shechem's father, for 100 kesita, i.e. ingots of silver of a certain weight. The old versions transl. "lambs," an ancient standard of wealth before coinage was practised. For "Shalem, a city of Shechem," transl. with Samaritan pentateuch, "J. came in peace to the city of Shechem," though there is still a Salim E. of Nablûs (Shechem). His settlement here in the N. instead of with his father in the S. at Beersheba may have been to avoid collision with Esau and to make an independent settlement in the promised land. It seems to have been in a time of his temporary religious declension after his escape from Esau through God's interposition. Undue intercourse with the Canaanites around ended in Dinah's fall and the cruel retribution by Simeon and Levi, which so imperilled his position among the surrounding Canaanites, and which so deeply affected him (Gen. xxxii. 17, 19, xxxiv. xlix. 5, 6). It is true he erected an altar, El Eloe Israel, claiming God as his own "the God of Israel." Still God saw need for calling him to a personal and domestic revival. J. understood it so, and called his household to put away their strange gods (viz. the Canaanite stolen teraphim and the idols of Shechem, which was spoiled just before), their earrings (used as idolatrous phylacteries), and uncleanness; and then proceeded to perform what he had vowed so long ago, viz. to make the stone pillar God's house (xxviii. 22). When thus once more he sought peace with God "the terror of God was upon the cities around" (comp. Josh. ii. 9). They made no attempt such as Jacob feared to avenge the slaughter of the Shechemites. Reaching Bethel once more after 40 years, where he had seen the heavenly ladder, he has a vision of God confirming his name "Israel" and the promise of nations springing from him, and of his seed inheriting the land; he therefore rears again the stone pillar to El Shaddai, "God Almighty," the name whereby God had appeared to Abram also when He changed his name to Abraham. Then followed the birth of Benjamin, which completed the tribal twelve (Gen. xxxv.).

The loss of his favourite son Joseph was his heaviest trial, his deceit to Isaac now being repaid by his sons' cruel deceit to himself. Tender affection for wife and children was his characteristic (xxxvii. 33-35, xlii. 36, xlv. 28). By special revelation at Beersheba (xlvii.) allaying his fears of going to Egypt, which Isaac had been expressly forbidden to do (xxvi. 2), he went down. This marks the close of the first stage in the covenant and the beginning of the second stage. Leaving Canaan as a family, Israel returned as a nation. In Egypt the transformation took place; the civilization, arts, and sciences of Egypt adapted it well for the Divine purpose of training Israel in this second stage of their history; J. and his family, numbering 70, or as Stephen from LXX. reads, 75 souls (Acts vii. 14), according as Joseph's children only or his grandchildren also are counted. J.'s sons' wives are not reckoned in the 70, only the unmarried daughter Dinah and a granddaughter. In the number are included, according to Heb. usage, some who were still "in the loins of their fathers." Benjamin's (then only 24) ten sons were probably born in Egypt subsequently. So Pharez' two sons and Asher's two grandsons by D-rach. In the genealogy those named are the heads of tribes and of families.

At 130 J. blessed Pharaoh and termed his life a "pilgrimage" of days "few and evil" (xlvii.; Heb. xi. 9, 13). The catalogue of his includes his sufferings (1) from Esau, (2) Laban, (3) manning by the Angel, (4) Dinah's violation and Simeon and Levi's cruelty, (5) loss of Joseph, (6) Simeon's imprisonment, (7) Benjamin's departure, (8) Rachel's death, (9) Reuben's incest. All these seemed "against" him, but all was for him, because God was for him (Rom. viii. 28, 31, 37; Gen. xlii. 36). His true grandeur and sublimity burst forth at his latter end; his triumphant and grateful review of life, "God, before whom my fathers did walk, the God which fed me all my life long unto this day, the Angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lad!" His blessing Joseph's sons was an act of "faith" (Heb. xi. 21), "leaning upon the top of his staff," an additional fact brought out by Paul (adopting LXX.), as he worshipped on his bed (Gen. xlvii. 31, xlviii. 2); the staff symbolised his "pilgrim" spirit seeking the heavenly city (xxxii. 10). Faith adapted him to receive prophetic insight into the characters and destinies of Ephraim and Manasseh respectively, as also of his other representatives. He anticipates the future as present, saying "I have given to thee (Joseph's descendants) above thy brethren (Ephraim was the chief tribe of the N.) one portion of that land which I in the person of my descendants (Joshua and Israel) am destined to take with sword and bow from the Amorites" (xlviii. 22). In xlix. 28 his prophecy as to his several sons and the tribes springing from them is called a "blessing" because, though a portion was denunciatory, yet as a whole all were within the covenant of blessing, but with modifications according to their characteristics. What already was gave intimation to the spirit of prophecy in J. of what would be. His prophecy of Shiloh's coming in connection with Judah's ceasing to have the sceptre and a lawgiver more accurately defined the Messianic promise than it had been before. The general promise of "the seed" sprung from Abraham, Isaac, and J. he now limits to Judah. His faith in "bowing on his bed" after Joseph promised to bury him in Canaan (xvii. 23, 30) consisted in his confidence of God's giving Canaan to his seed, and he therefore earnestly desired to be buried there. Epistle to Hebrews omits his last blessing on his 12 sons, because Paul "plucks only the flowers by his way and leaves the whole meadow to his hearers" (Dilitzsch). His secret and true life is epitomized in "I have waited for Thy salvation, O Lord" (xlix. 18).

At 117 he died, and his body was embalmed and after a grand state funeral procession buried with his fathers in the cave of Machpelah before Mamre (Gen. 1).

JACOB'S WELL.

appears the appropriateness of the allusions "our fathers worshipped in this mountain," viz. Gerizim, whereon the Samaritan temple stood (John iv. 20); "lift up your eyes, and look on the fields, for they are white already to harvest" (25). The distance from Shechem (Sychar) is no objection; for even if the Samaritan woman's coming to the well was not the result of a providential incident, the sacredness of Jacob's well and the excellence of its deep drawn water would account for her coming so far. It was not the public city well, otherwise it would have been furnished with some means of drawing the water (11). The sinking of so deep a well would only be undertaken by some one who had not access to the neighbouring streams and fountains. The patriarchs had never want of pasture in Canaan, but often difficulties as to water (Gen. xxi. 25-30, xxvi. 13-15, 18-22). Jacob therefore naturally provided himself with a well in his field just purchased (xxiii. 17-19). With characteristic prudence he secured on his own property, by great labour, a perennial supply at a time when the surrounding watersprings, which abound on the surface, were in the hands of unfriendly neighbours. Formerly there was a square hole opening into a vaulted chamber 15 feet square, in the floor of which was the well's mouth. The vault has fallen, so that stones have fallen in and much reduced its original depth. In Maundrell's time it was 105 feet deep; now it is often dry, at other times it has a few feet of water. Caspari (Chron. and Geog. Introd. to Life of Christ) says Sychar originally extended farther to the S., and consequently a large part of it lay nearer to Jacob's well than to the fountain Ain el Askar at the N. side of the opening of the valley of Nablus towards the E. Those at the S. of Sychar would repair to Jacob's well rather than to Ain el Askar, which is ten minutes' walk from Jacob's well. The true mouth of the well is but four feet long, and opens into the well itself, which is seven and a half feet in diameter, and now owing to rubbish only 75 ft. deep. The vaulted chamber was possibly the crypt of the church built over the well in the 4th century. Dr. Rogers and Miss Peache have contributed £150 for clearing the well and protecting it with stonework (Pal. Expl. Qv. Stat., April 1877).

Jada. 1 Chron. ii. 28, 32.

Jadan. Ezra x. 43.

Jaddua. 1. Successor of Jonathan or Johanan in the highpriesthood. The last highpriest and the latest name in O. T., supposing 1 Chron. iii. 22-24 corrupt. In the reign of the last Persian king Darius and of ALEXANDER [see]; when he invaded Judaea J. is said to have gone out in priestly robes to meet Alexander, and to have implored his goodwill toward the Jews (Josephus, Ant. xi. 8, § 7; Neh. xii. 11, 22). The phrase "Darius the Persian" implies that the Grecian dynasty of Alexander the Great had begun. 2. Neh. x. 21.

Jadon. Neh. iii. 7; comp. 1 Chron. xxvii. 30. Josephus calls the man of God who denounced Jeroboam's altar at Bethel "J.," intending probably "Jido the seer."

Jaël. [See DEBORAH on the "blessing" pronounced on her notwithstanding the treachery of which she was guilty in slaying Sisera who sought refuge with her. Besides the commendation of her real faith, though not of the treachery with which her act was alloyed, we should remember that the agents who execute God's righteous purposes are regarded in Scripture as God's "sanctified ones," not in respect to their own character and purposes, but in respect to God's work; so the Medes who executed His vengeance on Babylon (Isa. xiii. 3, Ps. cxxxvii. 9). Moreover Deborah anticipates a fact, viz. that J. would be regarded as a heroine and praised as a public benefactress above her fellow women.] Wife of HEBER [see] the Kenite, head of a nomad clan who, migrating from S. Canaan where his brethren had settled at the conquest of Canaan by Joshua, had encamped under the oaks named the "oaks of the wanderers" (A.V. "plain of Zaanan," Jud. iv. 11), near Kedesh Naphtali in the N. [See ISSACHAR.] He kept a neutral position, being at peace with both Jabin and Israel (ver. 17). Her tent, not Heber's, is specified as that to which Sisera fled, because the women's tent seemed a more secure asylum and J. herself "went out to meet" and invite him. She covered him with the mantle (ver. 18, Heb.), and allayed his thirst with curdled milk or buttermilk (v. 25), a favourite Arab drink. Often Palmer found in a king for water none had been in an encampment for days; milk takes its place. The "nail" with which she slew him was one of the great wooden pins which fastened down the tent cords, and the "hammer" was the mallet used to drive the nails into the ground.

In v. 6 "J." is thought (Bertheau) to be a female judge before Deborah; but as no other record exists of such an one the meaning probably is, "although J., who afterwards proved to be such a champion, was then alive, the highways were unoccupied," so helpless was Israel, "until I Deborah arose."

Jah. Condensing in one emphatical syllable all that is implied in Jahveh, the true pronunciation of Jehovah (Ps. lxxviii. 4): first in Exod. xv. 2 (Heb.). Often in names, as Eli-jah. Only in poetry: Isa. xii. 2, "Jah Jehovah is my strength and my song"; (xxvi. 4) "in Jah Jehovah is the Rock of ages." The union of the two names expresses in the highest degree God's unchanging love and power. Hallelu-Jah is "Praise ye Jah." Ps. lxxxix. 8, "O Jehovah, God of hosts, who, as Thou, is a strong Jah?" the emphatic concentration of the name "Jehovah." The spirit impressed with a sense of God feels the need of repeating frequently that name in which His being is comprehended (Hengstenberg).

Jahath. 1 Chron. vi. 20, 39, 43. 2. 1 Chron. xxiii. 10, 11. 3. 1 Chron. xxiv. 22. 4. 1 Chron. iv. 2. Identified by some with HAROEI [see]. 5. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 12.

Jahaz: JAHAZA (Josh. xiii. 18), JAHZAH (xxi. 36), JAHZAH (Num. xxi. 23, Deut. ii. 32, Jud. xi. 20, Isa. xv. 4, Jer. xlviii. 21, 34). Here the battle was fought wherein Israel overcame Sihon and so won his whole territory between the Arnon and the Jabbok. J. was assigned to Reuben, then to the Merarite Levites (1 Chron. vi. 78, Josh. xxi. 36). It was in the plain country, now the Belka, in the extreme S. of Sihon's land but N. of the Arnon. Doubtless the battle was fought along the slope of the hill still called Shihhan. There is on it a network of cyclopean walls, whence the slings and arrows of Israel dislodged the Amorites according to Josephus. Thence the enemy fled two miles to the edge of the Arnon gorge.

Jahaziah. Ezra x. 15.

Jahaziel. 1. 1 Chron. xii. 4. 2. 1 Chron. xvi. 6. 3. 1 Chron. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23.

4. Of the sons of Asaph. Under the Spirit, who came upon him, he encouraged Jehoshaphat and the congregation of Judah in the house of the Lord, before the new court: "thus saith the Lord unto you, Be not . . . dismayed by reason of this great multitude, for the battle is not yours but God's; to-morrow go ye down against them; behold they come up by the cliff of Ziz, and ye shall find them at the end of the brook (valley) before the wilderness of Jeruel, ye shall not need to fight . . . stand ye still, and see the salvation of the Lord with you" (2 Chron. xx. 14, Ps. lxxxiii. 3-7). This psalm was composed by one of the sons "of Asaph," which J. was; he probably was its author. It is called a "song" (shir), a thanksgiving by anticipation for the victory. It was sung by the Levite Kohathites and Korhites. So, according to their faith, "when they began to sing and praise, the Lord set ambushments against Amnon, Moab, . . . and they were smitten." The 47th Psalm was sung on the battlefield (2 Chron. xx. 26) after the victory, the 48th Psalm subsequently (2 Chron. xx. 28) in the temple. 5. Ezra viii. 5.

Jair=splendid, shining. [See ARGOB and BASHAN HAVOTH JAIR.] 1. On his father's side, of Judah; on his mother's side, of Manasseh. Son of Segub, who was son of Hezron by his third wife, daughter and heiress in part of Machir (father of Gilead) of Manasseh (1 Chron. ii. 21, 22, 23; Deut. iii. 14, 15). His designation from his mother, not his father, was probably owing to his settling in Manasseh E. of Jordan. His brilliant exploit was, he took Argob or Trachonitis, the Lejah, and called from his own name certain villages or groups of tents ("kraals"), 23 originally. Havoth Jair (Num. xxxii. 41), afterwards increased to 30 (Jud. x. 4). 2. The Gileadite judge. His 30 sons rode 30 asses, and had 30 cities, the number to which the original Havoth Jair had grown. 3. A Benjamite, son of Kish, father of Mordecai (Esth. ii. 5). 4. A different Heb. name, though in English Jair, or Jaor (Heb. text or kethib). Father of Elhauan, one of David's heroes who slew Lahmi, Goliath's brother (1 Chron. xii. 5).

Jairus=Jair. Ruler of a synagogue in a town near the lake of Galilee, probably Capernaum. Jesus raised her to life immediately after death (Matt. ix. 18, Mark v. 22, Luke viii. 41). The recurrence of the name in the same region, after the lapse of ages, is an undesigned coincidence, a mark of the truth of the sacred narrative.

Jakan. 1 Chron. i. 42, Gen. xxxvi. 27.

Jakel. akin to Heb. yikkah, "obedience." Father of AGUR [see]. Hitzig transl. Prov. xxx. 1, with a conjectural reading, "son of her whose obedience is Massa," i.e. the queen of Massa! (Gen. xxv. 14; 1 Chron. i. 30, iv. 41-43.) Thus Agar and Lemuel are brothers (Prov. xxxi. 1), sons of the queen of Massa in Arabia, the region which he conjectures the Simeonites conquered in Hezekiah's time. Bausen makes J. a proper name, "son of J. the man of Massa."

Jakim. 1. 1 Chron. xxiv. 12. 2. 1 Chron. viii. 19.

Jalon. 1 Chron. iv. 17.

James. Jacob in Gr.; the name appearing in our Lord's apostles and contemporaries for the first time since the patriarch. Son of Zebedee, brother of John. Their father's "hired servants" and fishing vessel imply some degree of competence. John probably was the one with Andrew (John i. 35-41), who, on John the Baptist's pointing to the Lamb of God, followed Jesus. The words Andrew "first findeth his own brother Simon" imply that John secondly found and called his own brother James to Jesus, or vice versa. Some months later the Lord saw Zebedee, J., and John, in the ship mending their nets. At His call J. and John "immediately left the ship and their father and followed Him" (Matt. iv. 22). Their leaving their father "with the hired servants" (Mark i. 20, a minute particular, characteristic of Mark's vivid style and his knowledge through Peter of all which happened) was not an unfilial act, which it would have been if he had no helpers. The next call was after an unsuccessful night's fishing, when the fishermen had gone out of their ships and had washed (Luke v. 2 Vat. and Camb. MSS. read eplunon, "were washing"; Sin. and Paris MSS. eplunau) their nets; Jesus entering one of the ships, Simon's, prayed him to thrust out a little from land, and preached. Then rewarding his loss of the ship, He desired Simon, launch out into the deep, and do ye let down your nets for a draught. At Christ's word, however unlikely to reason, he let down, and enclosed so many fishes that the net brake; and the partners in the other ship came to his help, and they filled both ships so that they began to sink. Astonished at the miracle, yet encouraged by His further promise to Simon, "henceforth thou shalt catch men," the three forsook not merely their "nets" as before, but "all," and followed Him. In fact the successive calls were: (1) to friendly acquaintance (John i. 37); (2) to intimacy (Matt. iv. 18); (3) to permanent discipleship (Luke v. 11); (4) towards the close of the first year of our Lord's ministry to apostleship (Matt. x. 1); (5) to renewed self dedication, even unto death (John xxi. 15-22).

In Matt. and Luke (vi. 14), of the four catalogues of APOSTLES [see], Andrew follows Peter on the ground of brotherhood. In Mark (iii. 16) and Acts (i. 13) J. and John precede Andrew on the ground of greater nearness to Jesus. These four head the twelve; and Andrew is at the foot of the four. Peter, J., and John alone witnessed the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mark v. 37); also the transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 1); also the agony (xxvi. 37). The four asked our Lord "privately" when His prediction of the temple's overthrow should be fulfilled, and what should be the sign (Mark xiii. 3). In Luke ix. 28 (the transfiguration) alone John precedes J. By the time that Luke wrote John was recognised as on a level with J., yet not above him, as Luke in Acts i. 13 has the order, "J., John," but in xii. 2 Luke calls J. brother of John, who by that time had become the more prominent. J. was probably the elder brother, whence John is twice called "brother of J." (Mark v. 37, Matt. xvii. 1.) No official superiority was given, for no trace of it occurs in N. T.; it was the tacitly recognised leadership which some took above the others.

J. and John were called BOANERGE [see] to express their natural character and the grace which would purify and ennoble it, making J. the first apostle martyr and John the apostle of love. Their fiery zeal in its untempered state appeared in their desiring to call fire from heaven to consume the Samaritans. These would not receive Jesus when He sent messengers to make ready for Him (i.e. to announce His Messiahship, which He did not conceal in Samaria as in Judea and Galilee: John iv. 26, Luke ix. 54), because His face was as though He would go to Jerusalem, whereas they expected the Messiah would confirm their anti-Jewish worship in the mount Gerizim temple. J. and John "saw" some actual collision between the Samaritans and the messengers who were sent before and whom our Lord and His apostles followed presently; just as Elijah in the same Samaria had called for fire upon the offenders face to face (2 Kings i. 10, 12). In Luke ix. 55, 56, "ye know not what manner of spirit ye are [not the fiery judicial spirit which befiteth Elijah's times, but the spirit of love so as to win men to salvation, is the spirit of Me and Mine], for the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives but to save them," is not in Alex., Vat., and Sin. MSS. The same John subsequently (Acts viii. 14-17) came down with Peter to confer the Spirit's gifts on Samaritan believers. What miracles in renewing the heart does the gospel work!

Salome the mother of Zebedee's children, impressed by Christ's promise that the twelve should sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel, begged, and her two sons joined in the prayer, that they might sit one on His right the other on His left hand in His glory (Mark x. 35-37). They prefaced it with pleading His own promise, "Master, we would that Thou shouldst do for us whatsoever we shall desire" (Matt. vii. 7, Luke xi. 9, Mark xi. 24). Perhaps jealousy of Peter and Andrew, their rivals for the nearest place to Him, actuated them (Matt. xx. 20-21). He told them that they should drink of His cup (Sin. and Vat. MSS. omit in ver. 22, 23 the clause as to the "baptism") of suffering (Acts xii. 1, 2, J.; Rev. i. 9, John), but to sit on His right and left, said He, "is not Mine to give, except to those for whom it is prepared of My Father" (so the Gr.). The ten were indignant at the claim.

J. was among those who abode in the upper room and persevered in prayer; the apostles, the women, and the Lord's brethren, after the ascension (Acts i. 13). In A.D. 41 Herod Agrippa I., a pliant politician but strict Jew, "very ambitious to oblige the people, exactly careful in the observance of the laws, and not allowing one day to pass without its appointed sacrifice" (Josephus, Ant. xix. 7, § 3), in consonance with his well known character, "laid hands (Gr.) on certain of the church." The passover had brought J. and Peter to Jerusalem (xii. 1-3). So he took the opportunity just before the passover to kill the most fiery of the two first, namely, "J. the brother of John." "The sword" was the instrument of his execution, Herod preferring the Roman method to the Jewish punishment of seducers to strange worship, viz. stoning.

Clement of Alexandria (Hypotyposis, vii.; Eusebius, H. E., ii. 6) records a tradition that J.'s prosecutor was moved by his bold confession to declare himself a Christian on the spot; he begged J.'s forgiveness, and the apostle kissed him, saying "peace be to thee"; they were both beheaded together. A Romish legend says that he preached in Spain, and that his remains were translated to Compostella there!

James, surnamed "the Less" or "Little." Son of Mary (Mark xv. 40, Matt. xxvii. 56, Luke xiv. 10). Brother of Jude (ver. 1, Luke vi. 16, Acts i. 13). "The brother of the Lord" (Matt. xiii. 55, Mark vi. 3, Gal. i. 19). "Son of Alphaeus" (Matt. x. 3, Mark iii. 18, Luke vi. 15, Acts i. 13). Writer of the epistle; president of the church at Jerusalem (Jas. i. 1; Acts xii. 17, xv. 13, 19; Gal. ii. 9, 12). Clopas (Alex. and Vat. MSS., John xix. 25) or Cleophas (Sin. MS.) is the Heb. Alphaeus the Gr., of the same name; he married Mary, sister of the Virgin Mary, and had by her J., Jesus, Jude, and Simon, and three daughters (Mary is sometimes designated "mother of J. and Jesus," Matt. xxvii. 56, as these were the two eldest); he died before our Lord's ministry began, and his widow went to live with her sister the Virgin Mary, a widow also herself (for Joseph's name never occurs after Luke ii.), at Nazareth (Matt. xiii. 55), Capernaum (John ii. 12), and Jerusalem (Acts i. 14). Living together the cousins were regarded as "brothers" and "sisters" of Jesus. Being His elders, they went on one occasion to "lay hold on Him," saying that He was "beside Himself"; as He was so pressed by multitudes that He and His disciples "could not so much as eat bread," His cousin brethren thought they would restrain what seemed to them mad zeal (Mark iii. 20, 21, 31-33). The statement in John vii. 3, 5, "neither did His brethren believe in Him," does not imply that all of them disbelieved; J. and Jude believed. Or if all are included, the negation of belief is not a negation of all belief, but of such as recognised the true nature of His Messiahship. They looked for a reigning Messiah, and thought Jesus' miracles were wrought with a view to this end: "depart hence (from obscure Galilee) and go into Judaea, that Thy disciples also may see the works that Thou doest, for there is no man that doeth anything in secret and (yet) he himself seeketh to be known openly (which they take for granted He seeks); if Thou do these things, show Thyself to the world." The theory that denies any of the Lord's brethren to have place among the apostles involves the improbability that there were two sets of four first cousins, named J., Jesus, Jude, Simon, without anything to show which is son of Clopas and which his cousin. Luke in enumerating the twelve calls Jude "the brother of James," he must mean brother of the "James, son of Alphaeus," before mentioned. Jude appears in Mark vi. 3, Matt. xiii. 55, as "brother of the Lord"; therefore James the son of Alphaeus must have been "brother," i.e. cousin, of our Lord. This proves the identity of James the apostle with James the Lord's brother. Luke moreover recognises only two Jameses in the Gospel and Acts down to chap. xii. 17; the James there must then mean the son of Alphaeus. An apostle is more likely to have presided over the Jerusalem church, wherein he is placed even before Cephas and John, than one who was an unbeliever till after the resurrection (Gal. i. 19, ii. 9-12; comp. Acts ix. 27, which calls those to whom Paul went "apostles"; now Peter and James were those to whom he went, therefore James was an apostle.

After the resurrection Christ appeared to J. (1 Cor. xv. 7). The spurious "Gospel according to the Hebrews" says "J. swore he would not eat bread from the hour that he drank the cup of the Lord till he should see Him risen again." (?) Christ's special appearance to J. strengthened him for the high position, tantamount to "bishop," which he subsequently held at Jerusalem. Christ's command to the collected apostles to preach the gospel everywhere is compatible with each having a special sphere besides the general care of the churches. To him and Peter Barnabas, A.D. 40, introduced Saul, three years subsequently to his conversion in A.D. 37 on his first visit to Jerusalem, and through their influence he was admitted to free intercourse with the disciples, who at first had been "all afraid of him, not believing he was a disciple" (Acts ix. 26-28; Gal. i. 18, 19). When Peter was delivered by the angel, A.D. 44, he said to the assembly at Mary's house "Go show these things unto James" (Acts xii. 17). In A.D. 49 at the Jerusalem council J. gives authoritative opinion, "My sentence is" (Acts xv. 13, 19). At the same time Paul recognises as "pillars of the church" "J., Cephas and John" (J. standing first; Gal. ii. 9). It was "certain who came from J.," president of the mother church of Jerusalem, who led Peter to his Judaising vacillation at Antioch (11, 12). Finally in A.D. 57 Paul, having been on the previous day "received gladly" by the brethren, went in officially, with Luke and his other assistant ministers, in the presence of all the elders, and "declared particularly what God had wrought among the Gentiles by his ministry" (Acts xxi. 17-19).

Besides Clement of Alexandria who speaks of his episcopate (Hypot. vi., in Euseb. H. E., ii. 1), Hegesippus, a Jewish Christian in the middle of the second century, writes much of J.,

that he drank not strong drink, nor had a razor up in his head, and wore no woollen clothes, but linen, so that he alone might go into the holy place; in short he was a rigid Nazarite ascetic, following after legal righteousness, so that the Jews regarded him as possessing priestly sanctity; such a one when converted to Christ was likely to have most influence with the Jews, who called him "the just one," and therefore to have been especially suited to preside over the Jerusalem church. So we find him recommending to Paul a conformity to legal ceremonialism in things indifferent (Acts xxi. 18-25), which however proved in the end really inexpedient. Hegesippus says J. was often in the temple praying for forgiveness for the people. At the passover shortly before the destruction of Jerusalem (foretold in his epistle, v. 1) the scribes and Pharisees set him on a pinnacle of the temple, and begged him to restrain the people who were "going astray after Jesus as though He were the Christ." "Tell us, O just one," said they before the assembled people, "which is the door of Jesus?" alluding to his prophecy "the coming of the Lord draweth high . . . behold the church standeth before the doors" (Gr. v. 8, 9), wherein he repeats Jesus' words (Matt. xxiv. 33), "when ye shall see all these things, know that He (marg.) is near, even at the doors." J. replied with a loud voice, "Why ask ye me concerning Jesus, the Son of Man? He sitteth at the right hand of power, and will come again on the clouds of heaven." Many cried "Hosanna to the Son of David." But J. was east down by the Pharisees. Praying, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," he was stoned in spite of the remonstrance of a Rechabite priest ("Stop! the just one is praying for you!"), then beaten to death with a fuller's club. Thus the Jews wreaked their vengeance on him, exasperated at his prophecy of their national doom in his epistle, which was circulated not only in Jerusalem but by those who came up to the great feasts, among "the twelve tribes scattered abroad" to whom it is addressed.

J. was probably married (1 Cor. ix. 5). Josephus makes Ananias, the high-priest after Festus' death, to have brought J. before the sanhedrim for having broken the laws, and to have delivered him and some others to be stoned. In Heb. xiii. 7 there may be allusion to J.'s martyrdom, "Remember them which had (not have) the rule (spiritually) over you, (Hebrews, over whom he presided) who have spoken unto you the word of God, whose faith follow, considering the end of their conversation" (their life walk). If this be the allusion, the Epistle to Hebrews was probably A.D. 63, and J.'s martyrdom A.D. 62. His apprehension by Ananias was very probably in this year; but according to Hegesippus he was not martyred till just before the destruction of Jerusalem, A.D. 69, to which, as near, chap. v. 1 may refer.

James, Epistle general of. Called by Eusebius (H. E. ii. 23; A.D. 330) first of the catholic epistles, i.e. addressed to the church in general; not, as Paul's, to particular churches or individuals. In the oldest MSS. except Sin. MS. they stand before Paul's epistles. Two were "universally acknowledged" (homologoumena, Euseb.); 1 Pet. and 1 John. All are found in every existing MS. of the whole N. T. The epistle of J., being addressed to the scattered Israelites, naturally was for a time less known. Origen, who lived between A.D. 185 and 254, first expressly mentions it (Comm. on John, i. 19). Clement of Rome quotes from it a century earlier (1 Ep. to Cor. x: Jas. ii. 21, 23). The Shepherd of Hermas soon after quotes iv. 7. Irenæus (Hær. iv. 16, §2) refers to ii. 23. The old Syriac version has it and the Epistle to Hebrews alone of the books which were "disputed" (antilegomena, Euseb. iii. 25) yet "acknowledged by the majority" (Euseb.). No Latin father of the first three centuries quotes it. It is specified as canonical both in the East and West in the councils of Hippo and Carthage, A.D. 397. Known only partially at first, it subsequently obtained a wider circulation; and the proofs becoming established of its having been recognised in apostolic churches, which had men endowed with the discernment of spirits to discriminate inspired utterances from uninspired (1 Cor. xiv. 37), it was universally accepted. The O. T. Apocrypha is a different case; the Jewish church had no doubt about it, they knew it to be not inspired.

Luther's objection ("an epistle of straw, destitute of evangelical character") was due to his thinking chap. ii. opposed to Paul's doctrine of justification by faith not works. The two viewing justification from distinct standpoints harmonize and mutually complement each other's definitions. By "works" James means love, which is the spirit of true "works" such as God accepts; for he compares "works" to "the spirit," "faith" to "the body." In ii. 26, "as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also," if mere outward deeds were meant, "works" would answer to "the body," "faith" to "the spirit." His reversing this proves he means by "faith" the form of faith without the working reality. Such "faith" apart from (Gr. choris) the spirit of faith, which is LOVE (and love evidences itself in works) is dead; precisely the doctrine of Paul also: 1 Cor. xiii. 2; Gal. v. 6, "faith which worketh by love" (its spirit). So also Jas. ii. 17: "faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone"; presumed faith, if it have not works, is dead, being by itself (Gr. for alone), i.e. severed from its spirit, love; just as the body would be "dead" if severed from the spirit. Paul speaks of faith in its justifying the sinner before God; James in its justifying the believer evidentially before men. Ver. 18, show me (evidence to me) thy faith without thy works, but thou canst not, whereas "I will show thee my faith by my works." Abraham was justified by faith before God the moment he believed God's promise (Gen. xv. 6). He showed his faith, and so was justified evidentially before men, by his offering Isaac 40 years afterwards. The tree shows its life by fruits, but is alive before either leaves or fruits appear. [See FAITH.] In ver. 23 James recognises, like Paul, that Abraham's "faith was imputed unto him for righteousness." James meets the Jews' false notion that their possession of the law, though they disobeyed it, and their descent from Abraham and notional belief apart from obedience, would justify (an error which Paul also combats, Rom. ii. 17-25; comp. Jas. i. 22). James in i. 3, iv. 1, 12, accords with Rom. v. 3, vi. 13, vii. 23, xiv. 4.

Coincidence with the Sermon on the Mount. James's speciality was so to preach the gospel as not to disparage the law which the Jews so revered. As Paul's epistles unfold the doctrines flowing from the death and resurrection of Christ, so James's epistle unfolds His teaching during His life, and is a commentary on the sermon on the mount. Both represent the law as fulfilled in love; the language corresponds: i. 2 with Matt. v. 12; i. 4 with Matt. v. 48; i. 5, v. 15 with Matt. vii. 7-11; ii. 13 with Matt. v. 7, vi. 14, 15; ii. 10 with Matt. v. 19; iv. 1 with Matt. vi. 24; iv. 11 with Matt. vii. 1, 2; v. 2 with Matt. vi. 19. He teaches the same gospel righteousness which the sermon on the mount inculcates as the highest realization of the law. His character as "the just," or legally righteous, disposed him to this coincidence (i. 20, ii. 10, iii. 18 with Matt. v. 20), and fitted him for both presiding over a church zealous of the law, and winning Jewish converts, combining as he did in himself O. T. righteousness with evangelical faith, ii. 8 with Matt. v. 44, 48. Practice, not profession, is the test of acceptance (ii. 17, iv. 17 with Matt. vii. 21-23). Sins of tongue, lightly as the world regards them, seriously violate the law of love (i. 26, iii. 2-18 with Matt. v. 22). So swearing: v. 12 with Matt. v. 33-37.

Object: Persons addressed. The absence of the apostolic benediction favours the view that the epistle, besides directly teaching the believing, indirectly aims at the unbelieving Israelites also. To those he commands humility, patience, prayer; to these he addresses awful warnings (v. 7-11, iv. 9, v. 1-6). The object is (1) To warn against prevalent Jewish sins: formalism as contrasted with true religious "service" (threskeia, cult); the very ritual "services" of the gospel consist in mercy and holiness (comp. i. 27 with Matt. xxiii. 23, Mic. vi. 7, 8); in undesigned coincidence with James's own decision against mere ritualism at the council, as recorded in the independent history (Acts xv. 13-21); against fanaticism which, under the garb of religious zeal, was rending Jerusalem (i. 20); fatalism (i. 13); mean crouching to the rich (ii. 2); evil speaking (iii. 3-12, iv. 11); parti- anship (iii. 14); boasting (ii. 5, iv. 16); oppression (v. 4). (2) To teach Christians patience in trial (i. 2), in good works (i. 22-25), under provocation (iii. 17), under oppression (v. 7), under persecution (v. 10). The motive for patience is the Lord's speedy coming to right all wrong (v. 8, Meyrick in Smith's Diet.). In v. 14 James writes, "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church"; not some one, as Rome interprets it, to justify her extreme unction. The elders praying for him represent the whole church, "anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord." This sign accompanied miraculous healings wrought by Christ's apostles. To use the sign now, when the reality of miraculous healing is gone, is unmeaning superstition. Other apostolic usages are discontinued as no longer expedient (1 Cor. xi. 4-15, xvi. 20), so unction of the sick: Rome anoints to heal the soul where life is despaired of; James's unction was to heal the body where life is to be preserved. Oil as sign of Divine grace was appropriate in healing.

Inspiration. In Acts xv. 28 he joins with the other apostles, elders, and brethren, in writing, "it seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us," etc. Peter, the apostle of the circumcision, tacitly confirms the inspiration of the first president of the Jerusalem church, with whose Jewish sympathies he had much in common, by incorporating with his own inspired writings ten passages from James (comp. i. 1 with 1 Pet. i. 1; i. 2 with 1 Pet. i. 6, iv. 12, 13; i. 11 with 1 Pet. i. 24; i. 18 with 1 Pet. i. 3; ii. 7 with 1 Pet. iv. 14; iii. 13 with 1 Pet. ii. 12; iv. 1 with 1 Pet. ii. 11; iv. 6 with 1 Pet. v. 5, 6; iv. 7 with 1 Pet. v. 6, 9; iv. 10 with 1 Pet. v. 6; v. 20 with 1 Pet. iv. 8.)

The style. Its pure Gr. shows it was meant not only for the Jerusalem Jews but for the Hellenists, i.e. Greek-speaking Jews. The style is curt and sententious, gloomy succeeding gloom. A Hebraic character prevails, as the poetic parallelisms show (ii. 1-12). The Jewish term "synagogue" (ii. 2 marg.) is applied to the Christian "assembly." The images are covert arguments from analogy, combining logic with poetical vividness. Eloquence, terse and persuasive, characterizes this epistle. Its palpable similarity to Matthew, the most Hebraic of the Gospels, is what we might expect from the president of the Jerusalem church when writing to Israelites.

In this epistle the O. T. law is put in its true relation to Christianity which brings out its inner spirit, love manifesting itself in obedience of heart and life. The Jews were zealous for the letter of the law, but what the gospel insists on is its overlying spirit. Paul insists on this as much as James (2 Cor. iii. 6-18). The doctrines of grace and justification by faith, so prominent in Paul's teaching to the Hellenists and Gentiles, are in the background in James as having been already taught by that apostle. To the Jewish Christians, who kept the legal ordinances down to the full of Jerusalem, James sketches the "perfect" man, "continuing" in the gospel "law of liberty" (because it is the law of love).

Jamin. 1. Gen. xvi. 10, Exod. vi. 15, 1 Chron. iv. 21, Num. xxvi. 12. 2. 1 Chron. ii. 27. 3. Neh. viii. 7.

Jamlech. 1 Chron. ix. 34, 35, 41.

Janna. Luke iii. 21.

Jannes and Jambres. Two magicians. "Withstood Moses" (2 Tim. iii. 8, 9). They could "proceed no further," though for a time they simulated Moses' miracles (Exod. vii. 11). At last "their folly was manifested unto all," when not only could they no longer rival Moses and send boils but were themselves smitten with boils. So as to the lice, the magicians confessed, "this is the finger of God" (viii. 18, 19, ix. 11). An or anna is Egyptian for "scribe." It is the name of a writer in papyri of the reign of Rameses II. Jambres may mean "scribe of the S." (Speaker's Comm., note at end of Exod. vii.) The Targum of Jonathan mentions J. and J. as "chiefs of the magicians." Numenius, a Pythagorean (in Euseb. Prep. Evang., ix. 8) wrote, "J. and J. were stercor scribes, deemed inferior to none in magic." Paul by inspiration endorses the names given them in secular history, though not mentioned in the inspired Exodus. Pliny (H. N. xxx. 1) makes Moses, Jannes, and Jotape, heads of magic factions.

EGYPTIAN MITRES.

Janoah. A place in northern Galilee, the land of Naphtali, taken by Tiglath Pileser (2 Kings xv. 29).

Janahah. On the border of Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 6, 7). Now Yanua, about 12 miles S.E. of Nabbis (Napolis) or Shechem. N.E. of Yanun is Khirbet Yanun, which may be the site of the original town.

Janum, Janim (in the kethib or Heb. text). A town of Judah in the mountain district near Hebron (Josh. xv. 53).

Japheth=enlargement. From pa-thah "to extend" (Gen. ix. 27); Geseuias from yaphth "to be fair," from the fair complexion of J., and his descendants. Probably the second son of Noah, Ham the youngest (Gen. ix. 24, x. 2, 6, 21, where Syr., Arab., Vulg. transl. as Geseuias "the elder brother of J."; but LXX. as A. V.). If "younger son" in ix. 24 be Canaan not Ham, the invariable order of the names represents also the order of their ages, "Shem, Ham, and J." Shem's genealogy is put last, being traced from x. 21 onwards uninterruptedly as the line of Messiah. These three are persons, the names of their descendants are ethnic. Written more than 3000 years ago the genealogical account in Gen. x. is the oldest and most trustworthy history of the dispersion of mankind. It states from J. came (1) Gomer, i.e. the Cymri or Celts; (2) Magog, the Scythians and Sarmatians (Slavonians); (3) Madai, the Medes or Aryans; (4) Javan, the Ionians (Greeks); (5) Tubal, the Tiberians; (6) Meshech, the Moschi (these two declined between 1100 and 400 B.C., leaving no literature, so that modern ethnology does not notice them); and (7) Tiras, the Thracians (Tentons). Moses thus, under the Spirit, anticipates the discoveries of ethnology, which comprises one great family of mankind under five heads: 1, Indo-Persians or Aryans; 2, Celts; 3, Tentons; 4, Greco-Italians; 5, Slaves. Moses rightly makes the nations N. and W. of Mesopotamia and Syria Japhetic, comprising seven principal races within the geographical limits known to him. They occupied "the isles of the Gentiles," i.e. all the coast lands in Europe and Asia Minor, and islands of the Mediterranean, whence they spread northwards over Europe and much of Asia, from India and Persia in the E. to the extreme W. of Europe, and now to America and Australia.

Gen. ix. 27, "He (God, John i. 14, or J.) shall dwell in the tents of Shem." J. by expansive energy and enlargement overpasses his own bounds and dwells in the tents of Shem, as the Medo-Persian, Greek, Roman, and modern European and American empires exemplify. But mainly J. dwells in Shem's tents spiritually. Superior in secular enterprise and capacity for rule, yet in spiritual concerns J. is inferior to Shem, through whose posterity alone all revelations from heaven have come, culminating in "God manifest in the flesh" (Rom. ix. 5). J.'s descendants, as converts to "the Lord God of Shem" (Gen. ix. 26), dwell in spirit in Shem's tents (Isa. lx. 3, 5). The full consummation of the prophecy will be when Israel, sprung from Shem, shall be spiritual head of the nations, and they shall flock to Jerusalem where Israel's king shall reign (Jer. iii. 17).

Japhia. A boundary of Zeonun (Josh. xix. 12). Now Yafa, two miles S. of Nazareth. Traditionally the birthplace of Zebedee's sons, James and John.

Japhia. 1. King of Lachish. One of the five Amorite kings confederated against Joshua (x. 3), defeated at Bethoron, and slain at Makkedah. 2. 2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chron. iii. 7, xiv. 6.

Japhlet. 1 Chron. vii. 30-32.

Japhleti on the Japhletite. A landmark on the S. border of Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 3). Possibly the name of some ancient tribe formerly there.

Japho. Josh. xiv. 46. Jorpa [see], now Jaffa (Jonah i. 3).

Jarah. 1 Chron. ix. 40, 42; but viii. 36, JEROADAH.

Jareb. Hos. v. 13, x. 6. "Ephraim went to the Assyrian and (Judah) sent to king J." "the calf shall be carried into Assyria . . . a present to king J." Heb. "avenger." The Assyrian king, seeking his own aggrandisement, proposed to undertake Israel's and Judah's cause. As in Jud. vi. 32, Jerub in Jerubbaal means "let Baal plead." Judah under Ahaz applied to Tiglath Pileser for aid against Syria and Israel (2 Kings xvi. 7, 8; 2 Chron. xxviii. 16-21). The Assyrian "distressed, but strengthened him not," as Hosea foretells, "he could not . . . cure you of your wound." The Israelite Menahem subsidised Pul (2 Kings xv. 19).

ASSYRIAN SOLDIER.

Instead of "avenger" to ward off foes, the expected protector proved to be God's "avenger" for Israel's and Judah's sins. Pusey explains J. "the strifeful king." Assyrian history being, as their own inscriptions prove, one perpetual warfare. The Assyrian word jarbam is "to fight"; Gesenius explains J. "the hostile king."

Jared=descent. Gen. v. 15, 16, 18-20; Luke iii. 37. [See JFRED.]

Jaresiah. 1 Chron. viii. 27.

Jarha. An Egyptian; servant or slave of Sheshan of Judah, about the time of Eli; married Sheshan's daughter Abhai, Sheshan having no sons (1 Chron. ii. 34). An extraordinary occurrence. J. was forefather of a chief house of the Jerahmeelites, which lasted at least till Hezekiah's time, and of which sprung ZABAD and AZARIAH [see both]. Abhai's descendants were called after her, as Joab, Abishai, and Asahel are called "the sons of Zerniah" (ver. 16). It is an undesigned coincidence, confirming the Bible record, that the Jerahmeelites dwelt on the S. of Judah nearest Egypt, so that an Egyptian servant might naturally be in a Jerahmeelite family, such as Sheshan's was (1 Sam. xxvii. 10).

Jarib. 1. Son of Simeon (1 Chron. ix. 24). JACHIN in Gen. xvi. 10, Exod. vi. 15, Num. xxvi. 12. 2. Accompanied Ezra (viii. 16) from Babylon. Sent unto Iddo the chief at Casiphia, and to his brethren the Nethinims, to procure ministers for the house of God. 3. Ezra x. 18.

Jarmuth. 1. A town in the shepherds or low hills (not "the plain") of Judah (Josh. xv. 35). Piram its king was one of the five confederated to punish Gibeon for submitting to Joshua (x. 3, 5); routed at Bethoron; executed at Makkedah (ver. 23). Occupied by children of Judah on the return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 29). Now Yarmuk, with a hill near, Tell Yarmud. 2. A city of Issachar, assigned to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. xxi. 29). REMETH in Josh. xix. 20; RAMOTH in 1 Chron. vi. 73. Both are modifications of the same root as Jarmuth.

Jaroah. 1 Chron. v. 14.

Jashen. 2 Sam. xxiii. 32; but in 1 Chron. xi. 34 HASHEM. Kennicott reads, "of the sons of Hashem, Guni; Jonathan the son of Shamha."

Jasher. A book alluded to only in Josh. x. 13 as containing Joshua's miracle of commanding the sun and the moon to stand still; 2 Sam. i. 18 as containing David's elegy over Saul and Jonathan, entitled the "bow" song, celebrating Jonathan famous for the bow (comp. ver. 22 and Ps. lx.), a national song to be "taught" to the people (not "he bade them teach the children of Judah [the use of the bow"): Deut. xxxi. 19. [See DAVID.] Jasher means upright. Jeshurun is the upright nation (so in its ideal), viz. Israel. So LXX. "the book of the upright one"; Vulg. "the book of just ones"; the Syriac, "the book of praise songs," from Heb. yashir. Exod. xv. 1, "then sang." This Book of Jasher was a kind of national sacred song-book, continued from age to age, according as great crises moved Israelites to mighty deeds, and poets to immortalize them; like the "chronicles" of the kings of Israel often alluded to in later times. So the Book of Psalms, beginning with David's, received fresh accessions from age to age down to the time of the return from Babylon, when it was completed. "The Book of the Wars of the Lord" (Num. xxi. 14, 15) similarly records in sacred odes Israel's triumphant progress; of these we have left the fragment as to passing the Arnon, the song of the well, and that on the conquest of Sihon's kingdom (ver. 17, 18, 27-30). The Targum and Jarchi explain, "the book of the law." Jerome (on Isa. xlv. 2) mentions that Genesis was called "the book of the just." The only two specimens of the Book of Jasher extant are rhythmical. In this respect, and in its being uninspired or at least not preserved as part of our inspired canon, this book differs from the pentateuch; both alike record successively the exploits of Jeshurun, the ideally upright nation.

Jashobeam. David's follower, a "HACHMONITE" [see] or rather "son of Hachmoni," i.e. of the family of Hachmoni (1 Chron. xi. 11), son of Zabdiel (xxvii. 2): head of the first monthly course of officers and men (24,000) who waited by turns on the king (ver. 32). He may be the "Korhite" who joined David at Ziklag (xii. 6). In 2 Sam. xxiii. 8 he is called the "Tachmonite that sat in the seat," Josheb basshebeth, a corruption of text for Jashobeam. Also he is here called "chief of the captains" or "the three" (shalishi), in Chron. "chief of the thirty" (Heb. shalishim): ver. 11, 15, 42, 1 Chron. xii. 4. "The thirty" formed the whole body of David's adjutants, "the three" were the king's aides de camp. He slays 300 in Chron., where the number may have crept in from 2 Sam. xxiii. 18 in the case of Abishai; 800 is the correct number in Samuel; not all at one blow, but with successive throws of his spear.

Jashub. 1. Num. xxvi. 24, 1 Chron. vii. 1; Job b: contraction in Gen. xli. 13. 2. Ezra x. 20.

Jashubi-lehem = "those who returned to Lulehem." A place on the W. of Judah, named among Shelah's descendants by Bathshua the Canaanitess (1 Chron. iv. 22). The Jewish doctors explained the name in this verse as = Naomi and Ruth who returned from "Moab" to bread (lulehem) or Bethlehem; the "ancient things" or "words" answer to the book of Ruth which records concerning them.

Jason. Grecised from Joshua. The Thessalonian who received Paul and Silas (Acts xvii. 5-7, 9), whom the mob therefore, after assaulting his house, dragged before the magistrates. J. had to give security before he was let go. In Rom. xvi. 21 Paul sends J.'s salutations from Corinth, calling him his "kinsman" or fellow tribesman, or fellow countryman, as the word is used ix. 3.

Jasper. Last of the gems in the highpriest's breastplate (Exod. xxviii. 20), probably the green jasper. In Rev. xxi. 19 it is first of New Jerusalem's foundations. It represents watery crystalline brightness, symbol of purity: xxi. 11, "her light was like unto a stone most precious, even like a jasper stone, clear as crystal." "He that sat upon the throne (iv. 3) was to look upon like a jasper." Ebrard thinks the diamond is meant. The common jasper has various way colours, somewhat transparent. The king of Tyre (Ezek. xxviii. 13) has the jasper with eight other of the highpriest's 12 precious stones, as type of antichrist who usurps Christ's highpriesthood combined with kingship (Zech. vi. 13).

Jathniel. 1 Chron. xxvi. 2.

Jattir. A town in the hills of Judah (Josh. xv. 48), one of the nine allotted to the sons of Aaron (xxi. 14, 1 Chron. vi. 57). David sent presents there, from the Amalekite spoil (1 Sam. xxx. 27). Now 'Attir, 10 miles S. of Hebron. The Ithrites Ira and Gareb were probably from Jattir.

Javan. 1. Son of Japheth, father of Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, and Dodanim (Gen. x. 2, 4). The same as Ionia, the branch of the Greek race best known in the East, so expressing the Greeks generally. Javanan is the Assyrian designation in cuneiform inscriptions of Sargon's time. Yavana is their Persian designation in Persepolitan inscriptions. In Isa. lxvi. 19 J. is one representative of the Gentile world. Its commerce in "the persons of men (slaves) and vessels of brass" with Tyre is mentioned Ezek. xxvii. 13. In Joel iii. 3, 6, God reproves the nations because "they have given a boy for (as price for prostitution of) an harlot, and sold a girl for wine," especially Tyre and Sidon; "the children of Judah and Jerusalem have ye sold unto the Grecians (sons of J.), that ye might remove them far from their border." Others from the mention of "Sabbeans" (ver. 8) think Javan in Arabia is meant. [See 2.] Some germs of civilization probably passed into Greece through Jewish slaves imported from Phœnicia. Greece, and her king Alexander, is prophetically mentioned (Dan. viii. 21, x. 20, xi. 2). God in retribution for the enslaving of Judah's children (Zech. ix. 13) declares He will fill his bow with Judah and Ephraim as his arrows, and "raise up thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece"; fulfilled partly in His raising up the Jewish Maccabees against Antiochus Epiphanes the representative of Greece; hereafter to be exhaustively consummated in Israel being made victorious over the last antichrist, Antiochus' antitype. 2. In Ezek. xxvii. 19 J. is a Greek settlement in Arabia. Then instead of "going to and fro" transl. "from Uzal" the capital of Arabia Felix or Yemen, Sanaa. However A.V. yields good sense: all peoples, whether near as the Israelite "Dan" on the sea coast, or far off as "J.," or the Greeks who "go to and fro," frequented thy fairs with "iron, cassia," etc., brought from various quarters.

Jaziz. A Magarite, over David's flocks (1 Chron. xxvii. 31). The Hagarites frequented the region E. of Jordan (ver. 19-22); here J. probably tended the sheep and goats.

Jealousy, waters of. Num. v. An ordeal to detect a woman's guilt or vindicate her innocence to her husband. It could not injure the innocent or punish the guilty except by miracle; contrary to heathen ordeals, wherein the innocent could scarcely escape except by miracle.

Jearim, Mount. On the northern border of Judah (Josh. xv. 10). CHESALON [see] (Kesla) was its shoulder, seven miles W. of Jerusalem, between wady Ghurab and w. Ismael. Wady Ghurab separates from it Kirjath Jearim which is two miles and a half to the N. J. means "forests"; it still has lonely dark woods.

Jeaterai. 1 Chron. vi. 21, 31. ETHNI in ver. 41.

Jeberechiah. In LXX. and Vulg. Berechiah (Isa. viii. 2), father of Zachariah in Alaz' reign. The same names occur later, Zech. i. 1. Josephus mentions another Zachariah, son of Baruch, slain by the Jews in the temple shortly before the last siege (B. J., iv. 5, § 4). If Berechiah was father of the house, not of the individuals, the "Zachariah son of Baruch" in Matt. xxiii. 35 (where "Zachariah the son of Jehoiada," 2 Chron. xxiv. 20, in the individual sense is meant) may be identical with Zachariah, son of Je (= Jah) berechiah (Isa. viii. 2).

Jebus. The Jebusite city, a former name of Jerusalem (Josh. xviii. 16, 25; Jud. xix. 10, 11; 1 Chron. xi. 4, 5). J. in Heb. means a trodden place, as a threshing-floor, viz. the dry rock, the S.W. hill, the modern "Zion," not mount Moriah, the city of Solomon, in the centre of which was a perennial spring. But the name is probably older than Hebrew times. In haughty self security the Jebusites fancied that "the blind and lame" would suffice to defend their fortress, so strong was its position, shut in by deep valleys on three sides. The Judæans and Benjaminites occupying the N. side, which was lower ground, ever since the death of Joshua (Josh. xv. 8, 63; Jud. i. 8, 21), had been heretofore unable to gain the Jebusite citadel, such is the characteristic bravery of mountaineers. But Joab [see DAVID] ascended the height and took it (2 Sam. v. 6-9, 1 Chron. xi. 6).

In Zech. ix. 7 "Ekron (shall be) as a Jebusite," the sense is, Even the ignoble remnant of the Jews shall be sacred to "our God" and "as a governor in Judah," whereas Philistine "Ekron" shall be a tributary bond servant "as a Jebusite," in the servile position to which Solomon consigned them (1 Kings ix. 20, 21). The Jebusites were a hilly mountain tribe (Num. xiii. 29, Josh. xi. 3). Jabin, king in the N., sent southwards to invite them to help against Joshua. Even after David's capture of Zion ARATHAH [see] appears settled prosperously in the neighbourhood. The language in 2 Sam. xxiv. 23 admits, though it does not require, that Arathah should be regarded as the fallen "king" of the Jebusites; he certainly exhibited a true kingly spirit. In Gen. x. 15, 16 the Jebusite stands third of Canaan's descendants, between Heth (Hittites) and the Amorite, the position which the race retained subsequently. So in Ezek. xvi. 3, 15 Jerusalem appears as the offspring of the union of the Amorite and Hittite. In the enumeration of the ten races occupying Canaan the Jebusites stand last (Gen. xv. 21). Some of them appear as late as the return from Babylon, termed "Solomon's servants" (Neh. vii. 57, xi. 3; Ezra ix. 1).

Jeeoniah. One of seven, apparently sons of Neri, of Nathan's line (as was Salathiel, Luke iii. 27), introduced into the royal line when Jehoiachin had no child who succeeded to the throne (1 Chron. iii. 17, 18). Jeeoniah's son Assir left a daughter probably, who according to the law of heiresses (Num. xxvii. 8, xxxvi. 8, 9) married a man of a family of her paternal tribe, viz. Neri descended from Nathan, David's son. Shealtiel, Malchiram, etc., sprang from this marriage.

Jeeholiah. 2 Kings xv. 2.

Jeeoniah = JEHOIACHIN [see]. Son of Jehoiakim, last but one of Judah's kings. Shortened, by omitting Jn, into COXIAH (Jer. xxvii. 20, xxvii. 24). It was virtually Jehovah's declaration of ceasing all connection with him (Hos. ix. 12).

Jedaiah. Head of the second course of priests, under David (1 Chron. xxiv. 7). Some "children of J. of the house of Joshua, 973," returned from Babylon (Ezra ii. 36, Neh. vii. 39). These are thus distinguished from a second priestly "house" named "Jedihah" (Neh. xii. 6, 7, 19, 21). Jehoiarib and Jedaiab represent two classes of the priesthood (1 Chron. ix. 10). It is a corrupt reading in Neh. xi. 10 which makes J. son of Joiarib. Though Joiarib's was the first course, J.'s, as having for their head Jesua (he being high-priest under Zerubbabel), is named first.

Jeduah (a different name in Heb. from the last). 1. Of Simon, forefather of Ziza (1 Chron. iv. 37). 2. Neh. iii. 10.

Jedaiab. 1. A patriarch of Benjaminite heads of houses whose sons numbered 17,200 mighty men in David's days (1 Chron. vi. 11). Identified with Jahiel (Gen. xli. 21). But J. may have been a later descendant from Benjamin who, by superior fruitfulness of his house, superseded an elder branch (Ashbel's) whose issue failed. 2. Tabernacle door-keeper under David (1 Chron. xxvi. 1, 2). 3. 1 Chron. xi. 45. 4. Joined David, from Manassah, on his way to Ziklag just before the battle of Gilboa; he helped David against the Amalekites (1 Chron. xii. 20; 1 Sam. xxix., xxx.).

Jedida = darling. Amon's queen, mother of good Josiah; of Bosceath near Laishish, daughter of Adaiab (2 Kings xxii. 1).

Jedidiah: Jedid-Jah = darling of Jehovah; name given by God through Nathan the prophet to Solomon, (2 Sam. xii. 25) combining David's own name (Jedih akin to David "be-loved") and Jehovah's; a pledge of David's restoration to God's favour after his fall in the matter of Bathsheba, implying the union of the earthly and the heavenly king. David himself had first given him the name Solomon "the man of peace," because he regarded his birth as a token of his restored peace with God, and also of God's promise to give peace and rest to Israel in his days (2 Chron. xxii. 9). God commissioned Nathan, and Nathan called his name J. "because of Jehovah," i.e. because Jehovah loved him; the fact of Jehovah's love (in contrast to the first-born child, the fruit of sin, therefore taken away in God's just displeasure), not the mere name, was the object of the commission. J. was not therefore his ordinary name, but Solomon. The practice still exists in the East of giving a second name, indicative of relation to God, besides the birth name.

Jeduthun = JEDITHUN = who gives praises. 1 Chron. xvi. 58; Ps. xxxix., lxii., lxxvii., titles, implying that these psalms were to be sung by J.'s choir; Neh. xi. 17. J. presided over a choir under David. "The sons of J." had the office to "prophesy with the harp, to give thanks, and to praise the Lord" (1 Chron. xxv. 1, 3). Hewasa Merarite Levite, along with the Kohathite Heman and the Gershonite Asaph directing the music of the sanctuary; 4000 in all, divided into courses, "praising the Lord with the instruments which I made, said David, to praise therewith" (1 Chron. xiii. 5, 6). Identical with ETHAN [see] the Merarite (vi. 44, xv. 17, 19); for as there was one Kohathite and one Gershonite, head of musicians, so there would be only one Merarite head. That J. was a Merarite appears from Hosah his son (xvi. 38, 42) being a Merarite (xxvi. 10). Comp. also xv. 17, 19 with xvi. 41, 42; xxv. 1, 3, 6; 2 Chron. xxxv. 15, where he is called the "king's seer," i.e. being under the Spirit's influence. He sounded the cymbals of brass, marking time, whilst those under him played the harp (Ps. cl. 5). The trumpets were peculiar to the priests. Asaph and his brethren ministered before the ark at Jerusalem, J. and Heman "before the tabernacle of Jehovah in the high place at Gibeon." His sons were six of them prophets with the harp, and two of them,

Obed Edom and Hosah, gatekeepers. J.'s singers with Asaph's and Heman's (viz. their sons and brethren), arrayed in white linen, officiated at the E. end of the altar, having cymbals, psalteries, and harps, at the dedication of Solomon's temple; and it was "when the trumpeters and singers were as one, to make one sound to be heard in praising and thanking the Lord," with trumpets, cymbals, and instruments accompanying the voices praising the Lord

ANCIENT MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.

"for He is good, for His mercy endureth for ever," that the house of the Lord was filled with the cloud of glory (2 Chron. v. 13, 14; comp. xx. 21, 22). Praise is a most effective way of obtaining God's help. In Hezekiah's reign (xxix. 13, 14), again in Josiah's (xxxv. 15), lastly under Nehemiah (xi. 17), J.'s choir or descendants officiated in the sanctuary music.

Jezer. Num. xxvi. 30. According to some identical with ABIEZER [see] in the parallel list (1 Chron. vii. 18, Josh. xvii. 2). Keil distinguishes them, for the family sprung from J. holds the first place among Manassite families, but Abiezer the son of Machir's sister held no such eminence; from him came Gideon (Jud. vi. 15) who says "my family is poor (marg. my thousand is meanest) in Manassah."

Jegar-Sahadutha = heap of witness. The Aramaic or Chaldean name given by the Syrian Laban to the stone heap commemorating his compact with Jacob, whereon they ate together. GALED [see], "a witness heap," the Heb. name given by Jacob. The wh. region was already "Gilead," i.e. hard rocky region, and Jacob made the word by a slight change to mark a crisis in his history (Gen. xxxi. 41-55).

Jehaleleel. Of Judah. 1 Chron. iv. 16.

Jehaleleel. 2 Chron. xxix. 12.

Jehdeiah. 1 Chron. xxiv. 29, xxvi.

24. J. as head and representative of the class made up of Shubael's sons, and probably of his brothers also, alone is mentioned. In xxvi. 24, xxiii. 16, Shubael or Shebuel perhaps represents the family, for J. was head of the family in David's time.

Jehezkeel. 1 Chron. xxiv. 16.

Jehiah. 1 Chron. xv. 24.

Jehiel. 1. 1 Chron. xv. 18, 20; xvi.

4. 2. 2 Chron. xxi. 2-4. 3. 2 Chron. xxxv. 8. 4. 1 Chron. xxiii. 8, xxix. 8. Jehiel or Jehielites (xxvi. 21). 5. Son of Hachmoni (a Hachmonite), an officer of David "with the king's sons" (xxvii. 32), i.e. their tutor or governor. 6. 2 Chron. xxix.

14. 7. 2 Chron. xxxi. 12, 13. 8. Ezra viii. 9. 9. Ezra x. 2. 10. Ezra x. 26. 11. Ezra x. 21.

Jehiel. Rather Jeeleel. 1. Heb. original text, ketlibh, has Jehel (1 Chron. ix. 35-39). 2. 1 Chron. xi. 44.

Jehizkiah = Hezekiah. Son of Shallum, a chief of Ephraim, in Abaz's time. At the prophet Oded's command he was one of those who withstood the returning warriors who wanted to keep their 200,000 brethren of Judah in captivity and the spoil taken by the Israelite king Pekah in one victory (2 Chron. xxviii. 8-12). J. and his noble helpers shod and clothed the naked, gave them to eat and drink, and carried all the feeble on asses to Jericho, on their way back to Judah (ver. 15).

Jehoadah. 1 Chron. viii. 36; in ix. 42 JARAH, a transcriber's error.

Jehoadan. 2 Kings xiv. 2, 2 Chron. xxv. 1.

Jehoahaz. 1. Jehu's son and successor; king over northern Israel nearly 17 years, 856-840 B.C. (2 Kings xiii. 1-9.) His reign began in the 22nd or even the 21st year (Josephus) of Joash of Judah, rather than the 3rd. His persevering in his father's sin, viz. the worship of Jeroboam's calves, and his leaving the Asherah (grove [see]) still standing in Samaria from the time of Ahab (1 Kings xvi. 33), brought on Israel Jehovah's anger more than in Jehu's time; for the longer sin is persevered in, the heavier the final reckoning, an accumulated entail of guilt descends (Exod. xx. 5). Hazael of Syria and his son Benhadad, as his commander in chief, scourged the people all J.'s (not as A.V. "their") days (ver. 3, 22), leaving him only 50 horsemen, 10 chariots, and 10,000 footmen, "making the people like the dust by threshing"; (Amos i. 3) "they have threshed Gilead with threshing instruments of iron," i.e. sledges on wheels with iron teeth, cutting the straw as well as threshing out the grain (2 Sam. xii. 31, Isa. xxviii. 27). In his affliction J. besought the Lord (Hos. v. 15, Ps. lxxviii. 34). "Jehovah hearkened unto him," Israel's oppression moving God's pity, irrespective of Israel's merits (2 Kings xiv. 25, 26). So "He gave Israel a saviour," not in J.'s reign, but in that of Joash and Jeroboam II. his successors, who were each in turn "a saviour"; for the answer to prayer often comes when the petition is dead and gone (ver. 22-25). Notwithstanding his misfortunes, J. had shown "might" in the conflict with Syria.

2. The name given to Jehoram's youngest son during his father's lifetime. Amaziah was his name as king (2 Chron. xxi. 17).

3. Son of Josiah; at his father's death the people took and made him king, 610 B.C., in preference to his two elder brothers, Jehonah and Jehoakim (1 Chron. iii. 15; Jer. xxii. 11; 2 Kings xxiii. 30, 31, 36; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 2). Zedekiah, though put before J. or Shallum in 1 Chron. iii. 15, was younger; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 11 he is given precedence because of his longer reign, viz. eleven years, whereas J. reigned but three months, then was carried by Pharaoh Necho to Egypt, never to return. J., or Shallum, was born of the same mother as Zedekiah, viz. Hamutal; so they are put together, whereas Jehoakim was son of Zebudah. With Josiah the regular succession of David's house ceased. The people set up J. out of order; Jehonah is never after mentioned; the heathen Pharaoh set up Jehoakim; Nebuchadnezzar Zedekiah. Jeremiah gave J. the significant name Shallum, i.e. "to whom it is required"; a second "Shallum," son of Jabesh, who reigned only one month in Samaria (2 Kings xv. 13), instead of Sholom, "peaceful," like Solomon; bitter irony! The popular party set great hopes upon him (Jer. xxii. 10-12), as though he would deliver the kingdom from Pharaoh Necho, and "anointed" him with extraordinary ceremony to compensate for his defective title to the throne. Ezekiel xix. 3, 4 compares him to "a young lion" which "learned to catch the prey and devoured men." His mother, "Jerusalem," is called "a lioness," referring to her heathenish practices in sad contrast to Jerusalem's name (Isa. xxix. 1) Ariel, "the lion of God," and Judah, "a lion's whelp . . . an old lion" in a good sense (Gen. xlix. 9). Meditating revenge for his father's death at Megiddo (2 Kings xxiii. 29, 30), J. was carried captive from "Riblah" in Hamath to Egypt by Pharaoh Necho; "they brought him with chains (or hooks or rings, fastened in wild beasts' noses, appropriate figure as he was compared to a 'lion'; the Assyrian king literally put a hook through the nose of captives, as appears in the Ninevite remains) unto . . . Egypt." "He did evil in the sight of the Lord according to all that his fathers had done." Josephus says "he was godless and tyrannical (lit. polluted) in disposition." In 2 Chron. xxxvi. 3 "Jerusalem" is stated to be the place where the king of Egypt deposed him. Doubtless Pharaoh, having there dethroned him, took him thence to "Riblah." After his victory at Megiddo, Necho intended to march forward to the Euphrates, but hearing that J. had ascended the throne as the people's favourite, whose leanings would be on the side of Babylon against Egypt, like Josiah's, he sent a division of his army, which took Jerusalem and dethroned J., and laid a heavy tribute on the land. Eliakim would readily act as his vassal, as owing his elevation to the throne, under the name Jehoakim, to Necho. Indeed Pharaoh did not recognise the reign of J. because elevated without his consent; therefore the words are "Pharaoh made Eliakim king in the room of Josiah his father" (2 Kings xxiii. 34). The main army marched slowly to Riblah, his headquarters, and thither he had J. brought, then chained and taken to Egypt. The people, feeling Jehoakim's heavy taxation for the tribute to Egypt (2 Kings xxiii. 35), lamented for their favourite in spite of his faults. Jer. xxii. 10: "weep ye not for the dead (Josiah, 2 Chron. xxxv. 24, 25), [so much as] for him that goeth away; for he shall return no more," viz. J. Dying saints are to be envied, living sinners to be pitied. Jeremiah's undesigned coincidence with the facts recorded in the history confirms the truth of both.

Jehohanan = Jehovah's gift. The N. T. John, meaning the same as Theodore. 1. 1 Chron. xxvi. 1, marg. 3; of the sons of Ebiasaph (not Isaph, who was a Gershonite not Kohathite). 2. The captain of 280,000 in and about Jerusalem under Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii. 13, 15, 19). Probably the same as the father of Ishmael, the captain who helped Jehoahaz against Athaliah (xxiii. 1). 3. Ezra x. 28. 4. Neh. xii. 2, 12, 13. 5. Neh. xii. 40-42.

Jehoiachin = appointed by Jehovah, or he whom Jehovah establishes or fortifies (Keil). JECONIAH, CONIAH. Son of Jehoakim and Nehushta; at 18 succeeded his father, and was king of Judah for three months and ten days; 20th king from David. In 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9 his age is made "eight" at his accession, so LXX., Vulg. But a few Heb. MSS., Syriac and Arabic, read "eighteen" here also; it is probably a transcriber's error. The correctness of eighteen, not eight, is proved by Ezek. xix. 5-9, where he appears as "going up and down among the lions, catching the prey, devouring men, knowing the widows" (marg.) of the men so devoured; unless Jehoiakim is meant. The term "whelp" appears to apply more to his son J., who moreover answers better to the description of the mother (Judah) "taking another of her whelps, and making him a young lion." Lord A. C. Hervey prefers "eight," from Matt. i. 11. "Josiah begat Jeconias and his brethren about the time they were carried away to Babylon," fixing his birth to the time of Nebuchadnezzar's invasion (2 Kings xxiv. 1), viz. three years after Jehoakim's accession, and eight before his reign ended and J. succeeded; but Matthew's language hardly justifies this; Jeremiah's language implies J. was a "man," and capable of having a "child" (xxii. 28, 30). Jerusalem was an easy prey to Nebuchadnezzar at this time, Judah having been wasted for three or four years by Chaldean, Ammonite, and Moabite bands, sent by Nebuchadnezzar as Jehovah's executioner of judgment) in consequence of Jehoakim's rebellion. Egypt, after its defeat at Carchemish by Nebuchadnezzar, could not interpose (2 Kings xxii. 7-17). After sending his servants (generals distinct from the Chaldean and other bands) to besiege Jerusalem, Nebuchadnezzar in person came (2 Chron. xxxv. 10 marg.) at the turn of the year, i.e. spring, in the eighth year of his reign, counting from the time that his father transferred the command of the army against Necho to him (so that his first coincides with the fourth of Jehoiakim, Jer. xxv. 1). J. seeing the impossibility of resistance made a virtue of necessity by going out to Nebuchadnezzar, he, the queen mother (who, as the king was only 18, held chief power; Jer. xiii. 18 undesignedly coincides with and confirms the history, "Say unto the king and to the queen, Humble yourselves," etc.), servants, princes, and eunuchs (marg.). Nebuchadnezzar, after Jehoiakim's rebellion (notwithstanding his agreement at Nebuchadnezzar's first advance to be his vassal) (2 Kings xxiv. 1, Dan. i. 1), would not trust his son J., but carried him away, the queen mother, his wives, chamberlains, and all the men of might, 7000, and 1000 craftsmen and smiths; fulfilling Jeremiah's prophecy (xxii. 24, etc.). He had already taken at the first siege of Jerusalem in Jehoiakim's third year part of the vessels of God's house (Dan. i. 1, 2; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 7) and put them in the house of his god in Babylon, viz. the smaller vessels of solid gold, basins, goblets, knives, tongs, etc., which Cyrus restored (Ezra i. 7, etc.). Now he cut the gold off (not "cut in pieces," 2 Kings xxiv. 13) the larger vessels which were plated, the altar of burnt offering, the table of shewbread, and the ark, so that at the third conquest of Jerusalem under Zedekiah there were only the large brazen vessels of the court remaining, beside a few gold and silver basins and firepans (xxv. 13-17). Nebuchadnezzar also carried off the treasures of Jeconiah's house (xxiv. 13), "as Jehoiach had spoken" to Hezekiah long before (xx. 17; Jer. xv. 13, xvi. 3, xxix. 2). The inhabitants carried off were the best not only in means but in character. In 2 Kings xxiv. 14 they are said to be 10,000; the details are specified in ver. 15, 16; "none remained save the poorest sort of the people of the land," having neither wealth nor skill to raise war, and therefore giving Nebuchadnezzar no fear of rebellion. The "princes" (sarim) are the king's great court officials; "the mighty men of valour" (gibborim hachail, "mighty men of wealth," same Heb. as xv. 20) are men of property, rather than prowess; ver. 14. In ver. 16 "men of might" (anshim hachail) may mean the same, but anash is a low man; I think therefore it means "men of the army," as in Ezek. xxxvii. 10, and is defined by "all that were strong and apt for war," 7000. The craftsmen (masons, smiths, and carpenters) and locksmiths (including weapon makers, hamasger), were 1000; so the "princes" or king's officials, "the mighty men of wealth," and "the mighty of the land" (udee haaretz), i.e. heads of tribes and families found in Jerusalem (including the nation's spiritual heads, priests and prophets, with Ezekiel: Jer. xxix. 1, Ezek. i. 1) must have been 2000, to make up the "ten thousand." In Jer. lii. 28 the number is 3023, but that was the number carried away "in the seventh year," "in the eighth year" of Nebuchadnezzar the 10,000 were carried away. The 1000 "craftsmen" may be exclusive of the 10,000. Evidently the 4,600 in all mentioned (30) as carried away do not include the general multitude and the women and children (15, xxxix. 9, 2 Kings xxv. 11), for otherwise the number would be too small, since the numbers who returned were 42,360 (Ezra ii, Neh. vii.).

J. wore prison garments for 36 years, till at the death of Nebuchadnezzar Evil-MERODACH [see], having been for a time sharer of his imprisonment (Jer. lii. 31-34), "in the 12th month, the 25th day of the month (in 2 Kings xxv. 27 'the 27th,' the day when the decree for his elevation, given on the 25th, was carried into effect) lifted up the head of J. (comp. Gen. xl. 13-20; Ps. iii. 3, xxvii. 6), and brought him forth out of prison, and spake kindly unto him, and set his throne above the throne of the kings that were with him in Babylon, and changed his prison garments (for royal robes; comp. Zech. iii. 1-5, Luke xv. 22), and he did continually eat bread before him all the days of his life (comp. 2 Sam. ix. 13); and there was a continual diet given him of the king of Babylon, every day its portion (comp. marg. 1 Kings viii. 39) until the day of his death." God, in sparing and at last elevating him, rewarded his having surrendered to Nebuchadnezzar, which was God's will (Jer. xxxviii. 17, xxvii. 6-12; comp. 2 Kings xxiv. 12). In the fourth year of his uncle Zedekiah (so called by Nebuchadnezzar instead of Mattaniah), false prophets [see HANANIAH] encouraged the popular hope of the return of J. to Jerusalem (Jer. xxviii. 4). But God's oath made this impossible: "as I live, though Coniah were the signet (ring seal, S. of Sol. viii. 6, Hag. ii. 23) upon My right hand, yet would I pluck thee thence." "Is this man Coniah a despised broken idol? (he was idolized by the Jews.) Is he a vessel wherein is no pleasure?" Jeremiah hereby expresses their astonishment that one from whom they expected so much should be now so utterly cast aside. Contrast the believer, 2 Tim. ii. 21; comp. as to Israel Hos. viii. 8, to which Rom. ix. 20-23 gives the answer.

Jeremiah (xxii. 28) mentions distinctly "his seed," therefore "childless" in ver. 30 means having no direct lineal heir to the throne. One of his sons was Zedekiah (Zidkijah), distinct in name and fact from Zedekiah (Zidkijahu), Jeconiah's uncle, whose succession after J. would never cause him to be called "his son" (1 Chron. iii. 16). This Zedekiah is mentioned separately from the other sons of J., Assir and Salathiel, because probably he was not led to Babylon as the other sons, but died in Judaea (Keil). In Luke iii. 27 Shealtiel (Salathiel) is son of Neri of the lineage of David's son Nathan, not Solomon. Probably Assir left a daughter, who, according to the law of heiresses (Num. xxxvii. 8, xxxvi. 8, 9), married a man of a family of her paternal tribe, viz. Neri descended from Nathan. Shealtiel is called Assir's "son" (1 Chron. iii. 17), i.e. grandson. So "Jeconias (it is said Matt. i. 12) begat Salathiel," i.e. was his forefather. [See JECAMIAH.] Assir, as often occurs in GENEALOGIES [see], is skipped in Matthew.

A party of the captives at Babylon also, through the false prophets, expected restoration with J. and Nebuchadnezzar's overthrow. This accounts for the Babylonian king inflicting so terrible a punishment (comp. Dan. iii.), roasting to death Ahab (Jer. xxix. 4-9, 21-23, 27-32). Ezekiel dates his prophecies by J.'s captivity, the latest date being the 27th year (i. 2, xxix. 17, xl. 1). The Apocrypha (Baruch i. 3, and the History of Susanna) relates dubious stories about J. Kish, Mordecai's ancestor, was carried away with J. (Esth. ii. 6.)

Jehoiada. 1. Father of BENAIAH. Prince leader of the 3700 Aaronites, i.e. priests who joined David at Hebron (1 Chron. xxvii. 5, xii. 27). 2. Benaiah's son, named after his grandfather; succeeded to Ahithophel as one of David's chief counselors (1 Chron. xxvii. 34). 3. Amariah's successor in the high-priesthood. Married JEHOISHEBA [see], king Jehoram's daughter, sister of king Ahaziah, on whose death by Jehu's hands the queen mother ATHALIAH [see] slew all the seed royal; but Jehoshaphat stole JOASH [see] the youngest son, and with her husband hid him in the house of God six years. Then when Athaliah's tyranny and foreign idolatries had disgusted the people, he with great prudence and tact made a secret compact in the temple with the five captains of the king's body guard (lit. the executioners and runners), Azariah son of Jeroham, Ishmael, Azariah the son of Obed, Maaseiah, and Elishaphat. These summoned the Levites and heads of families throughout Judah, probably under pretext of a festival celebration. Then J. with the whole assembly "made a covenant with the king in the temple, saying, Behold the king's son shall reign, as Jehovah hath said of the sons of David" (2 Chron. xxiii. 3), or, as 2 Kings xi. 4 expresses it, "J. made a covenant with the rulers over hundreds, the captains, and the guard, taking an oath of them and showing them the king's son." The Levite temple servants entering upon the sabbath service (relieving guard), and those being relieved, J. directed, under the captains of the royal body "guard" (2 Kings xi. 11, halberdiers) to keep watch, the former in three divisions, the latter in two. The first of the three divisions stood by the gate Sur (2 Kings xi.) or Jesod (2 Chron. xxiii. "the foundation," a gate in the outer court at the hollow of the Tyropæon or the Kedron). The second to guard the king's house (2 Chron. xxiii. 5, not the royal palace, but the young king's place of residence in the temple), at the gate behind the guard, i.e. the gate of the guard (2 Kings xi. 6, 19), the gate leading from the temple court to the royal palace on Zion; or else this division had to guard the royal avenue to the temple from the palace outside, they watching from a post in the outer courts what went on in the palace. The third to guard the house (the temple) "that it be not broken down" (Keil, "to ward off" intruders), "to be guards ('porters') of the thresholds" (of the ascent to the temple, 1 Chron. ix. 19 marg., 2 Chron. xxiii. 4 marg.). J. furnished them with David's weapons stored in the temple. Some of the royal "guard," on whom the captains could rely, were with the Levites (2 Chron. xiii. 12, 2 Kings xi. 13). Those relieved on the sabbath, whom J. still retained (for "he dismissed not the courses," 2 Chron. xxiii. 8) kept watch of Jehovah's house about (in respect to) the king (2 Kings xi. 7) in two divisions; these answer to (2 Chron. xxiii. 5) "all the people (the remainder besides the three bodies under the captains) in the courts of the house of Jehovah" (2 Kings xi. 13, 19). The whole royal body guard, probably after Athaliah's slaughter, joined the people in the courts, to lead the king thence to the palace; at all events the relieved Levite guards were with the people in the courts, and probably some of the royal guards who took share in the plot. 2 Kings emphasizes the part performed by the royal body guard; 2 Chron. that performed by the Levites: there is no irreconcilable discrepancy. The guard and people kept to the courts, none but the priests and consecrated Levites entered the holy place (2 Chron. xxiii. 6). Any coming within the ranks ("ranges," 2 Kings xi. 8) of the guards so stationed, i.e. within the temple precincts (2 Chron. xxiii. 7), were to be put to death. The captains over hundreds (2 Kings xi. 9) answer to "all Judah," viz. "chiefs of the fathers" (2 Chron. xxiii. 2, 8), with "the Levites." He "dismissed not the courses" (who had charge of the temple service, 1 Chron. xxiv.—xxvi.), answering to 2 Kings xi. 7, "all you that go forth . . . shall keep the watch."

J., having enthroned Joash, restored the temple worship as David had settled it, it having been neglected under the idolatrous Athaliah. Mattan the Baal priest alone was slain by the people when breaking Baal's images and altars. J. made a solemn covenant between the king and all the people, "that they should be the Lord's people." Joash repaired the house by his help, "doing that which was right in the sight of Jehovah" all the days "wherein J. the priest instructed him." Joash ordered "the money of the dedicated things" to be applied to the repair of the temple, viz. (1) "the money of every one that passeth" the census (not "the account"), half a shekel, Exod. xxx. 13; (2) "the money that every man is set (valued) at," viz. the valuation in redeeming the firstborn (Num. xviii. 15, 16), or in payment for a vow; (3) "all the money that cometh into any man's heart to bring into the house of Jehovah," freewill offerings. When, in the 23rd year of Joash's reign, the temple was still not repaired, through the Levites' and priests' dilatoriness, he took the money and the repairs out of their hands; "the priests consented to receive no more money of the people (i.e. for repairs), neither to repair." J. then took a chest, with a hole made in the lid, and set it against the outer wall beside the burnt offering altar on the right, by the S. entrance into Jehovah's house, to receive the people's freewill offerings for the repairs. No golden or silver vessels, basins, knives, etc., were made with the money, until the repairs were first completed (2 Kings xii. 13, comp. the complementary, not contradictory, statement 2 Chron. xxiv. 11). The trespass money and freewill gifts to the priest, for his trouble in offering the sin offerings, the priests retained; this money did not go to the repairs.

J. died (2 Chron. xxiv. 15, 16) at last, 130 years old, "full of days." But there is perhaps an error; Lord A. C. Horvey would read 83. Otherwise he would be 95 at Joash's accession, supposing him to live 35 of Joash's 40 years of reign, which is improbable; fifteen years before, when Jehoram was 32 (who e daughter he married), he would have been 80 (xxi. 5, xxii. 1, 12). Disinterested patriotism, loyalty where loyalty was at immense risks, tact and practical wisdom, power of influencing others, above all deep reverence (e.g. his jealous care, amidst the irregularities of a revolution, that none should "come into Jehovah's house save the priests and ministering Levites," also that Athaliah should be thrust forth outside "the ranges," and not be slain "in the house of Jehovah," 2 Chron. xxiii. 6, 14), and zeal for the Lord's honour and the purity of His worship, were conspicuous in J. His death was the fatal turning point of Joash's declension. The religion that leans on man only will fail when the earthly prop is removed. J. had saved Joash's life and throne, and had been God's providential instrument in preventing the extinction of David's line, which then hung upon the one seemingly frail thread, but which could not be broken since to it belonged the promises of Messiah; he had stifled the idolatry transplanted into Judah by Joram's marriage into apostate Ahab's house, and restored Jehovah's worship. He therefore was honoured (1 Sam. ii. 30) with the unique privilege of interment "among the kings in the city of David, because he had done good in Israel, both toward God and toward His (God's) house." The fickle people, princes, and king soon forgot all his benefits, and slew his son ZECHARIAH [see] "in the court of the Lord's house," (the very scene of J.'s reverent care to remove pollution, 2 Chron. xxiii. 14, in restoring the throne and the temple,) for his faithful reproofs of their idolatry (xxiv. 15, 16, 20, 22).

4. Second priest (saran) to Seraiah the highpriest. Either carried away to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, or deposed by the Jewish rulers as a favourer of Jeremiah. This accords with the false prophet at Babylon, Shemaiah's, accusation by letter against Zephaniah, who was promoted to J.'s place, for ingratitude to God in not apprehending Jeremiah, seeing that (in Shemaiah's view) "the Lord had made him priest in the stead of J. the priest" for this very purpose (Jer. xxix. 25, 29, 2 Kings xxv. 18). The second priest was "officer in the house of Jehovah." The highpriest was "chief governor in the house of Jehovah"; then the second priest; then the 24 "governors of the sanctuary and of the house of God" (Jer. xx. 1, 1 Chron. xxiv. 5). 5. Neh. iii. 6.

Jehoiakim. Eliakim (=whom El, God, established) at first; 25 years old at his accession. Second son of Josiah and Zebudah, daughter of Pedaiah of Rumah (Arumah in Manasseh, near Shechem? Jud. ix. 41); Jehonah was the eldest son. Raised to the throne by Pharaoh Necho, who named him J. (whom Jehovah establishes), having deposed JEHOIAHAZ [see], the people's nominee, his younger brother. Pharaoh bound J. to exact tribute from Judah, for Josiah's having taken part with Babylon against him: one talent of gold and 100 talents of silver (£40,000). So "J. valued ('taxed') the land to give the money to Pharaoh . . . he exacted the silver and gold of every one according to his valuation" ("taxation"): 2 Kings xxiii. 33, 34; Jer. xxii. 10-12; Ezek. xix. 4. In J.'s fourth year Necho suffered his great defeat from Babylon at Carchemish, wherein he lost his possessions between Euphrates and the Nile, and returned no more to Judea; so that Josiah's death was not unavenged (2 Kings xxiv. 7, Jer. xlv. 2). The change of J.'s name marked his vassalage (Gen. xli. 45, Ezra v. 14, Dan. i. 7). The names were often from the heathen gods of the conqueror. In this case not so; the heathen kings Pharaoh and Nebuchadnezzar made J. and Zedekiah (=Jehovah's righteousness) confirm their covenant of subjection with the seal of Jehovah's name, the Jews' own God, by whom they had sworn fealty. J. reigned 11 years, doing evil throughout, as his forefathers before him. "His eyes and heart were only for covetousness, shedding innocent blood, oppression, and violence" (Jer. xxii. 13-17). "He built his house by unrighteousness and wrong, using his neighbour's service without wages," using his people's forced labour to build himself a splendid palace, in violation of Lev. xix. 13, Dent. xxiv. 14, 15; comp. Mic. iii. 10, Hab. ii. 9, Jas. v. 4. God will repay those who repay not their neighbour's work. His "abominations which he did, and that which was found in him," are alluded to 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6. God finds all that is in the sinner (Jer. xvii. 11, xxiii. 24). Sad contrast to his father

Josiah, who "did justice, and it was well with him." Nebuchadnezzar from Carchemish marched to Jerusalem, and fettered him as Pharaoh Necho's tributary, in the third (Dan. i.) or fourth year of his reign (the diversity being caused by reckoning Jehoahaz' reign as a year, or not), intending to take him to Babylon; but afterwards for the sake of his formerly Josiah, his father, restored him as a vassal. At this time Daniel, Hananiah, Michael, and Azariah, were taken to Babylon. Three years subsequently J. rebelled with characteristic perfidy, sacrificing honour and truth in order to spend the tribute on his own costly luxuries (Jer. xxii. 13-17). Nebuchadnezzar, not able in person to chastise him, sent marauding "bands" of Chaldeans, Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites (2 Kings xxiv. 1-7). Ammon had seized on Gad's territory, upon Israel's exile, and acted as Nebuchadnezzar's agent to scourge Judah (Jer. xlix. 1, 2; Ezek. xxv. 3). Jehoiach was the primary sender of these scourges (rebellion against Nebuchadnezzar, after promising fealty, was rebellion against God: Jer. xxvii. 6-8, Ezek. xvii. 16-19), not only for J.'s sins but for those of his forefather Manasseh, in whose steps he trod, and the "innocent blood which Jehovah would not pardon." Jeremiah (xxii. 18, 19) foretold "concerning J., they shall not lament for him, Ah, my brother! or Ah, my sister!" (his queen, the lamentation of blood relatives for a private individual) nor, "Ah! lord! ah! his glory (the public lamentations of subjects for a king; alas! his majesty), he shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem"; again, xxxvi. 30, "he shall have none to sit (i.e. firmly established and continuing) upon the throne of David (for his son Jehoiachin's [see] reign of three months is counted as nothing, and Zedekiah was not his son but uncle); his dead body shall be cast out in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost." J. was probably slain in a battle with Nebuchadnezzar's Chaldean and other "bands," and had no burial; possibly his only oppressed subjects slew him, and "cast out" his body to conciliate his invaders. Nor is this inconsistent with "J. slept with his fathers" (2 Kings xxiv. 6); it simply expresses his death, not his burial with his royal ancestors (Ps. xlix. 16); "slept with his fathers" and "buried with his fathers" are found distinct (2 Kings xv. 38, xvi. 29). He reigned 11 years. Early in his reign (Jer. xxi. 1, 20, etc.) J. showed his vindictive malice against Jehovah's prophets. Urijah, son of Shemaiah, of Kirjath Jeariam, prophesied against Jerusalem and Judah in the name of Jehovah; thereupon J. sought to kill him; he fled to Egypt, but J. sent Elnathan of Achbar, and men with him, who brought Urijah back from Egypt, the Egyptian king allowing his vassal J. to do so. J. "slew him with the sword, and cast his dead body into the graves of the common people," instead of burial in the cemetery of the prophets (Matt. xxiii. 29). J. gained by it only adding sin to sin, as the argument of the elders in Jeremiah's b-half implies, the notorious prostration of the state at the time intimating that heavier vengeance would ensue if Jeremiah too, as was threatened, should be slain. By God's retribution in kind J.'s own body fared as he had treated Urijah's body. 1 Esdras i. 42 speaks of "his uncleanness and impiety." His intense selfishness and indifference to the people's sufferings appear in his lavish expenditure upon building palaces for himself at the very time the people were overwhelmed with paying heavy tribute to Pharaoh (Jer. xxii. 13-18). His crowning impiety, which had no parallel in Jewish history, was his cutting up, and burning in the fire before him, the written roll of Jeremiah's inspired prophecies (xxxvi.). Jeremiah being "shut up," i.e. prevented by fear of the king, sent Baruch to read them to the people assembled out of Judah to the Lord's house on the fasting day. "In the fifth year of J. they (the princes) proclaimed a fast to all the people," or (Michaelis) "all the people proclaimed a fast"; in either reading J. had no share in appointing it, but chose this season of all seasons to perpetrate such an audacious act. On hearing of the roll, J. sent Jehudi his ready tool to fetch it from Elishama the scribe's chamber; for sinners fleeing from God, yet, by an involuntary instinct, seek to hear His words against them. Then, as often as Jehudi read three or four columns of the long roll, J. cut the parts read consecutively, till all was destroyed. Yet he and his servants "were not afraid," a contrast even to the princes who "were afraid both one and other when they had heard all the words"; a still sadder contrast to his father Josiah whose "heart was tender," and who "rent his clothes" on hearing the words of the law just found (2 Kings xxii. 11, 13, 19, 20). Even Elnathan, who had been his tool against Urijah, recoiled from this, and interceded with J. not to burn the roll; but he would not hear, may even commanded his minions to apprehend Baruch and Jeremiah: but the Lord hid them (Ps. xxxi. 20, lxxxiii. 3; Isa. xxvi. 20). Judicial blindness and reprobation! The roll was rewritten, not one word omitted, and with awful additions (Matt. v. 18; Acts ix. 5, v. 39; Rev. xxii. 19); his body should be exposed to the sun's "heat," even as he had exposed the roll to be burnt by the heat of the fire. Sinners only gain additional punishment by fighting with God's word, which is a sharp sword; they cut themselves, when trying to cut it. Comp. the rewriting of the law's two tables (Exod. xxiv. 15, 16, xxxi. 18, xxxiv. 1, 2; Deut. xxxi. 9). The two-edged sword of God's Spirit converts the humble and tender as Josiah, draws out the latent hatred of the ungodly as J. (2 Cor. ii. 15, 16; Heb. iv. 12, 13). J. reigned from 609 B.C. to 598 B.C.

Jehoiarib, Joiarib = Jehovah will defend. 1 Chron. ix. 10, xxiv. 7. A descendant of his is mentioned in Neh. xi. 10, also descendant representatives of nearly all the old courses (xii. 6, 19). But the Talmud makes these professed representatives of the old 24 courses to have been not really descendants from the original heads, except from four of them, Jedaiah, Immer, Pashur, and Harim, for which the Babylonian Talmud has Joiarib (as implied in Ezra ii. 36-39, Neh. vii. 39-42); and that these four were subdivided into six each to make the 24; and that the 24 took the old names (Luke i. 5). The Asmonzean family and Josephus belonged to the course of J. The Talmud view is not favoured by Neh. x. 2-8, which enumerates 21 courses, of Nehemiah's time: xii. 1-7, 19, also enumerates 22 courses of Zerubbabel's time, among them J., of whose course Mattathai was chief in Jehoia-kim's days. J. is added in xii. 6, not appearing in x. 2-8; from which Lord A. C. Hervey infers that J. did return from Babylon, but later than Zerubbabel's time, and that his name was added to the list subsequently.

Jehonadab (= Jehovah makes freely willing): JONADAB. 2 Kings x. 15, 23; Jer. xxxv. 8, 14, 16, 18; 1 Chron. ii. 55; "the [four] families of the series which dwelt at JABEZ [see] . . . the Kenites that came of Hemath, the father of the house of Rechab" (= the rider). Rechab, father of J., belonged to the Kenites connected with Israel through Moses' marriage; these [see HEBER and JAEZ] with Israel entered Canaan, and shared their inheritance, though remaining nomads in tents, some in the far N. (Jud. iv. 11), others made their "nest" in the rocks of ENGEDI [see] (Jud. i. 16, Num. xxiv. 21), others near their native desert in southern Judah (1 Sam. xvi. 6). J., the tribe father of the Rechabites, enjoined the rule of the clan on his children the more strictly because these were brought into close contact with the settled community, which would tempt them to neglect it, viz. to dwell in tents and not build houses, not to sow seed or plant vineyards. This rule they observed with such filial obedience as to secure the promise "that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee," fifth commandment. Jeremiah (xxxv.) argues, a fortiori, if earthly sons so honour their father how much more ought Judah, to whom God hath commanded "Return ye now every man from his evil way" by His prophets, "rising early and speaking," hearken to the heavenly Father; yet Judah has not done so. Both therefore shall fare accordingly: Judah shall suffer all the evil pronounced against her; "J. the son of Rechab shall not want a man to stand before Jehovah for ever." Comp. Mal. i. 6.

J. by his strict asceticism was held in high repute in Israel, as well as in his own tribe; Jehu desired his countenance, that so he might without any opposition carry out the slaughter of the Baal worshippers. Jehu "blessed" J. (margin. 2 Kings

x. 15) on meeting him, and asked, Is thy heart right (true) as my heart is with thy heart? J. gave his hand in token of pledged fellowship (Ezra x. 19). Then Jehu took him up to him in his chariot and imparted his secret plan. J.'s followers by his strict rule on the one hand avoided possible collision with the settled Israelites among whom they were; and Diodorus Siculus (xix. 94) gives a like picture of the Nabathæan Arabs, "it is a law with them neither to sow corn, nor to plant fruit-bearing plants, nor to use wine, nor to provide a house." On the other hand, as a half religious sect, indirectly originating from Elijah's and Elisha's reforming efforts, and copying the Nazirite rule in part (comp. Amos ii. 11), they maintained the true religion as far as they knew it by avoiding needless association with the degenerate people around. Such a sincere zealot as J. was just the ally whom the fiery self-seeking JEHU [see] wanted. The name RECHAB [see], "rider," may also imply their unsettled pilgrim state, from which they deviated only when in fear of Nebuchadnezzar they took refuge within Jerusalem; but even there they would not for any consideration violate the law of their forefather. J. is last mentioned in accompanying Jehu into Baal's temple, to remove all Jehovah's secret worshippers (2 Kings x. 23), whom probably his previous knowledge of them in the desert would enable him to discern.

Jehonathan. 1. 1 Chron. xxvii. 25. 2. 2 Chron. xvii. 8, 9. 3. Neh. xii. 6, 18.

Jehoram (=exalted by Jehovah), JORAM. 1. Son of Ahab, king of Israel. Succeeded his brother Abaziah who had no son, 896 B.C., and died 884 B.C. Jehoram, king of Judah, had two accessions recorded in Scripture, and an earlier one not recorded, but conjectured by Usher; [1] probably when Jehoshaphat went from his kingdom to Ramoth Gilead battle in his 17th year (2 Kings iii. 1); [2] when he retired from the administration, making his son joint king, in his 23rd year (2 Kings viii. 16 marg.); [3] at Jehoshaphat's death, in his 25th year. (2 Chron. xxi. 1. 1 Kings xxii. 50 marg.) Thus the accession of J. king of Israel in Jehoshaphat's 18th year synchronized with [1] the second year after the first accession (2 Kings i. 17), and [2] the fifth year before the second accession, of Jehoram king of Judah (2 Kings viii. 16). For the last year of his reign he synchronized with Abaziah, Joram's son, slain along with him by Jehu (2 Kings ix.). There was a close alliance between Judah and Israel, begun by Ahab his father with Jehoshaphat and continued by himself. With Judah (whose territory Moab had invaded, 2 Chron. xx., and so provoked Jehoshaphat) and Edom as allies, J. warred against Mesha, who had since Abaziah's reign (2 Kings i. 1) withheld the yearly tribute due to Israel, "100,000 lambs and the wool of 100,000 rams" (Keil) (2 Kings iii., Isa. xvi. 1). The allies would have perished for want of water in their route S. of the Dead Sea [see DIBON], then northwards through Edom and the rocky valley Ahsy which separates Edom from Moab, but for ELISHA [see] who had a regard for Jehoshaphat, and brought water to fill the wady Ahsy miraculously from God; the water was collected for use in (Jer. xiv. 3) the ditches made by his direction. Rain fell probably in the eastern mountains of Edom far away from Israel, so that they perceived neither the wind which precedes the rain nor the rain itself; and this at the time of the morning "meat offering" to mark the return of God's favour in connection with sacrifice and prayer to Him. The reddish earth of the ditches coloured the water, gleaming in the rising sun, and seemed blood to Moab, who supposed it to indicate a desperate conflict between the three kings. Edom's late attempt at rebellion (2 Chron. xxi. 8) made the Moabites' supposition probable; and remembering how their own joint expedition against Judah with Ammon and Edom (xx.) had ended in mutual slaughter, they naturally imagined the same issue to the confederacy against themselves. After smiting the cities, felling the trees, stopping the wells, and marring the land, the allies pressed the king of Moab sore in his last stronghold Kir Haraseth, the citadel of Moab (Isa. xv. 1), now Kerak, on a steep chalk rock above the deep valley, wady Kerak, which runs westward into the Dead Sea. Failing to break through the besiegers to the king of Edom, from whom he expected least resistance, he offered his firstborn son a burnt offering to CHEMOSH [see]. So there ensued "great wrath against Israel"; Israel's driving him to such an extremity brought on Israel some of the guilt of the human sacrifice offered. Their conscience and superstitious feelings were so roused (probably a Divine sign visibly accompanying this feeling) that they gave up the siege and the subjugation of Moab. The Dibon stone records probably the victories of Mesha subsequent to this, though the allies' circuitous route S.E. of the Dead Sea, instead of directly E. across Jordan, may have resulted from Mesha's successes already in the latter quarter.

J. fell into Jeroboam's sin of worshipping Jehovah under the calf symbol, which every Israelite king regarded as a political necessity, but not into his father's and mother's Baal idolatry; nay, he removed Baal's statue (2 Kings iii. 2, 3). Jehoshaphat's influence produced a compromise on both sides, to the spiritual good of neither, as always happens in compromises between the world and the Church. Baal worship outlived such half-hearted religious efforts. How could it be otherwise, when Jozebel lived throughout his reign, as whole-hearted for false gods as her son was half-hearted for the true God! (2 Kings ix. 30, x. 18, etc., iii. 13.) However J.'s removal of Baal's statue seems to have drawn Elisha to him, so that the prophet was able to offer the Shunammite woman to speak to the king in her behalf (iv. 13). As Elisha spake so sternly to him in iii. 14, the removal of the Baal statue may have been subsequent to, and the consequence of, J.'s witnessing the deliverance of himself and his two allies, wrought through Jehovah's prophet in chap. iii. The king's want of faith, yet mixed with recognition of God's exclusive omnipotence, appears in his answer to the Syrian king's command that he should heal Naaman of his leprosy, "Am I God to kill and to make alive, that this man," etc. (v. 7; Dent. xxxii. 39); his unbelief ignored the existence of God's prophet in Israel. The miraculous cure deepened his respect for Elisha. The prophet again and again saved J. by warning him of the position of the Syrian camp (vi. 8-12; comp. Luke xii. 3). Blinding, and then leading the Syrian hosts sent to surround him in Dothan, into the midst of Samaria, he checked J. who would have smitten them ("wouldest thou smite those whom thou hast taken captive with thy sword?") Surely not. Much less those taken not in open battle, but by a device, combined with mental blindness sent by God, and caused him instead to set bread and water, "great provision" (2 Kings vi. 22, 23), before them, and then to send them home, the effect being that love melted the enemy's heart, and Syrian "hands" (i.e. flying bodies), reverencing God's power, for long ceased to harass Israel (Rom. xii. 20).

Abatement of the Divine scourge, apparently, brought with it carnal security to J. Then followed a divinely sent regular war. Ben-hadad besieged Samaria; a terrible famine ensued. The tale of a mother who had slain her child for food, and complained of another mother having hidden hers contrary to agreement, roused J. to rend his clothes; then appeared the hair sackcloth of mourning penitence "within" (mitaith), a bare sign without the real repentance of heart, as his threat of murdering Elisha proves, ver. 31. The prophet probably had advised holding out, and promised deliverance if they humbly sought Jehovah (Jonah iii. 6). J. thought that by his sackcloth he had done his part; when God's help did not yet come, J. vented his impatience on the prophet, as if ELISHA's [see] zeal for Jehovah against Baal was the cause of the calamity. Elisha, by deferring the entrance of the executioner, gave time for J.'s better feelings to work. He stayed the execution in person, then complained despairingly of the evil as "from Jehovah," as if it were vain to "wait still further for Jehovah." Elisha's prophecy of immediate plenty, and its fulfilment to the letter (2 Kings vii.), restored the friendly relations between J. and him (2 Kings viii. 4).

J.'s conversation with Gehazi about Elisha's great works and his raising the dead lad, and the Shunammite woman's return at that very time, occurred probably whilst the prophet was at Damascus prophesying to Hazael his coming kingship (2 Kings viii.). Similarly Herod was curious about our Lord's miracles, and heard John Baptist gladly (Luke ix. 9, xiii. 8; Mark vi. 14, 20). A fascination draws bad men, in spite of themselves, towards God's servants, though it be only to hear their own condemnation. The revolution in Syria seemed an opportunity to effect his father's project, to recover Ramoth Gilead. J. accordingly, in concert with Ahaziah of Judah, his nephew, seized it. J. was wounded, and returned to Jezreel to be healed. Jehu his captain was left at Ramoth Gilead to continue the war with Hazael. But Jehu, with characteristic haste, immediately after Elisha had anointed him, set out for Jezreel and with an arrow slew J., and threw his body on the very plot of ground which by falsehood and murder Ahab had dispossessed Naboth of, fulfilling Elijah's prophecy (1 Kings xxi. 19, 22).

Lord A. C. Hervey considers the seven years' famine (2 Kings viii. 1) to foretell to the Shunammite to be the same as that in iv. 38. It ended on the same year as J. died, after 12 years' reign, therefore it must have begun in his sixth year. As the Shunammite's child must have been at least three years old when raised again, Elisha's acquaintance with her must have been four or five years sooner, bringing us to J.'s second year; so that Elisha's presence with the three allied kings (chap. iii.) must have been in J.'s first year. Lord Hervey thinks Elijah was not translated till the sixth year of J., whereas Elisha began ministering in the first year of J. Thus Elijah's writing to Jehoram of Judah (2 Chron. xxi. 12) was addressed to him in Elijah's lifetime. He did not begin reigning till the fifth year of J. of Israel (2 Kings viii. 16), thus 2 Kings i. 17 will belong to the narrative in 2 Kings ii. He thinks the 25 distinct years assigned to Jehoshaphat a mistake, that 22 is the real number, three being added for the three last years of Asa his father, when incapacitated by disease in the feet he devolved the kingly duties on Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvi. 12). Three years were then added to Ahab's reign to make the whole number of years of the kings of Israel tally with the whole number of the years of the kings of Judah, unduly lengthened by the three added to Jehoshaphat's reign.

2. JEHOAM, son of Jehoshaphat, succeeded at the age of 32 and reigned 892 to 884 B.C. Married Athaliah, Ahab's daughter, the reflex of her wicked mother Jezebel; he yielded himself up to the evil influences of his wife instead of following the example of his pious father. His first act as a king was to murder his six brothers, though his father had provided for them independently of him so as to avert collision (2 Chron. xxi. 1-4); also several "princes of Israel." Not only did he set up idolatrous high places, but "caused Jerusalem to commit fornication and compelled Judah thereto" (11). ELIJAH'S [see] prophetic writing threatened him with great plagues to his people, children, wives, and goods, and disease of the bowels so that they should fall out, because of his apostasy and murder of his brethren who were "better than himself" (12-15, 18, 19). All this came to pass. Edom, heretofore tributary to Jehoshaphat, made a king over themselves (1 Kings xxii. 47, 2 Kings iii. 9, 2 Sam. viii. 14) and revolted; and only by a night surprise did J. extricate himself at Zair (2 Kings viii. 20-22, for which the copyist in 2 Chron. xxi. 9 has "with his princes"), in Edom, from "the Edomites who compassed him in." Libnah a fenced city (2 Kings xix. 8) also revolted, probably as being given by Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xxi. 3) to one of those sons whom J. had murdered. The great reason was God's anger "because he had forsaken the Lord God of his fathers." Then those surrounding peoples, upon whom the fear of the Lord had been in Jehoshaphat's days so that they made no war, may even gave presents and tribute to him, as the Philistines and the Arabians (2 Chron. xvii. 10, 11) near the Ethiopians, now were stirred up by the Lord against J. They carried away his substance from his house, his sons, and wives, so that there was never a son left him save Jehoahaz (Ahaziah) the youngest (God for the sake of His covenant with David still leaving "a light to him and to his sons for ever"; 2 Chron. xxi. 7; 2 Sam. vii. 12, 13; Ps. cxxxii. 17), a retribution in kind for the murder of his father's sons. An incurable disease of the bowels after two years' agony caused his death. He died "without being desired," i.e. unregretted (Jer. xxii. 18). No burning of incense was made for him, and his body though buried in the city of David was excluded from the sepulchres of the kings. The undesigned propriety of the same names appearing as they would naturally do in the allied royal houses of Judah and Israel, e.g. Jehoram and Ahaziah, confirms the truth of the sacred history. 3. A priest in the time of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii. 8).

Jehoshaphat = he whom Jehovah judges. 1. Recorder or annalist in David's and Solomon's court. Son of Ahilud (2 Sam. viii. 16, 1 Kings iv. 3; comp. Esth. vi. 1). 2. A priest. Blew the trumpet before the ark in its passage from Obed Edom's house to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv. 24). 3. Son of Paruah. One of Solomon's twelve purveyors, in Issachar (1 Kings iv. 17). 4. Son of Asa and Azubah. At 35 began to reign, the first three years during his father's incapacity through disease in the feet, then 22 alone, beginning at 914 B.C., 25 years in all (1 Kings xv. 24, xxi. 41-50; 2 Kings viii. 16; 2 Chron. xvii. 1-xxi. 3). "He walked in the first ways of his father David (before his sin with Bathsheba), and sought not unto Baalim (whether Baal or other false god, or worshipping Jehovah by an image which degrades Him to the level of Baal, Jud. ii. 11), but to the Lord God of his fathers, and not after the doings of Israel (worshipping Jehovah through the golden calves). Therefore the Lord established the kingdom in his hand. . . . And his heart was lifted up in the ways of the Lord; moreover he took away the high places and groves out of Judah" (2 Chron. xvii. 3-6, xix. 3). But "the high places (of Jehovah) were not taken away, for as yet the people had not prepared their hearts unto the God of their fathers." All that depended on him he did, but the people could not yet rise up to his spirituality so as to worship Jehovah without any visible altar save the one at Jerusalem (xx. 32, 33). He utterly abolished the idol high places and, as far as he could, the unlawful Jehovah high places, but was unable thoroughly to get rid of the latter (1 Kings xv. 14, xxii. 43). To remedy the people's ignorance of the book of the law, in the third year of his reign he sent a commission of five princes, nine Levites, and two priests to go through the cities of Judah, teaching them in it; a model for rulers as to national education (Deut. xi. 19-21). J. at first fortified the cities of Judah and those of Ephraim taken by Asa (2 Chron. xvii. 2) to secure himself against Israel. Afterwards he changed his policy to one of alliance with Israel against the common foe Syria and the eastern tribes, Ammon, Moab, etc.; and his son JEHOAM [see] married ATHALIAH [see], the daughter of Ahah and Jezebel (xxii. 2, 3, 7, 8, 10). A fatal union (1 Cor. xv. 33)! Many facts attest the intimacy between the two dynasties; ELIJAH'S [see] avoiding Judah when fleeing from Ahab; the same names given in the two families; Jehovah's name compounded in names of Ahab's idolatrous children; J.'s readiness to go with AHAB [see] to battle at Ramoth Gilead. Ahab's demonstrative hospitality was the bait to entice him (2 Chron. xviii. 1-3). There he would have paid with life for his dangerous alliance with cowardly Ahab, who sought to save his own life by exposing his magnanimous ally, but for God's interposition.

On his return in peace, in the 16th year of his reign probably, Jehu the son of Hanani reproved him, "Shouldst thou help the ungodly and love them that hate the Lord?" (comp. 1 Sam. xv. 35, xvi. 1). Therefore is wrath upon thee from before the Lord." But God is ever ready to discern any good in His servants; "nevertheless there are good things found in thee, in that thou hast taken away the groves out of the land, and hast prepared thine heart to seek God" (comp. 2 Chron. xxvii. 6, "ways"; contrast Rehoboam, xii. 14). J. then again, besides the former commission (xvii. 9) in the third year of his reign, took up the work of reformation and went out in person through the people from Beersheba in the S. to mount Ephraim in the N. to bring them back unto the Lord God of their fathers. He also set judges in the several cities, and a supreme court for references and appeals ("controversies") in Jerusalem, made up of Levites, priests, and chief fathers of Israel (the judges in the cities were probably of the same classes). The judges chosen from the elders by Moses at Jethro's suggestion were the foundation of the judicial body (Exod. xviii. 21, etc.; Deut. i. 15, etc.). David added for the expanding wants of the kingdom 6000 Levites. "The judgment of the Lord" (2 Chron. xix. 8) answers to "matters of the Lord" (ver. 11), i.e. religious questions. "Controversies" answer to "the king's matters," civil causes. J.'s directions are a rule for judges in all ages: "take heed what ye do, for ye judge not for man but for the Lord, who is with you in the judgment; wherefore now let the fear of the Lord be upon you . . . for there is no iniquity with the Lord our God, nor respect of persons, nor taking of gifts." Amariah the chief priest presided in religious questions; Zebadiah, "ruler of the house of Judah" (tribal prince of Judah), in civil questions. The Levites were to be shoterim, "officers" lit. scribes, keeping written accounts; assistants to the judges, transmitting their orders to the people, and superintending the execution of them.

Five divisions comprised his soldiery, comprising 780,000 men in Judah and 380,000 in Benjamin. But it was "the fear of the Lord falling upon all the kingdoms . . . round about Judah" (so Gen. xxxv. 5), that was his main defence, "so that they made no war on J." Nay, the Philistines and Arabians brought presents and tribute.

Edom had a "deputy king," a vassal to Judah; "there was (then) no (real, independent) king" (1 Kings xxii. 47). This remark is introduced to show how J. was able to make ships of Tarshish (i.e. ships such as go to Tarshish, i.e. long voyaging ships; 2 Chron. xx. 36 changes this into "to make ships to go to Tarshish," a copyist's misunderstanding) to go to Ophir from the maritime coast of Edom. J. allied himself with the wicked Abaziah in this enterprise. The ships were built in EZION GEBER [see] on the Red Sea. Then ELIEZER [see], son of Dodayah, prophesied, "because thou hast joined thyself with Abaziah, the Lord shall break (the perfect is prophetical, not hath broken) thy works." They were accordingly wrecked at Ezion Geber by a storm (2 Chron. xx. 35-37). Abaziah in vain tried to induce J. to repeat the attempt. One chastisement from the Lord sufficed a docile child (1 Cor. xi. 32; contrast Isa. ix. 13, Jer. v. 3). This was subsequent to the Edomite, Ammonite, and Moabite invasion of Judah by way of ENGEDI [see]. Edom joined with Ammon and other desert tribes enumerated in Ps. lxxxiii. 3-7 ("other beside the Ammonites," A. V. 2 Chron. xx. 1; Hiller proposes to read Maonites from Maan a city near Petra on mount Seir, tribes from all parts of mount Seir: Keil; xxvi. 7, Melchior), to not only throw off Judah's supremacy but root the Jews out of their divinely given inheritance; but in vain. [See JAHAZIEL and BERACHAH.] J.'s piety shone brightly on this occasion. "He feared, set himself to seek Jehovah, and proclaimed a fast throughout Judah," so that "out of all the cities they came to ask help of Jehovah." His prayer in the congregation in the Lord's house is a model: "O Lord God of our fathers (therefore we the children have a covenant claim on Thee), art not Thou God in heaven (therefore hast rule thence over all)? Ruldest not Thou over all the kingdoms of the heathen (therefore the heathen invaders of Thine elect nation cannot escape Thee)? And in Thine hand is there not power and might, so that none is able to withstand Thee (therefore this horde cannot)? Art not Thou our God who didst drive out the inhabitants of this land before Thy people Israel, and gavest it to the seed of Abraham Thy friend for ever? (Thy covenant for ever with 'Thy friend,' and Thine honour at stake, require Thy interposition.) And they have built Thee a sanctuary, saying (1 Kings viii. 33, 37, covenanting for God's help to be rendered in all future times in answer to the nation's prayer, which covenant God accepted), If when evil cometh upon us . . . we stand before Thy house in Thy presence . . . and cry unto Thee . . . then Thou wilt hear and help. And now behold . . . Ammon, Moab . . . whom Thou wouldst not let Israel invade . . . they reward us (evil for good) to come to cast us out of Thy possession (in undesigned coincidence with Ps. lxxxiii. 12, 'let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession'). O our God, wilt Thou not judge (do us justice on) them? For we have no might against this great company . . . neither know we what to do: but our eyes are upon Thee." The "little ones, wives, and children," standing before Jehovah, by their very helplessness were a powerful plea with the compassionate God. Jahaziel then gave the promise from God (comp. Exod. xiv. 13, 14), and J. and all Judah bowed with face to the ground. The Levites stood up to praise the God of Israel with a loud voice. As the people went forth the following morning J. urged the people to faith as the receptive state needed on their part for ensuring God's promised blessing: "Believe in the Lord your God, so shall ye be established" (comp. Isa. vii. 9; Matt. ix. 28, 29). In strong faith he ordered singers to "praise the beauty of holiness" ("to praise, clad in holy ornaments," Keil) already for the promised victory. At their beginning to sing was the time that the Lord delivered them. Seirites, greedy for booty, by God's providence, from an ambush suddenly attacking, caused a panic among the Ammonites and Moabites which eventuated in mutual slaughter. J. and his people were three days gathering the spoil. On the fourth day was the blessing of Jehovah in Berachah valley, then the return and the thanksgiving in the house of God. The three allies' invasion of Moab was probably subsequent.

His character stands among the highest for piety of Judah's kings, and the kingdom in his reign was at its zenith. Firmness and consistency were wanting. This want betrayed him into the alliance with Israel which on three occasions brought its penalty: (1) at Ramoth Gilead, (2) in the joint invasion of Moab (2 Kings iii.) through the Edomite wilderness, and (3) in respect to his naval enterprise for Ophir. To avert the foreseen evil consequences of his alliance he appointed JEHORAM [see], his firstborn, king in his lifetime, and gave gifts and fenced cities to his other sons; but no human precautions can avert the penalty for religious compromise (2 Cor. vi. 17, 18). 5. Nimshi's son, king Jehu's father (2 Kings ix. 2).

Jehoshaphat, Valley of. Joel iii. 2, 12, parallel to Zech. xiv. 2-4, where the mount of Olives answers to the "valley of Jehoshaphat" in Joel. Possibly "the valley of BERACHAH" [see], where between Tekoa and the main road from Bethlehem to Hebron Jehoshaphat assembled the people to bless Jehovah for the victory over Ammon, Moab, etc. (2 Chron. xx. 20-26.) The valley with the Kedron at its foot is now called "the valley of Jehoshaphat." But it was not anciently so; Jerome and the Onomasticon of Eusebius first call it so in the fourth century A.D. As the Jews bury worn out rolls of Scripture (for which they have such a deep reverence) here, it is likely the Jehoshaphat from whom the valley is named was a rabbin held in veneration. The tomb called J. Jehoshaphat's tomb (an excavation with an architectural front) is certainly not that of the king Jehoshaphat, for he was buried in the city of David (2 Chron. xxi. 1).

TOMB OF JEHOSEPHAT.

However, the phrases "the city of David" and "Zion" are applied in a general sense to the site of Jerusalem and to the hills around, among which the same name, "sunny mountain," still lingers. The word "city" comprises the surrounding suburbs (Num. xxxv. 25-28; 1 Kings ii. 36, 37). Also "in" often means at or near (Conder, Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., Oct. 1877, pp. 178, 195). Thus the burial "in the city of David" may apply to burial in the vicinity. The enemies Tyre, Sidon, the Philistines, Edom, and Egypt (Joel iii. 4, 19), are types of the last confederacy under antichrist (Rev. xvi. xvii. xix.), which shall assail restored Israel and shall be judged by Jehorah. As Jehoshaphat means "the judgment of Jehorah," "the valley of Jehoshaphat" is probably the general name for the scene of His judgment, Jehoshaphat's victory over the godless horde that sought to dispossess Judah typifying the last victory over the antichristian host that shall seek to dispossess restored Israel (Ezek. xxxviii. xxxix.). That this shall be in the Holy Land seems likely from Zechariah's definite mention of mount Olivet (xiv. 1, 4, 5) as the scene of Christ's return and from its having been the scene of His ascension; the angels moreover announced, "this same Jesus . . . shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven" (Acts i. 11). The word in Joel is emek, which means a spacious valley, not a narrow ravine (for which the term is nachal) such as the valley of the Kedron. In Joel iii. 14 "the valley of Jehoshaphat" is called "the valley of decision" or "excision," where the foess shall meet their determined doom. "ARMAGEDDON" [see] in Rev. xvi. 16 corresponds: from har a mountain, and Megiddo the valley of Jezreel, the great battle field of Canaan, where golly Jo-iah fell before Pharaoh Necho. Some great plain antitypical to the two valleys will probably be the scene of the last conflict. Its connection with Jerusalem appears in the context; so "come up," the regular phrase for going to the theocratic capital, is used, but "down into" the valley of Jehoshaphat" also (Joel iii. 2, 12). The Moslems bury their dead on one side of the valley, the Jews on the other. Absalom's tomb and Zechariah's, besides Jehoshaphat's, are pointed out, but without good grounds for the tradition. The king's (Melchizedek's) dale or valley of Shaveh (Gen. xiv. 17, 2 Sam. xviii. 18) is identified with "the valley of Jehoshaphat." Josephus (Ant. vii. 10) says ANSALOM's [see] monument was two stadia from Jerusalem, probably in the valley of the upper Kedron, where were the judges' tombs, a likely site for his erecting his sepulchral monument.

Jehoshoba = Jehovah's oath, i.e. devoted to Him. Daughter of king Joram of Israel. JEHOIADA'S [see] wife. So Elishoba (God's oath) was Aaron's wife, Elizabeth Zacharias'. Athaliah is not specified as her mother, but this may be due to the sacred writer's abhorrence of her name. Possibly her mother may have been another wife of Joram (2 Kings xi. 2). J. is the only instance of a princess marrying the highpriest. Her position enabled her through God's providence to rescue the little prince Joash, and hide him and his nurse in a bedchamber in the palace, afterwards in the temple (2 Chron. xxii. 11, xxiii. 11; 2 Kings xi. 2, 3), where he was brought up with her sons, who assisted at his coronation. ZECHARIAH, Jehoiada's successor, one of them, was afterwards slain, a martyr for the truth.

Jehovah: Jahaveh or Yahaveh is probably the correct form (the vowel pointing in Jehovah is derived from A-d-o-n-a-i from the substantive verb havah (found only six times in the Bible; obsolete in Moses' time; retained in Chaldee and Syriac from a time anterior to the division of the Semitic languages), for the more modern hayah, to be; a proof of the great antiquity of the name: "I AM THAT I AM" is the key of the name (Exod. iii. 14), expressing unchanging Being. The name was old and known long before; it appears compounded in Jochebed and Moriah, and simply in Gen. ii. and afterwards. But its significance in relation to God's people was new, and now first becoming experimentally known. [See GENESIS, God, EXODUS.] Exod. vi. 2, 3: "I am JEHOVAH, and I appeared unto Abraham, . . . by the name of God Almighty (El-Shaddai), but by My name JEHOVAH was I not known": its full and precious import is only now about to be revealed. To the patriarchs He was known, when giving the promises, as God, Almighty to fulfil them (Gen. xvii. 1); to Moses as Jehovah unchangeably faithful (Mal. iii. 6) in keeping them; comp. Heb. xiii. 8, which identifies Jesus with Jehovah. Elohim can do all that He wills; Jehovah will do all that He has promised. Elohim (the plural expressing the fullness of God's powers) is appropriate to creation (Gen. i.-ii. 3); JEHOVAH ELOHIM to paradise and to the covenant of grace at the fall; the combination identifies the Jehovah of the moral government with the Elohim of creation. If JEHOVAH had been a name of more recent introduction, the whole nation would never have accepted it with such universal reverence. Elohim appears in the trial of Abraham's faith (Gen. xxii.); Jehovah, in its triumph. The last 19 chaps., from Jacob's meeting the angels and Esau, have Elohim alone (except in the history of Judah and Pharez, xxxviii.; and Joseph's first entrance into Egypt, xxxix.; and Jacob's dying exclamation, xlix. 18: the beginning and close of the long period of sorrow and patient waiting) to prepare by contrast for the fuller revelation to Moses, when Jehovah is made known in its full and experimental preciousness: "To be made known" (Exod. vi. 3) means to be manifested in act (Ps. ix. 17, xlviii. 3-6), making good in fact all that was implied in the name (Ezek. xx. 9) (noda'ti). The name was not new to Israel, for it occurs before Exod. vi. 3 in iii. 16, iv. 1. ELOHIM, from alah "to be strong" (Fürst), rather than from Arabic aliha astonishment, alaka worship (Hengstenberg), the Deity, expresses His eternal power and Godhead manifested in nature, commanding our reverence; JEHOVAH the Personal God in covenant with His people, manifesting boundless mercy, righteousness, and faithfulness to His word. So "Im-mannuel" is used not of the mere appellation, but of His proving in fact to be what the name means (Isa. vii. 14). The "I AM" (Exod. iii. 14) is to be filled up thus: I am to My people all whatever they want. Prayer is to supply the ellipsis, pleading God's covenanted promises: light, life, peace, salvation, glory, their exceeding great reward, etc. I am all that My word declares, and their threefold nature, body, soul, and spirit, requires. I am always all this to them (John viii. 58). "Before Abraham began to be (Gr.) I am" (Matt. xxviii. 20). The Jews by a misunderstanding of Lev. xxiv. 16 ("utters distinctly" instead of "blasphemeth") fear to use the name, saying instead "the name," "the four lettered name," "the great and terrible name." So LXX., Vulg., and even A.V. (except in four places "Jehovah": Isa. xii. 2, xxvi. 4; Exod. vi. 3; Ps. lxxxiii. 18) has "THE LORD," which in CAPITALS represents JEHOVAH, in small letters Adonai. Maimonides restricts its use to the priests' blessings and to the sanctuary; others to the highpriest on the day of atonement, when entering the holy of holies. The Samaritans pronounced the name Yabe (Theodoret); found also in Epiphanius; Yahu in such names as Obadiah (Obad-yahu). So that Jahveh or Yahveh seems the correct pronunciation. The Hebrews said the Elohim, in opposition to false gods; but never the Jehovah, for Jehovah means the true God only. Again, My God, Elohai, but not My Jehovah, for Jehovah by itself means this covenant relation to one. Again, the Elohim of Israel; but not the Jehovah of Israel, for there is no other Jehovah. Again, the living Elohim, but not the living Jehovah; for Jehovah means this without the epithet. Jehovah is in O. T. the God of redemption. The correlative of Elohim is man, of Jehovah redeemed man. Elohim is God in nature, Jehovah God in grace (Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7). Elohim is the God of providence, Jehovah the God of promise and prophecy; hence the prophets' formula is, "thus saith Jehovah," not Elohim. Elohim is wider in meaning, embracing the representatives of Deity, angels and human judges and rulers (Ps. lxxxii. 6; John x. 34, 35). Jehovah is deeper, the incommunicable name. The more frequent use of the name Jehovah from Samuel's time is due to "the religious revival then inaugurated, and to the commencement of the regular school of prophets. In the first four verses of the Bhagavat God says to Brahma, "I was at first . . . afterwards I AM that which is, and He who must remain am I." (Sir W. Jones.)

Jehovah Jireh. [See ABRAHAM, ISAAC.] Jehovah will see or provide (Gen. xxii. 14). In ver. 8 Abraham had said, "Elohim will provide for Himself a Lamb." He perceives he has uttered an unconscious prophecy, and that the Elohim in whom he trusted has proved Himself JEHOVAH [see], in covenant with His people; so that the phrase became a Hebrew proverb, "In the mount [as He provided for Abraham in His extremity] Jehovah will provide" [for us also in our every extremity]. The meaning of Mori-jah, "the seeing of Jehovah," implies that it originated in this saying of Abraham, and that "Moriah" in ver. 2 is used by anticipation. Moreover Solomon built his temple on mount "Moriah" (2 Chron. iii. 1). It is no valid objection that Abraham "saw the place afar off," whereas the temple mount is not conspicuous from a distance (whence Moriah is connected by some with Moreh and "the natural altar on the top of mount GERIZIM" [see], which the Samaritans make the place of the sacrifice); for what is meant in Gen. xxii. 4 is only that he saw it at some little distance, as far off as the place admitted. The distance, two days' journey from Beersheba, would bring Abraham and his party to Jerusalem, whereas Gerizim could not be reached in three days.

Jehovah Nissi. Jehovah my banner. Name given by Moses to the altar commemorating Israel's victory, under Jehovah, over AMALEK [see] (Exod. xvii. 15). His name, i.e. manifested character towards His people, is their rallying point [see BANNER]. The rod of God in Moses' hand, when held up as a banner, brought victory; so it was the pledge of what the altar represented, that Jehovah is the saviour of victory to His people when rallying round Him (Ps. lx. 4, Isa. xi. 10, Prov. xviii. 10).

Jehovah Shalom. Jehovah is peace. Gideon so called his altar of thanksgiving (not sacrifice) in Ophrah, to commemorate the angel of Jehovah's salutation, "Peace be unto thee"; where rather judgment for national backslidings was to have been expected, and when he himself had feared death as having seen the angel of Jehovah. Jehovah's assurance of "peace" confirmed His previous announcement that Gideon would conquer Midian and deliver Israel.

Jehozabad. 1. 1 Chron. xxvi. 4, 15; Neh. xii. 25 marg. 2. 2 Chron. xvii. 18. 3. Shew Joash: 2 Kings xii. 21, 2 Chron. xxiv. 26.

Jehozadak: JOSEDECH. Led captive to Babylon after Seraiah his father's execution at Riblah (1 Chron. vi. 14, 15; 2 Kings xxv. 18, 21). Father of Jeshua the highpriest, who with Zerubbabel led the returning Jews from Babylon (Ezra iii. 2, Neh. xii. 26). Zedekiah=righteous is Jehovah; Jehozadak=Jehovah is righteous. It is suggestive that the names of the last king and of the representative of the highpriesthood in the captivity both express that the suspension of the throne and of the priesthood was Jehovah's righteous judgment for Judah's sins; moreover JOSHUA or JESHUA, who restored the temple altar, expresses salvation; as the former Joshua led the hitherto homeless Israelites into Canaan their inheritance; and as Jesus, the Antitype, saves us from our sins and leads us into the heavenly rest.

Jehu. 1. Son of Hanani who reproved Asa (2 Chron. xvi. 7-9) of Judah; prophetically denounced Baasha for all the evil he did in the sight of Jehovah, like the house of Jeroboam, and for killing "him" (the last representative of Jeroboam): 1 Kings xvi. 7, xv. 27-29, xiv. 10-14. Though Baasha thus fulfilled the word of Jehovah by Abijah, yet as not this but his own bloody minded ambition was his motive, he should be punished (Hos. i. 4). His following Jeroboam's sins showed that his destruction of Jeroboam's house was not from zeal for God. Thirty years later J. reproved Jehoshaphat, "shouldst thou help the ungodly, and love them that hate the Lord? therefore is wrath upon thee from the Lord," etc. (2 Chron. xix. 2, 3.) Jehoshaphat's "acts, first and last, were written in the book of J." (xx. 34.) 2. Son of Jehoshaphat, son of Nimshi, from whom, as better known, J. is sometimes called "son of Nimshi." In youth he had ridden behind Ahab as one of his guards, when that lad king went down to Jezreel to take possession of the vineyard obtained by false accusation and murder, and treasured in memory Elijah's prophecy against him on that occasion, "in the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth shall dogs lick thy blood even thine" (1 Kings xxi. 19). Bidkar (Bar [son of] Dakar) was then his comrade in the king's guard; and it was a striking retribution that these two witnesses of Ahab's sin should be the executioners of God's righteous vengeance. Jehovah had directed Elijah at Horeb to anoint him as future king, a commission which the prophet executed through his successor Elisha, whose ministry was the continuation of his own. The impulsive vehemence of his character betrayed itself even at a distance in his "furious" driving, which was notorious (2 Kings ix. 20 marg.). During the absence at Jezreel, owing to wounds, of Jehoram king of Israel, J. as commander in chief was holding Ramoth Gilead against Hazael and the Syrians, when a pupil of the prophets, sent by Elisha, suddenly appeared amidst the captains assembled in the court, saying "I have an errand to thee, O captain"; J. went into the innermost of the surrounding chambers, and there the young prophet in the name of Jehovah God of Israel anointed him with the sacred oil (Josephus, Ant. ix. 6, §1) as Israel's king, and commissioned him to avenge the blood of Jehovah's prophets and servants (1 Kings xviii. 4, xix. 10) on Ahab's whole house. On going out J. was asked, "Wherefore came this mad (Jer. xxix. 26, John x. 20, Acts xvi. 24) fellow to thee?" J. replied, "Ye know the man and his muttering" (ecstatic utterances), i.e., that he says nothing rational. But the captains elicited from J. the truth; then, fired with enthusiasm and weary of the reigning dynasty, they made an extempore throne of the bare steps of the staircase, spreading their outer wrappers (beged) as the carpet, to do homage to J. (Matt. xxi. 7, 8), and proclaimed with sound of trumpets, "J. is king." The prophet's few words sufficed to act on J.'s excitable, impetuous, and ambitious character. Without a prayer for guidance, and without further precaution, J. set out on a journey of 20 miles, crossing the Jordan with a band of horsemen, and Bidkar whom he had made captain of the host, and being himself the first messenger of the revolution to Jezreel, having secured that none else should leave Ramoth Gilead. One messenger on horseback after another, sent out by Joram, asked "Is it peace?" and received the reply "What hast thou to do with peace?" i.e., trouble not thyself about peace: "follow me." At last Joram himself, with Ahaziah, each in his chariot, went forth. To Joram's inquiry J. replied, "What peace so long as the whoredoms (spiritual) of thy mother Jezebel, and her witchcrafts (usually associated with idolatry), are so many?" (Deut. xviii. 10, etc.) On Joram turning to flee J. drove an arrow through the back and shoulders, so as to come out at his heart, and made Bidkar cast the body upon Naboth's ground, "as Jehovah laid this burden (pronounced this prophetic threat; wassa) upon him," for "the blood of Naboth and of his sons" (this passage supplies the latter particular, which 1 Kings xxi. 13, 14 omits as being a matter of course, Ahab's object being to cut off all heirs to the confiscated vineyard). J. smote AHAZIAH [see] too. Fleeing by the way of the garden house (Heb. Bethon, Engannin?) he first hid in Samaria where his relatives were (2 Kings x. 3), moreover Samaria was the direct road from Jezreel to Jerusalem; then was brought to J., and was mortally wounded in his chariot at the ascent to Gur by Ibleam, so that when he got out to Megiddo he died there (2 Chron. xxii. 8, 9; 2 Kings ix. 27). On J.'s approach to Jezreel, Jezebel in oriental fashion painted her eyebrows and eyelashes with black antimony, to heighten the splendour of the dark eyes, and so to present an imposing appearance to J. and die as a queen; not to charm him, for she compared him to "Zimri who slew his master," and warned him that the same fate awaited him as overtook Zimri. Without deigning to answer her J. desired the eunuchs to throw her down. After eating and drinking, when J. commanded her burial, her skull, palms, and feet were all that the ravenous dogs had left of her carcase, in fulfilment of 1 Kings xxi. 23. Next he directed the rulers of the city, and the elders or magistrates, and the tutors of Ahab's 70 sons (including grandsons) at Samaria, to send him the heads of the 70 in baskets to Jezreel. J. in the morning went out of the city gate before the two heaps of heads, and addressing the assembled people, as if they were slain without his interfering, he attributed their slaughter to Jehovah's decree, in order to justify his conspiracy in the eyes of the people. So the people offered no resistance when he proceeded to slay all the survivors of Ahab's house at Jezreel, "all his great men, his acquaintances (or adherents), and court priests."

Then he set out for Samaria. On his way, at the house of shepherds binding sheep to shear them (where the shepherds used to meet on the road from Jezreel to Samaria), he caused 42 brethren of Ahaziah, who were about to visit their royal relations, Joram's sons and his mother Jezebel's sons, to be slain at the cistern of the binding or shearing house. Ahaziah's actual brothers had been carried off by the Arabs, etc., "so that there was never a son left Jehoram save Jehohaz," Ahaziah (2 Chron. xxi. 17); his "brethren" then mean his stepbrothers, Joram's sons by concubines, and his nephews or cousins. Next J. met and took with him the ascetic JEHOADAB (see), held in universal repute, in order to have his countenance in the wholesale slaughter by subtilty of Baal's worshippers which followed, and so to stand well with the people. J. said, "come, see my zeal for the Lord"; but it was really zeal for self, which he was glad to find capable of bearing a religious colour. When God's work fell in with his own ambition he did it with his wonted impetuosity. But if his had been real zeal for the Lord he would have routed out the calf worship, Jeroboam's state policy, as well as Baal worship (x. 29). His haste was not real faith (Isa. xxviii. 16); his religious zeal was the blaze of natural impetuosity soon going out (Matt. xxv. 8). When religious principle required self sacrifice, then he chose the praise of men not that of God (2 Kings x. 31, John xii. 13). The Baal worshippers upheld Ahab's dynasty; by killing them he got rid of political opponents, and gained to his side the worshippers of Jehovah. Religion was with him but a tool to serve his ends (1 Tim. vi. 5). The assuming of Baal vestments by that full assembly (as was usual at the time of worship) in Ahab's grand temple (1 Kings xvi. 32) seemed at the time politic, but proved the seal of the wearers' destruction. "As soon as he (the priest; not J., as Smith's Bible Dict.) had made an end of offering the burnt offering," J. gave the word for their slaughter. "The city of Baal," to which next the guard and captains went, was the temple citadel, the true temple house; thence they brought the wooden standing columns or statues (nutzzeboth, assessors of Baal, worshipped with him), and burnt them, and broke in pieces the central column of Baal himself, a conical stone.

Jehovah rewarded this removal of Baal idolatry, and execution of the Divine vengeance on Ahab's house, by promising J., "thy children of the fourth generation shall sit on the throne of Israel." Among them was Jeroboam II., the most prosperous of the Israelite kings; and the dynasty lasted the longest of all that ruled the northern kingdom. But this religious reformation, a fruit of Elijah's and Elisha's labours, through J.'s "not taking heed to walk in the law of Jehovah with all his heart," went only half way. So Israel's day of grace now commencing to wane, Jehovah began to cut Israel short. HAZAEL (see) smiting them from Jordan eastward. J. and Hazael are mentioned on "the black obelisk"; J. (Jahua) is called "son of Omri" (Khumti), a natural mistake for the Assyrians to make, as knowing Omri to have formed a powerful dynasty and as knowing Samaria by the name "the house of Omri." J. at this time, according to the inscription, sent gold and silver tribute to Shalmaneser I. Stern, ruthless, impetuous, yet a master of profound dissimulation (as in his consummate hypocrisy towards the Baal worshippers), he never discovered that whole heartedness for God is the truest policy, and that blood shed in external obedience to God's command, where yet the motive is self, brings guilt on the blood shedder: Hos. i. 4, "I will avenge the blood of Jezreel on the house of J.," though temporarily he was rewarded for his measure of outward obedience. Zachariah his great grandson, the fourth from J., after a six months' reign, was slain by Shallum (2 Kings xv. 8-12). J.'s paying tribute to Assyria to secure the throne which God gave him accords with his half believing character, using all means secular or religious to gain his end. He died and was buried in Samaria after a 28 years' reign. 3. 1 Chron. ii. 38. 4. 1 Chron. iv. 35-43. 5. The Antiochite, i.e. of Anathoth (1 Chron. xii. 1-3).

Jehubbah. 1 Chron. vii. 34.

Jehucal. Son of Shedeniah; a prince sent by Zedekiah to consult and ask Jeremiah's prayers (Jer. xxxvii. 3, xxxviii. 1-4).

Jehud. A town of Dan (Josh. xiv. 45). Now Jehudie, seven and a half miles E. or S.E. of Jaffa.

Jehudi. The princes' ready tool in fetching Baruch to read Jeremiah's (Jer. xxxvi. 14, 21, 23) denunciations; then employed by JEHOIAKIM (see) to bring and read the roll, which the king cut and burned.

Jehudijah. The Jezeess wife of Mered, as distinguished from BITHIAH (see), his Egyptian wife (1 Chron. iv. 17-19). Bertheau simply transposes "these are the sons of Bithiah the daughter of Pharaoh whom Mered took," and puts the clause after "Jalon." Thus "she" refers to Bithiah, "and she bare Miriam," etc.; whereas in the common text "she" has none to refer to. Also thus the sons come regularly after their respective mothers. The marg.

ver. 19 identifies Hodiah with J.; but Keil remarks the construct state, eesheth before Hodiah, shows it to be a man's name, "the sons of Hodiah's wife" (not of his wife Hodiah), the sister of Naham. Of her sons, Jered was father (founder) of Gidon; (see) and Heber father (founder) of Socno (see), etc.

Jehush. 1 Chron. viii. 39.

Jeiel. 1. 1 Chron. v. 7. 2. 1 Chron. xv. 18, 21; xvi. 5. 3. 2 Chron. xx. 14. 4. 2 Chron. xxvi. 11. 5. 2 Chron. xxix. 13. 6. 2 Chron. xxxv. 9. 7. Ezra vii. 13. 8. Ezra x. 43.

Jekameam. 1 Chron. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23.

Jekaniah. 1 Chron. ii. 41.

Jekuthiel. Sprung from Judah; son of Mered and JEHOIAH (see); father (founder) of Zanoah (a town in Judah; Josh. xv. 34, 56). J. means trust in God. The Targum says, "because in his days the Israelites trusted in the God of heaven for 40 years in the wilderness." Mered's marrying Bithiah, Pharaoh's daughter, took place probably before the exodus. The Portuguese Jews at the sabbath's close invoke Elijah as "having tidings of peace by the hand of J."

Jemima = day; bright as day. Eldest of Job's three daughters after his restoration (Job xiii. 14). Gesenius, from Arabic "dove." Jemama, a central province of Arabia, is in Arab tradition named from an ancient queen.

Jemuel. Simeon's eldest son (Gen. xlv. 19, Exod. vi. 15). NEMUEL is a corrupt form (Num. xxvi. 1 Chron. iv.).

Jephthah. Son of Gilead by an harlot, the father bearing the same name as the famous Gilead his ancestor. Gilead's sons by his wife drove J. out from share of the father's inheritance as being "son of a strange woman." just as Ishmael and Keturah's sons were sent away by Abraham, so as not to inherit with Isaac (Gen. xxi. 10, etc.; xxv. 6). J. went to the land of Tob, N.E. of Peraz, between Syria and Ammon (2 Sam. x. 6-8, Ish Tob, man of Tob), and there gathered about him a band of loose (1 Sam. xxi. 2) men, whom he led in marauding Bedouin-like expeditions. Meantime, through Jehovah's anger at Israel's apostasy to Baalim, Ashtaroth, the gods of Ammon, etc., he sold them (comp. Rom. vii. 14, gave them up to the wages that their sin had earned) into the hands of those very people whose gods they chose (Jud. x. 7, 17, 18), the instrument of their sin being made the instrument of their punishment (Prov. i. 31, Jer. ii. 19). Then the princes ("elders") of Gilead with Israel encamped at Mizpeh (Jud. x. 17, 18; xi. 5-11), having resolved to make "head" (civil) and "captain" (military) over all Israelite Gilead (the Israelites in Peraz) whatever warrior they could find able to lead them against Ammon, applied to J. in Tob. J., whose temper seems to have been resentful (comp. xii.), upbraided them with having hated and expelled him out of his father's house; yet it was not just to charge them all with what was the wrong of his brethren alone, except in so far as they connived at and allowed his brethren's act. Passion is unreasoning. They did not reason with him the matter, but acknowledged the wrong done him and said, "therefore (to make amends for this wrong) we turn again to thee now, and if thou go with us and fight against Ammon thou shalt be our head, namely over all Gilead." J. accepted the terms, and "uttered all his words (repeated the conditions and obligations under which he accepted the headship) before Jehovah (as in His presence; not that the ark or any altar of Jehovah was there; simply J. confirmed his engagement by an oath as before Jehovah) in Mizpeh," where the people were met in assembly, Ramoth Mizpeh in Gilead, now Salt.

J. before appealing to the sword sent remonstrances to the Ammonite king respecting his invasion of Israel. The marked agreement of J.'s appeal with the pentateuch account proves his having that record before him; comp. Jud. xi. 17, 19-22 agreeing almost verbatim with Num. xx. 1, xxi. 21-25. He adds from independent sources (such as the national lays commemorating Israel's victories, quoted by Moses Num. xxi. 14, 17, 27) that Israel begged from the king of Moab leave to go through his land (ver. 17). The pentateuch omitted this as having no direct bearing on Israel's further course. The Ammonite king replied that what he claimed was that Israel should restore his land between the Arnon, Jabbok, and Jordan. This claim was so far true that Israel had taken all the Amorite Sihon's land (because of his wanton assault in answer to Israel's peaceable request for leave to pass through unto "his place," i.e. to Israel's appointed possession), including a portion formerly belonging to Moab and Ammon, but wrested from them by Sihon (Num. xxi. 25, 28, 29); for Josh. xiii. 25, 26 shows that Sihon's conquests must have included, besides the Moabite land mentioned in the pentateuch, half the Ammonite land E. of Moab and Gilead and W. of the upper Jabbok. But Israel, according to God's prohibition, had not meddled with Edom, Moab, or Ammon (Dent. ii. 5, 9, 19), i.e. with the land which they possessed in Moses' time. What was no longer Ammon's, having been taken from them by Sihon, the prohibition did not debar Israel from Israel, as J. rejoindered, went round Edom and Moab, along the eastern boundary by JEABARIM [see] (Num. xxi. 11-13), on the upper Arnon, the boundary between Moab and the Amorites. J. reasons, Jehovah Elohim of Israel has dispossessed the Amorites, and transferred their land to Israel; Ammon therefore has no claim. Ammon can only claim what his god Chemosh gives him to possess; so Israel is entitled to all that land which Jehovah gives, having dispossessed the previous owners. Further, J. reasons, Balak did not strive against Israel for the once Moabite land taken by the Amorites, then transferred to Israel; he bribed Balaam indeed to curse them, but never fought against them. Moreover it was too late now, after Israel's prescriptive right was recognised for 300 years, for Ammon to put forward such a claim. "I (says J., representing Israel) have not sinned against thee, but thou doest me wrong to war against me." Ammon having rejected his remonstrances, J. gathered his army out of Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh (northern Gilead and Bashan), and went to (transl. Jud. xi. 29 "passed over to") Mizpeh Gilead, the encampment and rendezvous of Israel (x. 17), and thence to Ammon. He smote them from Aroer to Minnith, 20 cities, "with a very great slaughter," so that Ammon was completely subdued.

J. had vowed, in the event of Jehovah giving him victory, to "offer as a burnt offering whatsoever (rather whosoever) should come forth from the doors of his house to meet him"; certainly not a beast or sheep, for it is human beings not brutes that come forth from a general's doors to meet and congratulate him on his victory. J. intended a hard vow, which the sacrifice of one animal would not be. He left it to Providence to choose what human being should first come forth to meet him. "In his eagerness to smite the foe and thank God for it J. could not think of any particular object to name, great enough to dedicate. He shrank from measuring what was dearest to God, and left this for Him to decide" (Cassel in Herzog. Encycl.). He hoped (if he thought of his daughter at the time) that Jehovah would not require this hardest of sacrifices. She was his only child; so on her coming out to meet him with timbrels and dances (Exod. xv. 20) J. rent his clothes, and exclaimed: "Thou hast brought me very low, for I have opened my mouth (vowing) unto the Lord, and I cannot go back" (Num. xxx. 2, 3; Eccles. v. 2-5; Ps. xv. 4 end, lxvi. 14). Her filial obedience, patriotic devotion, and self-sacrificing piety shine brightly in her reply: "My father (comp. Isaac's reverent submission, Gen. xxii. 6, 7, 10), do to me according to that which hath proceeded out of thy mouth, forasmuch as the Lord hath taken vengeance for thee of . . . Ammon." She only begged two months to bewail with her fellows her virginity, amidst the surrounding valleys and mountains (marg. 37). Afterwards he did with her according to his vow, viz. doomed her for ever to "virginity," as her lamentation on this account proves, as also what follows, "she knew no man." So it became "a custom in Israel that the daughters of Israel went yearly to praise (timah, Jud. v. 11, not 'to lament') the daughter of J. . . . four days in a year." J. contemplated evidently a human sacrifice. A literal human sacrifice was forbidden as an abomination before Jehovah (Lev. xviii. 21, xx. 2-5). It was unknown until introduced by the godless Ahaz and Manasseh. Lev. xxvii. 28, 29 is not in point, for it refers to a forced devoting of the wicked to God's glory in their destruction; God alone could so devote any. Nor was J. otherwise impetuous and hasty; he had not recourse to the sword until negotiation with Ammon proved of no avail. His vow was made, not in the heat of battle without weighing his words, but before he set out. J., though a freebooter (the godly David was one too), was one who looked to Jehovah as the only Giver of victory, and uttered all his words of engagement with the princes of Gilead "before Jehovah." He showed in his message to Ammon his knowledge of the pentateuch, therefore he must have known that a human sacrifice was against the spirit of the worship of Jehovah. "The Spirit of Jehovah came upon J." moreover, which shows he was no Moloch worshipper. Above all J. is made an instance of FAITH for our imitation, in Heb. xi. 32. Therefore the sense in which he fulfilled his vow was "she knew no man," words adverse to the notion of a sacrificial death. He dedicated her life to Jehovah as a spiritual "burnt offering" in a lifelong "virginity." Her willingness to sacrifice herself and her natural aspirations as a virgin, who as the conqueror's daughter might have held the highest place among Israel's matrons, to become like a Gibeonite menial of the sanctuary (Josh. ix. 23), as the price of her country's deliverance, is what the virgins used yearly to come to celebrate in praises. They would never have come to praise a human sacrifice; Scripture would never have recorded without censure an anti-theocratic abomination. Moreover literal burnt offerings could only be offered at the altar of the tabernacle. This spiritual burnt offering answers somewhat to Abraham's sacrifice of Isaac (Heb. xi. 17) in will though not in deed, and to the Israelites redeeming their firstborn belonging to Jehovah instead of sacrificing them (Exod. xiii. 1-13; Num. xviii. 15, 16), and to Aaron's offering the Levites to the Lord for an offering for Israel (Num. viii. 10-16), and redeeming vowed persons at an estimation (1 Sam. i. 11, 20, 22, 28; ii. 20; Lev. xxvii. 1, etc.).

After the victory was won over Ammon, the tribe of Ephraim, ever jealous of any rival and claiming the supremacy, threatened J. "Wherefore passedst thou over to fight against . . . Ammon, and didst not call us to go with thee? We will burn thine house upon thee with fire." J. did not show Gideon's magnanimity in dealing with their perversity. He did not give the "soft answer" that "turneth away wrath," but let their "grievous words stir up strife" (Prov. xv. 1). Herein Gideon was superior, for "he that is slow to anger is better than the mighty, and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city" (xvi. 32). (For "Ephraim gathered . . . and went northward," Kail transl. "went to Zaphon, the city of Gad in the Jordan valley": Josh. xiii. 27, Jud. xii. 1.) J. however answered truly that he had "called them" but they had refused, doubtless because the Gileadites had made J. their commander without consulting Ephraim. They feared as they richly deserved. Besides threats of destroying J. they insultingly had called the Gileadites whom J. led "fugitives of Ephraim among the Ephraimites and Manassites," i.e. a mob of runaway Ephraimites in the midst of the two noblest tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh (comp. 1 Sam. xxv. 10). They who began the strife paid the bitter penalty (Prov. xvii. 14). "Shibboleth," a stream, was the test whereby the Gileadites detected the fugitive Ephraimites when trying to cross the Jordan fords, in the hands of their conquerors; 42,000 were slain who betrayed their birth by saying Shibboleth (comp. on the Galilean dialect Matt. xxvi. 73, Luke xlii. 59, Acts ii. 7). They who first dung the taunt "fugitives" perished as fugitives at the hands of those they taunted (Prov. xxvi. 17).

J. judged Israel E. of the Jordan six years, and was buried in one of the cities of Gilead.

Jephunneh. 1. CALEB'S (see father). Of the Kenezites (Num. xxxii. 12), seemingly an Edomite tribe, Kenaz being a "duke of Edom" (Gen. xxvi. 11, 15, 20, 23). Edomite names occur in Caleb's genealogy, as Shobal (1 Chron. ii. 50, 52). If the similarity of some names among Israel and Edom be not due to their being kindred peoples, it shows that Caleb's family was an Edomite one incorporated into Judah. 2. 1 Chron. vii. 58.

Jerah=the oasis. Joktan's fourth son, forefather of a southern Arab tribe. The fortress Yerah in the Mabar country, to the E. of Hadramaut, seems akin in name.

Jerahmeel. 1. Hezon's firstborn (1 Chron. ii. 9, 25-27, 33, 42). His descendants occupied southern Judah. David pretended to Achish he had invaded them, but finally he sent them presents of the Amalekite spoil (1 Sam. xxvii. 8, 10, xxx. 20). The Geshurites, Gezrites, and Amalekites dwelt close to southern Judah, so that David's march against them seemed a march against southern Judah. The Negeb or S. land lies between the mountains of Judah and the Arabian desert (Josh. xv. 19, 21). The Kenites occupied the wilderness of Judah S. of Arad (Jud. i. 16). The Negeb of J. lay S.W. of Arad, the quarter from which David would pretend to attack them, setting out from the Philistines. It is now er Bekhamah, a corruption of Jerahmeel. The wady er Ramail and Jebel er Ramail, S.E. of Arad, are traceable to the same name. The Negeb of Caleb meets the Jerahmeelite land, as its northern frontier. 2. 1 Chron. xxiv. 29, xxiii. 21. 3. Hammelech's son sent by king Jotham to apprehend Baruch and Jeremiah, "but the Lord hid them" (Jer. xxxvi. 26; Ps. xvi. 20, lxxxiii. 3; Isa. xxvi. 20). Not as marg. "son of the king," for he at this time (the fifth year of his reign) had no grown up son; Jeremiah was then but 11 years old (2 Kings xxiii. 36, comp. xxiv. 8).

Jered, Jared=descent. 1. 1 Chron. i. 2. 2. Father (founder) of Gedor (1 Chron. iv. 18), son of Mered by JERUBBAH (see 1 Chron. iv. 18).

Jeremiah=exalted of Jehovah (Jerome); appointed of Jehovah (Gesenius); Jehovah throws (Hengstenberg); comp. i. 10. 1. Son of Hilkiah, a priest in Anathoth of Benjamin; not the highpriest Hilkiah who discovered the book of the law in Josiah's reign (2 Kings xxii. 8), for J.'s father is not designated as "the priest" or "the highpriest." Moreover the Anathoth priests were of the line of Abiathar, who was deposed by Solomon (1 Kings ii. 26-35). Thenceforward the highpriesthood was in Eleazar's and Zadok's line. The independent history (2 Chron. xxxv. 25, xxxvi. 12, 21) mentions his "lamentation for Josiah." Zedekiah's "not humbling himself before J. the prophet speaking from the mouth of Jehovah," and the Babylonian captivity "to fulfil Jehovah's word by the mouth of J. until the land had enjoyed her sabbaths, for as long as she lay desolate she kept sabbath to fulfil threescore and ten years" (chap. xxvii. 7; xxv. 9-12; xxvi. 6, 7; xxix. 10).

In 629 B.C., the 13th of Josiah's reign, whilst a mere youth at Anathoth, three miles from Jerusalem (i. 2), "the word of Jehovah came to him," just as manhood was opening out to him, calling him to lay aside his natural sensitiveness and timid self distrust, and as Jehovah's minister, by the might of Jehovah's efficacious word, to "root out . . . throw down, build and plant." "Before thou comest forth out of the womb I sanctified and ordained thee a prophet unto the nations." To his pleas of childlike inability to speak (as Moses, Exod. iii. 11, 12, iv. 10-12; and Isaiah, vi. 5-8), Jehovah opposes His mission and His command: "thou shalt go to all that I shall send thee, and whatsoever I command thee thou shalt speak." To his fear of men's faces Jehovah declares "I am with thee to deliver thee." Touching Jeremiah's mouth (as Isaiah's; comp. Jesus' touch, Matt. ix. 21, 20), Jehovah put His words in the prophet's mouth, so that the prophetic word became divinely efficient to produce its own fulfilment; even as the Word was the efficient cause of creation. J. must have at first exercised his office in contemplation rather than action, for he is not mentioned in connection with Josiah's reforms, or the great pass-over held in the 18th year of his reign, five years subsequent to J.'s call. It is from the prophetess Huldah, not from him, that the godly king sought counsel. Yet he must have warmly sympathised with this great revival. Indications of affinity or friendship with some of the actors in it occur in the sameness of names: J.'s father bearing the name of Hilkiah, Josiah's highpriest; his uncle that of Shallum, Huldah's husband (chap. xxxii. 7; comp. 2 Kings xxii. 11); Alikam, J.'s protector (Jer. xxvi. 24), was also the fellow worker with Huldah in the revival; moreover Maaseiah, governor of Jerusalem, sent by Josiah as ally of Hilkiah in repairing the temple (2 Chron. xxxiv. 8), was father of Neriah, the father of both Baruch and Seraiah, J.'s disciples (Jer. xxxvi. 4, li. 59). The finding of the book of the law, the original temple copy (see HILKIAH) exercised a palpable effect on his later writings. (Comp. xi. 3-5 with Deut. vii. 12, iv. 20, xxvii. 26; chap. xxxiv. 14 with Deut. xv. 12; xxxii. 18 with Exod. xx. 6; xxxii. 21 with Exod. vi. 6). He saw that the reformation was but a surface one, and would not ensure the permanent peace which many anticipated from it (Jer. vii. 4), for whilst "the temple" was restored the spirit of apostasy still prevailed, so that even Israel seemed just in comparison with what Judah had become (iii. 11), a seeker of the truth was scarcely to be found, and self seeking was the real aim, whilst "the prophets prophesy falsely, the priests bear rule by their means, and God's people (!) love to have it so" (v. 1, 31). Five years after his call to prophesy the book of the law was found in the temple by Hilkiah (2 Kings xxii. 8, xxiii. 25); then J. in Jehovah's name proclaimed, "Hear ye this covenant, and speak (it in your turn to others, viz.) unto the men of Judah and Jerusalem." Next Jehovah commanded J. to take a prophetic tour, proclaiming the covenant through the cities of Judah, as well as in Jerusalem (xi. 1, 2, 6). Apparently he lived at first in Anathoth, repairing thence from time to time to prophesy in Jerusalem (Jer. ii. 2), until the enmity of his townsmen and even his brethren, because of his godly faithfulness (xi. 18, 21, xii. 6), drove him to Jerusalem. He knew not of their plotting against his life till Jehovah revealed it. His personal experiences were providentially ordered to qualify him to be the type in his own person, as well as the prophet, of Messiah (comp. Isa. liii. 7). So His brethren, and the Nazarenes His townsmen, treated Christ (Luke ix. 24, 29; John i. 11, vii. 5; 1's. lix. 8). By Jehovah's direction J. was to have neither wife or children (xvi. 2), in order to symbolise the coming of calamities on Judah so severe that the single state (contrary to the natural order) would be preferable to the married (1 Cor. vii. 8, 26, 29; Matt. xxiv. 19; Luke xxiii. 29). Eighteen years after his first call king Josiah died. During this period, when others thought evil distant, the vision of the ALMOND [see] tree, the emblem of wakefulness, showed J. that evil was hastening, and the seething pot that it should come from the N., viz. the Babylonians entering into the Holy Land from the N. by way of Hamath (Jer. i. 11-15). J., like Isaiah (xxx. 1-7), foresaw that the tendency of many to desire an alliance with Egypt, upon the dissolution of the Assyrian empire whose vassal Manasseh was, would end in sorrow (Jer. ii. 18): "what hast thou to do in the way of (with going down to) Egypt? to drink the waters of Sihor (to seek hosts as allies from the Nile land)?" Josiah so far moulded his policy according to J.'s counsel; but he forgot that it was equally against God's will for His people to lean upon Assyrian or Babylonian "confidences" as upon Egyptian (36, 37), so taking the field as ally of Assyria and Babylon against the Egyptian Pharaoh Necho he fell (2 Kings xxiii. 29). Josiah's death was one of his bitterest sorrows (Jer. xxii. 10, 15, 16), the remembrance of his righteous reign intensified the pain of witnessing the present injustice of his successors. J. composed the funeral dirge which "the singing men and women in their lamentations" used at the anniversary kept subsequently as an ordinance in Israel (2 Chron. xxxv. 20-25). J. had also inward conflicts. Like Asaph (Ps. lxxiii.) he felt perplexed at the prosperity of the wicked (Jer. xii. 1-4) plotters at Anathoth against his life (i. 19-21), to which Jehovah replies that even worse is before him at Jerusalem: "if thou hast run with the footmen (the Anathoth men), and they have wearied thee, then how canst thou contend with horses (the men of Jerusalem)? And if (it is only) in a land of peace thou trustest (so the Heb. is), then how wilt thou do in the swelling of Jordan?" Or else, if in the plain country alone thou art secure, how wilt thou do "in the pride (the wooded banks, the hair of beasts: Zech. xi. 3, 2 Kings vi. 2; comp. Prov. xxiv. 10) of Jordan?" J. sensitively shrank from strife, yet the Holy Spirit enabled him to deliver his message at the certain cost of rousing enmity and having his sensitiveness wounded (xv. 10). His nature said, "I will not make mention of Him, nor speak any more in His name; but (the Spirit made him feel) His word was in mine heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones, and I was weary with forbearing" (xx. 9).

In xxii. 11, 12 J. foretold that Josiah's son, Shallum or Jehoiakim [see], who reigned but three months and was carried to Egypt by Pharaoh Necho, should never return. On Jehoiakim's accession idolatry returned, combined with the worship of Jehovah; and priests, prophets, and people soon brought J. before the authorities, urging that he should be put to death for denouncing evil against the temple and the city (xxvi. 7-11). This he had done in vii. 12-14, viii., ix., and more summarily in xvi. 1, 2, 6, at the feast of tabernacles, when the law was commanded to be read, or at either of the other two great feasts, before the people of "all the cities of Judah," assembled for worship ("in the court of Jehovah's house"; he "diminished not a word" through fear of offending. The "princes," including doubtless some of Josiah's counsellors or their sons, interposed in his behalf (ver. 16), appealing to Micah's case, who had uttered a like prophecy in Hezekiah's reign with impunity; adding the implication which they durst not express, that though Urijah who prophesied similarly was brought back from his flight into Egypt, and slain by Jehoiakim, yet that the notorious prostration of the state showed that evil, not good, is the result of such persecutions. So AHIKAM [see] his friend, the former officer of good Josiah (2 Kings xxii. 12, 14), saved him from death; however J. deemed it prudent not to appear in public then. In JEHOIAKIM'S [see, and BARUCH and JERUHI] fifth year J. escaped his violence by the Lord's hiding him and Baruch (xxxvi. 27-32), after the king had destroyed the prophetic roll of prophecies for the 23 years past of J.'s ministry, which J. was commanded to write in Jehoiakim's fourth year, and which in the fifth Baruch, having first written them, read to the people assembled on the fast.

J. had shown his prophetic prescience by opposing as delusive what as a patriot he would have desired, the hopes cherished of his country's independence of Babylon (xxvii. 1, 6-8): "thus saith Jehovah of hosts, I have made the earth . . . and now have I given all these lands into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar . . . My servant . . . and all nations shall serve him, and his son's son, until the very time of his land come." So in Jehoiakim's fourth year Judah's hopes from Egypt were crushed by Nebuchadnezzar's defeat of Pharaoh Necho at Carchemish (xvi. 2, a prophesy uttered shortly before the event). J. had in this year foretold that not Judah alone, but all nations, should be subject to Babylon for 70 years, having to drink God's wine-cup of fury, and then Babylon itself should be made "perpetual desolations" (xxv. 8-12, 13-38). Hence the Rechabites [see JERONADAB] were constrained at this time to take refuge within Jerusalem through fear of the Chaldees. J.'s own ascetic spirit was instinctively attracted to them, famed as they were for their abstemious, pilgrim, devout, and idolatry-aborring walk. The occurrence of the name Jeremiah among them, and their ready admission into the temple, mark previous association with J. and the priests. J. made their filial obedience to their earthly father a condemnation of Judah's disobedience to their heavenly Father (xxxv.). [On the 45th chap. concerning an individual, subjoined to his prophecies concerning nations, though belonging to the time just after (xxxvi.) the close of Jehoiakim's reign, see BARUCH.]

J., in xviii., xix. (probably in Jehoiakim's reign), by the symbols of the remaking by the potter of the marred vessel, and of the breaking of the bottle in the valley of Hinnom, sets forth God's absolute power over His creatures to give reprobates to destruction, and to raise others instead of the people who prove unfaithful to His election (Isa. xlv. 9, xlv. 8; Rom. ix. 20, 21). The potter's field significantly was the purchase with the price of reprobate Judas' treachery (Matt. xxvii. 9, 10, which quotes Zech. xi. 12, 13 as J.'s because Zechariah rests on J.; comp. Ps. ii. 8, 9, Rev. ii. 27). Pashur, chief governor in the Lord's house, in consequence smote and put him in the stocks (Jer. xx. 2); when liberated, he renewed his prophecy against the city, denouncing Pashur as about to become Magor Missabib, "terror round about." Then he gave way to complaints of God, but to God, as if God had deceived him; but God had promised (i. 19), not that he should escape suffering, but that God would deliver him out of it; he even, like Job (iii. 3-11), in impatience cursed his day of birth, but better feelings prevailed soon, and he records his deep depression (i. 4-18) after his believing thanksgiving only to show how great was his deliverance (11-13). In the three months' reign of Jehoiachin, Jeconiah, or Coniah (the omission of the Jah marking his severance from Jehovah), J. prophesied the carrying away of the king and the queen mother Nehushta, daughter of Elnathan (Jer. xiii. 18, xxii. 24-30; 2 Kings xxiv. 6, 8, 12, 15). In this reign J. gave the symbolical prophecy of the girdle on his loins taken to the Euphrates, and hidden in a hole of the rock (xiii. 1-7). Some symbolical acts of prophets, being scarcely possible, probable, or decorous, existed only in spiritual vision; when possible and proper, they were often materialized by outward performance. The act, even when only internal, vivified the naked statement of prophetic truth. A journey twice of 200 miles to the Euphrates may have been taken only in the spiritual world wherein the seer moved (comp. xix. 1, 10, xxvii. 2, 3; Isa. xx. 2). Nebuchadnezzar was evidently acquainted with him, but whether it was by an actual journey of J. to Babylon is uncertain (Jer. xxxix. 11).

In spite of the warning given in Jeconiah's case, Zedekiah set at naught J.'s words and revolted. So in his ninth year, tenth month, Nebuchadnezzar began the siege of Jerusalem (xxxix. 1). Zedekiah in the tenth year, through Jehnah and Zephaniah, begged J., "pray for us," as the issue between Nebuchadnezzar and Pharaoh Hophra (Apries) was at that time as yet undecided. In consequence of fear the Jews obeyed the law by temporarily emancipating their bondservants at the end of seven years, but on the remission of the siege again enslaved them (xxxix.). J. therefore foretold that Zedekiah and his princes should be given up to their enemies (xxxii. 2-5). Yet he foretold the sure repossession of Judah by the Jews, by redeeming his uncle Hananeel's field in due form; just as at Rome the ground whereon Hannibal was encamped was put up for sale and found a purchaser. Pharaoh's advance caused the Chaldeans to withdraw temporarily from besieging Jerusalem (xxxvii. 1-5). J. warned the king that the Chaldeans would return and burn the city with fire. Therefore Zedekiah shut him up in the court of the prison. J. himself tried to escape to his native place, Anathoth of Benjamin; but Irijah arrested him at the gate of Benjamin on the charge of desertion to the Chaldeans. Then the princes smote and imprisoned him in the house of Jonathan the scribe. It was a pit (dungeon) with vaulted cells ("cabins") round the sides. After many days in the dungeon Zedekiah the king took him out, and inquired secretly (John iii. 2, v. 44, xii. 43, xix. 38), "is there any word from Jehovah?" J. without regard to his earthly interests (contrast vi. 14, Isa. xxx. 10, Ezek. xlii. 10) foretold Zedekiah's being delivered up to Nebuchadnezzar, and begged not to be left to "die" in Jonathan's house. His natural shrinking from death (Jer. xxxvii. 20) makes his spiritual firmness the more remarkable; ready to die rather than swerve from duty. Zedekiah committed him to the court of the prison (the open space occupied by the guard, xxxii. 2, where his friends had access to him: ver. 12, xxxvii. 12-21), and commanded bread to be supplied to him until all in the city was spent (Is. xxxviii. 19, Isa. xxxiii. 16). Honest reproof sometimes gains more favour than flattery (Prov. xxviii. 23). Zedekiah again sent Pashur and Zephaniah to J. to inquire of him, and received the reply that submission to the Chaldees is the only way of life (xvi. 1-9, xxxviii. 2, etc.); and then the princes accused J. of weakening the hands of the warriors by such words, and the weak prince left J. in their hand, saying "the king cannot do anything against you." So they cast him into Malchiah's dungeon, or cistern emptied of its water during the siege, the mire alone remaining (comp. Zech. ix. 11 and the Antitype, Is. lxix. 2, 14). An Ethiopian stranger, the eunuch Ebedmelech [see], saved the prophet whom his own countrymen tried to destroy. "Old cast clout and rags" were used to raise him up (comp. spiritually 1 Cor. i. 27-29). Zedekiah again secretly consulted J., taking him to the third or N. entry of the outer or inner temple court. Fear of the mocking of the Jewish deserters deterred him from following the prophet's counsel, that he should go forth to the Chaldees; by refusing he brought on himself, as J. foretold, the mocking not only of the deserters but even of his own courtiers. J. abode in "the court of the prison until Jerusalem was taken.

Nebuchadnezzar directed Nebuzaradan, and he gave him liberty to stay with the remnant or go to Babylon, and added "victuals and a reward." Notwithstanding the wrongs he had received from his countrymen for 40 years, as a true patriot he stayed with the Jews under Gedaliah, the son of his friend Ahikam (xxxix. xl.). After GEDALIAH'S [see] murder by ISHMAEL [see], JOHANAN [see] first consulted J. as to going to Egypt with a foregone conclusion, then carried J., in spite of the prophet's warning, to Egypt (xli.—xliii.). At Tahpanhes he foretold Egypt's overthrow (xliii. 8-13), and tradition says he was stoned there (Pseudo Epiphanius; comp. Heb. xi. 37). The Jews expected his reappearing as the forerunner of Messiah (Matt. xvi. 14), "that prophet" (John i. 21). He in a true sense did foretell Messiah, foreseeing to his own "sweet" comfort (Jer. xxxi. 26) not only His conception by a "virgin," but His kingdom, first spiritual, whereby He is "the Lord our righteousness" (xxiii. 5, 6), making the "new covenant," "remembering our sin no more," and "writing His law in our hearts" (xxii. 22, 31-34; Heb. viii. 8-12, x. 16, 17), then visible in Jerusalem, Judah, and Israel, in the last days (Jer. xxxiii. 6-26, iii. 16-18).

J. wrote too an epistle to the exiles at Babylon, carried away with Jeconiah (xxix.), similar in form and style to the N. T. epistles, advising them to settle quietly in Babylon and pray for its peace, for the captivity must last 70 years. The portion of the nation remaining in Judah J. saw by the Spirit was the worst (xxiv.), and would fare the worst. Early in Jehoiaquin's reign (xxvii. 1) he had by symbolic yokes foretold Nebuchadnezzar's subjugation of Judah, etc. But the Syriac and Arabic versions make it likely "Zedekiah" ought to be read; so ver. 3, 12, xxviii. 1. The false prophet Hananiah brake the yokes of wood; but Jehovah declared yokes of iron should be substituted, and that Hananiah should die; he accordingly died the seventh month of the same year. J. took advantage of the embassy sent by Zedekiah to send his letter to the captives (xxix.). Even among the captives at Babylon were false prophets, Ahab, Zedekiah, and Shemaiah (the writer to Zephaniah at Jerusalem that he should imprison J. as "mad"), who held out delusive hopes of a speedy return. Therefore J. announces their doom. Six whole years before Jerusalem's fall J. wrote the prophecy of Babylon's own doom, for Sennah to take to Babylon when he went there on behalf of Zedekiah (marg. li. 59-61), and therewith to console the captives.

The Jews say, "the spirit of Jeremiah dwelt afterwards in Zechariah"; Matthew (xxvii. 9) therefore quotes the words of Zechariah as J.'s. His protests against the priests and prophets answer to our Lord's against the scribes and Pharisees (Matt. xxiii.); his lamentations over his doomed country correspond to the Saviour's tears over Jerusalem. The picture of his sufferings in Lam. i. 12 is antitypically realized in Messiah alone. The subjective and the elegiac elements preponderate in him.

His Hebrew is tinged, as was to be expected, with Chaldaism. Sheshbath (which, on the Kabbalistic system of making the last letter of the Heb. alphabet express the first, would be Babel) is supposed to prove his using that mystic system (xxv. 26); but in li. 41 there can be no design of concealment, for he mentions expressly Babylon; the word is rather from Shach the Babylonian goddess, during whose feast Cyrus took the city. Pathos and sympathy with the suffering are his characteristics. As Ezekiel views the nation's sins as opposed to righteousness, so J. as productive of misery. Ezekiel is as marked by firmness as J. is by delicate sensitiveness. His heaping of phrase on phrase, and repeating of stereotyped forms, are due to his affected feelings; but in the rhythmical parts, and against foreign nations, he is concise, sublime, and energetic.

Division.—The various parts are prefaced by the formula, "The word which came to J. from Jehovah." Notes of time mark other divisions more or less historical. In the poetical parts there are 23 sections, divided into strophes of seven or nine verses, marked by "Jehovah said also unto me." The five books thus are: I. Introduction: chap. i. II. Reproofs of the Jews, seven sections, chaps. ii.—xiv.: (1) chap. ii., (2) iii.—vi., (3) vii.—x., (4) xi.—xiii., (5) xiv.—xvii., (6) xviii.—xx., (7) xxi.—xxiv. III. Review of all nations, in two sections: (1) chap. xvi.—xlix., (2) xxv. IV. Historical appendix, in three sections: (1) chap. xxxv. 1-7, (2) xxxv. 8-22, (3) xxxv. V. Conclusion, in two sections: (1) chap. xxxvi. 2, etc., (2) xlv. Subsequently in Egypt he added xlv. 13-26 to his previous prophecy as to Egypt; also the three sections xxxvii.—xxxix., xl.—xliii., xlv. A later hand (see li. 61) probably appended li. from 2 Kings xxiv. 18, etc., xxv. 30. Our Heb. text seems the latest and fullest edition from J.'s own hand. The LXX. have a different order of the prophecies against foreign nations, xlv.—li. being placed after xxv. 13, 14. Probably these prophecies were repeated more than once; in the original smaller collection (for LXX. omit much that is in the Heb.) they stood early, in the fuller and later one they stood in their present position, and J. inserted then the clause xxv. 13, which implies that they existed in some other part of the book, "all that is written in this book, which J. hath prophesied against all the nations." It was in this very year (comp. xxv. 1 with xxxvi. 1) that J. was directed to write in a regular book all he had prophesied from the first against Judah and foreign nations. We saw above that xxi., xxxv., xxxvi. are out of chronological order. The whole may be divided into (1) chaps. i.—xlv., concerning Israel; (2) xlv.—li., concerning the nations. Chaps. i.—xxxiii. are prophetic as to Israel; xxiv.—xlv. combine prophecy and history; xxiv.—xxxix. set forth Nebuchadnezzar as God's instrument of chastising Israel and the nations, irresistible for the time, submission the wisest policy, the exiles better in position than the people at home; chaps. xxx.—xxxiii., the most Messianic portion, sets forth Israel restored under Messiah reigning upon David's throne; chaps. xxiv.—xiv. mainly historical, illustrating from the people's unbelief the need of God's judgments.

The N. T. by quotations stamps J.'s canonicity (Matt. ii. 17, xvi. 14; Heb. viii. 8-12). Philo quotes J. as an "oracle." Melito, Origen, Jerome, and the Talmud similarly include it in the canon.

Jericho. Num. xxi. 1; Josh. ii. 1-3, 5, 15; iii. 16. From a root "fragrance," or "the moon" (jareach), being the seat of Canaanite moon worship, or "broad" from its being in a plain bounded by the Jordan. J. is to the W., opposite where Israel crossed the Jordan under Joshua, at six miles' distance. It had its king. Walls enclosed it, and its gate was regularly shut, according to eastern custom, when it was dark. Its spoil included silver, gold, vessels of iron and brass (Josh. vi. 19), cast in the same plain of Jordan where Solomon had his foundry (1 Chron. iv. 17). The "Babylonish garment" (Josh. vii. 21) betokens its commerce with the East. Joshua's two spies lodged in Rahab's house upon the wall; and she in reward for their safety received her own preservation, and that of all in her house, when Joshua burned the city with fire, and slew man and beast, as all had been put under the ban. The metals were taken to the treasury of the sanctuary (Josh. vi. 17-19, 21-25). Other towns had their inhabitants only slain, as under the Divine ban (Deut. vi. 2; xx. 16, 17; i. 34, 35), whilst the cattle and booty fell to the conquerors. J.'s men, cattle, and booty were all put under the ban, as being the first town of Canaan which the Lord had given them. They were to offer it as the firstfruits, a sign that they received the whole land as a fief from His hand. The plain was famed for palms and balsams, whence J. is called "the city of palms" (Deut. xxxiv. 3; Jud. i. 16, iii. 13; 2 Chron. xxviii. 15). The town stood, according to some, N. of the poor village Riha, by the wady Kelt. However, modern research places it a quarter of a mile from the mountain Quarantana (the traditional scene of Christ's temptation), at the fountain of Elisha. This accords with Josh. xvi. 1, "the water of J.," and Josephus mentions the fount and the mountain near (B. J., iv. 8, § 2, 3). Traces of buildings occur S. of the fountain. Its site was given to Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 21). It is mentioned in David's time as a town (2 Sam. x. 5). Joshua's curse therefore was not aimed against rebuilding the town, which the Benjamites did, but against its miraculously overthrown walls being restored, against its being made again a fortress. HIEL [see] in Alab's ungodly reign incurred the curse (1 Kings xvi. 34). Elisha "healed the waters" of the fountain, called also Ain es Sultan (2 Kings ii. 18-22), half an hour N.W. of Riha, in the rainy season forming a brook, which flows through the wady Kelt into the Jordan. Here myrobalanum, acacias, figtrees, etc., stand where once grew Jericho's famous palms.

In its plains Zedekiah was overtaken by the Chaldeans (2 Kings xxv. 5, Jer. xxxix. 5). Robbers still infest the road from Jerusalem down (a steep descent) to J., as when Jesus spake the parable of the good Samaritan (Luke x. 30); Pompey undertook to destroy their strongholds not long before. Moreover some of the courses of priests lived at J., which harmonizes with the mention of the priest and Levite returning that way from Jerusalem. From mount Pisgah, the peak near the town Nebo, on its western slope (Deut. xxxiv. 1), Moses looked "over against J."

J. strategically was the key of the land, being situated at the entrance of two passes through the hills, one leading to Jerusalem the other to Ai and Bethel. "By faith the walls of J. fell down, after they were compassed about seven days" (whereas sieges often last for years) (Heb. xi. 30). Trumpets, though one were to sound for ten thousand years, cannot throw down walls; but faith can do all things (Chrysostom). Six successive days the armed host marched round the city, the priests bearing the ark, as symbol of His presence, in the middle between the armed men in front and the reeward or rearguard, and seven priests sounding seven ramshorn (rather jubilee) trumpets, the sign of judgment by "the breath of His mouth"; comp. the seven trumpets that usher in judgments in Revelation, especially xi. 13, 15. On the seventh day they compassed J. seven times, and at the seventh time the priests blew one long blast, the people shouted, and the wall fell flat. Even though volcanic agency, of which traces are visible in the Jordan valley, may have been employed, the fall was no less miraculous; it would prove that the God of revelation employs His own natural means in the spiritual world, by supernatural will ordering the exact time and direction of those natural agencies to subserve His purposes of grace to His people, and for announcing to them the fact, and connecting it with their obedience to His directions; so in the Egyptian plagues. The miracle wrought independently of all conflict on their part at the outset marked that the occupation of the whole Holy Land was to be by His gift, and that it was a fief held under God at His pleasure. Under Elisha a school of prophets resided at J. (2 Kings ii. 5, iv. 1, vi. 1, 2; v. 24, for "tower" transl. "the hill" before the city: Keil.) Of "children of J." 345 returned from Babylon (Ezra ii. 34). They helped to rebuild the wall (Neh. iii. 2, vi. 36). Archelais in our Lord's days had irrigated the plain and planted it with palms. Herod the Great had previously founded a new town (Phasaelis) higher up the plain. The distinction between the new and the old towns may solve the seeming discrepancy between Matthew (xx. 30), who makes the miracle on the blind to be when Jesus was leaving J., and Luke, who says it was when Jesus was come nigh unto J. (xviii. 35.) The Lord Himself, in whose genealogy Rahab the harlot is found, here was guest of Zacheus the publican, a lucrative office in so rich a city as the Roman J. was. The tree that Zacheus climbed was the fig mulberry or tree fig. The Lord's visit to Bethany appropriately follows His parable of the good Samaritan who relieved the man robbed between Jerusalem and J., for Jesus was then travelling from J. to Jerusalem, and Bethany was only a little way short of Jerusalem (Luke x. 25, 38; John xi. 1). James and John's proposal to call fire down upon the Samaritans who would not receive Him in an earlier stage of the journey suggested probably His choosing a Samaritan to represent the benefactor in the parable, a tacit rebuke to their un-Christlike spirit (Luke ix. 51-56).

Jeroboam=whose people is many. "Rehoboam," meaning enlarger of the people, is much the same. Both names appear first in Solomon's time, when Israel's numbers were vastly increased. 1. Founder of the northern kingdom of Israel. Son of Nebat and Zerah of Zareda or Zarthan in the Jordan valley (1 Kings vi. 46); of Ephraim (so "Ephraimite" means, 1 Kings xi. 26, 1 Sam. i. 1). His mother is called a "widow woman." When Solomon was building Millo, and was closing the gap

(not "the breaches," for no hostile attack had been made since David had fortified the city, 2 Sam. v. 9), long afterwards called Tyropœon, separating Zion from Moriah and Ophel, so as to bring the temple mount within the city wall, and so complete the fortification of the city of David, he found J. able and energetic in "doing the work" (margin, 1 Kings xi. 28), so he made him overseer over all "the heavy work" of the house of Joseph. In this post J. attempted a rebellion, the Ephraimites being impatient because of the heavy taxes and works imposed, and so having their old jealousy of Judah awakened afresh. Events moved on, in God's providence, steadily towards the appointed end: J. of Ephraim over an army of Ephraimite workmen, employed for 20 years in works for the glory of Judah, and for palaces and idol temples (besides Jehovah's temple transferred from Shiloh in northern Israel to Judah's capital), all for a prince no longer of their own line. Naturally J. became their king, and they wreaked their vengeance on Adoniram the collector in chief of taxes for those hated works. Solomon suppressed the rebellion, and J. fled to Egypt. Ahijah the prophet of Shiloh had previously met J. by the way, and drawn him aside into the field, and in Jehovah's name intimated that J. should have ten tribes, and the house of David one, for the apostasy of Solomon and the people, vividly symbolising the fact as already accomplished in God's counsel by tearing His new (answering to the youthful vigour of the kingdom) four cornered garment into twelve pieces, and giving him ten. As two, not merely one, remained, the numbers are symbolical not arithmetical [see ISRAEL], ten expressing completeness and totality (xii. 20), "they made J. king over all Israel." Ahijah's words, "thou shalt reign according to all that thy soul desireth," imply J. already in heart aspired to the throne before his overt rebellion. God gave no promise of permanence to J. as He did to the house of David, simply "if thou wilt walk in My ways I will build thee a sure house." J. fulfilled not the condition, and so his house was extirpated at his son's death (xv. 25-31). David's seed was to be afflicted, but "not for ever." The tribes shall be united again in Messiah the Son of David (Ezek. xxxvii. 16-22). Ahijah's prophecy did not justify J.'s attempt. Sannam anointed David in Saul's reign; yet David, even when God had put Saul his deadly foe in his power, would not lay violent hands on the Lord's anointed, but waited patiently God's way and time for raising him to the throne. God had expressly said, "I will make Solomon prince all the days of his life"; so that J. had no pretext from Ahijah for rebellion, and Solomon would have justly slain him had he not escaped to Shishak or Shechem of Egypt. Shechem, having dethroned the Pharaoh whose daughter Solomon had married, had naturally espoused J.'s cause. At Solomon's death the Israelites called

J. out of Egypt, for they had been longing for a less theocratic and more worldly kingdom, impatient already of submission to the royal house appointed by Jehovah (2 Sam. xx.). Israel, having the right of making king whomsoever God chose (2 Sam. ii. 4, v. 3; 1 Chron. xxix. 22), assembled to Shechem (Nablûs now) for that purpose, the ancient place of national assembly in Ephraim (Josh. xxiv. 1), and more suited than Jerusalem to their design of transferring the government to J. J., having formerly superintended Ephraim in the works of Solomon at Jerusalem in building Millo and repairing the city of David (1 Kings xi. 27), could readily suggest calumnies from his own professed experience, J. as their spokesman begged of Rehoboam a reduction of their tribute and heavy service, due no doubt to Solomon's maintaining such splendour and erecting magnificent buildings. They forgot the blessings of his reign, the peace, wealth, and trade which they enjoyed. Rehoboam, following the young men's counsel rather than the old and experienced counsellors of his father (Prov. xxvii. 10), answered harshly (xv. 1): "My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins. . . . my father chastised you with whips, but I . . . with scorpions," i.e. scourges with barbed points like a scorpion's sting. Had he "served them," they would have been "his servants for ever." By acting the tyrant he precipitated the secession. Adopting the watchword of Sheba's rebellion they cried "what portion have we in David? to your tents, O Israel; now see to thine own house (to Judah, of which David's representative was head), David." Then they "made J. king over all Israel."

His first care was to fortify (so "build" means, for the two cities existed long before) Shechem his first residence (Tirzah was his subsequent abode, 1 Kings xiv. 17). (It was to Shechem Rehoboam had hastened to meet Israel, to secure Ephraim's allegiance, as he knew he was sure of Judah's allegiance; Shechem had been burnt down by Abimelech.) Also Penuel, to secure Gilead against enemies from the E. and N.E. Next, adopting carnal policy instead of God's will, which assured him the kingdom on condition of obedience, and which designs ultimately to reunite Israel to Judah after Judah's temporary chastisement for sin, he set up two golden calves (see CALF WORSHIP), one at Dan the other at Bethel, to obviate the apprehended return of Israel to Rehoboam through going up to the great feasts at Jerusalem. He thus violated God's command that there should be only one altar, viz. that at Jerusalem; still worse, he violated the second commandment by worshipping Jehovah, who is a spirit, under the form of images somewhat like the two cherubim. Rome compared the Protestant reformation to J.'s secession; but it is she who breaks the unity of the faith by representing the one God under images, in violation of the second commandment; paying the way to violating the first, as J.'s sin prepared the way for Baal worship. Borrowing Aaron's words concerning his calf, J. insinuated that his calf worship was no new religion, but a revival of their fathers' primitive one in the desert, sanctioned by the first highpriest: "Behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of Egypt" (Exod. xxxii. 4, 8). The places were hallowed by ancient tradition: Bethel on the S. of his kingdom, the scene of Jehovah's revelation to the patriarch Jacob (Gen. xxvii. 11, 19, xxxv. 7); and Dan, at the sources of the Jordan (now Tell el Kadi) in the far N., consecrated by the Danites' image worship, at which Moses' descendant JONATHAN [see] officiated; so that no part of his kingdom was beyond easy reach of one or other of the two sanctuaries. (But Corder presents various reasons for supposing, with the older writers except Josephus, that Dan and Bethel were two heights W. and S. of Shechem: Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., Jan. 1878. [See SHECHEM].) He made priests of the people indiscriminately, not of Levi; any who "came to consecrate himself with a young bullock and seven rams" (2 Chron. xiii. 9). Thus one sin entailed many others, and brought its own punishment; for the Levites, refusing to be priests of the calves, and the godly were alienated from him, and most emigrated to Judah (2 Chron. xi. 13, 14, 16), strengthening Rehoboam. J. transferred the feast of tabernacles from the legal seventh to the eighth month ("the month which he had devised of his own heart," 1 Kings xi. 33; see Col. ii. 23, "will worship"), his pretext being the later ripening of the vintage in the N. than in the S., but his real reason being to separate Israel from Judah religiously, the legal 15th day being still retained. Whilst J. stood in person to burn incense, or rather to burn the sacificial portions of the flesh, upon the altar of Bethel, usurping the priest's office, a man of God out of Judah, impelled by (1 Kings xiii. 2, Heb. in: Hag. i. 13) the word of Jehovah, Iddo according to Josephus (Ant. viii. 8, § 5), cried against the altar: "behold, a child born unto the house of David, Josiah, upon thee shall offer the priests of the high places that burn incense (burn sacrifices) upon thee (retribution in kind), and men's bones shall be burnt upon thee," to defile thee. He gave also a sign of the future fulfilment of his prophecy: "the altar shall be rent, and the ashes . . . poured out" (implying the altar's destruction and the desecration of the sacrificial service). Josiah's name, as Cyrus, in Isa. xlv. 28, xlv. 1, is specified as a concrete description of what God would do by him—"he whom Jehovah will support," to execute His judgment on Bethel and its priests: fulfilled 2 Kings xiii. 15-20. J. attempting to seize the prophet had his hand dried up, and was only restored upon the prophet's intercession. Failing by violence, J. tried to win the prophet by favours, asking him home to refresh himself with food and offering him a present. This only elicited a stronger rejection of him on the part of God. Not for half his house would the prophet go in with him, or eat or drink in the place, or return by the way he came. God would have His people to hold no communion with the apostates of Bethel, or to have any renewed communication with any on the way, which might ensue from meeting the same persons on the same road again. Contrast Balaam's tempting God (through desire of reward) by asking again, as if God would change His once for all declared will (Num. xxii.-xxiv.; 1 Pet. v. 21). An old prophet at Bethel, where, Lot like, he dwelt, risking the corrupting influences of bad association (1 Cor. xv. 33, 2 Cor. vi. 14-18), jealous that any should be faithful where he himself was not, and desiring to drag down the man of God to his own low level (Ps. lxxii. 4), overtook him, and by a lie, saying "an angel of God spake unto me, Bring him back that he may eat," overcame his constancy. He ought to have remembered God cannot contradict Himself (Num. xxiii. 19; Gal. i. 8, 9). The prophet, the instrument of his sin (according to God's righteous law: Prov. i. 31, Jer. ii. 19), became the instrument of his punishment; his tempter became his accuser: "forasmuch as thou hast disobeyed the mouth of Jehovah . . . thy carcass shall not come unto the sepulchre of thy fathers." So, a lion slew him, yet ate not his body, nor tore the ass, but stood passively, an emblem of mercy amidst judgment; also to mark it was no mere chance, but the visitation of Jehovah, a warning to Bethel; "if judgment begin (thus immediately) at the house of God, what shall the end be of them that obey not . . . God; and if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and sinner appear?" (1 Pet. iv. 17, 18.) God chastises His children immediately, so that they may not be condemned with the world: He is slower in punishing the world, that His long-suffering may lead them to repentance (1 Cor. xi. 30, 32; Rom. ii. 4). The worldly prophet showed much sentimentality at his death, laying his carcass in his own grave, and exclaiming "Alas! my brother." Balaam like (Num. xxiii. 10), desiring at death to lie with the man of God, he utters no self-reproach, though having caused his death. J. unwarmed by his visitation "returned not from his evil way," ordaining whosoever would (1 Kings xiii. 33, 34; 2 Chron. xi. 15) priests, for the high places, the devils, and the calves" (the gods worshipped in these houses in the high places being called "demons" or devils (lit. goats, from the Egyptian goat-shaped god Mendes or Pan) from their nature, and calves from their form; Lev. xvii. 7, "evil spirits of the desert" (Speaker's Comm., se'irim; 1 Cor. x. 20, 21). So it "became sin unto his house, to eat it off." [See ABIAH and ABIAH, on the death of the former, J.'s son, and the prophecy of the latter against J.] Rehoboam's son ABIAH [see] defeated J., and gained for a time Bethel, Jeshanah, and Ephraim. "Because the children of Judah relied upon the Lord God of their fathers," "God delivered (2 Chron. xiii.) the Israelites into their hand." J. never recovered strength again; and the Lord struck him (by a special visitation, 1 Sam. xxv. 38), and he died after a 22 years' reign, and "slept with his fathers," i.e. was buried in his ancestral tomb. Nadab, or Nebat from his grandfather's name, succeeded. J.'s master stroke of policy recoiled on himself. The brand rests eternally on him that he "sinned and made Israel to sin." Rejecting Jehovah's will, he was no longer king by the will of God, but a successful usurper, whose example others followed. The son whose throne J. was at such pains to secure permanently fell with all J.'s house before Baasha.

2. J. II., Joash's son, fourth of Jehu's dynasty. In JEROBAHAZ [see] reign Jehovah gave Israel promise of a "saviour" from Syria who "had made Israel like the dust by threshing" (2 Kings xiii. 4, 5). J. was that saviour, fulfilling the further prophecy of JONAH [see] that J. should "restore the coast of Israel from the entering in of Hamath unto the sea of the plain" (xiv. 23-29). J. took Syria's capital, Damascus (Amos i. 3-5, vi. 14; where Amos warns Israel not to exult in having just taken Hamath, for that shall be the foe's starting point to afflict you: contrast 1 Kings viii. 65), and Hamath, and restored the tribes E. of Jordan (1 Chron. v. 17-22, 2 Kings xiii. 5). Assyria's depression from 800 to 750 B.C., according to their inscriptions, harmonizes with Scripture that then J. II. in Israel, and Uzziah in Judah, were able to enlarge their borders. The long period of prosperity thus given was a respite which should have led Israel to repentance. When they repented not, speedy and final judgment followed. The calf worship, as an engine of state policy, still remained at Bethel. The priest there, AMAZIAH [see], alleged before J. (Amos vii. 9-13), "Amos hath conspired against thee in the midst of the house of Israel," exaggerating Amos' prophecy, "I will rise against the house of J. with the sword," as if he had said, "J. shall die by the sword." J. seems not to have heeded Amaziah through awe of Jehovah's prophet. In all ages the ungodly have accused witnesses against the national sin as guilty of treason: as Elijah and Jeremiah 1 Kings xviii. 17, Jer. xxxvii. 13, 14; Jehu xix. 12 the Antitype, xi. 48-50 political expediency being the plea for persecution; Acts xvii. 6, 7, xxiv. 5, Paul. After reigning 41 years he was buried in state and entombed with the kings of Israel. Amaziah's expression, "the land is not able to bear all Amos' words," implies a critical state of the country, which eventuated in actual anarchy for some time after J.'s death.

Jeroham. 1. 1 Chron. vi. 27, 34; 1 Sam. i. 1. 2. Head of a family dwelling in Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii. 27), as distinguished from the Benjaminites dwelling in Gibeon (28, 29), probably the J. father (forefather) of Ibmehiah (ix. 3, 8, 9). 3. 1 Chron. ix. 12; Neh. xi. 12. 4. 1 Chron. xii. 7. 5. 1 Chron. xxvii. 22. 6. 2 Chron. xxiii. 1.

Jerubbaal. [See GIDEON.] Jud. vi. 32 transl., "they (not Joash, but one, for the townsmen generally) called him J., saying, Let Baal fight against him, because he hath thrown down his altar." They took up Joash's words: "he that will fight for Baal (seeking to put to death the destroyer of his altar) shall be put to death (himself; let us wait) TILL morning (to see, will Baal avenge his own wrong); let Baal fight for himself." When Baal did Gideon no harm the title Jerub-Baal, the "Baal fighter," became an honourable one. Besheth, "shame," is substituted for the idol in Jerubbesheth (to comply literally with Exod. xxiii. 13, 2 Sam. xi. 21), as in Ishbosheth for Eshbaal (2 Sam. ii. 8, etc.; 1 Chron. viii. 33, ix. 39). Philo of Byblos, in his revision of Sanchoniatho, calls him Hierombal, priest of Jeno, or Jalve, or Jehovah.

Jeruel wilderness. Part of the flat country stretching from the Dead Sea to Tekoa, a waste table land in front of the valley; where Jahaziel told Jehoshaphat he should encounter Ammon, Moab, etc., pouring round the S. of the Dead Sea into Judah (2 Chron. xx. 16, 21); containing "the watchtower" built there for observing from afar such inroads. "The ascent of Ziz," or Hazziz, has probably given its name to the wady el Hasasah.

Jerusalem. Jeru., the foundation (implying its divinely given stability, Ps. lxxvii. 1, Isa. xlv. 32; so spiritually, Heb. xi. 10); -salem, of peace. The absence of the doubled sh forbids Ewald's derivation, jerush-possessio. Salem is the oldest form (Ps. lxxvi. 2, Heb. vii. 2, Gen. xiv. 18). Jebusi (the Jebusite) (Josh. xv. 8, xviii. 16, 28; Jud. xix. 10, 11) and the city itself. Jebus, the next form, J. the more modern name. Melchizedek (king of righteousness) corresponds to Adoni-zedek, "lord of righteousness," king of J. (Josh. x. 1), the name being a hereditary title of the kings of J. which is "the city of righteousness" (Isa. i. 21, 26). Ps. cx. connects Melchizedek with Zion, as other passages do with Salem. The king of Salem met Abram after his return from the slaughter of the kings, therefore near home (Hebron, to which J. was near). "The valley of Shaveh, the king's dale" (Gen. xiv. 17, 2 Sam. xvi. 18), was the valley of Kedron, and the king of Sodom had no improbable distance to go from Sodom in meeting him here (two furlongs from J.; Josephus, Ant. vii. 10, § 3).

ARIEL [see], "lion of God," is another designation (Isa. xxxix. 1, 2, 7). Also "the holy city" (Matt. iv. 5, xxvii. 53; Rev. xi. 3). Eliahu Hadrianus, the Roman emperor, rebuilt it (A.D. 135), whence it was named Elia Capitolina, inscribed still on the well known stone in the S. wall of the Aksa. J. did not become the nation's capital or even possession until DAVID's [see] time, the seat of government and of the religious worship having been previously in the N. at Shechem and Shiloh, then Gibeon and Nob (whence the tabernacle and altar were moved to Gibeon). The boundary between Judah and Benjamin ran S. of the city hill, so that the city was in Benjamin, and Judah enclosed on two sides the tongue or promontory of land on which it stood, the valley of Hinnom bounding it W. and S., the valley of Jehoshaphat on the E. The temple situated at the connecting point of Judah and northern Israel admirably united both in holiest bonds. J. lies on the ridge of the backbone of hills stretching from the plain of Jezreel to the desert. Jewish tradition placed the altars and sanctuary in Benjamin, the courts of the temple in Judah. The two royal tribes met in J. David showed his sense of the importance of the alliance with Saul of Benjamin by making Michal's restoration the condition of his league with Abner (2 Sam. iii. 13). Its table land also lies almost central on the middle route from N. to S., and is the watershed of the torrents passing eastward to Jordan and westward to the Mediterranean (Ezek. v. 5, xxxviii. 12; Ps. lxxvii. 2). It lay midway between the oldest civilized states; Egypt and Ethiopia on one hand, Babylon, Nineveh, India, Persia, Greece, and Rome on the other; thus holding the best vantage ground whence to act on heathendom. At the same time it lay out of the great highway between Egypt and Syria and Assyria, so often traversed by armies of these mutually hostile world powers, the low sea coast plain from Pelusium to Tyre; hence it generally enjoyed immunity from wars.

It is 32 miles from the sea, 18 from Jordan, 20 from Hebron, 36 from Samaria; on the edge of one of the highest table lands, 3700 ft. above the Dead Sea; the N.W. part of the city is 2581 ft. above the Mediterranean sea level; mount Olivet is more than 100 ft. higher, viz. 2700. The descent is extraordinary; Jericho, 13 miles off, is 3624 ft. lower than Olivet, i.e. 900 below the Mediterranean. Bethel to the N., 11 miles off, is 419 below J. Ramleh to the W., 25 miles off, is 2274 ft. lower. To the S. however the hills at Bethlehem are a little higher, 2701; Hebron, 3020. To the S.W. the view is more open, the plain of Rephaim beginning at the S. edge of the valley of Hinnom and stretching towards the western sea. To the N.W. also the view reaches along the upper part of the valley of Jehoshaphat. The city is called "the valley of vision" (Isa. xxii. 1-5), for the lower parts of the city, the Tyro-peon (the cheesemakers), form a valley between the heights. The hills outside too are "round about" it (Ps. cxv. 2). On the E. Olivet; on the S. the hill of evil counsel, rising from the vale of Hinnom; on the W. the ground rises to the borders of the great wady, an hour and a half from the city; on the N. a prolongation of mount Olivet bounds the prospect a mile from the city. Jer. xxi. 13, "inhabiters of the valley, rock of the plain" (i.e. Zion). "J. the defenced" (Ezek. xxi. 20), yet doomed to be "the city of confusion," a second Babel (confusion), by apostasy losing the order of truth and holiness, so doomed to the disorder of destruction like Babylon, its prototype in evil (Isa. xxiv. 10, Jer. iv. 23). Seventeen times desolated by conquerors, as having become a "Sodom" (Isa. i. 10). "The gates of the people," i.e. the central mart for the inland commerce (Ezek. xxvi. 2, xxvii. 17; 1 Kings v. 9). "The perfection of beauty" (Lam. ii. 15, the enemy in scorn quoting the Jews' own words), "beautiful for situation" (Ps. xlviii. 2; 1. 1, 2).

The ranges of Lebanon and Antilebanon pass on southwards in two lower parallel ranges separated by the Ghor or Jordan valley, and ending in the gulf of Akabah. The eastern range distributes itself through Gilead, Moab, and Petra, reaching the Arabian border of the Red Sea. The western range is the backbone of western Palestine, including the hills of Galilee, Samaria, Ephraim, Benjamin, and Judah, and passing on into the Sinaitic range ending at Ras Mohammed in the tongue of land between the two arms of the Red Sea. The J. range is part of the steep western wall of the valley of the Jordan and the Dead Sea. W. of this wall the hills sink into a lower range between it and the Mediterranean coast plain. The eastern ravine, the valley of Kedron or Jehoshaphat running from N. to S., meets at the S.E. corner of the city table land promontory the valley of Hinnom, which on the W. of the precipitous promontory first runs S., then bends eastward (S. of the promontory) till it meets the valley of Jehoshaphat at Bir Ayub; thence as one they descend steeply toward the Dead Sea. The promontory itself is divided into two unequal parts by a ravine running from S. to N. The western part or "upper city" is the larger and higher. The eastern part, mount Moriah and the Aera or "lower city" (Josephus), constitute the lower and smaller; on its southern portion is now the mosque of Omar. The central ravine half way up sends a lateral valley running up to the general level at the Jaffa or Bethlehem gate. The central ravine or depression, running toward the Damascus gate, is the Tyropeon. N. of Moriah the valley of the Asmoneans running transversely (marked still by the reservoir with two arches, "the pool of Bethesda" so called, near St.

Stephen's gate) separates it from the suburb Bezetha or new town. Thus the city was impregnable entrenched by ravines W., S., and E., whilst on the N. and N.W. it had ample room for expansion. The western half is fairly level from N. to S., remembering however the lateral valley spoken of above. The eastern hill is more than 100 ft. lower; the descent thence to the valley, the Bir Ayub, is 450 ft. The N. and S. outlying hills of Olivet, viz. Viri Galilai, Scopus, and mount of Offence, bend somewhat toward the city, as if "standing round about J." The neighbouring hills though not very high are a shelter to the city, and the distant hills of Moab look like a rampart on the E. The route from the N. and E. was from the Jordan plain by Jericho and mount Olivet (Luke xvii. 11, xviii. 35, xix. 1, 29, 45; 2 Sam. xv. xvi.; 2 Chron. xxviii. 15). The route from Philistia and Sharon was by Joppa and Lydda, up the two Bethborons to the high ground at Gibeon, whence it turned S. and by Ramah and Gibeah passed over the N. ridge to J. This was the road which armies took in approaching the city, and it is still the one for heavy baggage, though a shorter and steeper road through Amwas and the great wady is generally taken by travellers from Jaffa to J.

The gates were (1) that of Ephraim (2 Chron. xxv. 23), the same probably as that (2) of Benjamin (Jer. xx. 2), 400 cubits from (3) "the corner gate" (2 Chron. xxv. 23). (4) Of Joshua, governor of the city (2 Kings xxiii. 8). (5) That between the two walls (2 Kings xxv. 4). (6) Horse gate (Neh. iii. 28). (7) The valley gate (2 Chron. xxvi. 9). (8) Fish gate (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11). (9) Dung gate (Neh. ii. 13). (10) Sheep gate (iii. 1). (11) E. gate (ver. 29). (12) Miphkad (ver. 31). (13) Fountain gate, (xii. 37). (14) Water gate. (15) Old gate (ver. 39). (16) Prison gate. (17) The E. gate (margin. Jer. xix. 2, "suu gate"), Harsith; Jerome takes it from heres, "a potter's vessel," the way out to Hinnom valley where the potters formed vessels for the use of the temple (ver. 10, 11). (18) First gate (Zech. xiv. 10), perhaps "the old gate" of Neh. iii. 6. The gates of the temple were Sar (2 Kings xi. 6), named "the gate of foundation" (2 Chron. xxiii. 5); "the gate of the guard" (2 Kings xi. 6, 19); "high gate" (2 Chron. xxiii. 20); Shallecheth (1 Chron. xxvi. 16). The sides of the valleys of Kedron and Hinnom were and are the chief burial places (2 Kings xxiii. 6); tombs still abound on the slopes. Impurities of every kind were cast thence (1 Kings xv. 13; 2 Chron. xxix. 5, 16). The kings were buried in mount Zion. "David was buried in the city of David (here used in a vague sense [see Birch's remark quoted at the close of this article] of the Ophel S. of the temple mount), between Siloah and the house of the mighty men," i.e. the guard house (Neh. iii. 16). It became the general burial place of the kings of Judah. Its site was known down to Titus' destruction of the city, which confused the knowledge of the sacred sites. "The king's garden," of David and Solomon, was at the point of union of Kedron and Hinnom (Neh. iii. 15). The garden of Gethsemane was at the foot of Olivet. Beyond the Damascus or northern gate the wall crosses the royal caverns. J. is honeycombed with natural and excavated caverns and cisterns for water, for burial, and for quarries. The royal quarries extend under the city according to the first measurement 200 yds. southeastwards, and are 100 yds. wide. The cuttings are four or five inches wide, with a little hollow at the left corner of each, into which a wick and oil might be placed. Mr. Schick adds considerably to these measurements by his recent discoveries. The entrance is so low that one must stoop, but the height speedily increases in advancing.

N. of the city an abundant waterspring existed, the outflow of which was stopped probably by Hezekiah, and the water conducted underground to reservoirs within the city. From these the overflow passed to "the fount of the Virgin," thence to Siloam, and perhaps to Bir Ayub, the "well of Nehemiah." Besides this spring, private and public cisterns abounded. Outside on the W. are the upper and lower reservoirs of Gihon (Birket Munilla and Birket es Sultan). On the S.E. outside is the pool of Siloam. The Birket Hanmam Sitti Maryam is close to St. Stephen's gate, which is on the eastern side of the city, just above the Haram area. The pool of Hezekiah is within, near the Jaffa gate, which receives the overflow of Birket Munilla. The pool of Bethesda is inside, near St. Stephen's gate.

ST. STEPHEN'S GATE.

Barelay discovered a reservoir in the Tyropoeon, W. of the Haram (the temple area, the slopes S. of which are Ophel), supplied from Bethlehem and Solomon's pools. Four great towers stood at the N.W. part of the wall. The castle of Antonia, in our Lord's time, rose above all other buildings in the city, and was protected by the keep in its S.E. corner.

History.—The first mention of J. is as the Salem of Melchizedek (Gen. xiv. 18). Herodotus gives it the name Cadytis, which reappears in the modern El Kuds, or this may come from Kodesh, "the holy city." Next in Josh. x. 1, etc., as the capital of Adonizedek. Then Joshua allotted it to Benjamin (xv. 8, xviii.

16, 28). Neither Judah, whose land environed the stronghold, nor Benjamin could drive the Jebusites out of it (xv. 62; Jud. i. 21). The first destruction of the lower city is recorded Jud. i. 3-8; Judah, with Simcon, "smote it with the sword, and set it on fire" as being unable to retain possession of it (for the Jebusites or Canaanites held the fortress), so that, as Josephus says (Ant. v. 2, § 23), they moved to Hebron. This was the first of the 17 sieges ending with the Roman (Luke xxi. 20; Matt. xxiv. 15). Twice in these sieges it was destroyed; on two other occasions its walls were overthrown. We find it in the hands of the stranger, the Jebusite, in Jud. xix. 10-12. DAVID [see] at last took the hitherto impregnable stronghold, which was therefore called "the city of David" (Joab being the first in the assault, 1 Chron. xi. 6), and built his palace there. He enclosed the city and citadel together with a wall, and strengthened Zion "inwards" by a wall upon the N. side where the lower town joined it; and brought up the ark, making it thus the political and religious centre of the nation (2 Sam. v. 6-9, vi, vii). This choice was under the direction of Jehovah (Deut. xii. 5-21, 1 Kings xi. 36); henceforth it was "the city of the Great King" (Matt. v. 35), "the holy city" (Neh. xi. 18), the spiritual as well as civil capital. For this its situation admirably adapted it, bordering between Judah, his own tribe, and the valiant small tribe of Benjamin, which formed the connecting link with the northern tribes, especially with Ephraim the house of Joseph. This event he, and his enemies the Philistines too, regarded as a pledge that his kingdom was established. Here in Zion was the sepulchre of David, where also most of his successors were buried. In 1 Sam. xvii. 54 it is said David brought Goliath's head to J.; either to the lower city, which was already in the Israelites' hands, or finally, as a trophy, to the city of David when it fell into his hands. The altar too was transferred in Solomon's reign from the tabernacle of Gibeon to the permanent temple. The preparation for this transference was made by David's sacrificing in the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite, where he saw the Angel of Jehovah after the plague, and where he was directed by God to rear an altar (2 Sam. xxiv. 16-25; 1 Chron. xxi, xxii. 1; 2 Chron. iii. 1; Ps. lxxvi. 1, 2, cxxxii. 13-18). Asaph wrote Ps. lxxviii. 67-71 to soothe Ephraim's jealous feeling by showing that the transference of the sanctuary from Shiloh to Zion was God's appointment; henceforth Zion is "the mountain of the Lord's house" (Isa. ii. 2). At the meeting of the valleys Kedron and Hinnom David had his royal gardens, S.E. of the city, watered by Ain Ayub (the well of Joab). Solomon, besides the TEMPLE [see] and PALACE [see], enlarged and strengthened the wall with towers (Jos. Ant. viii. 6, § 1), taking in the outlying suburbs (1 Kings iii. 1; ix. 15, 24). He built also a palace for his Egyptian queen, not in the city of David (in the N. T. this phrase means Bethlehem): 1 Kings vii. 8, ix. 24; 2 Chron. viii. 11. On the hill S.E. of Jerusalem, a southern part of Olivet, he built shrines for his foreign wives' idols; it is hence called "the mount of offence," 1 Kings xi. 7; 2 Kings xxiii. 13, "the mount of corruption." Josephus (Ant. viii. 7, § 4) praises the roads which Solomon paved with black stone, probably the durable basalt from Argob. "Solomon made silver in J. (common) as stones, and cedars as sycamore trees" (1 Kings x. 27; 2 Chron. ix. 27; Eccles. ii. 9).

At the disruption under Rehoboam the priests, Levites, and better disposed of the people flocked from the northern kingdom to Judah and J. which the king fortified (2 Chron. xi. 5-17). But fortifications avail nothing without God's favour. He and his people forfeited this by idolatries (1 Kings xiv. 22-28, 2 Chron. xii). So Shishak, Rehoboam's ally, came up against J. Rehoboam at once surrendered all the treasures of Jehovah's house, and of the palace, including Solomon's 300 golden shields (three pounds in each) in the house of the forest of Lebanon (1 Kings x. 17), for which Rehoboam substituted brazen shields. Asa, after overthrowing the Ethiopian Zerah who thought to spoil J. as Shishak did, brought in the sacred offerings which his father Abijah had dedicated from the war with Rehoboam (2 Chron. xiii. 16-20), and which he himself had dedicated from the Ethiopian spoil into the house of the Lord, silver, gold, and vessels (1 Kings xv. 15; 2 Chron. xiv. 12, 13). So he replaced the vessels taken by Shishak. Asa also rebuilt Jehovah's altar before the porch (xv. 8). Jeho-shaphat, Asa's son, probably added "the new court" to the temple (xx. 5).

The fourth siege of J. was in the reign of Jehoram, Jehoshaphat's son. In punishment for his walking in the Israelite Ahab's idolatries instead of the ways of his father, and for his slaying his brothers, Jehovah smote him with a great stroke, stirring up the spirit of the Philistines and the Arabians near the Ethiopians to break into Judah, slay all his sons except the youngest (in retributive justice both to himself and his sons: 2 Chron. xxi. 4, 10-20; xxii. 1; xxiv. 7), and carry away all the substance in the king's house, and his wives; he himself also died of sore disease by Jehovah's visitation, and was excluded from "the sepulchres of the kings," though buried in the city of David. Keil denies the certainty of J. having been taken this time, as "Judah" does not necessarily include J. which is generally distinctly mentioned; "the king's house" is not necessarily the palace, what may be meant is all whatever substance of the king's house (family) was found. But it is hard to see how they could carry away his sons and wives without taking the capital. Next JOASH [see, and JEREMIAH] in his 23rd year of reign (2 Kings xii

6-16, 2 Chron. xxiv. 4-14) repaired the temple after its being injured by the Baal worshippers of Athaliah's reign. Joash apostatized at Jehoiada's death. Then Hazael (by God's appointment) set his face to go up to J., and Joash bought him off only at the sacrifice of all the treasures in the temple and palace. Two of his servants slew him. Like Jehoram he was excluded from the royal sepulchres, whereas Jehoiada, his subject, was honoured with burial there.

AMAZIAH [see], intoxicated with his success against Edom whose idols, in spite of a prophet's warning, he adopted, challenged Joash of Israel. The latter conquered at Bethshemesh at the opening of the hills 12 miles W. of J. Taking Amaziah prisoner he brought him to J. and there brake down the wall from the Ephraim or Benjamin gate to the corner gate (N.W. of the city) 400 cubits (the first time the walls were injured, probably at the N.W. corner), and took all the silver and gold and vessels in God's house under charge of the Obed Edom family, and the treasures of the palace, and hostages. Josephus (ix. 9, § 9) says that he compelled the inhabitants to open the gates by threatening to kill Amaziah otherwise.

UZAZIAH repaired the walls, building towers at the corner gate (the N.W. corner of the city: 2 Chron. xxvi. 9, Neh. iii. 19-24), at the turning of the wall (E. of Zion, so that the tower at this turning defended both Zion and the temple from attacks from the S.E. valley), and at the valley gate (on the W. of the city, where now is the Jaffa gate) opening to Hinnom. Also he made engines to be on the towers and bulwarks, to shoot arrows and great stones with. The great earthquake in his reign (Amos i. 1) was a physical premonition of the social revolutions about to visit the guilty nation as a judgment from God (Matt. xxiv. 7, 8). Jotham "built the high gate of the house of the Lord" connecting the palace and the temple (2 Chron. xxxiii. 20, xxxiv. 3); and built much at the wall of Ophel, the S. slope of Moriah, the wall that connected Zion with the temple mount.

Under Ahaz J. was besieged by Rezin of Syria and Pekah of Israel (2 Kings xvi. 5, 6). Josephus (Ant. ix. 12, § 1) says it withstood them "for a long time," doubtless owing to the fortifications of the two previous kings. Rezin during it made an expedition to Elath, which he transferred from the Jews to Edom. On his return, finding J. still not taken, he ravaged Judah, and leaving Pekah at J. he carried a number of captives to Damascus. Ahaz then ventured to meet Pekah in open battle and was utterly defeated, losing 120,000 slain, besides numerous captives, all of whom however by the prophet Oded's counsel were sent back. J. was uninjured. [See AHAS as to his mutilation of the temple, in vassalage to Tiglath Pileser.]

ZEZEKIAH "in the first year of his reign" "suddenly," i.e. with a promptness that took men by surprise, restored all that his father had desecrated (2 Chron. xxix. 3, 36).

[See HEZEKIAH on this and Sennacherib's invasion.] Hezekiah stopped the outflow of the source of the Kedron N.E. of the city, to which nachal is applied as distinguished from the Hinnom valley S. and W., which is called ge, and brought it within, underground, to the W. side of the city of David, which must therefore have been on the E. (2 Kings xx. 20; 2 Chron. xxxii. 4, 30; Isa. xxii. 9-11), i.e., to the valley Tyropæon between the E. and W. divisions of the city, where traces of the channel still exist. He made strong or fortified the Millo [see] (the article marks it as a well known place), probably a large tower at one particular part of the wall (Jud. ix. 6, 46, 49, where Millo is interchanged with Migdol "a tower"). The name, which means "the filling," originated probably in the fact that this castle filled or completed the fortification of the city of David. It was situated (1 Chron. xi. 8) at the N.W. corner of the wall, on the slope of the Tyro-peon valley, where Zion had least height and therefore needed most strengthening (1 Kings xi. 27). Manasseh on his restoration from Babylon built a fresh wall outside the city of David on the W. side of Gihon in the valley, even to the entering in at the fish gate (2 Chron. xxxiii. 14), and continued Jotham's works enclosing Ophel, and raising the fortress up to a very great height. [See JOSIAH on the renovation of the temple in his reign.] "The second (or lower) part" of the city, ha-Mishneh, "the college," is mentioned as Huldah's place of residence (2 Chron. xxxiv. 22, 2 Kings xxii. 14). The fish gate on the N. resounds with cries at the foe's approach (in the prophecy of Zeph. i. 10) first; then the second or lower part of the city, Ara; then the hills Zion and Moriah last.

Josiah's successor JEHOIAHAZ [see] gave place to JEHOIAKIM [see]. Nebuchadnezzar, after defeating Pharaoh Necho at Carchemish, marched to J., carried off the temple vessels, and fettered Jehoiakim as Necho's tributary, intending to take him to Babylon; but afterwards for his ally Josiah's sake, Jehoiakim's father, restored him as a vassal (2 Chron. xxxvi. 6, 7). Three years after Jehoiakim rebelled, and Nebuchadnezzar sent Chaldean, Syrian, Moabite, and Ammonite "bands" to chastise him (2 Kings xxiv. 2). Nebuchadnezzar in person came up against JEHOIACHIN [see], who surrendered in the third month of his reign, wishing to spare the city the horrors of a lengthened siege when he saw resistance would be unavailing (2 Kings xxiv. 10-13; Josephus, B. J., vi. 2). Nebuchadnezzar carried away all the temple and palace treasures, and some of Solomon's gold vessels heretofore still left, which he cut in pieces, leaving only a few (Jer. xxvii. 19); also the princes, men of wealth, and skilled artisans, in all 10,000, leaving only the poorest behind. Zedekiah he made king under an oath of allegiance by God (2 Chron. xxxvi. 13, Ezek. xvii. 13-18). In violation of this oath Zedekiah, relying on Pharaoh Hophra, revolted. Nebuchadnezzar then began the siege of J., surrounding it with troops, in Zedekiah's ninth year, tenth day of the tenth month. From forts erected on lofty mounds around he hurled missiles into the city, and battered the walls and houses and gates with rams (Jer. xxxii. 24, xxxiii. 4, lii. 4, 6; Ezek. xxi. 22). On Pharaoh Hophra's approach the siege was for a brief space intermitted (Jer. xxxvii. 5-11); but the Chaldeans returned and took J. after the inhabitants had suffered much by famine and pestilence (Jer. xxxii. 24, 2 Kings xxv. 3, Lam. v. 10) in Zedekiah's 11th year, on the ninth day of the fourth month, a year and a half from the beginning of the siege. Nebuchadnezzar was meanwhile at Riblah, watching the siege of Tyre. The breach in the walls of J. was made at midnight, and the Jews knew nothing till the Chaldean generals took their seats (Jer. xxxix. 3) "in the middle gate" (between Zion the citadel and the lower city on the N.), or as the Jewish historian says, "in the middle court of the temple" (Josephus, Ant. x. 8, § 2). Zedekiah stole out by a gate on the S. side, and by the royal gardens fled across Kedron and Olivet, but was overtaken in the Jericho plains, and brought for judgment to Riblah. On the seventh day of the next (the fifth) month Nebuzaradan, the commander of the king's body guard, arrived, and after collecting the captives and booty, on the tenth day he burnt the temple, palace, and chief buildings, and threw down the walls (Jer. li. 12-14), so that they soon became "heaps of rubbish" (Neh. iv. 2). The Assyrian regular custom was for the generals to sit in council at the gate, the usual place of public assembly, at the close of a siege. The Imperial Bible Dict. supposes Zion's superior strength caused the month's delay between the princes sitting in the gate on the ninth day of the fourth month and the final desolation on the seventh day of the fifth month; but the account above is more probable. The king's orders had to be first obtained from Riblah before the final destruction took place under Nebuzaradan, who carried out Nebuchadnezzar's instructions. Meantime the horrors described in Lam. ii. 4, v. 11, 12, slaughter of old and young, and violation of women, took place in the upper city, Zion, as well as the lower. "In the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion He poured out His fury like fire. They ravished the women in Zion, and the maids in the city of Judah. Princes are hanged up by their hand," etc.

[On the numbers carried away, and who returned, Gedaliah's murder, and the rebuilding of the temple, etc., see CAPTIVITY, GEDALIAH, CYRUS, EZRA, HAGGAI, NEHEMIAH.] 42,360 returned with Zerubbabel's caravan (Ezra ii. 64), carrying back the old temple vessels besides other treasures (v. 14, vi. 5). On the first day of the seventh month Joshua the highpriest and Zerubbabel set up the altar and kept the feast of tabernacles (iii. 1-6). In the second year the temple foundation was laid, amid tears of the old men and the trumpets' notes sounded by the priests and cymbal music of the Levites. The work, after many interruptions by Samaritan enemies influencing ARTAXERXES [see] or Pseudo-Smerdis, (they failed apparently with Abaserus, Cyrus' successor), then by Tattai governor W. of the river, was finally completed on the third day of the last month, Adar, in the sixth year of Darius, by the Jews encouraged through the prophesying of Haggai (i. 4-9) and Zechariah. (Ezra iv., v., vi. 14, 15, etc.) Ps. cxxxvii. gives us a glimpse of the yearnings after J. of the captives in Babylon. The Jews still commemorate the chief events of this period by fasts: Nebuchadnezzar's investment of J. the 10th of Tebeth (Jan. 5); Nebuzaradan's destruction of the temple, also Titus', 10th of Ab (July 29); Gedaliah's murder, 3rd Tisri (Sept. 19); Ezekiel and the captives at Babylon hearing the news of the temple's destruction, 9th Tebeth; the Chaldees entering the city, also Titus' making a breach in Antonia, 17th Tammuz (July 8). The new temple was 60 cubits lower than Solomon's (Josephus Ant. xv. 11, § 1). After 58 years' interval Ezra (457 B.C.; chaps. vii., viii.) led a second caravan of priests, Levites, Nethinims, and laymen, 1777 in all, with valuable offerings of the Persian king, and of the Jews still remaining in Babylon; he corrected several irregularities, especially the alliance with and retention of foreign wives, which had caused such sin and sorrow to the nation formerly.

Eleven years afterwards Nehemiah arrived (445 B.C.), and gave the finishing stroke to the national organization by rebuilding and dedicating the wall (enclosing J. as well as Zion), notwithstanding the mockings and threats of the Hasmonean Sanhallat, the ruler of the Samaritans, and Tobiah the Ammonite. Ezra cooperated with him (Neh. viii.) by reading publicly the law at a national assembly on the first of the seventh month, the anniversary of the first return of Zerubbabel's caravan; then followed the grand and formal observance of the feast of tabernacles with a fulness of detail such as had not been since Joshua's days, for the earlier observance in Ezra iii. 1, 4 was only with burnt offerings, etc. [See NEHEMIAH on his abolition of usury, and attention to the genealogies, so important to the Jews.]

According to Neh. xiii. 4-9, 28, "one of the sons (probably meaning grandson or descendant; Manasseh according to Josephus, Ant. xi. 7, § 2) of Joiada," Elishib's (whose un-Jewish conduct Nehemiah corrected) son, married the daughter of Sanballat. Manasseh became the first priest of the Samaritan temple on Gerizim.

Joiada's son Jonathan (Neh. xiii. 11) or Johanan murdered his brother Joshua in the temple, through rivalry for the highpriesthood. Bagoas, the Persian general, thereupon entered the sanctuary itself, saying he was less unclean than the body of the murdered man, and imposed a tribute of 50 darics for every daily lamb sacrificed for seven years.

[See ALEXANDER THE GREAT and JADUBA on their interview at Sapha: Mizpeh, Seopus, or the Nob of Isaiah, the high ridge N. of the city, crossed by the northern road, whence the first view, a full one, of both the temple and city is obtained.] In 320 B.C. J. fell into Ptolemy Soter's hands because the Jews would not fight on the sabbath. Many Jews were transported to Egypt and N. Africa (Josephus, Ant. xii. 1, Apion i. 22).

Simon the Just, a leading hero with the Jews, succeeded his father Onias in the highpriesthood (300 B.C.). He repaired the sanctuary, added deep foundations to gain a larger surface (Ecclus. i. 1-4), coated the great sea or cistern in the court with brass, and fortified the city walls.

Ptolemy Philadelphus caused the LXX. Gr. transl. of O. T. to be made at Alexandria (285 B.C.), and for the purpose sent Aristas to J. in Eleazar's highpriesthood, and bestowed rich gifts on the temple (Josephus, Ant. xii. 2, § 5-10, 15). J. became a prey subsequently to rival parties, at one time taken by Antiochus the Great (203 B.C.), then retaken by Scopas the Alexandrian general, who garrisoned the citadel, then again delivered by the Jews to Antiochus, who rewarded them by presents for the temple, which he decreed should be inviolable, and by remitting taxes.

Antiochus Epiphanes [see ANTICHRIST], the subject of Daniel's prophecy (Dan. viii. xi.), sold the highpriesthood whilst Onias III. was alive to the highpriest's brother Joshua. The latter, under the Græcised name Jason, introduced at J. Greek dress, sports, and gymnasia where young men were trained naked (1 Macc. i.; 2 Macc. iv., v.), and endeavoured to "become uncircumcised," obliterating the Jews' distinctive mark. Onias assuming the Gr. name Menelaus in his turn bought the highpriesthood from Antiochus with the consecrated plate of the temple, and drove away Jason, who however again returned but soon retreated and perished beyond Jordan. Antiochus came to J., slew Ptolemy's adherents, and, guided by Menelaus into the sanctuary, carried off the golden altar, candlestick, and table of shewbread, vessels, utensils, and 1800 talents, also numerous captives. Resolving to exterminate the Jews utterly, in two years he sent Apollonius to carry out his purpose. On the sabbath when the Jews were at their devotions an indiscriminate slaughter took place, the city was spoiled and burnt, and the walls demolished. Seizing on Zion, the city of David "on an eminence in the lower city," i.e. in the eastern hill, not the western hill or upper city (Josephus, Ant. xii. 9, § 3; 5, § 4), "adjoining the northern wall of the temple, and so high as to overlook it," the enemy fortified it with a turreted wall, securing their booty, cattle and women prisoners. Antiochus decreed heathen worship throughout his kingdom, and sent Athenæus to J. to enforce it. The temple was reconsecrated to Jupiter Olympius (2 Macc. vi.). Heathen riot, revelling, and dalliance with harlots took place within the sacred precincts. The altar was filled with profane things, sabbath keeping was forbidden, the Jewish religion proscribed. The Jews on the king's birthday were forced monthly to eat of idol sacrifices, and to go in procession carrying ivy on Bacchus' feast. Pigs' flesh was offered to Zeus on an altar set on Jehovah's brazen altar, and the broth sprinkled about the temple (Josephus, Ant. xii. xiii.). Many heroically resisted; so, amidst torments and bitter persecutions, the ancient spirit of the theocracy revived (Heb. xi. 34-38). See for their terrible and heroic sufferings for their faith 2 Macc. vi. 10-31, vii. Judas Maccabeus then gathered 6000 faithful Jews (viii.), and praying God to look upon the downtrodden people, the profaned temple, the slaughter of harmless infants, and blasphemies against His name, he could not be withstood by the enemy. With 10,000 he defeated Lysias with 60,000 choice footmen and 5000 horsemen at Bethsura, in Idumea. Judas' prayer (1 Macc. iv.) before the battle breathes the true spirit of faith: "Blessed art Thou, O Saviour of Israel, who didst quell the violence of the mighty man by the hand of Thy servant David, and gavest the host of strangers into the hand of Jonathan the son of Saul and his armour bearer: shut up this army in the hand of Thy people Israel, . . . and let all those that know Thy name praise Thee with thanksgiving." On the third anniversary of the desecration, the 25th of Chisleu, 165 B.C., he dedicated the temple with an eight days' feast (alluded to in John x. 22, and apparently observed by our Lord though of human ordinance). Then he strengthened the temple's outer wall. On Eleazar's brother's death in battle, Judas retired to J. and endured a severe siege, which ended in Lysias advising Antiochus (son of Epiphanes) to grant the Jews their own laws, their liberty, and their fortress. Judas subsequently defeated Nicænor, general of the usurper Demetrius, whence the gate E. of the great court was named Nicænor. Judas died (161 B.C.) in battle with Bacchides, Nicænor's successor, and all Israel mourned for him; "how is the valiant man fallen that delivered Israel?" (1 Mace. ix.)

Jonathan and Simon, Judas' brothers, succeeded to the command of Israel, and rebuilt the walls as a solid fortification round Zion. Simon succeeded as highpriest and leader at Jonathan's death, and took the lower city, Aera, which had been so long in the foe's hands. He cast down the citadel and lowered the eminence on which it stood, so that the temple overtopped all the other buildings; and he filled up the valleys with earth, in order to make them on a level with the narrow streets of the city, thus the entire depth of the temple foundations did not appear. (Josephus, Ant. xiii. 6, § 7; B. J. v. 5, § 1). Then he built a fort on the N.W. side of the temple hill, so as to command Aera, viz. Baris, where he resided, afterwards the well known Antonia. John Hyrcanus his son succeeded. Antiochus Sidetes, king of Syria, besieged J., and then only a want of water was experienced, which was relieved by a fall of rain. Ultimately the siege ended in terms of peace.

The name Maccabee was first given to Judas, from the initials of the Heb. "Who among the gods is like unto Thee, O Jehovah?" (Exod. xv. 11) or of the sentence, "Mattathias (whose third son was Judas), a priest (of the course of Jearib, the first of the 24 courses, but not highpriest), son of Johanan"; or from makabab "a hammer," as Charles Martel (hammer or mallet) is named from his prowess. "Asmoneans" is the proper family designation, from Hasmon, the great grandfather of Mattathias.

Aristobulus, Hyrcanus' son, succeeded as highpriest, and assumed the title "king." Alexander next succeeded. Then his sons Aristobulus and Hyrcanus by their rivalries (in which for the first time the animosities of the sects, the Pharisees and Sadducees, came into prominence) caused the interference of Pompey the Roman general (63 B.C.), who after a siege took the temple by storm, the priests all the time calmly performing regularly their rites, and many being slain while thus engaged. What most astonished the Romans was to find no image or shrine in the holy of holies. Pompey allowed Hyrcanus to remain highpriest without the title "king." He reverently left the treasures and spices in the temple untouched; he merely laid a tribute upon the city, and destroyed the walls. The greedy Crassus two years later (54 B.C.) not only plundered what Pompey had spared, but also what the Jews throughout the world had contributed, viz. 10,000 talents or £2,000,000, and this though the priest in charge had given him a bar of gold on condition of his sparing everything else. Julius Caesar confirmed Hyrcanus in the highpriesthood, and gave him civil power as ethnarch, and made his chief minister Antipater the Idumean, Herod's [see] father, procurator of Judaea. Upon Antipater's assassination Herod and Phasaelus his sons, with Hyrcanus, resisted Antigonus (Aristobulus' son and Hyrcanus' nephew), who with a Parthian army attacked J. Five hundred Parthian horsemen with Antigonus were admitted on pretence of mediating. Phasaelus was killed, Herod escaped. Hyrcanus knelt before the new king his nephew, who then bit off his ears to incapacitate him from being highpriest. Herod ultimately, with the Roman governor of Syria, Sosius, took J. by siege and storm. Antigonus gave himself up from the Baris, which remained untaken, and at last was killed by Antony's command. Herod slew the chiefs of the Asmoneans, and the whole sanhedrin, except the two great founders of the Jewish rival schools, Hillel and Shammai, and finally Hyrcanus, more than 80 years old, the last of the Asmoneans. Still the old spirit of the Maccabees survived. Every attempt Herod made at Greek and Roman innovations upon Jewish religious feeling was followed by outbreaks. This was the case on his building a theatre, with quinquennial games in honour of Caesar, at J., and placing around trophies which the Jews believed to contain figures of men. He enlarged the Baris at the W. end of the N. wall of the temple, built by John Hyrcanus on the foundations of Simon Maccabeus, and named it Antonia after his friend Mark Antony. He occupied the Asmonean palace at the eastern side of the upper city adjoining the end of the bridge joining it to the S. part of the temple. He built a new palace at the N.W. corner of the upper city (where now stands the Latin convent), next the old wall, on his marriage to a priest Simon's daughter. His most magnificent work was to rebuild the temple from its foundations; two years were spent in preparations (beginning 20 or 19 B.C.), one and a half in building the porch, sanctuary, and holy of holies (16 B.C.). But the court and cloisters were not finished until eight years subsequent to the beginning of the work (9 B.C.). The bridge of Herod between the upper city and what had been the royal cloister of Solomon's palace, S.W. of the temple, was now rebuilt, of which part (Robinson's arch, so called from its discoverer) still remains. Nor was the temple considered completed till A.D. 64, under Herod Agrippa II. and the procurator Albinus. So in John ii. 20 the Jews said to our Lord, "forty and six years has this temple been in building" (Gr.), viz. 20 from beginning the work to the era A.D. when Christ was in His fourth year, 27 added brings us to His 30th year when He began His ministry, so the year when the Jews said it would be the 46th or 47th year from the temple work being begun. Herod also built three great towers on the old wall in the N.W. corner near the palace, and a fourth as an outwork; called Hippicus, Phasaelus, Mariamne, and Psephinus. The Jews were indignant at his fixing a golden eagle, the symbol of Roman authority, over the sanctuary, in violation of the second commandment, and two rabbins instigated disciples to pull it down; the rabbins were burnt alive. Herod died some months after Christ's birth. [See ARCHELAUS, on his cruelty in cutting up the clamouring Jews assembled for the passover, and his appointment at Rome as ethnarch of Judaea.]

Judaea was now become a Roman province, the procurator of which resided at Caesarea on the coast, not at J. Coponius first was procurator, accompanied by CYRENIUS [see] or QUIRINIUS, now a second time prefect of Syria, charged with carrying out the assessment (Luke ii. 2, 3) which had already been prepared for in his first tenure of office at Christ's birth. Coponius took possession of the highpriest's state robes, which were to be put after use in a stone chamber under the seal of the priests, in charge of the captain of the guard. Christ's visit to the temple (Luke ii. 42) took place whilst Coponius ruled. Ambivius, Annius Rufus, and Val. Gratus successively held the office, then Pontius Pilate, Joseph Caiaphas being highpriest. Pilate transferred the winter quarters of the Roman army from Caesarea to J. The Jews resented his introduction of the eagles and images of the emperor, and they were withdrawn; also his applying the sacred revenue from redeeming vows (Corban) to an aqueduct bringing water 200 or 400 stadia (Jos. Ant. xviii. 3, § 2; B. J. ii. 9, § 4) into the city. In A.D. 27 our Lord attended the first passover recorded since His childhood (John ii. 13). At the passover A.D. 30 our Lord's crucifixion and resurrection took place.

Pilate was recalled in A.D. 37, and Vitellius, prefect of Syria, let the Jews again keep the highpriest's vestments, and removed Caiaphas, and gave the highpriesthood to Jonathan, Ananias' son. Petronius superseded Vitellius, who brought an imperial order for erecting in the temple Caligula's statue. The Jews protested against this order, and by Agrippa's intercession it was countermanded. Claudius' accession brought an edict of toleration to the Jews. AGRIPPA's [see] first act in taking possession of his kingdom was to visit the temple, and sacrifice, and dedicate the golden chain with which the late emperor had presented him after his release from captivity; it was hung over the treasury. Outside the second wall, which enclosed the northern part of the central valley of the city, lay the Bezetha or new town; this Agrippa enclosed with a new and third wall, which ran from the tower Hippicus at the N.W. corner of the city northward, then by a circuit to the E., then southward till it joined the S. wall of the temple at the W. bank of Kedron valley. In A.D. 45 commenced a famine which lasted two years, and which was alleviated by Helena, queen of Adiabene, a convert to Judaism, who visited J. A.D. 46. Her tomb, three stadia from the city, formed one of the points in the course of the new wall (B. J., v. 4, § 2).

FELIX [see] succeeded Cumanus at the request of the highpriest Jonathan. The Sicarii, whose creed it was to rob and murder all whom they deemed enemies of Judaism, were employed by Felix to assassinate Jonathan for remonstrating with him respecting his wicked life. The murder was committed whilst the highpriest was sacrificing! A riot at Cesarea caused the recall of Felix, A.D. 60. PORCUS FESTUS [see] succeeded, who is described as upright (B. J., ii. 14, § 1). But as time went on "all things grew from worse to worse" (Ant. xx. 9, § 4).

Gessius Florus (A.D. 65) tested the Jews' endurance to the last point, desolating whole cities and openly allowing robbers to buy impunity in crime. He tried to get the treasure from the temple, but after plundering the upper city failed. Young Eleazar, son of Ananias, led a party which withheld the regular offerings from the Roman emperor, virtually renouncing allegiance. So the last Roman war began, in spite of the remonstrances of the peace party, who took possession of the upper city. The insurgents from the temple and lower city, reinforced by the Sicarii, drove them out, and set on fire the Asmonean palace, the highpriest's house, and the archives repository, "the nerves of the city" (B. J., ii. 17, § 6); next they slew the Roman garrison, and burnt Antonia; then they murdered treacherously the soldiers in the three great towers who had been forced out of Herod's palace after a resistance of three weeks. Next the highpriest and his brother were found in the aqueduct and slain.

Cestius Gallus marched from Scopus on the city through the Bezetha, but was obliged to retire from the N. wall of the temple, E. of and behind Antonia, back to Scopus, where he was utterly defeated in November, A.D. 66. C. Gallus' first advance and retreat gave the Christians the opportunity of fleeing as Christ counselled them, "when ye see J. compassed with armies, then let them which are in Judæa flee to the mountains" (Matt. xxiv. 16). Vespasian, till the the temple and Antonia, 8400 men; the other under Simon Barjoras, in the tower Phasaelus, holding the upper city, from the Cemaculum to the Latin convent, the lower city in the valley, and the Acra N. of the temple, 10,000 men and 5000 Idumeans. Strangers and pilgrims swelled the number to 600,000 (Tacitus). Josephus says a million perished in the siege, and 40,000 were allowed to depart into the country, besides an immense number sold to the army, part of the "97,000 carried captive during the whole war" (B. J., vi. 9, § 3). This number is thought an exaggeration.

Our Lord's prophecy (Luke xix. 41-44) was literally fulfilled: "thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round, and keep thee in on every side." Out of 27 sieges this was the only one in which J. was surrounded by a wall. Titus, with 30,000 men, including four legions and auxiliaries (the 12th and 15th on Scopus far to the N., the 5th a little behind, and the 10th on Olivet), forced an entrance through the first wall by the battering ram called "the conqueror," then through the second. Then, withdrawing the 10th from Olivet, he gave the Jews time for offering terms of peace, but in vain. Next he attacked the temple at Antonia and the city near the monument of John Hyrcanus simultaneously; but John undermined and fired at one point the Roman banks made for their batteries (catapults, ballistæ, and rams), and Simon assailed and fired the rams at the other point. Titus then resolved to surround the whole city with a wall, to prevent intercourse with the country on the S. and W. sides. The wall was completed in three days. Then Antonia was taken on June 11. The period of bombarding the temple is named by the Jews "the days of wretchedness." On the 28th of June the daily "sacrifice" (Dan. ix. 27) ceased "from want of an officiating priest, and Titus again in vain invited to a surrender. On July 15th a soldier, contrary to Titus' intention, fired the temple, and all Titus' efforts to stop the fire were unavailing, the very same month and day that Nebuchadnezzar burnt the first temple, God marking the judgment plainly as from Him. Titus himself recognised this: "we fought with God on our side, it is God who pulled the Jews out of these strongholds, for what could the hands of men or machines have availed against these towers?" The infatuation and divisions of the Jews "shortened those days" in order that "the elect," the seed of future Israel, "might be saved" (Matt. xxiv. 22). On September 11th at last the Romans gained the upper city; even still John and Simon might have made terms, had they held the three great towers which were deemed impregnable; but they fled, and were taken to grace the Roman conqueror's triumph at Rome. The city and temple were wholly burnt and destroyed, excepting the W. wall of the upper city and Herod's three great towers, which were left as memorials of the strength of the defences. The old and weak were killed, the children under 17 sold as slaves, the rest were sent to the Egyptian mines, the amphitheatres, and Rome, where they formed part of Titus' triumphal train. The 10th legion under Terentius Rufus "so thoroughly levelled and dug up, that no one visiting J. would believe it had ever been inhabited" (Josephus B. J. vii. 1, § 1), fulfilling Christ's words, "they shall lay thee even with the ground and thy children within thee; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another, because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation" (in mercy).

The Jews revolted again under Barchochab (son of a star) who pretended to be the Messiah prophesied of by Balaam (Num. xxiv. 17), "there shall come a star out of Jacob," when the emperor Hadrian tried to colonize J. with his veterans, and so for ever to prevent its becoming a rallying point to the nation. R. Akiba was his armour bearer. Having been crowned at Bethar he gained possession of J., of which his coins with the legend "to the freedom of J." and "J. the holy" bear evidence. After two years' war he was slain, and Hadrian completed the fulfilment of Christ's words by razing the ruins still left and drawing a plough over the temple foundations. The new Roman J. was called Ælia (from his own name) Capitolina (from the temple to Jupiter Capitolinus reared on the temple site). A donkey driver in our days picked up the head of Hadrian's statue not far from the Damascus gate. The head bears a crown of laurels, the two branches of which are attached to a medallion, on which is engraven in cameo an eagle, the symbol of imperial power. Jews were forbidden to enter the city on pain of death. In the fourth century they got leave to enter it in order to wait on the anniversary of its capture; their place of wailing being then as now by the W. wall of the temple, where the Jews every Friday at three o'clock, the time of the evening sacrifice, wail over their desecrated temple. Christian pilgrimage to the holy places in the same century became common. The empress Helena, Constantine's mother, in A.D. 326 built a grand church on Olivet.

Constantine founded an oratory on the site of Astarte's shrine, which occupied the alleged scene of the resurrection. The martyrium on the alleged site of finding the cross was erected E. of the oratory or church of the resurrection.

In the apostate Julian's reign the Jews at his instigation attempted with great enthusiasm to rebuild the temple; but a whirlwind and earthquake shattered the stones of the former foundation, and a fire from the temple mount consumed their tools.

Annaianus Marcellinus (xxiii. 1), the emperor's friend, attests the fact. Providence baffled Julian's attempt to falsify Christ's words.

The Persian Chosroes II. took J. by storm A.D. 614, slew thousands of monks and clergy, destroyed the churches, including that of the holy sepulchre, and carried away the so called wood of the true cross, which in 628 was restored.

Caliph Omar (637) took the city from the patriarch Sophronius, who said, "Verily, this is the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing in the holy place." Christians were allowed liberty of worship, but forbidden to erect more churches. The proper mosque of Omar still exists in the S.E. corner of the mosque el Aksa, and has been always a place of Moslem pilgrimage. The crusaders took J. in A.D. 1099, July 15th, and it remained in Christian possession 88 years. Saladin retook it in 1187. In a dismantled state it was ceded to the Christians by the treaty with the emperor Frederick II., in 1219, and has ever since remained in the Mahometans' hands. From the first siege by the children of Judah (Jud. i. 8), 1400 B.C., to A.D. 1244 J. underwent 27 sieges, the last being by the Kharezmian hordes who slaughtered the priests and monks. There was the city before David, the second that of Solomon 1000 to 597 B.C., the third city that of Nehemiah which lasted for 300 years. A Grecised city under Herod (the fourth city) succeeded. This city, destroyed by Titus A.D. 70, was followed by a Roman city, the fifth, which lasted till the Mahometan time, the sixth city. Then followed the Christian city of Godfrey and the Baldwin, the seventh; lastly the eighth, the modern city of 600 years of Moslem rule. The Ottoman Sulaiman in 1542 built the present walls. After a brief possession by the Pasha of Egypt from 1832 to 1840, J. was restored to the Sultan of Turkey, in whose hands it continues.

Sites.—J. Fergusson thinks the Moslem "Dome of the Rock" to be Constantine's church over the rock which contained Christ's tomb. The so called Church of the Sepulchre shows by its architect that its date of erection was after the crusades. But the Dome of the Rock in architecture is evidently long before them, and has in its centre a rock, sakhrah, with one cave in it as Eusebius describes, and is near buildings undoubtedly of Constantine's time. The present Church of the Sepulchre has never had a rock in it, but merely a small tabernacle of marble. The Dome of the Rock is an eight sided building, each side being 67 ft. long, ornamented by seven windows on each side. The interior has two cloisters separated by an octagonal course of piers and columns; within this again another circle of four great piers and twelve Corinthian columns supporting the great dome. This stands immediately over the sacred rock, which rises 4 ft. 9½ in. above the marble pavement. Beneath is a cave entered by a flight of steps at the S.E. The cave is 24 ft. by 24, but the side at the entrance not square: 6 ft. high on the average. The floor is marble, with a slab in the centre covering "the well of the spirits" as the Mahometans call it. The slab is never lifted, and is believed to be the gate of paradise. The roof is pierced by a round hole. The Dome is not arch supported the propylaea and led from the valley into the royal cloisters of Solomon's palace, which was S.W. of the temple. Josephus does not exaggerate when he speaks of the giddy height of this southern cloister above the valley below. At the depth of 60 feet Warren found in situ large stones forming the foundation of the wall of enclosure, bearing Phœnician marks. At the same angle of the Haram area were pieces of pottery with the Phœnician character, denoting they were made for royal use, probably accumulations from the royal services of Solomon's palace, which abutted there. The only remaining arch of importance, Wilson's arch, farther up on the W. wall of the Haram area, must have been the bridge crossing the valley to the temple. The rock levels, which are highest in the northern half of the Haram area, and the excavated walls, confirm the old tradition that the Kubbet es Sakhrat, or rock under the dome, was the altar of Araunah's threshing floor and marks the site of Solomon's temple, and that the latter was not, as Fergusson thinks, at the S.W. angle of the Haram.

The second wall began near Phasaelus tower at the gate of Genath, crossed Tyropœon (about where the Damascus gate now is), enclosing the lower city in that valley, then turning S. to Antonia. Bevelled old stone work found near the Damascus gate shows that there the second wall coincided with the modern wall. The N. part too of the W. wall of the Haram rests probably on the foundations of the second wall.

Herod Agrippa, A.D. 42, built the third wall, enclosing the northern suburbs and Bezetha (N. of Aera), and Aera (N. of Antonia and the temple). It began at Hippicus, thence it passed to the tower Psephinus N. of the city; thence it extended opposite Queen Helena's tomb, of Adiabene, then opposite the tombs of the kings; then it turned from the point close to the fuller's monument, at the tower of the corner, and "it joined the old wall at the valley of Kedron" (Josephus, B. J. v. 4, § 2). Josephus makes the city's circumference 33 stadia, almost four miles, which accords with the sites given above.

Antonia was a tower at the N.W. angle of the temple, and with its enclosing wall was at least two stadia in circumference (B. J. v. 2, § 8), the temple with Antonia being six, the temple by itself four, a stadium each side, leaving two for Antonia; it may have been more, as the fourth side coinciding with the W. part of the N. wall of the temple is perhaps not counted by Josephus in the six of the temple and Antonia together.

strictly a mosque; the proper mosque of the whole enclosure, called the Masjid, is the El Aksa at the S.W. angle. The Stoa Basilica or royal porch of Herod's temple occupied the whole S. side, overhanging the valley (see Josephus Ant. xv. 16, § 5). Herod added the S.W. of the Haram area to the S. cloister of the temple. The arch of a bridge (joining originally the royal cloister to the upper city) commencing 40 ft. from the S.W. angle, coinciding with the centre of the stoa, remains in part, and is known as Robinson's arch, its pier or spring still being in situ. One of the gateways mentioned by Josephus (B. J. vi. 6, § 2) as leading from the temple has been found. Warren's excavations prove that Robinson's

The Aera in Gr. corresponds to Heb. metzudah, "a fortress," and is used by Josephus (Ant. xii., xiii.) in mentioning the fortress adjoining the N. side of the temple. On the other hand the "upper market place," called by David "the citadel" (B. J. v. 4, §1), answers to the modern S.W. hill, Zion. But Aera was on the N.W. of the temple hill. It is the stronghold of Zion, originally occupied by David (2 Sam. v. 7-9). A transverse valley ran from Tyropoeon to the right at the foot of Aera, separating it from Bezetha, and from a fourth hill, and almost corresponding to the Via Dolorosa; it was filled up by the Asmoneans. The Aera, or citadel, though said by Josephus to be in "the lower city," yet originally commanded by its superior height the temple lying close to it on the same hill; for Josephus says, "the other hill, called Aera, sustains the lower city, and is of the shape of the moon when horned," i.e., curving round from the E. or temple hill to the N. of the western hill. This whole eastern division was the lower city, in comparison to the western division which was higher and was the upper city."

The Haram esh Sherif (the noble sanctuary) is enclosed by a massive wall rising 50 feet above the surface. The faces of the stones in various places are dressed with a marginal draft, i.e., the central portion of stone projects from a marginal cutting of 2 in. to 4 in., the projecting face being left rough in the oldest portions. It is called the Jewish bevel, but is seen also in Cyrus' tomb at Pasargadae. The S. wall, overlooking the southern tongue of Moriah called Ophel, has three gates: the Single gateway, now closed up, most modern; the Triple gate, three circular arches built up, the opening to a subterranean avenue up to the platform; the Double gateway or Huldah, where the modern city wall abuts upon the Haram wall; the central pier and E. and W. jambs are marginal drafted stones; within is a subterranean passage up to the Haram area, with a monolith 21 ft. high and 1 1/2 diameter. At 40 ft. N. of the S.W. angle is the projecting part of the famous "Robinson's arch" (above an older arch), the span of which Major Wilson estimated at 45 ft.; and the pier is 51 ft. 6 in. long and 12 ft. 2 in. thick. Higher up is the waiting place. Robinson's arch has the same draft and chisel marks as the wall at the S.W. angle. There were four gates to the temple in the W. wall of the Haram area: viz. Wilson's arch, above a second; Barclay's gateway, or the gate of the Prophet, 270 ft. N. of the S.W. angle; and Robinson's arch; the fourth Captain Warren believes he has ascertained to have been N. of Wilson's arch, at a piercing of the Haram wall, 20 ft. S. of Bab el Mathara. This again will indicate that Fergusson's location of the temple S. of Wilson's arch must be erroneous. Under Wilson's arch is a cistern low down, and a shaft sunk along the wall, the stones 4 ft. high being in their original position, and probably the oldest existing portions of the sanctuary's enclosing wall. Running water was found, and observations prove that a fountain to this day is running beneath the city. An aqueduct in the rock is older than the wall, and the wall crosses the Tyropoeon valley. The Jews' tradition is that when flowing water has been found three times under the city Messiah is at hand; Warren's discovery was the third. He thinks Herod, in reconstructing the temple, took in the palace of Solomon, and built the present S.W. angle of the sanctuary; for the course of great stones running continuously from the E. angle to the Double gate comes there suddenly to an end, therefore the wall to this point was built before the continuation to the W. All the stones in the S. wall are in situ, and have the marginal draft. The rock 60 ft. below the surface at the S.W. angle slopes down till it reaches 90 ft. below the surface. It rises rapidly eastward along the S. wall, is 30 ft. below the surface at the Double gate, level with it at the Triple gate. Therefore the temple could not have been here (as Fergusson thinks), for it would not have looked down on a deep valley, but on a rock sloping one in three. Solomon's palace probably stretched eastward along the S. wall from the Double gate, and Herod built the S.W. angle, which accounts for the absence of the course of great stones W. of the Double gate. The heaviest stone in the wall (100 tons weight) is in the S.E. angle, the longest (38 ft. 9 in.) at the S.W. angle. The S.W. angle is built over a circular aqueduct below, and is therefore later than it. Moreover, S. of Barclay's gate on the W. wall there are stones at a higher level with faces rough. From it northwards the drafted stones have their faces finely worked. Also the stones of the S. wall near the W. angle are rough up to a certain pavement, the date of which is probably about that of Herod. Lastly, the W. wall here is not built on the E. hut on the W. slope of the Tyropoeon valley, probably at a time when rubbish had choked up the valley so that it was here partially covered in (Captain Warren); for all these reasons the S.W. angle must be later than the rest of the S. wall, and is probably Herod's work; therefore the temple was not where Fergusson puts it at the S.W. angle. At the Triple gateway a passage runs up to the platform by an inclined plane. Fergusson places the E. wall of Herod's temple here, and makes this wall to be the W. wall of the passage. Capt. Warren's examination disproves this, it has no appearance of being the outer wall of the temple. A secret causeway was found by Warren connecting the temple area and the citadel, large enough to march an army through. The rock to the N. of the platform is made level with it, but slopes thence with a dip of 60 ft. in 400 down to the Triple gate. At the N.E. angle Phoenician marks are on the turret courses of stones. A valley ran right across by the N. corner. The Birket Israel there was built for a pool. The platform in the middle is not built, but is of rock scarped in the N. From the platform of the Sakhrab to the S.W. angle there is a dip of 140 ft. in the rock, to the S.E. angle 160 ft., to the N.E. angle 110 ft. Fergusson's site of the altar would need 50 ft. deep to be filled up to get the altar level, while Araunah's threshing floor was on a slope of one in six. Solomon's temple would never be built upon a slope as steep as Gibraltar rock to the W., or anywhere but on the ridge flattened near the top. Threshing floors are on the highest ridges, to catch every breeze. If on the ridge the temple could not be at the S.W. of the Haram, or N.E., or N.W. (for there too is a small valley 30 ft. depressed under the N. side of the platform), or S.E. The altar must be at the dome of the rock, the same rock having been part of the Chel through which the gate Nitzotz led underground to the gate Tadi. Solomon's temple was a rectangle, 900 ft. from E. to W., 600 from N. to S. Wilson's arch is thus Solomon's, also all the portion of the sanctuary on the E. side. The wall at the S.E. and N.E. is as old as any part; this is explained if Solomon's palace stood at the S.E. corner, 300 ft. from N. to S., and 600 from E. to W. In the S.E. corner Solomon's porch was on the wall between Solomon's palace and that continued part which, turning to the W. at the N.E. angle, formed the N. part of the second wall. The Talmud shows that "the stone of foundation," i.e. the solid rock, was the highest point within the mountain of the house, projecting slightly above the floor of the holy of holies. There was a 22 cubits and three fingerbreadths' difference of level between the floor opposite the E. gate and the highest point of the rock projecting from the floor of the holy of holies. A line produced from the Sakhrab through the centre of the house beyond the mount of Olives [see on Scopus, OLIVES, MOUNT OF] would intersect the top of that mount, just as the Talmud represents as to the rock in the holy of holies. Dr. Chaplin attests that one standing on the top of mount Olivet near the minaret may look straight through the little dome (judgment seat of David) and the door of the Dome of the Rock toward the Sakhrab; and vice versa one standing at the E. door of the Sakhrab and looking in a line at right angles to the door will look straight at the top of mount Olivet a few feet S. of the centre of the minaret. From the highest point of rock within the holy of holies the rock sloped down on the W., N., and S. sides, as well as on the E. The summit of the Sakhrah under the great Dome of the Rock is the only spot which accurately answers to these data. The holy house was not in the centre of the modern enclosure (Haram), but nearer to its western than its northern bound, nearer to its northern than its eastern bound, and nearer to its eastern than its southern bound; thus the largest free space was on the S., and the smallest on the W. If the Sakhrah represent the holy of holies, almost all the levels are word.

Area and population.—The space within the old walls is estimated at 180 acres, that of the whole city enclosed within Agrippa's walls 2,250,000 yds. The population at the time Titus advanced against it would, judging from the space, not much exceed 70,000; but Tacitus' statement, 600,000, and Josephus' 1,200,000, must be taken into account, also the crowding of pilgrims in and about the city at the great feasts, and the denser crowding of Eastern centres of population than ours, owing to their living more in the open air.

Ps. xlviii. 1, 2 favours the view that Zion is not the southwestern hill: "the city of our God . . . the mountain of His holiness; beautiful in its elevation (Heb.) . . . is mount Zion, on the sides of the N.," i.e. where the hill sides meet on the N., for Zion citadel was N.W. of the temple site, and commanded it in David's time. The mystic Lucifer's boast (comp. with 2 Thes. n. 4), "I will sit upon the mount of the congregation (God's place of meeting His people) in the sides of the N.," connects the temple with the same site ("the sides of the N.") as that of Zion in Ps. xlviii. Modern Zion on the contrary is the most southern point of the city. If the psalm, as is probable, be an enumeration of the several parts, "Zion" the acropolis stands first; then "the sides of the N.," the temple; then "the city of the great King," the upper city, "J.," which is often distinguished from "Zion" (2 Kings xix. 31, Ps. li. 18, Zech. i. 17, Joel iii. 16). Zion, owing to its greater nearness to the temple hill than to the upper city, is regarded in Scripture as especially holy; perhaps also with allusion to its having been the home of the ark during David's time (Ps. ii. 6, xxxvii. 13). Jer. xxxi. 6: "let us go up to Zion, unto the Lord our God." Joel iii. 17: "I am the Lord your God, dwelling in Zion." Hence we read Ahaz was buried "in the city, even J.," but not "in the sepulchres of the kings," which were in "Zion the city of David" (2 Chron. xxviii. 27). The modern sepulchre of David is in J., not in (or by) the city of David where the Bible says it was. The close connection of Zion and the temple appears in 1 Mace. iv. 37, 60, vii. 33; the rabbins hold the same view.

Neh. iii. and xii. confirm this. The order of places in the dedication of the wall is this: the princes went on the wall at a point over against the temple; half to the right "toward the dung gate" on the S. of the city (Neh. xii. 31, 37); "and at the fountain, which was over against them (N.E. of the dung gate), they went up by the stairs of the city of David, at the going up of the wall, above the house of David, even unto the water gate eastward" (N.E. of the fountain gate); the other half (ver. 38) "from beyond the tower of the furnaces (W. of the city) even unto the broad wall (northwards from the furnaces tower), and from above the gate of Ephraim (northeastward of broad wall), and above the old gate (northeastward), and above the fish gate (due N. of the city), and the tower of Hananeel (N.E. of the city), and the tower of Meah (S.E. of the tower of Hananeel), unto the sheep gate (S.E. of Meah tower); and they stood still in the prison gate" (S.E. of sheep gate and N.E. of the temple area, E. of the city). There the two companies met, and "gave thanks in the house of God."

In Neh. iii. the first 16 verses apply to J., the last 16 to Zion the city of David. The places repaired are enumerated in the reverse order, starting from the sheep gate to the fountain of furnaces (the site of the present tower in the citadel); then the order of the right half company at the dedication, the valley gate, dung gate, fountain gate, "the wall of the Siloah pool (S.E. of the city) by the king's garden, and unto the stairs that go down from the city of David." All these notices will harmonize with mount Zion being connected with, though distinct from, and lying on the N.W. of the temple hill.

Water Supply.—"Hezekiah stopped the upper watercourse of Gihon; [see] and brought it straight down to the W. side of the city of David" (2 Chron. xxxii. 3, 4, 30). Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat. (April, 1872) mentions an aqueduct discovered which leads from near the Damascus gate to the southern at the convent of the Sisters of Zion, N.W. of the Haram area. The pool beyond the tombs of the kings must have been the largest pool near the city, and is admirably situated for collecting the surface drainage of the upper branches of the Kedron valley. This probably supplied by an aqueduct the pool of Bethesda. The "upper pool" and "upper watercourse (water source) of Gihon" is probably the pool N. of the tombs of the kings (2 Kings xviii. 17; Isa. vii. 3, xxxvi. 2). The aqueduct discovered would be the "conduit" in the highway of the fullers' field, by which Rabshakeh stood when speaking to the Jews on the wall. Siloam, where Solomon was anointed, is identified with lower Gihon. The position of the discovered aqueduct accords with the view that the eastern hill was connected with the city of David; Hezekiah, by leading the water W. of it, would bring the water within the city; whereas if Zion were the southwestern hill, the course of the water W. of it would be outside the city. The Tyropæon valley is the valley of Gihon, stretching from the upper Gihon on the N. outside the city to the lower Gihon on the S. outside the city; but see Birch's view below. Warren makes the lower Gihon to be Amygdalon, N.E. of Herod's palace, and near the so called Holy Sepulchre, but within the second wall. Tacitus says the city had "a perennial fountain of water, and subterranean channels hollowed in the rock." A great reservoir or "excavated sea" is yet in existence, under the temple; the "water gate" implies that its overflow passed out by underground channels in that quarter. The steps of the gate ran down with water when caliph Omar was searching for the Sakhrah or holy rock, the supposed stone of Jacob's vision (not that under the Dome of the Rock, but under the Aksa), then covered with filth by the Christians. The so called pool of Bethesda is more rightly "the sheep pool," designed as a water reservoir to receive some of the overflow from the excavated sea, not as a fosse; the stone faced with fine plaster proves this. The reservoirs at Etham, now called "Solomon's pools," also supplied water taken into the city above Siloam. Cisterns too abounded all over the city. The cistern called "Hezekiah's pool," near the so called "church of the Holy Sepulchre," is really a mere receptacle within the walls for the surplus rain water drained into the Birket Manilla.

The Holy Sepulchre.—Defending his views, Fergusson reminds us that Eusebius says: "impious persons, to insult Christians, heaped earth on the rock, and erected an idol temple over it." When the earth was removed, "the rock stood alone on the level, having only one cave in it." "On the spot that witnessed our Saviour's sufferings a new Jerusalem was constructed over against the one so celebrated of old, . . . now in desolation; opposite this city the emperor (Constantine) began to rear a monument of our Saviour's victory over death" (Vita Const. iii. 26, 33). Constantine's two buildings, the Anastasis (now called the mosque of Omar and Dome of the Rock, according to Fergusson a circular church over the tomb of Christ), and the Golden gateway, the propylæa to the basilica, still remain. Fergusson (Smith's Bible Dict.) contends that the architecture of both is that of Constantine's century, the end of the third and beginning of the fourth; the best entablature on the external and internal openings proves it to be later than Hadrian's time, whilst its classical features show it earlier than Justinian, when the incised style came in. The Golden gateway is a festal not a fortified entrance; suited to a sacred or palatial edifice, such as was the basilica described by Eusebius as Constantine's. The Anastasis has the Roman round arch wherever the modern coating of tiles has peeled off. It is a tomb building in style, in form and arrangement resembling that of Constantine at Rome, and that of his daughter Constantia outside the walls. Fergusson thinks no other object can be assigned for such a tomblike building of Constantine over a mass of native rock (the Sakhrab) rising nine feet and occupying the whole central area, and therefore that it is the Anastasis church referred to by Eusebius; and hesays that it cannot be the mosque of Omar, for what he built is the small mosque over the S. wall and E. of Aksa. The essential feature of every mosque, the kiblah or niche pointing to Mecca, is wanting; in its place is the chief entrance, so that the worshipper would in entering have his back to Mecca, an unheard-of profanity to a Moslem.

Jeremiah (xxi. 33-40), mentioning the hill Gareb on the N.W. and Goath N.E. of the city as hereafter to be included in the restored and greatly enlarged city, and "the whole valley of the dead bodies and ashes, and all the fields unto Kedron," implies that tombs existed both in the Tophet and the Kedron valley sides. In Golgotha was a garden with the sepulchre. "The sepulchre was nigh at hand" to the city (John xix. 20, 41, 42). The Antonia was the residence of the governors and the citadel of J., and was probably the praetorium where Christ was judged. The council house was near. From the council and the praetorium Jesus, in being led "without the gate" (Heb. xiii. 12), would meet "Simon . . . passing by as he came out of the country" (Mark xv. 21). GOLGOTHA [see] was close to a thoroughfare where "they that passed by reviled Him" (Matt. xxvii. 39).

The Bordeaux pilgrim (A.D. 333) is the earliest witness as to the site after Constantine. Going out from the Ziou gate on the S. he passed along the walls to his left, and had Pilate's house "on his right in the valley" (as some traditions placed it) and Golgotha and the sepulchre to his left. This suits Fergusson's view.

So also Antoninus Martyrus before the Mahometan conquest. "Nigh the altar is a crypt, where, if you apply your ear, you hear the sound of water, and if you throw in an apple you will find it at Siloam." This applies to the eastern site, the whole Haram having subterranean water channels, the water of which drains out toward Siloam; so the well Bir Arraah under the cave in the Dome of the Rock communicates with the excavated sea in front of the Aksa, and overflows toward Siloam. In the modern Sepulchre there is no well nor communication with Siloam. Adamnanus abbot of Iona records the visit of a French bishop Arelf, in the seventh century. He describes the church of the sepulchre, then the mosque El Aksa as on the site of Solomon's temple; either he omits mentioning the most conspicuous building in J., viz. the Dome of the Rock, or he means his description of the church of the sepulchre to answer for it, the two being the same. Dositheus (ii. 1, § 7) describes it as on the edge of a steep valley on the W., which is true of the Dome of the Rock on the verge of the Tyropeon valley, but not of the modern Church of the Sepulchre. Epiphanius in the fourth century speaks of Golgotha as "over against the mount of Olives."

In the modern Holy Sepulchre the only fragment of architecture earlier than the crusades is a classical cornice worked in with the gothic, probably a relic picked up by the crusaders from the ruin of the old basilica destroyed by El Hakeem before their arrival. The Christians in the tenth century were excluded from the holy places under pain of death. When the persecution abated some returned and built a simulated sepulchre church in their old quarter of the city, viz. the W., not in fraud, but to celebrate as in Spain and elsewhere the sacred Easter mysteries. When the crusaders gained back the city the name remained of "the Sepulchre Church" which was now treated as the real one. The crusaders regarded however the mosque El Aksa as "the temple of Solomon," making it a stable in contempt of Judaism, and the buildings as the knights' dwellings, who therefore were called "templars." But the Dome of the Rock they called "the temple of the Lord," evidently knowing so much, if no more, that it was a Christian church, by whomsoever and for whatsoever special purpose built.

The S. wall of the Haram bears traces of Julian's attempt, through the Jews, to rebuild the temple. The great tunnel like vault under the mosque El Aksa, with four-domed vestibule, appears to be part of Herod's temple (Fergusson); outside are added to these old walls architectural decorations, so slightly attached that daylight can partly be seen between. Their style is classical, therefore not so late as Justinian; yet not so old as the style of the Golden gateway or of the Dome of the Rock; evidently they are of Julian's age. Hadrian's name is turned upside down in an inscription above, the stone being evidently an insertion in the wall. The workmen (Gregory Nazianzen, Ad Jud. et Gent. 7, § 1), when driven from their works by balls of fire issuing from the foundations, took refuge in a neighbouring church, evidently the church of Constantine, the only church near. The temple site was well known at that time (A.D. 362), and was held accused by the Christians as doomed by Christ. But the Dome of the Rock was not within its precincts, and so would be unobjectionable as a Christian site.

Procopius (De Edific. Const.) describes Justinian's church in such terms as exactly apply to the S.E. rectangle of the Haram, E. of the site where are now the mosques of Omar and El Aksa. The substructures which he details as needful to be built up correspond to the vaults in the S.E. angle of the Haram; at the N. end of these Justinian's church was probably built. The church cannot be El Aksa, which is on the temple site (Fergusson), held accused by Christians, and where they never built a church (Eutychius, Annales ii. 289). The Sakhrab was found by Omar covered with filth, and held in Christians' abhorrence as within the temple precincts. Justinian's favourite architecture was a dome on pendentives, the type of an Eastern church. The Aksa on the other hand has no apse or other essential feature of a Christian basilica. The seven aisles and whole style are those of a mosque at the end of the seventh century. Antoninus Martyr mentions a church on this very site (Itin. 16), alongside of Solomon's portico, the E. portico of the temple. Justinian chose this remote part of the city for his church of St. Mary, evidently because Golgotha and the sepulchre were near, and not where, in the western quarter, the sepulchre and his church of St. Mary are now placed. The only other building now remaining besides Constantine's Anastasis is the dome called the Little Sakhrab at the N. end, said to contain a fragment of the stone which the angel sat on, and which closed the sepulchre door.

H. Bonar's objections to Fergusson's view are that thus the crucifixion is made to take place close by the temple wall; and that the tomb would be less than 200 ft. from the temple, and opposite one of its gates, and that there would not be room enough for a garden round it; and that it is unlikely at this short distance from the temple gate there should be a rock 17 ft. above the ground around, and 40 in breadth, and 60 in length, allowed to remain unlevelled till Joseph of Arimathea chose it for his tomb, and cultivated the bare rock as a garden. Eusebius describes the sepulchre as looking eastward, whereas the Sakhrab cave is underground, entered by a descent of 20 steps at the S.E. angle; and the basilica as built on an excavation, whereas the mosque stands on an eminence. Moreover, the rock cave is uncarved and unfaced by tool inside and outside, and it seems unlikely that Joseph of Arimathea, a rich man, should choose a cave for his sepulchre and leave the stone so rough and undressed. H. B. thinks the rock to be the old top of Moriah (the scene of Abraham's sacrifice), spared by Solomon in levelling the hill, which no tool has touched save at one end where is a rough cleavage. It has no appearance of a tomb; the cave below is a natural hollow; there is a deep shaft in the centre of the floor of the cave, communicating with Kedron. H. B. guesses it was the conduit for carrying the blood of sacrifices away, for it is called "the well of souls" (the blood being the life or soul: Lev. xvii. 11). Luke xiii. 53 states "the sepulchre" was "hewn in stone" (larenta murem), which does not accord with the rock

under the Dome. The Kubbet es Sakhrāh has been stripped, and a balustrade discovered with round arches. Capt. Warren's explanations favour a position N. or N.E. of the city for the site of Christ's sepulchre. The Jews regarded the rock as Jacob's pillow (but Jacob's resting place was some solitary place, not near a city as Salem of Melchizedek was), as the threshing floor of Arannah the Jebusite, and as the site of the brazen altar; a Moslem of the twelfth century describes the cave as ten cubits long, five wide, and a fathom high. The S.W. city "J." being higher, would seem more naturally to be the Jebusite fortress; but "J." the city is in many passages distinguished from the castle Zion which David took and the city of David (1 Chron. xi. 4-8, 2 Sam. v. 6-9). Probably the Jebusites held both the S.W. and the N.W. or Aera heights, with their stronghold Zion (on the N.W. bend of the eastern hill), which was originally far higher till Simon Maccabæe lowered it. The Jews occupied the lower city until David dislodged the Jebusites from the heights. It is noteworthy, in estimating the arguments above, that the terms "mount Zion" and "city of David" are in a vague sense applied to Ophel, Moriah, Millo or Aera, and the upper city. The same name, "sunny mountain," still is applied to the hills about Jerusalem. Zion is a district name like mount Ephraim. Thus Hezekiah's bringing the water "from Gihon to the W. side of the city of David" means that he brought it by an aqueduct from the Virgin's fount or Euphrat (Gihon according to the Jews) to Siloam (the lower Gihon), a water channel still to be seen. In 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14, xxxii. 30, Ophel is termed part of "the city of David"; so Millo is in "the city of David" (2 Chron. xxxii. 5). So also "in" means often "by," as when Uziah or Azariah is said to have been buried "in the city of David" (2 Kings xv. 5-7), but in 2 Chron. xxvi. 23 "in the field of the burial which belonged to the kings, for they said, he is a leper." He was buried in the same field, but in a rock-cut separate chamber of his own, not in the sepulchre of the kings. Thus David's tomb may have been cut in the face of the high rock with which Ophel ends just over Siloam. (W. F. Birch, Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., Oct. 1877.)

Outside the Damascus northern gate is the 20 inch entrance descending into the quarries out of which came the enormous stones of the walls, temple, and other structures. Some of the stones in the quarries still bear the Phœnician printmarks of the masons, who had intended to quarry them, answering to similar marks in the temple stones. How far one may hear marks of spiritual designation for the temple of the Holy Ghost, and yet never become a living stone in it, but always remain in the quarry of nature! (Isa. li. 1.)

Spiritually, J. is the antithesis to Babylon. By apostasy "the faithful city" became "the harlot" or Babylon (Isa. i. 21, Rev. xvii. 5). In the gospel dispensation the literal J. by servile adherence to the letter, and by rejecting Christ who is the end and fulfilment of the law, became the bondservant; whereas "J. which is above is free, and is the mother of us all" (Gal. iv. 26). It is the centre of the spiritual kingdom, as the old J. was the centre of Judaism. It is the church or Messianic theocracy now. It will finally be the heavenly J., "the new J. which cometh down out of heaven from my God" (Rev. iii. 12). The Gr. for "new" (kaïne, not nea) implies that it is new and different from and superseding the old worn out J. and its polity (Heb. viii. 13, xii. 22). The first foundation of the spiritual church was laid in the literal J. (John xii. 15, 1 Pet. ii. 6.) This spiritual church is the earnest of that everlasting J. which shall come down from heaven to abide permanently in "the new heavens and new earth." The glorious literal J. (Jer. iii. 17, 18; Zech. xiv.) of the millennium (Rev. xx.), the metropolis of the Christianized world kingdoms, will be the earthly representative and forerunner of the heavenly and everlasting J. which shall follow the destruction of the old earth and its atmosphere (Heb. xi. 10, Rev. xxi. 2-27). John in the Gospel applies to the old city the Gr. name Hierosolyma, but in the Apocalypse always the sacred Heb. name Hierosaleem. Paul uses the same distinction only where he is refuting Judaism (Gal. iv. 26, Heb. xii. 22). The citizens of that holy J. to come constitute the wife of the Lamb. It is a perfect cube, denoting the complete elect church. During the millennium the elect saints reign with Christ as king-priests over the earth and over Israel and the nations in the flesh. Not until the earth has been regenerated by fire will it be a fit home for the saints or heavenly J., about to descend upon and to make their everlasting abode there. God dwells in His spiritual temple (aos, "shrine"), the church, now (1 Cor. iii. 17, vi. 19); then the church will dwell in Him, as her temple (shrine). Comp. Ps. cxiv. 2. There will be "no" literal "temple" then, for the glorious one described by Ezekiel in his closing chapters will be superseded by what is infinitely better, even God Himself (Rev. xxi. 22).

Jeshanah. One of the three towns taken from Jeroboam by Abijah (2 Chron. xiii. 19). Now Ain Sana, well watered and surrounded with gardens. Its position three miles N. of Beitān, near the main route between Jerusalem and Shechem, and its relation to the other towns of the triangle, Ephron (Taiyibeh) and Bethel (Beitān), made its acquisition of consequence to Abijah as commanding the high road to his capital.

Jeshimon. Pisgah and Peor faced the J., i.e. the waste; not merely midbar, "a common" rather than a desert (Num. xxi. 20, xxiii. 28). The desolate tract skirting the N. and N.W. coasts of the Dead Sea, between the Jordan mouth (near which was Beth-jeshimoth) and Engedi: consisting of chalky crumbling limestone rocks and a flat covered with nitrons crust, into which the feet sink as in ashes; without vegetation except the hubeibeh, or alkali plant. The hill of HACHILAH was "S. of" or "before" J. (1 Sam. xxiii. 19, xxvi. 1, 3.) Eusebius says J. was ten miles S. of Jericho, near the Dead Sea. "The midbar (pastoral common) of Judah" stretched S. of J. from Engedi southwards (Josh. xv. 61, 62).

Jeshishai. An ancestor of the Gadites dwelling in Gilead and reckoned by genealogies in Jotham's days (1 Chron. v. 14, 17). A part of the transjordanic tribes came temporarily under his dominion in the period of disorder in Israel after the death of Jeroboam II. This caused his registration of the Gadites. Pekah in Ahaz's reign, probably by the Syrian Rezin's help, recovered Gilead.

Jeshua=JOSHUA. 1. 1 Chron. xxiv.

11. See as to his descendants JEDAHIAH (Ezra ii. 36). 2. 2 Chron. xxxi. 15. 3. Son of Jehoazak who went into captivity (1 Chron. vi. 15). First highpriest of the third series, viz. that which succeeded the Babylonian captivity; ancestor of the 14 down to Joshua (or Jason) and Onias (or Menelaus). Zerubbabel's contemporary. Came from Babylon in Cyrus' first year; took part in rebuilding the temple; first of all restored the altar and daily sacrifice, then in the second month of the second year of the return from Babylon laid the foundation of the temple (Ezra iii.). Fourteen years' interruption to the work was caused by the Samaritans' influence upon Artaxerxes (pseudo Suerdis). It was resumed in Darius Hystaspes' year by J. and Zerubbabel, with Haggai's (i. 1, 12, 14; ii. 1-4) and Zechariah's co-operation (Zech. i.-viii.), and completed in his sixth year, on the 3rd of the month Adar. At the dedication a sin offering was offered "for all Israel, 12 he goats, according to the number of the tribes" (Ezra vi. 15-22), and they kept the passover "seven days with joy, for the Lord had made them joyful, and turned the heart of the king of Assyria unto them to strengthen their hands in the work of the house of the God of Israel." J. represents Jerusalem (and so the church) before Jehovah; accused by Satan, but justified by Jehovah, of His own will and choice, through Messiah His Advocate, who strips off his rags (comp. Isa. lxiv. 6), and "clothes him with change of raiment (the filthy garments were worn by those on trial; the white robe or caftan is put on an Eastern minister of state when acquitted; comp. Isa. lxi. 10), and sets a fair (symbolising purity) mitre (the priestly turban, the pledge of the re-established priesthood) upon his head," in answer to Zechariah's prayer (iii. 1-9). So the wedding garment, Christ's righteousness, imputed for justification, imparted for sanctification (Matt. xxii. 11). The restoration of the glory of the priesthood was first at the completion of the second temple, fully in Jesus=Joshua, who represents Israel, "the kingdom of priests" (Exod. xix. 6). Once clad in our vileness, yet He was the chosen of the Father (Isa. xlii. 1, xlv. 1, xlix. 1-3). Ceasing from connection with sin by death, in garments of glory He has entered the heavenly holy place as our Highpriest (Heb. viii. 1, ix. 24). So now (1 Pet. ii. 5) the "holy priesthood" is not restricted to one order; all Christians are priests unto God, arrayed in "the best robe" (Luke xv. 22, Rev. xix. 8). So the literal Israel hereafter (Isa. iii. 6, lxvi. 21). They of the captivity brought silver and gold, which were made into crowns and set upon J.'s head by Jehovah's command; symbolising the combination of kingship and priesthood in Messiah, unknown to the Levitical priesthood, realized in Him of whom Melchizedek was type (Zech. vi. 9-13; Ps. cx. 1-4; Heb. v., vi.). "The counsel of peace shall be between both" the kingship and the priesthood. As priest He expiates sin, as king He extirpates it. It is the "counsel" of infinite wisdom (Isa. ix. 6, Eph. i. 8-11, Heb. vi. 17) to reconcile God's justice as a king with His love as father and priest. Only by being pardoned by His priestly atonement and ruled by His kingly laws we find "peace" (Luke ii. 14, Acts x. 36, Eph. ii. 13-17). 4. Neh. viii. 17. 5. Chief of a Levitical house that assisted Zerubbabel, and long subsequently Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra ii. 40, iii. 9; Neh. iii. 17-19, viii. 7, ix. 45, xii. 8). "J." is used either for the whole family or its successive heads. J. and Kadmiel were "sons (descendants) of Heli-viah," or Judah (Ezra iii. 9, ii. 40), but J.'s immediate ancestor was Azariah (Neh. x. 9). In Neh. xii. 24 the text is corrupt probably; "J. and Kadmiel," or "and the sons of Kadmiel" may be conjectured. 6. Neh. vii. 11, x. 14; Ezra x. 30. 7. A town re-inhabited by the people of Judah on the return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 26). On the line of retreat of the five kings who fought at Gibeon, midway between the lower Bethoron and Shochoh, near Azekah, is the large village Jeshua, which probably commemorates Joshua's commanding the sun to stand still upon Gibeon, and the moon in the valley of Aialon, a day without a parallel (x. 12-14).

Jeshurun="the righteous (from jashar) people": Israel's ideal character; his high calling (Deut. xxxii. 15, xxxiii. 5, 26; Isa. xlv. 2; comp. Num. xxiii. 21). [See JASHER, BOOK OF.] The idea of blessedness and prosperity enters into the word; the Arabic and the Heb. ashar, "happy," being akin to jashar. There is a play on similar sounds which the Heb. writers delight in, in Jeshurun and the diminutive of Israel, Israelun.

Jesse. Obed's son, father of David; sprung from the Moabitess Ruth and the Canaanite Rahab of Jericho; and from Nahshon, at the exodus chief of Judah, and so from the great house of Pharez, through Hezron. His designation "the Ephrathite of Bethlehem Judah" (1 Sam. xvii. 12) implies that he was of a very old family in the place. He was elderly and had eight sons when we first read of him. The Targum on 2 Sam. xxi. 19 makes him a weaver of veils for the sanctuary. [On his removal to Moab in David's flight from Saul see DAVID, also see ABIGAIL on J.'s connection with her and Joab, Abishai and Asabel, and Zeruah.] His own name is immortalized, probably because of his faith in the coming Messiah, "the rod out of the stem (stump) of J." even long after David had eclipsed him (Isa. xi. 1, 10), expressing the depressed state of David's royal line when Messiah was to be born of it (Luke ii.).

Jesui. Num. xxvi. 44, 63; ISUI Gen. xli. 17; ISHVAI 1 Chron. vii. 30.

Jesus. 1. Greek of Joshua, Jeshua, or Jehoshua (salvation of Jehovah): Acts vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8. 2. Called Justus: with Paul, at Rome, saluted the Colossians (iv. 11): "of the circumcision, a fellow worker unto the kingdom of God," and so "a comfort" to the apostle.

Jesus Christ. Jesus = Jehovah salvation; for "He Himself (autos), not merely like Joshua He is God's instrument to save" saves His people from their sins" (Matt. i. 21). CHRIST, Gr. = MESSIAH, Heb., "anointed" (1 Sam. ii. 10; Ps. ii. 2, 6 marg.; Dan. ix. 25, 26). Prophets, priests, and kings (Exod. xxx. 30; 1 Kings xix. 15, 16) were anointed, being types of Him who combines all three in Himself (Deut. xviii. 18, Zech. vi. 13). "By one offering He hath perfected for ever them that are being sanctified" (Heb. x. 5, 7, 14; vii. 25). "Christ," or the Messiah, was looked for by all Jews as "He who should come" (Matt. xi. 3) according to the O. T. prophets. IMMANUEL [see] "God with us" declares His Godhead; also John i. 1-18. The N. T. shows that Jesus is the Christ (Matt. xxii. 42-45). Jesus is His personal name, Christ His title. Appropriately, in undesignated confirmation of the Gospels, Acts, and epistles, the question throughout the Gospels is, whether Jesus is the (the article is always in the Gr.) Christ (Matt. xvi. 16, John vi. 69), so in the first ministry of the word in Acts (ii. 36, ix. 22, x. 38, xvii. 3). When His Messiahship became recognised "Christ" was used as His personal designation; so in the epistles. "Christ" implies His consecration and qualification for the work He undertook, viz. by His union with the Holy Spirit, of which the O. T. oil anointings were the type; in the womb (Luke i. 35), and especially at His baptism, when the Holy Ghost (as a dove) abode on Him (Matt. iii. 16; John i. 32, 33). Transl. Ps. xlv. 7; "O God (the Son), Thy God (the Father) hath anointed Thee with the oil of gladness above Thy fellows." Full of this union without measure (John iii. 34) He preached at Nazareth as the Fulfiler of the scripture He read (Isa. lxi. 1-3), giving "the oil of joy for mourning," "good tidings unto the meek" (Luke iv. 17-21). Jesus' claim to be Messiah or "the Christ of God" (Luke ix. 20), i.e. the anointed of the Father to be king of the earth (Is. ii. 6-12; Rev. xi. 15, xii. 10), rests (1) On His fulfilling all the prophecies concerning Messiah, so far as His work has been completed, the earnest of the full completion; take as instances Isa. liii., Ps. xxii., Mic. v., Hos. vi. 2, 3, Gen. xlix. 10, comp. Luke ii.; "the testimony of Jesus is the Spirit of prophecy" (Rev. xix. 10; Luke xxiv. 26, 44-46; Acts ii. 22-25). (2) On His miracles (John vii. 31, v. 36, x. 25, 38). Miracles alleged in opposition, or addition, to Scripture cannot prove a Divine mission (2 Thess. ii. 9, Deut. xiii. 1-3, Matt. xxiv. 24), but when confirmed by Scripture they prove it indisputably. "Son of David" expresses His title to David's throne over Israel and Judah yet to be (Luke i. 32, 33). "King of Israel" (John i. 49), "King of the Jews" (Matt. ii. 2, xxi. 5), "King of Zion." As son of David He is David's "offspring"; as "root of David" (in His Divine nature) He is David's "lord" (Rev. xii. 16, comp. Matt. xxii. 42-45). His claim to the kingship was the charge against Him before Pilate (John xviii. 37; xix. 3, 12). The elect of God (Luke xxiii. 35, comp. Isa. xlii. 1). The inspired summary of His life is, "God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power, who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil, for God was with Him" (Acts x. 38). To be "in Christ," which occurs upwards of 70 times in Paul's epistles, is not merely to copy but to be in living union with Him (1 Cor. xv. 18, 2 Cor. xii. 2), drawn from Christ's own image (John xv. 1-10). In Christ God is manifested as He is, and man as he ought to be. Our fallen race lost the knowledge of man as utterly as they lost the knowledge of God. Humanity in Christ is generic (1 Cor. xv. 45, 47), as the second "man" or "last Adam," "the Son of man" (a title used in N. T. only by Himself of Himself, except in Stephen's dying speech, Acts vii. 56; from Dan. vii. 13; marking at once His humiliation as man's representative Head, and His consequent glorification in the same nature: Matt. xx. 28, xxvi. 64). Sinless Himself, yet merciful to sinners; meek under provocation, yet with refined sensibility dignified, yet without arrogance; pure Himself, yet with a deep insight into evil; Christ is a character of human and Divine loveliness such as man could never have invented; for no man has ever conceived, much less attained, such a standard; see

His portraiture, Matt. xii. 15-20. Even His own brethren could not understand His withdrawal into Galilee, as, regarding Him like other men, they took it for granted that publicity was His aim (John vi. 3, 1; contrast v. 41). Jesus was always more accessible than His disciples; they all rebuked the parents who brought their infants for Him to bless (Luke xviii. 15-17); they all would have sent the woman of Canaan away. But He never misunderstood nor discouraged any sincere seeker, contrast Matt. xx. 31 with 32-24. Earthly princes look greatest at a distance, surrounded with pomp; but He needed no earthly state, for the more closely He is viewed the more He stands forth in peerless majesty, sinless and Divine. [On His MIRACLES and PARABLES see.] He rested His teaching on His own authority, and the claim was felt by all, through some mysterious power, to be no undue one (Matt. vii. 29). He appeals to Scripture as His own: "Behold I send unto you prophets," etc. (Matt. xxiii. 34; in Luke xi. 49, "the Wisdom of God said, I will send them prophets.")

His secret spring of unstained holiness, yet tender sympathy, was His constant communion with God; at all times, so that He was never alone (John xvi. 32), "rising up a great while before day, in a solitary place" (Mark i. 35). Luke tells us much of His prayers: "He continued all night in prayer to God," before ordaining the twelve (vi. 12); it was He who "praying, the heaven was opened, and the Holy Ghost descended, and (the Father's) voice came from heaven, Thou art My beloved Son," etc. (iii. 22); it was "as He prayed, the fashion of His countenance was altered, and His raiment was white and glistening" (ix. 29); when the angel strengthened Him in Gethsemane, "in an agony He prayed more earnestly," using the additional strength received not to refresh Himself after His exhausting conflict, but to strive in supplication, His example confirming His precept, xiii. 24 (xxii. 44; Heb. v. 7). His Father's glory, not His own, was His absorbing aim (John viii. 29, 50, vii. 18); from His childhood when at 12 years old (for it was only in His 12th year that Archelaus was banished and His parents ventured to bring Him to the passover; Josephus, Ant. xviii. 15) His first recorded utterance was, "Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?" or else "in My Father's places" (Luke ii. 49; Ps. xl. 6, 8).

Little is recorded of His childhood, but as much as the Spirit saw it safe for us to know; so prone is man to lose sight of Christ's main work, to fulfil the law and pay its penalty in our stead. The reticence of Scripture as remarkably shows God's inspiration of it as its records and revelations. Had the writers been left to themselves, they would have tried to gratify our natural curiosity about His early years. But a veil is drawn over all the rest of His sayings for the first 30 years. "He waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom . . . He increased in wisdom" (Luke ii. 40, 52), which proves that He had a "reasonable soul" capable of development, as distinct from His Godhead; Athanasian Creed: "perfect God and perfect man, of a reasonable soul and human flesh subsisting." His tender consideration for His disciples after their missionary journey, and His compassion for the fainting multitudes, outweighing all thought of His own repose when He was weary, and when others would have been impatient of their retirement being intruded on (Mark vi. 30-37), are lovely examples of His human, and at the same time superhuman, sympathy (Heb. iv. 15). Then how utterly void was He of resentment for wrongs. When apprehended, instead of sharing the disciples' indignation He rebuked it; instead of rejoicing in His enemy's suffering, He removed it (Luke xxii. 50, 51); instead of condemning His murderers He prayed for them: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do" (xxiii. 34). What exquisite tact and tenderness appear in His dealing with the woman of Samaria (John iv.), as He draws the spiritual lesson from the natural drink which He had craved of her, and leads her on to convict herself of sin, in the absence of His disciples, and to recognise Him as the Messiah. So in the account of the woman caught in adultery. When "every man went unto his own house" He who had not where to lay His head "went to the mount of Olives." His wonted resort for prayer; "early in the morning He came again into the temple." Then followed the scribes' accusation of the woman from the law, but He who wrote on stone that law of commandments now writes with His finger on the ground (the law of mercy), showing the power of silence to shame the petulant into self-recollection, the censorious into self-condemnation. His silent gesture spoke expressively. Then His single speech, "he that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her," followed by the same silent gesture, made them feel the power of conscience and withdraw. Then she stays, though her accusers were gone, awaiting His sentence, and is made to feel the power of His holiness, condemning her sin yet not herself, "Go and sin no more." The same spirit appears here as in His atonement, which makes sin unspeakably evil, yet brings the sinner into loving union with God in Christ. Other systems, which reject the atonement, either make light of sin or else fill the sinner with slavish and unconquerable dread of wrath. Stoning was the penalty of unfaithfulness in one betrothed. If Jesus decided she should be stoned, He would be opposing Rome which claimed power of deciding all capital cases (John xviii. 31). If Jesus decided to let her off, He would forfeit the favour of the Jews, as a setter aside of Moses' law. His reply maintained the law, but limited its execution to those free from sexual uncleanness, which none of her accusers were. The lesson is not for magistrates, but for self-constituted judges and busybodies, whose dragging of filthy stories against others into the social circle is only deiling. They were not witnesses in court; there was no judicial trial. The context (chap. viii. 12, "I am the light of the world," referring to the rising sun and the lighted lamps at the feast of tabernacles, vii. 37; and chap. viii. 15, "ye judge after the flesh, I judge no man") confirms the gemminess of the passage, which is omitted from good MSS.

His birth was in the year 750 from Rome's foundation, four before the era "Anno Domini," some months before Herod's death. The first Adam was created, and not born; the Second Adam, in His manhood, both born and created with a body free from the inherited taint of original sin (Heb. x. 5).

The census of the Roman empire ordered by Augustus led Joseph and Mary from Nazareth to Bethlehem, the city of David their ancestor, in fulfilment of Micah's prophecy (v.). Spring was probably the season for the shepherds beginning to watch over their flocks by night. The season when winter deadness gives place to new vegetation and life was the appropriate birthtime of Him who "maketh all things new." So S. of Sol. ii. 10-13. Spring was the pass-over season, Israel's national birthday. So that the spiritual, national, and natural eras, in this view, coincide. To allow time between the presentation in the temple and the arrival of the wise men and the other events before Herod's death, perhaps February may be fixed on. The grotto at Bethlehem is mentioned by Justin Martyr in the second century as the scene of His birth. The humble (1 Cor. i. 26-31) Jewish shepherds were the earliest witnesses of the glory which attended His birth. For in every successive instance of His voluntary humiliation, the Father, jealous for the honour of His equal Son, provided for His glorification (Luke ii. 8-18; so xxii. 43, xxiii. 4, 40-43, 47; Matt. iii. 14-17; John xii. 28). Simeon and Anna were the divinely appointed welcomers of the Son of God at His lowly presentation in the temple, the former discerning in Him "God's salvation," the "light to lighten the Gentiles and the glory (especially) of His people Israel"; the latter "speaking of Him to all who looked for redemption in Jerusalem." The Gentile wise men of the East (Persian magi possibly, the Zend religion teaching the expectation of a Zoziosh or Redeemer; or magoi being used generally, these wise men coming from Balaam's region, the East, and knowing his prophecy, "there shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel": Num. xxiv. 17, xxiii. 7, whence they ask for the "King of the Jews" and mention the "star" came later, and found Him no longer in a manger where the shepherds found Him, but in a "house" (Matt. ii. 11). They were the firstfruits of the Gentile world; their offering of gold is thought to mark His kingship, the frankincense His priesthood, and the myrrh His coming burial, in God's purpose if not theirs. HEROD [see], being an Edomite who had supplanted the Jewish Asmonians or Maccabees, was alarmed to hear of one "born king of the Jews," and failing to find Jesus slew all children from two years old and under (Herod fixed on this age as oriental mothers suckle infants till they are two years old). God saved His Son by commanding the mother and Joseph to flee to Egypt, the land of the type Israel's sojourn, when fleeing from famine, and the land whence God called His Son Israel (Hos. xi. 1, Matt. ii. 15); not by miracle, but by ordinary escaping from persecution, as sharing His people's trials (Matt. x. 23).

His interview with the doctors in the temple shows that His human consciousness already knew His Divine mission and was preparing for it. Stier describes His one utterance in childhood as "a solitary floweret out of the wonderful enclosed garden of 30 years, plucked precisely there where the swollen bud at the distinctive crisis bursts into the flower." The description "He increased . . . in stature . . . and in favour with God and men," combined with Ps. xlv. 2, "Thou art fairer than the children of men, grace is poured into Thy lips," implies that His outward form was a temple worthy of the Word made flesh. Isa. liii. 2 expresses men's rejection of Him, rather than the absence of graces inward or outward in Him to cause that rejection.

In the 15th year of the emperor Tiberius, dating from his joint rule with Augustus (15 years from 765 after the founding of Rome, i.e. two years before Augustus' death in 767), i.e. 789 (30 counted back bring our Lord's birth to 750), when Pontius Pilate was procurator of Judea and ANNAS and CAIAPHAS [see] jointly in fact exercised the highpriesthood, Caiaphas being nominally the highpriest (John xviii. 13), John Baptist, as last prophet of the O. T. dispensation, by preaching repentance for sin and a return to legal obedience, prepared the way for Messiah, the Saviour from sin; whereas the people's desire was for a Messiah who would deliver them from the hateful foreign yoke. Wieseler thinks John's preaching took place on the sabbatical year, which, if it be so, must have added weight to his appeals. We know at all events that he came "in the spirit and power of Elias." Jesus received His solemn consecration to His redeeming work by John's baptism with water (to which He came not, as all others, confessing sin, but undertaking to "fulfil all righteousness") and at the same time by the Holy Spirit's descent permanently, accompanied by the Father's acceptance of Him as our Redeemer, "this is My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased," viz. as undertaking to become man's Saviour. Thus "Christ glorified not Himself to be made an highpriest, but He that said Thou art My Son" (Ps. ii. 7, Heb. v. 5, Matt. iii. 14). John, though knowing His goodness and wisdom before, as he must have known from the intimacy between the cousin mothers, Mary and Elisabeth (Luke i.), and knowing that Messiah should come, and when Jesus presented Himself feeling a strong presentiment that this was the Messiah, yet knew not definitely Jesus' Messiahship, until its attestation by God the Father with the Holy Ghost at His baptism (John i. 31-33).

Under the power of the Spirit received at His baptism He encountered Satan in the wilderness. The mountain Quarantania, a perpendicular wall of rock 1400 feet above the plain, on this side of Jordan, is the traditional site. Satan's aim was to tempt Him to doubt His sonship, "if Thou be the Son of God," etc. The same voice spake through His mockers at the crucifixion (Matt. xxvii. 40). Faith answers with Nathanael (John i. 49). Mark i. 13 says "He was with the wild beasts," a contrast to the first Adam among the beasts tame and subject to man's will. Adam changed paradise into a wilderness, Jesus changed the wilderness into paradise (Isa. xi. 6-9). Jesus' answer to all the three temptations was not reasoning, but appeal to God's written word, "it is written." As Christ was "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners" (Heb. vii. 26), the temptation must have been from without, not from within: objective and real, not subjective or in ecstasy. The language too, "led up . . . came . . . taketh Him up . . . the Spirit driveth Him" (ekballet), a necessary though a distasteful conflict to the Holy One, etc., implies reality (Matt. iv. 1, 3, 5; Mark i. 12). In fallen man suggestions of hatred of God, delight in inflicting pain, cruel lust, fierce joy in violating law, are among the inward temptations of Satan; but Jesus said before His renewed temptation in Gethsemane, "the prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in Me" (John xiv. 20). As 40 is the number in Scripture implying affliction, sin, and punishment (Gen. vii. 4, 12; Num. xiv. 33, xxxii. 13, 14; Ps. xcv. 10; Deut. xxv. 3; Ezek. xxix. 11, iv. 6; Jonah iii. 4). Christ the true Israel (Deut. viii. 3, 16; ix. 9, 11, 25) denied Himself 40 days, answering to Israel's 40 years' provocation of God and punishment by death in the wilderness. Not by His almighty power, but by His righteousness, Jesus overcame. First Satan tried Him through His sinless bodily wants answering to "the flesh" in fallen man. But Jesus would not, when hungry, help Himself, though He fed multitudes, for He would not leave His voluntarily assumed position of human absolute dependence on God.

He who nourished crowds with bread Would not one meal unto Himself afford: O wonderful the wonders left undone, And scarce less wonderful than those He wrought!

Self restraint passing all human thought, To have all power and be as having none! O self denying love, which felt alone For needs of others, never for His own!

The next temptation in the spiritual order (Matthew gives probably the chronological order) was, Satan tried to dazzle Him, by a bright vision of the world's pomps "in a moment of time," to take the kingdoms of the world at His hands (as "delivered" to him, owing to man's fall) without the cross, on condition of one act of homage to him "the prince of this world." But Jesus herein detected the adversary, and gives him his name, "Get thee behind Me, Satan" (His very words to Peter, who, as Satan's tool, for the moment urged the same avoidance of the cross: Matt. xvi. 23), for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord," etc. The kingdom of the world shall come to Him, just because His cross came first (Phil. ii. 5-11, Rev. xi. 15, Isa. liii. 12). To the flesh and the world succeeds the last and highest temptation, the devil's own sin, presumption. Satan turns Jesus' weapon, the word, on Himself, quoting Ps. xci. 11, 12, and omitting the qualification "in all thy ways," viz. implicit reverent faith and dependence on God, which were "Christ's ways." Christ would no more presume because He was God's Son than doubt that He was so. To cast Himself from the temple S.W. wall pinnacle, then 150 feet above the valley before soil accumulated, or the topmost ridge of the royal portico, to test God's power and faithfulness, would be Israel's sin in "tempting Jehovah," saying, Is Jehovah among us or not? though having had ample proofs already (Exod. xvii. 7; Ps. lxxviii. 18-20, 41; Deut. vi. 16, which Jesus quotes). All His quotations are from the same book, which rationalism now assails. Thus the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, which lured the first Adam, could not entice the Second (Gen. iii. 6: comp. 1 John ii. 16, 17). The assault against man's threefold nature, the body (the want of bread), the soul (craving for worldly lordship without the cross), and the spirit (the temptation on the temple pinnacle), failed in His case. It was necessary the foundation should be tested, and it stood the trial (Isa. xxviii. 16). Satan left Him "for a (rather until the) season," viz. until he renewed the attack at Gethsemane, "and angels came and ministered unto Him." God fulfilling the promise of Ps. xci. in Christ's, not Satan's, way.

Then began His public course of teaching and of miracles, which were not mere wonders, but "signs," i.e. proofs, of His Divine commission; and not merely signs of supernatural power, but expressive intimations of the aim of His ministry and of His own all loving character; the spiritual restoration, which was His main end, being shadowed forth in the visible works of power and mercy. The Jews understood them and His words as His setting up the claim to be equal with God (John v. 1-19, x. 30-33). It is certain that He made the claim (xiv. 8-11). Such a holy One as He would never have made it if it were not true. His whole character excludes the notion of self deceiv-ing enthusiasm. They evaded the force of His miracles (whilst recognising their truth, which they would have denied if they could) by attributing them to Beelzebub (Matt. xii. 24). His incarnation being once granted, His divine sympathy, expressed by miracles of healing man's sufferings, follows as the necessary consequence (viii. 17, comp. Isa. liii. 4). His death in our nature to atone for our sins, and His resurrection, are the culminating point of His suffering with us and for us, that He and we through Him should be free from sin, sorrow, and death for ever (1 Pet. iii. 18, iv. 1, 2; Rom. vi. 4-11).

John's testimony to Him, "Behold the Lamb of God," followed but a few days after the temptation, Jesus meeting John at the Jordan valley on His homeward journey toward Galilee. John's words so impressed his two disciples Andrew and probably John (the apostle) that they left the Baptist for Christ. On the third day after leaving Bethany (John i. 28, Sin. Vulg. and Alex. MSS.; John ii. 1) He reached Cana of Galilee and performed His first miracle. He who would not work a miracle in the wilderness at the outset of His ministry, to supply His own needs, worked one to supply our hunger. As His ministry began, so it ended, with a social meal. The poet happily describes the miracle, "the modest water saw its God and blushed" ("vidit et erubuit lymphæ pudica Deum"). Next He goes to Capernaum,

EARTHEN WATERPOTS.

a more suitable centre for His ministry amidst the populous western shores of the Galilean lake than secluded Nazareth. Next He went to Jerusalem for His first passover during His ministry, and drives out of the temple court of the Gentiles the sheep and oxen, and overthrows the moneychangers' tables (for the trade was an insult to the Gentile worshipper, and was not practised in the court of the Israelites, and made devotion impossible), not by mere force but moral power. The whip of small cords was a puny weapon, but symbolised His coming universal empire. The act repeated at the close (Matt. xvi. 12) of His ministry, as at its beginning, befitted Him who came as purifier of the temple literal and spiritual (Mal. iii. 1-4). His own divinely termed holy (the sanctuary, the holy of holies, or God; naos) was typified by that literal (hieros) temple (John ii. 18-20); its being destroyed by the Jews, and raised up by Himself in three days, was the sign He gave to those who challenged His authority in purging the temple of stone. John describes His officially taking possession of that temple which when a boy He called His Father's house (Luke ii. 49, "in My Father's places," Gr.), with a punitive scourge, the symbol of authority. The synoptical three evangelists describe the final purgation before the close of His ministry, without the scourge. A mere word and awe inspiring look made all, as in Gethsemane, fall back abashed before Him alone.

The interview with NICODEMUS [see] issuing in his ultimate conversion occurred towards the close of the paschal week (John iii.). Then He passed to northeastern Judea, where by His disciples He baptized many (ver. 22-26; iv. 1, 2) and stayed to nearly the end of the year. After His eight months' ministry in Judea, upon John's imprisonment which threatened danger to His infant church, He proceeded through Samaria, the shortest route, to the safe retreat of Galilee. At Jacob's well the chief reason for His "must needs go through Samaria" appeared in the conversion of the Samaritan woman, His first herald in Sychem, the firstfruits of the harvest gathered in by Philip the deacon after His ascension. (Acts viii. 5, etc.) It was now December, four months before harvest (John iv. 35); but the fields were "white already to harvest" spiritually. His two days' ministry in Samaria, without miracles, produced effects not realized by His eight months' stay in Judea with miracles. Proceeding to "His own country" Galilee (the place of His rearing) He was received by the Galileans only because they had seen His miracles when at the feast in Jerusalem; as mournfully at Cana, the scene of His first miracle, which He now revisits, He tells the nobleman who sought healing for his son, "except ye see signs and wonders ye will not believe." The cure was followed by the conversion of the nobleman and his whole house.

Jesus returned to Jerusalem at "the feast" of passover (John v. 1; Sin. MS. reads "the"; Alex. and Vat. omit it, which would favour the view that the feast was Purim); thus there would be four passovers during His ministry: ii. 13, v. 1, xiii. 1 (the last), besides the one He stayed away from because of threatened violence (vi. 4, vii. 1); and thus His ministry lasted three and a half years; not two and a half, as making the feast to be Purim would imply. The cure of the man infirm for 38 years at BETHESDA pool [see] followed on the sabbath, proving that He who had shown Himself Lord of the temple is Lord also of the sabbath. This was the turning point in His history; henceforth "the Jews" (i.e. the hierarchical party, adherents of the sanhedrim, in John's usage), on His claiming unity in working, dignity, and honour with the Father as justifying His healing on the sabbath, commenced that ruinous opposition which drove Him in a day or two after from Jerusalem. He only visited the capital twice again before

KEPH KENNA, CANA.

His last passover; viz. seven months afterwards at the feast of tabernacles in the middle of October (John vii. 1, etc.), and at the feast of dedication in December (John x. 22, 23); probably the two months between these two feasts were spent in Judea. He returned to Nazareth in Galilee, His old home. Luke iv. 15 refers summarily to the same visit to Galilee as John iv. 3, 43. A chasm then intervenes in Luke between iv. 15 and 16; ver. 14 refers to the earlier visit whilst He was fresh from the "Spirit's" baptism, John i. 43, etc., ii.; and Luke iv. 16, etc., refers to the visit to Galilee implied in John vi. 1, succeeding the visit to Jerusalem (John v. 1-10). By the next sabbath He was in Nazareth, and preached from Isa. lxi. 1. Though at first wondering at His gracious words, His hearers were so offended at His announcing God's sovereignty in ministering mercy to the Gentiles, sometimes, rather than to Israel when apostate, that they sought to cast Him down from the brow of the hill (a precipice of the western hill, that by the Maronite church) whereon their city was built; but "He passed through the midst of them."

His main Galilean ministry begins with this, as recorded in the synoptical GOSPELS [see]: Matt. iv. 12-17, Mark i. 14, 15; after John's imprisonment, which had not taken place at the earlier visit (John iii. 24, i. 43, ii., iv. 1-3, etc.). His Judean ministry is John's main subject. However, Luke from ix. 51 to xix. 28 records Christ's ministry between the feast of tabernacles in October, A.D.C. 782, and the triumphal entry before the last passover, April 783. Eusebius (H. E., iii. 24) states that the three synoptical evangelists recount "what was done by our Saviour in the space of one year after the imprisonment of John the Baptist." This period is divided into two by the feeding of the 5000 about the time of that passover which our Lord was debarred from keeping at Jerusalem by the murderous designs of the hierarchical party there. The events up to and including the feeding, a period of little more than three weeks, are fully detailed; those of the remaining period are only in part narrated. Luke's order of events seems from his own statement (i. 3, "from the very first," viz. the Baptist's birth, "to write in order") to be the chronological one; in the first portion (viz. that before the feeding) it is confirmed by Mark, also by John. Matthew's grouping of the discourses and events in clusters is designed for other than chronological sequence: the sermon on the mount, the instructions to the twelve before their mission, the collection of 12 parables (xiii.), that of miracles (viii., ix.); he notices place, where the order of time is not observed, showing it was not ignorance of the order of time which caused his non observance of it (viii. 5, 14, 18, 28; ix. 1; xii. 9; xiii. 1).

In fulfilment of Isa. ix. 1 He, after His rejection at Nazareth (Matt. iv. 13-17), settled at CAPERNAUM [see] hard by the populous plain of Genesareth, a "people that sat in darkness," being half gentitized by the neighboring nations. The people remembering His miracle on the nobleman's son a few weeks before (John iv. 46) "pressed upon Him to hear God's word"; then the miraculous draught of fishes was the occasion of His drawing Simon, [Andrew,] James and John permanently from earthly fishing to become "fishers of men" (Luke v. 1-10, Matt. iv. 18-22, Mark i. 14-20). Zebedee being a man of means, and with ship and "hired servants" (Luke v. 7, Mark i. 20; John's acquaintance with the high-priest, John xviii. 15, implies the same), the report of the miracle and its effect on the four attracted many to hear Jesus Christ next sabbath in the synagogue. Then followed the rasting out of the demon (whose wild cry is recorded in Mark i. 24, Ea), and the cure of the fever of Simon's wife's mother (Luke iv. 33-39), transposed in Luke to bring into better contrast by juxtaposition Christ's rejection the sabbath before at Nazareth and His welcome this sabbath at Capernaum. Mark chronologically places the two cures after the miraculous draught, not before. Fevers are generated at the marshy land of Tabiga, especially in spring, the season in question. Luke as a "physician" calls it "a great fever," in contradistinction to "a small." Jesus "rebuked" it, as He did the sea (Matt. viii. 26), as the outbreak of some hostile power (comp. Isa. xiii. 16), and infused in her full strength, enabling her to minister.

In the casting out demons three things are noteworthy: (1) the patient's loss of conscious personality (Mark v. 7), so that he becomes identified with the demon whose mouthpiece he is; (2) the appalled demon's recognition of the Son of God; (3) Christ's prohibiting the demon to testify to Him, that the people's belief might not rest on such testimony, giving colour to the Jews' slander (Matt. xii. 24, Mark i. 34). His ceaseless energy in crowding the day with loving deeds vividly appears in Mark i. 32-34, Luke iv. 40, 41. Retiring for communion with God into a solitary place long before day, He was tracked by Simon and the people; but He told them He must go and preach to the other village towns (koinopoleis) also, with which the Gennesareth plain was studded. His circuit lasted till the eve of the next sabbath, when (Mark ii. 1) He was again in Capernaum. The only incident recorded of the circuit was He healed the leper in the synagogue by His holy touch. Emissaries of the hostile hierarchy from Jerusalem (Luke v. 17) now watched His movements: at first "reasoning in their hearts," which His omniscience detected, as if His assuming the power to forgive sins in the case of the palsied man were "blasphemy" (Mark ii. 6, 8); then "murmuring" at His eating with the publican Levi whom He called that day before the sabbath (ver. 14-17, Luke v. 30); then objecting to His not fasting, whence He was called "a winebibber and glutton," to which He replied by images from the wine before them and the garments they wore, the spirit of the new dispensation must mould its own forms of outward expression and not have those of the old imposed on it, nor can the two be pieced together without injury to both; lastly "filled with madness" at His healing on the sabbath a man with withered right hand, besides His previous justification of the disciples against their censure for plucking corn ears on the sabbath, "the first of a year standing second in a sabbatical cycle" (Ellicott, Life of Christ; Luke vi. 1 Alex. MS., but Sin. and Vat. omit it), and proclaiming Himself its Lord. They resolve to "destroy" Him (Mark ii. 23-25, iii. 1-6; Matt. xii. 1-14). This resolve at Capernaum was the same as they had already formed at Jerusalem (John v. 1-18), and on the same plea. Nay, they even joined the Herodians their political opponents to compass their end (Mark iii. 6). Seven miracles He performed on the sabbath (Mark i. 21, 29, iii. 1, 2; John v. 9, ix. 14; Luke xiii. 14, xiv. 1).

Their murderous plotting was the time and occasion of His withdrawal to the solitary hills W. of the lake, and choosing 12 apostles who should be His witnesses when He was gone. The horned hill of Mattin was probably the scene of their being chosen (Luke vi. 12, 13), and of the sermon on the mount. The beginning and end of this sermon are the same in Luke vi. as Matt. v., vi., vii.; the general order is the same; and the same miracle, the centurion's servant, succeeds. Some of the expressions are found in other collocations in Luke (who gives only the summary in chap. vi.), our Lord giving the same precepts on more occasions than one (comp. Matt. v. 18, vi. 19-21, 24, vii. 13, 22, respectively, with Luke xii. 58, 33, xvi. 13, xiii. 24, 25-27). The sermon's unity precludes its being thought a collection of discourses uttered at different times. Possibly, though not so probably, the longer form was spoken at the top of the hill (Matt. v. 1) to the apostles and disciples, the shorter when "He came down and stood on the level" a little below the top (Luke vi. 17), to the "great multitude." The variations in the two forms are designed by the Holy Ghost to bring out fresh lights of the same truths. Luke's does not notice the portion on almsgiving, prayer, and fasting (Matt. vi.). The healing of the centurion's servant follows: the first Gentile healed, without seeing Him, by a word, at the request preferred twice by others before he presumed himself to ask (Luke vii. 3-6, Matt. viii. 5, 6).

Next day He ascended the steep up to the hamlet Nain, and restored to the sorrowing widow her son who was being carried for burial, probably to the sepulchral caves on the W. of Nain, of which traces remain. The anointing of His feet (only) in Simon's house in some neighbouring town by the sinful but forgiven woman followed. Mary of Bethany anointed His head as well as His feet. Both wiped His feet with their hair, the sinful woman also kissed and washed

His feet with her tears (Luke vii. 38, John xii. 3, Mark xiv. 3). Not Mary Magdalene, whose possession by demons does not prove impurity, as on the other hand this woman's impurity does not prove demoniacal possession. About the same time John Baptist from his dungeon at Machærus sent two disciples to inquire whether Jesus is He that should come; primarily to convince them (as Jesus in fact did from His miracles and His gospel preaching; Luke vii. 18-23, Matt. xi.) that thus to the last he should be the Bridegroom's friend, introducing the bride to Him (John iii. 1-29, 27-30); secondarily to derive for himself the incidental comfort of accumulated conviction. Next followed the short circuit of a couple of days preaching from city to city, attended by ministering women (Luke viii. 1-3): Mary Magdalene, Joanna, Susanna, and many others, including possibly the woman who "loved much" and evidenced it because she knew by "faith" "her many sins forgiven" (vii. 46-50).

He returned to His "home" at Capernaum (marg. Mark iii. 19, 20), and the multitude flocked together so eagerly that the disciples "could not so much as eat bread": so His kinsmen "went out (of their temporary abode at Capernaum) to lay hold on Him, saying, He is beside Himself." A few verses later (Mark iii. 31) they with His mother arrived at the house "desiring to speak with Him," and He replied to His informants, "My mother and My brethren are these which hear the word of God and do it." The cure of the demoniac blind and dumb was the occasion of the Pharisees attributing His miracle to Beelzebub (a charge repeated again subsequently; Luke xi. 14, 15), and elicited His warning that they were verging towards the unpardonable sin against the Holy Ghost, viz. the expression of their inward hatred of what they knew and felt Divine so as to lose the power of fulfilling the conditions required for forgiveness. On the evening of the same day from a fishing vessel He spake the series of parables beginning with that one recorded by all the three synoptical Gospels, that of the sower, as His eyes rested on the cornfields reaching to the margin of the lake. At the close the apostles took away from the lingering multitude their wearied Master "as He was" (Mark iv. 36), in the vessel towards the eastern shore. A storm wind from one of the deep ravines in the high plateau of Julan, which "act like gigantic funnels to draw down the winds from the mountains" (Thomson, Land and Book) and converge to the head of the lake, burst upon the waters (Luke viii. 23, "came down" appropriately, for the lake is 600 ft. lower than the Mediterranean), and the ship filled and they were in jeopardy. His word sufficed to quell the sea in the world of nature, as previously the demons in the spirit world. On reaching the eastern shore the two Gergesene demoniacs (of whom the prominent one alone is noticed by Mark and Luke) met Him. The tombs where was their home still are visible in the ravines E. of the lake. The manifold personality of the one, his untamable wildness, self mutilation with stones, his kneeling, shouting, and final deliverance are graphically told by Mark (v.). By our Lord's command he became first preacher to his own friends, and then in Decapolis (Luke viii. 39).

On Christ's return to the western shore followed the raising of Jairus' daughter with studied privacy (contrast the public raising of the Nain widow's son, each being dealt with as He saw best for them and for His all wise ends), preceded by the cure of the woman with the issue of blood. Again He visited Nazareth and taught on the sabbath. The same incredulity of His countrymen (John i. 11), though now expressed by contempt rather than by violence as before, showed itself: "is not this the carpenter?" etc. (Mark vi. 1-6, referring probably to His having worked with Joseph the carpenter in youth.) Their unbelief, which made Him "marvel" stayed His hand of power and love (Isa. lix. 2); but even the promiscuous and exceptional cures He wrought there manifested His Divine grace and power.

Soon after John Baptist's murder the twelve returned and "told Jesus all they had done and taught" (Mark vi. 39, etc.), and He considerably invited them to retire to the farther side of the lake for rest, to the neighbourhood of Bethsaida Julias. Five thousand people soon broke in on His retirement, and instead of sending them away He first fed their souls, then their bodies, making them sit on the green grass table land N.E. of the lake, or else the plain by the Jordan's mouth (Luke ix. 10-17). The miracle constrained them to confess, "this is of a truth that prophet that shall come into the world"; it is one of the seven selected by John to be recorded. On the same evening that the Jerusalem multitudes were having the paschal lamb slain for the feast, He the true Lamb in eastern Galilee was feeding other multitudes, and on the following day in the Capernaum synagogue discoursed on the bread of life and His flesh which must be eaten in order to have life (John vi. 22, etc.).

From ministering in Judea He had gone to minister in eastern Galilee, which was the more Judaized part. Now He proceeds to the more Gentile part, viz. northern Galilee. Teaching and preaching characterized this period, as miracles had the former. Thus a progressive character is traceable in Christ's ministry. Luke devotes to this period only from ix. 12 to 50, Mark from vi. 45 to the close of ix.

Matthew gives the fullest record of it. Christ's performance of miracles was regulated by the faith of those to whom He ministered; amidst the imperfect faith of the northern frontier lands little scope for them was afforded, and they were few.

After feeding the 5000 Christ directed His disciples (Mark vi. 45) to cross to Bethsaida (not Julias at the head of the lake, but on the W. at Khan Minyeh, or Bat-Szaidu, meaning "the house of fish," a name likely to belong to more than one place on a lake so famous for fish. The gale which brought boats from Tiberias to the N.E. coast, but delayed a passage to the W., must have been from the S.W.; John vi. 23. Therefore the Bethsaida here was a town on the W. coast which the apostles were making for, but in vain). It was "evening" (Matt. xiv. 15), i.e. the first evening or opsis, between three and six o'clock, towards its close, before the 5000 sat down, the day being "far spent" (Mark vi. 35). At the beginning of the second evening (from sunset to darkness) after six the disciples embark (John vi. 16), and before its close reach the mid lake (Mark vi. 47, Matt. xiv. 24) and encounter the gale which, beginning after sunset, was now at its height. For hours they made slow progress, till Jesus "in the fourth watch" came walking to them on the waters (the attribute of God: Job ix. 8, Ps. lxxvii. 19). He had "departed into a mountain Himself alone" because He perceived that the people would come and take Him by force to make Him king (John vi. 15). Now He comes to the relief of His disciples. "He would have passed them," to elicit their faith and prayers (Mark vi. 48, Luke xxiv. 28); also leading the way toward the desired haven. Then followed Peter's characteristically impulsive act of faith, and failure through looking at the dangers instead of to Jesus, and his rescue in answer to his cry (Ps. xciv. 18). This miracle "amazed the disciples sore beyond measure," so that "they worshipped Him, saying, Of a truth Thou art the Son of God." The people on the E. side of the lake followed after Jesus to the W. side in some of the boats which had come from Tiberias (the W. side), and found Him at Capernaum. It was the 15th day of Nisan, a day of "holy convocation, in which no servile work was done," the day succeeding the passover eve (Lev. xxiii. 6, 7). Appropriately, as His miracle of the leaves the evening before answered to the passover, so His discourse in Capernaum synagogue on Himself as the Bread of life (in His incarnation "coming down from heaven," and in His atoning death where He gave His flesh "for the life of the world," appropriated by faith, John vi. 35, 50-52) was on the day of holy assembly the first of the seven. [See CAPERNAUM.] Less malignity appears in His hearers than on His former visit (Luke vi. 7, 11); for the emissaries of the hostile faction from Galilee, Judaea, and Jerusalem, were away celebrating the passover in the metropolis. Some doubters and cavillers of the hostile party (called by John "the Jews," John vi. 41) murmured at His calling Himself "the Bread which came down from heaven." But the multitude who had come after Him in the earlier part of His discourse questioned in a less unfriendly spirit. Some disciples "went back and walked no more with Him"; but Peter in the name of the twelve declared "we are sure that Thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God" (Sim. and Vat. and other best MSS. read "THE HOLY ONE OF GOD"; received reading is evidently a marginal correction from Matt. xvi. 16). The reference to the Eucharist can only be indirect, for it was not yet instituted: the saved thief on the cross never partook of it; "the son of perdition," Judas, did. The eating of His flesh which is essential to salvation can only therefore be spiritual (ver. 63).

Healings in the Gennesaret plain near Capernaum for a few days followed (Matt. xiv. 34-36; Mark vi. 55, 56). Pharisees and scribes then came from Jerusalem (Matt. xv. Mark vii.). Having craftily gained entrance into the disciples' social meetings they observed and now charge Jesus with His disciples transgressing the tradition of the elders which forbade eating with unwashed hands. He in reply condemned them because they also transgressed God's fifth commandment, to honour parents, and in their hearing calls the multitude and warns the latter that defilement comes from within, not from without. Both the truth and the publicity grievously offended the Pharisees. Herod very shortly before, perplexed on hearing the fame of Jesus, had surmised with others that "this is John Baptist risen from the dead, and therefore mighty works do show forth themselves in him" (Matt. xiv. 2). The I is emphatical in Luke ix. 9: "John have I beheaded, but who is this?" Guilty conscience recalls his perpetrated murder, and fills him with superstitious fears. Sadducean unbelief on the other hand whispered that his fears might be groundless after all. So he desired to see Him to satisfy himself.

Eastern Galilee was no longer a safe place for Jesus and His apostles, therefore the Lord withdrew to the N.W. to the confines of Tyre and Sidon (Mark vii. 24, Matt. xv. 22) for quiet seclusion, where He might further instruct the twelve. He did not cross into the heathen territory, but a Syro-phenician woman crossed from it to Him. Descended from the Canaanite idolaters who fled to the extreme N. from Palestine on its conquest by Israel, she yet exhibited a faith which triumphed over repeated trials whereby the Lord designedly tested it. She extended His mission beyond "the lost sheep of the house of Israel" to include her. Counting herself a "dog" she by faith was counted by God His child (Gal. iii. 26). The demon was cast out, her child healed, and herself commended for a faith which almost surprises the Giver of it, and which was irresistible with Him: "O woman, great is thy faith! Be it unto thee even as thou wilt." Thence He returned through the half heathen Decapolis, which was almost wholly on the E. side of the sea of Galilee. The Vat. and Sin. MSS., besides the very ancient NS. of Beza and others, old Latin, Vulg. and Copt. MSS., read Mark vii. 31, "from the coasts of Tyre He came through Sidon unto the sea of Galilee." This implies that Jesus actually passed on to the heathen Sidon, the stronghold of Baal and Astarte worship. Thus the climax of mercy was reached; an earnest of the extension of His kingdom, after His ascension, from Jerusalem to Judea, from Judea to Samaria and half Judaized half heathen Galilee, and from thence to the uttermost parts of the Gentile world (Acts i. 8). Thence He began His southeastern circuit through Decapolis to the shore E. of the sea of Galilee. A deaf man with an impediment in his speech was cured there. In his case and that of the blind man at Bethsaida Julius there is the peculiarity (probably to awaken attention to His act in both the patient and the unspiritual crowd) that He took each away from the crowd and He used the action of touching (comp. 1 John i. 1 spiritually; Dan. x. 15, 16; Ps. li. 15; Eph. vi. 19) and spitting (comp. spiritually Ps. xxiv. 8) on the parts affected; and in the blind man the cure was gradual (comp. Mark iv. 31, 32; vii. 32-35; viii. 22-25). The half Gentile Decapolitans thereupon glorified the God of Israel (Matt. xv. 31), drawn by the Divine Son to recognise the Father and to take Israel's God for their God. Then followed the feeding of the 4000 with seven loaves (probably on the high ground E. of the lake near the ravine opposite to Magdala, now wady Samak). The place was near that of the feeding of the 5000; but the number of loaves in the miracle of the 4000 was greater; the number of the fishes also ("a few" among the 4000, only two among the 5000: Mark vi. 33; fish naturally would be forthcoming, the apostles being fishermen and near the lake); the number of baskets of remnants less (seven spurides, but from the 5000, 12 kophinai); the number of people less; the time they had been with Jesus longer, three days, only a day in the case of the 5000 (Mark vi. 33-35, viii. 2). The impulsive coast villagers of the N. and W. (for they had run on foot after our Lord from the W., round the N. end of the lake, and received accessions to their numbers from Bethsaida Julius: Mark vi. 33, Matt. xiv. 13) would have made Jesus Christ a king had He not withdrawn (John vi. 15). The Decapolitans and men of the E. coasts made no such attempt. The 4000 Decapolitans were mainly Gentile; the 5000 N. and W. Galileans were Jewish. The distinction (though unobserved in the English "baskets") is accurately maintained between the spurides of the miracle of the 4000 and the kophinai of the 5000. When our Lord refers back to both miracles (Matt. xvi. 9, 10), with the undesignated minute accuracy that characterizes truth He says, "Do ye not remember the five loaves of the 5000; and how many kophinai ye took up? neither the seven loaves of the 4000, and how many spurides ye took up?" Comp. Gr., Matt. xvi. 9, 10, with Matt. xiv. 20, xv. 37. Spuris expresses in Acts ix. 25 the basket in which Paul was let down, therefore it was capacious. Kophinos was the common provision basket, therefore smaller; there were 12, as each of the apostles carried one. Possibly the amount of remnants in the seven spurides was as much as, or more than, that of the 12 kophinai. The company of 5000 sat on "the green grass, much" of which was in the place (Mark vi. 39, John vi. 10); the 4000 sat "on the ground" (Matt. xv. 35, Mark viii. 6).

Next He crosses to Magdala (on the W. of the lake, now el Mejdal, a village of a few huts; Sin. and Vat. MSS. read Magalan) or to Dalmanutha (from darab, pointed, i.e. among the cliffs) in its neighbourhood (Mark viii. 10, comp. Matt. xv. 39). The Pharisees for the first time now in concert with the Sadducees hypocritically (for they had no real desire to be convinced) desired a "sign from heaven, tempting Him." The only sign He vouchsafed to this spiritually "adulterous" generation, which could not discern the signs of the times, was that of Jonah. Jesus was about to cast Himself into the angry waves of justice which would have otherwise overwhelmed us, as a peculiar victim, and then rise again on the third day like the prophet. His stay was brief. Embarking again in the ship in which He had come (Mark viii. 13), and warning His disciples against the leaven of their doctrine, He comes to Bethsaida Julius and heals the blind man, with significant actions accompanying the healing, and by a gradual process.

Next He journeys northwards to Caesarea Philippi. In this region occurred Peter's famous confession of Jesus Christ as "the Christ the Son of the living God," a truth which Jesus charged them not to make known, as His time was not yet come and premature announcement might have excited popular outbreaks to force on His kingdom. There is a "fulness of time" for which all God's dispensations wait. Here also for the first time formally Jesus announced what seemed so contrary to His Divine claims, His coming death, which offended Peter and brought on him sharp rebuke as his previous confession brought him praise. Here too, six days later (Mark ix. 2, Matt. xvii. 1; "about eight days after," Luke ix. 28), occurred the transfiguration on mount Hermon near Caesarea (Mark ix. 3, where the reading "as snow," omitted in Sin. and Vat. MSS. but supported by Alex. MS., that of Beza, and the oldest Lat. and Vulg., favours snowy Hermon, which is moreover near Caesarea Philippi, in the neighbourhood of which the transfiguration took place, not Tabor with a fortified town on its top). Moses and Elias appeared with our Lord, to show that the law and the prophets were fulfilled in Jesus Christ, whose "decease" was the subject of their conversation (Luke ix. 31), the very thing from which Peter shrank (Matt. xvi. 21-23). The glory then revealed was a counterpoise to the announcement of His sufferings, from which Peter had shrunk, and would confirm the three primates among the twelve so as not to lose faith because of His sufferings foretold just before. (Matt. xvi. 21, 27, 28; xvii. 1, etc.) The following day, on His descent from the mount, He found the scribes questioning with the disciples respecting their inability, through defective faith, to cure a deaf and dumb demoniac. What a contrast! heavenly beings on the mount, devils and unbelieving disciples below! His face still beamed with the glory of the transfiguration, just as Moses' face shone after being in Jehovah's presence (Exod. xxxiv. 29-35); so that "the people were greatly amazed, and running to Him saluted Him" (Mark ix. 15). The Lord rebuked the "faithless" (the disciples; comp. before, Matt. xvii. 19-21) and perverse (the scribes) generation"; the demoniac's paroxysm became more violent "when he saw Him" (Mark ix. 20; so in the case Luke ix. 34), so that he fell foaming and wallowing. The father said, "if Thou canst do anything, have compassion"; Jesus replied [The question is not, if I can do, but] "if thou canst believe; all things are possible to him that believeth." With tears the father cried, "Lord, I believe, help Thou mine unbelief." Seeing the people running together, and the father's faith having been now proved, Jesus by a rebuke cast out the demon, and with His hand lifted up the lad, almost dead with the reaction (as Mark describes with the vividness of an eyewitness, Peter being his prompter).

Next the Lord turned S., and at Capernaum by a miracle paid the half shekel apiece, for Himself and Peter, appointed to be paid by every male from 20 years old for the temple service (Exod. xxx. 13; 2 Kings xii. 4; 2 Chron. xxiv. 6, 9). The late demand of the tax levied months before is attributed by Hp. Elliott (Life of Jesus Christ) to the Lord's frequent absences from Capernaum. As son of the temple's King He might claim exemption from the temple tribute, but His dignity shone only the brighter by His submission. Elation at their Master's power now bred contention among the disciples for preeminence; instead of laying to heart His prediction of His being delivered into wicked men's hands, they did not even understand His meaning and were afraid to ask Him. Forgetting their own late inability through want of faith to cast out the demon at the foot of the transfiguration mount, they forbade one casting out demons in Jesus' name, because "he followed not with them." (This combined with the confidence implied in his character, Mark x. 38, 39, shows that John had not merely the feminine softness and meditative quiet commonly assigned to him, but was also a "son of thunder," implying fiery zeal: 2 John 10, 11; 3 John 9, 10). The Lord replied, "Forbid him not, for he that is not against us is for us" (Luke ix. 50). This is the maxim of charity towards others. The seemingly contrary maxim (xi. 23) is that of decision in regard to ourselves. (Therefore the Gr. in ix. 50 is hos ouk esti, but in xi. 23 ho me on.) We are to hail the fact of the outward adhesion of others to Christ's cause in any degree, the judgment of their motive resting with Him; but we are to search our own motives, as before Him who knows them and will judge us accordingly. Comp. Num. xi. 28, Acts xv. 8, 9. A misgiving that they had acted wrongly probably suggested John's mention of the fact after Jesus set the little child in the midst and said, "whoever shall receive one of such children in My name receiveth Me": the man in question had used Christ's name without avowedly receiving Him; not numbered among the apostles, yet by faith exercising apostolic powers. At this period lowliness, guarding against offending the little ones at any earthly cost, love and forgiveness, illustrated by the parables of the one lost sheep and the unforgiving though forgiven debtor, were the chief subjects of Christ's teaching (Mark ix. 33-50, Matt. xviii.).

Here a new and distinct phase of Christ's ministry begins, "the time that He should be received up" (Luke ix. 51). This period begins with His journey in October to the feast of tabernacles, and ends with His arrival at Bethany six days before the passover. The priestly party's design to kill Him was now matter of public notoriety, and the Pharisees sent officers to take Him (John vii. 25, 30, 32). From Luke ix. 51 to xviii. 15 Luke's Gospel has no parallel notices in Matthew and Mark, except xi. 17, xiii. 18, probably the repetition of the same truths on a later occasion (Mark iii. 24, iv. 30). From xviii. 15 Luke coincides fully with Matthew and Mark. The connection is earlier renewed; comp. Luke xvii. 11 with Matt. xix. 1, 2, Mark x. 1; Luke alluding to the journey from Ephraim (John xi. 54) through "Samaria and Galilee," Matthew and Mark through Peræa "beyond" or "the farther side of Jordan." But at xviii. 15 the account of the blessing of the infants undoubtedly reunites the three synoptists. The notes of time and place in the portion of Luke (ix. 51-xviii. 15) are vague, the Holy Spirit's design there being to supply what the other evangelists had not recorded and which He saw fit for the edification of the church. John supplies three chronological notices of three journeys toward Jerusalem in this period. Luke ix. 51-53 answers to His journey to the feast of tabernacles (John vii. 10), when "He went up not openly, but as it were in secret," so that it was only because "His face was as though He would go to Jerusalem" that the Samaritans would not receive Him. "The time that He should be received up" includes not merely His last journey thither, but the whole period between the close of His regular ministry and His last passover; a season preparatory for His death and His being received up, and preceded by prophecies of it (Mark ix. 31). Again Luke xiii. 22 corresponds to John x. 40, xi. 1. His second journey three months later toward Jerusalem, but not reaching farther than Bethany, from beyond Jordan whither He had withdrawn. He had remained previously in Judæa between the feast of tabernacles and that of the dedication (John vii. 2, 10; x. 22, 40). His third journey, in Luke xvii. 11, answers to Matt. xix. 1, Mark x. 1, and to His previous retirement to Ephraim, near the wilderness or hill country N.E. of Jerusalem (John xi. 54); and shortly precedes the last passover.

Soon after the feast of dedication Jesus Christ retired to the Peræan Bethany (John x. 40), and during His stay there many believed on Him, the place where John baptized suggesting the remembrance of his testimony concerning Jesus Christ and how true it proved to be. Thence began His second journey towards Jerusalem (John xi. 7, Luke xiii. 22) ending at Bethany (John xi. 47, 54), whence He turned to N.E. to Ephraim; thence the third journey began through Samaria, Galilee, Peræa, to Bethany six days before the passover, about April 1, A.U.C. 783.

His brethren (cousins) practically disbelieving His Godhead, yet recognising His miraculous power, urged Him to go to Judea, and display there those wondrous works which might attract to Him that public acceptance which, as worldly men, they took it for granted was His aim (contrast John vii. 3, 4 with v. 41, 44): "no man doeth anything in secret, and he himself (personally) seeketh to be known openly," as Thon who claimed to be Messiah must necessarily desire to be. He replied to them, as to His mother formerly, "My time (for being glorified) is not yet come," "I go not up yet unto this feast" (Sin. MS. and MS. of Beza read "I go not up unto," i.e. in your carnal, self-seeking spirit, I go not up to it at all; but Vat. MS. and Vulg. support A.V. reading, "not yet"). "He went up as it were in secret," subsequently, after His brethren; not to work astounding wonders, but to win souls from among those gathered to the feast. His disciples accompanied Him; their way was through Samaria, the less frequented route than Peræa (Luke ix. 52, 54). One at least showed the same zeal to follow Jesus which had appeared among the Samaritans at His former visit (John iv.); but Jesus pathetically told him now, "Foxes have holes, . . . the Son of man hath not where to lay His head." A similar answer to a scribe in Matt. viii. 19-21 is differently connected, the same incident probably occurring twice. Jesus about the midst of the feast went up to the temple, and taught the throngs crowding now in its courts. The residents of Jerusalem (John vii. 25, as distinguished from both "the people," ver. 20, or general multitude, and the hostile "Jews," ver. 15) expressed wonder that the rulers allowed Him whom notoriously they sought to kill to speak openly, adding that He could not be the Christ, since they knew whence He was. But many of the multitude believed (31) because of His miracles. The priestly party thereupon sent officers to take Him. Fear of the multitude and the awe inspired in the officers by hearing Him ("never man spake like this man," 45, 46) prevented His immediate apprehension; and Nicodemus' pertinent and bold (59, contrast him John iii. 2) question, appealing to their own law which, with all their boasting of it, they were violating, stayed further proceedings. Meantime Jesus had for the first time publicly announced to the adverse "Jews" His removal: "ye shall seek Me and not find Me, and where I am thither ye cannot come" (34, 36); and on the last and great day of the feast (the eighth, a solemn sabbath, Lev. xxiii. 36), alluding to the libations on the altar, of water from Siloam, on each of the seven previous days, He invited all to come to Him for the living waters of the Spirit which He was to give upon His ascension (John vii. 37, 39). The account of the woman taken in adultery follows; not in Sin. and Vat. MSS. Elliott on the authority of some cursive MSS., and because of its style resembling Luke's, and because of similar temptations of Jesus occurring in Luke xx., transposes it to the end of Luke xxi.; but see above. Then followed His discourse concerning the Father's testimony combining with His own: "the Father hath not left Me alone, for I do always those things that please Him" (John viii. 29); words which converted many of His opponents. These He taught that it is only by "continuing in His word" that they can become disciples indeed, and know and be made free by the truth. The objection of some that they were free already, as being Abraham's seed, drew forth His reply that, like Abraham's seed, Ishmael, cast out of the house as son of the bond-woman, so they, as long as they committed sin, were its bondslaves, not sons of the free, who alone abide in the Father's house for ever (Gal. iv. 23-31). He further charges those seeking to kill Him for telling the truth with being children of the devil, a murderer and liar from the beginning. They sneered at Him as a Samaritan, possibly because of His converse with that people for their salvation (John iv.). He challenges them, "which of you convicteth Me of sin?" and declares that Abraham, whose seed they claimed to be, rejoiced to see His day, and was glad, and that "before Abraham was (came into created being, Gr.) I am" (essentially). Understanding this rightly to be a claim to Godhead, they would have stoned Him but that He passed through their midst, as in Luke iv. 30.

On the sabbath He healed the "beggar" (John ix. 8, "seen him that he was a beggar," Sin., Vat., Alex. MSS.), blind from birth; anointing his eyes with clay, and making the cure depend on his going and washing in Siloam. The noteworthy features in the man were implicit faith (contrast Naaman's pride at first, 2 Kings v.); fearless confession of the miracle to his neighbors and the hostile Pharisees; disregarding consequences, even at the risk of expulsion from the synagogue, which his very parents shrunk from; his brave retort on their "we know that this Man is a sinner," with "I know . . . I was blind, now I see . . . we know that God heareth not sinners"; his simplicity confounding the wise, his belief in and worship of Jesus Christ as the Son of God (he had previously believed in His being the Son of man) as instantly on Jesus revealing Himself as he had obeyed His direction for the cure of his bodily blindness. Then followed the loving discourse on Himself as the Good Shepherd and the Door.

Next He sent forth the seventy (Luke x. 1), their number intimating the coming worldwide extension of the gospel, for at the feast of tabernacles shortly before (John vii.) sacrifices, according to custom, were offered for 70 heathen nations as representing the world; whereas the twelve represented Israel alone (Matt. x. 5), to whom the first gospel offer was restricted. During the interval between the feast of tabernacles and that of the dedication (John x. 22) comes the series of discourses beginning with the good Samaritan (Luke x. 25) and ending with the cure of the woman with a spirit of infirmity (xiii. 10-17). The rich fool and the barren fig-tree (xii. 16, xiii. 6) are characterized by a feature frequent in the parables in Luke, they are suggested by some incident. Judaea probably was the scene; here in Bethany at this time Jesus visited Mary and Martha (x. 38). The cure of a "dumb" demoniac (xi. 14, 15) and the Jews' blasphemy seem to have occurred now a second time; the blasphemy originating first with the Pharisees (Matt. ix. 32-34, xii. 22-24) "a devil blind and dumb" was reiterated by others. The enmity of the priestly party was intensified by His open denunciations of their hypocrisy (Luke xi. 39-54). The cure in the synagogue on the sabbath of the woman bound by Satan 18 years was made ground for censuring Him on the part of the rulers; but He so answered that His adversaries were shamed to silence, and the people all rejoiced.

After a two months' ministry in Judaea, on the FEAST OF DEDICATION [see] (John x. 22, 23), about December 20, He was again at Jerusalem. Formerly in Galilee He had forbidden His disciples to divulge His Messiahship (Matt. xvi. 20); but now openly in Solomon's porch (the cloister on the E. side of the temple had in part escaped burning, 2 Kings xxv. 9), which afforded some cover, it being "winter," He proclaims His Divine oneness with God (John x. 30). Jewish custom did not at this time assign the title "the Son of God" to Messiah (x. 24). S. Jesus did not plainly avow Himself Messiah to the Jews whose Messianic hopes were carnal and the watchword of rebellion, but includes it in the higher title proclaiming His Godhead. Thereupon a third time (v. 18, viii. 50, x. 34) the Jews sought to kill Him for blasphemy, now as on the second occasion taking up the stones that lay about the cloisters which had suffered from fire in the revolt against Sabinus, and were being restored (Josephus, Ant. xvii. 10, § 2, xx. 9). The Gr. (ebastasein) implies not merely "they took up" (eran, viii. 59) hastily stones," but deliberately held them in their hands ready for use; so ver. 32, "for which . . . do ye stone (are ye stoning) Me?" Jesus Christ replies, If God calls the rulers to whom the word of God (constituting them such) came, "gods," as being His representatives, a fortiori He who is the Word of God "whom the Father sanctified and sent into the world" (John xvii. 18, 19; Luke i. 35) may claim without blasphemy to be "the Son of God."

He thereupon withdrew to the scene of John Baptist's ministry, Perea Bethany (the oldest reading for Bethabara, near the Jordan ford nigh Jericho) (John x. 40, i. 28). Here He stayed till His second journey to Bethany nigh Jerusalem (Luke xiii. 22), which He moved "toward" slowly, "teaching" in the several "cities and villages." The Pharisees seeking to get Him again in Judaea to kill Him, and impatient of His success in Perea, urged Him to "depart," on the plea that "Herod would kill Him." But Herod's aim was that He should depart, being perplexed whether to honour or persecute Him (ix. 7, 9); the Pharisees' aim was to get Him out of Herod's land, where He was comparatively safe, to Judaea where they might kill Him. Herod used the Pharisees as his tools. So, reading the hearts of both, He said, "Go tell that fox, behold I do cures to-day and to-morrow (i.e. for two days in his territory), and the third day I shall be (I am being, i.e. soon and certainly) perfected," i.e. shall begin that journey which (though retraced from Ephraim, John xi. 54) will be the last to Jerusalem (for the second journey ended in Bethany, then back to Ephraim, thence to Jerusalem), and to My sacrifice to be there perfected. (Comp. the apostles' fear of that journey as likely to close in His death, John xi. 8, 16.) This naturally suggested the pathetic apostrophe to Jerusalem (Luke xiii. 34, 35), which with some variation He repeated later, after His triumphal entry into Jerusalem. The people's acclamation, "blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord" (i.e. having His attributes, comp. Exod. xxiii. 21 end), was but a partial pledge of His prophecy's final fulfilment, a slight earnest of Israel's universal acceptance of Messiah hereafter (Luke xix. 38; Mark xi. 9; Zech. xii. 10, xiv. 9). A sample of His "cures to-day and to-morrow" is given (Luke xiv.), that of the dropsical man (one of the seven performed on the sabbath) in the chief Pharisee's house, who had invited Him for the purpose of watching Him. He answered the cavil as to the cure on the sabbath, as in xiii. 15. Naturally at the Pharisee's entertainment He exhorted the entertainer in making a feast to invite the poor, and to look for his recompence at "the resurrection of the just"; also in answer to a guest's remark He spake the parable of the great supper. The crowding of "all the publicans" to Him (xv. 1) would be likely in the productive region near the Jordan's fords, where they were numerous. The Pharisees' murmurs thereat drew from Him the parables of the lost sheep, the lost coin, the prodigal son; and to His disciples, in the Pharisees' hearing (xvi. 1, 14), the unjust steward and Lazarus and the rich man. It was just before this Jesus received the sisters' message as to Lazarus' illness. Jesus' thoughts would be upon him; naturally then He would use the name (= Eleazar, God's help) in the parable; the words "neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead," are thus prophetic; so far from being persuaded by His raising Lazarus presently after, they sought to kill both Him and Lazarus (John xi. 53, xii. 10, 11).

From Perea, where He received Mary and Martha's message (x. 40, xi. 1-6, 7), after two days' delay (the "to-day and to-morrow" of Luke xiii. 33), He proceeded a two days' journey (from Jordan to Jericho two miles, thence to Jerusalem 18) to Bethany, where Lazarus had been four days dead. His raising Lazarus there, whereby He conquered corruption as well as death, converted even some of His adversaries (John xi. 45) and attracted crowds to see the raised man; the multitude of eyewitnesses in His train were met by the people from Jerusalem, who heard of the miracle, and who had come to the feast, so that a vast number with palm branches escorted Him at His triumphal entry upon an ass colt, crying "Hosanna, blessed is the King of Israel that cometh in the name of the Lord," fulfilling Zech. ix. 9.

On the other hand the miracle roused the Pharisees to convene a council, at which they expressed their fears that if they let Him alone all would believe on Him, and the Romans take away their nation. Whereupon Caiaphas under the Spirit said, "It is expedient that one man should die for the people, and the whole nation perish not"; the Spirit intending thereby that He should die for Jews and Gentiles, Caiaphas meaning thereby only a pretext for killing Him (John xi. 49-52; comp. 2 Pet. i. 20). Jesus therefore withdrew to EPHRAIM [see] (ver. 54), on the borders of Samaria, 20 miles N.E. of Jerusalem; here He stayed a month or five weeks. Then began His third and last journey recorded by the three synoptical Gospels, "through the midst of Samaria and Galilee, probably meaning on the border between Samaria and Galilee" (Luke xvii. 11), to Bethany, six days before His last passover at Jerusalem. On the Samaritan frontier probably He healed the ten lepers, and received the adoring thanks of the only grateful one, the Samaritan (ver. 16-18), a miracle characterized by the cure not taking place till the subjects proved their faith by obedience. In His passing through Galilee the Pharisees asked when the kingdom of God should come. His reply foretells the concomitants of the Lord's coming; the parable of the unjust judge follows, which shows that importunate prayer "day and night" is the means whereby the now widowed elect church will bring the Lord in person to vindicate her speedily (Isa. xlii. 6, 7; Acts xxvi. 7; Luke ii. 37; 1 Tim. v. 5), in opposition to Satan's accusations "day and night" (Rev. xii. 10).

From Galilee He passed to the parts of Perea near Judea, where He had preached shortly before (Matt. xix. 1, Mark x. 1). "He came to the frontiers of Judea, His route lying on the other side of Jordan" (Ellicott); multitudes followed Him whilst there, and were healed. The Pharisees questioned Him about divorce, to compromise Him with either the school of Hillel who allowed divorce "for every cause," or the school of Shammai who allowed it only for adultery; also to endanger Him with the adulterous tetrarch in whose dominions He then was. In beautiful contrast to their cunning follows the parents' bringing of "their infants" (Gr. Luke xviii. 15) "that He should lay His hands on them (in sign of blessing them) and pray" (Jas. v. 16). Jesus' prayers, as He is God not merely "man," avail not only much but altogether. Here also lived the rich youth whose amabilities Jesus loved, but whose love of his possessions kept him from the sacrifice which Jesus required.

Now Jesus goes before on the way to His death. The disciples, "amazed" and with forebodings, follow (Mark x. 32). With like steadfastness He had set His face toward Jerusalem at His former journey (Luke ix. 51, comp. Isa. l. 7). Privately He foretells to the twelve His coming death and resurrection (Mark x. 31-33), to the multitude He avoids giving offence by announcing it. Even the twelve so little understood Him, their minds being full of temporal Messianic expectations, that James and John coveting the highest and nearest place to Christ prompted their mother Salome to beg it for them, as they were ashamed to ask it themselves. He reaches Jericho, and heals two blind men, of whom BARTIMEUS [see, for reconciliation of seeming discrepancies, also JERICO] was the prominent one, who importuned the Lord on His entry and was healed with another blind man as Jesus left Jericho. Their cry "Thou Son of David" anticipates by faith that of the palm bearing multitude escorting Zion's King and David's Heir to His capital. Near Jericho Zaccheus, a rich publican, from a sycamore sought to see Jesus, not from mere curiosity but with a heart yearning for "salvation," which accordingly in the person of Jesus spontaneously came to his house, whereas like the publican (Luke xviii. 13) he would have been content to be allowed even to "stand afar off." "All murmured at Jesus going to be guest of a sinner." Still they cherished hopes of His now setting up the kingdom of God "immediately" at Jerusalem (xix. 11). Jesus checks this expectation as to its immediate realization, but confirms its ultimate consummation in the parable of the pounds (distinct from the talents, Matt. xxv. 14, 15).

Six days before the passover He reached Bethany (John xii. 1), on Friday Nisan 7, or Friday evening, just after the sabbath began, i.e. in Jewish reckoning Nisan 8. These six days are as momentous to the new creation as the six days of Gen. i. to the original creation. In the mountain hamlet of Bethany, 15 furlongs E.S.E. from Jerusalem (John xi. 18), He passed His last sabbath. In the house of Simon the leper, whom doubtless Christ had healed (Matt. xxvii. 6; some guess him to be the one grateful leper of the ten, Luke xvii. 16, 18, but he is designated "a stranger" and "Samaritan"), and who was a close relative or friend (father according to Theophylact, husband others say), of Martha, the sisters made a feast in honour of Jesus (John xii. 1-3). Martha served, Lazarus the raised one was at table. Mary lavished her costly ointment, which proved to be for His burial; Judas hypocritically pretended concern for the poor as if this cost were waste, but Christ immortalized her for the act (Mark xiv. 1, 3-9). This provoked Judas' spite, so that Mark records it in connection with "two days before the passover," when Judas made his bargain with the chief priests (Matt. xxvi. 12-14), instead of in its right place six days before the passover. Matthew and Mark for the same reason record the feast after the triumphal entry instead of before it (the right place), in order to connect Judas' bad spirit at the feast with his subsequent treachery.

BETHANY.

The triumphal entry followed on the day succeeding the sabbath (our Lord's day); the thrice repeated "these things" marks the disciples' act, Zechariah's prophecy of it (ix. 9), and their subsequent recognition of its being the prophecy's fulfilment (John xii. 16). Christ's route was the most southern of three routes from Bethany to Jerusalem. On coming "over against Bethphage," separated by a narrow valley from His route, He sends His disciples for the ass and "colt" (anass, the animal used in peace, Jud. v. 10, x. 4, as the horse for war, was the fit bearer of "the Prince of peace") "tied by the door without in a place where two ways met," saying, "the Lord hath need of them" (contrast Acts xvii. 25, Ps. l. 10-12. What condescension that He should stoop to need anything from His creatures!). On coming in sight of Zion, the city of David, from the ridge of the S. slope of Olivet, "the whole multitude of disciples first" raised the HOSANNA [see], then the general multitude going before, and that which followed Jesus (the two latter because of the miracle upon Lazarus; John xii. 12, 17, 18, see above), took up the cry (Luke xix. 37, Matt. xxi. 9, Mark xi. 9). They cast their garments on the colt as a saddle, and in the way as a token (still practised) of honour. Their acclamations were in the inspired psalmist's (cxviii. 26) and the angels' words (Luke ii. 14), substituting "peace in heaven" for "peace on earth"; comp. Col. i. 20, contrast Rev. xii. 7. At one point of the southern route, from a ledge of smooth rock, the whole city burst on Jesus' view, rising as "out of a deep abyss" (Stanley). In this His hour of triumph He wept over it, seeing its coming doom, because it "knew not the time of its visitation," though He wept not over His own near agony. [See JERUSALEM, on the fulfilment of His prophecy that the foe should "cast a trench about, and compass round, and keep it in on every side."] Josephus estimates from the 256,500 lambs sacrificed, allowing ten for every lamb, that two and a half millions attended the passover. Thus the temporary recognition of Jesus as their Messianic King, and the subsequent rejection of Him, were the acts not merely of the sanhedrim but of the nation (Acts ii. 36, iii. 14, 15; Mark xv. 9-13; John xviii. 40). His temporary triumph was no result of an appeal to the multitude's political prejudices, no false enthusiasm in Him. His tears over the city as doomed were utterly opposed to the general expectations of an immediate earthly deliverer of the Jews from Rome. The acclamations were overruled to suit a then spiritual kingdom, of which salvation (as Hosanna, "save we pray") is the prominent feature, though expressing also a future visibly manifested kingdom (Rom. xi. 26, Heb. ix. 28). Jesus therefore, so far from forbidding them, told the objecting Pharisees, "if these should hold their peace the stones would immediately cry out" (Luke xix. 40, comp. iii. 8). He repaired at once to His Father's house, "and when He had looked round about upon all things (with one all-comprehensive glance that instantly detected the desecration at its height in the Gentiles' court), and now the eventide was come, He returned to Bethany with the twelve."

Early on the morrow (Monday) He went forth from Bethany, and on His way cursed the precociously leafy but fruitless FIGTREE [see], from which He had vainly sought figs to allay His hunger (comp. Heb. iv. 15); emblem of the early privileged, professing, but spiritually barren people of God, now doomed (Heb. vi. 7, 8). Next He purges again the temple at the close of His ministry, even as He had done at the opening of it (John ii. 13, 14). His former cleansing had not prevented the resumption of usurious and thievish (Jer. vii. 11) gains in exchanging Gentile for temple coin, and in selling doves, and in carrying vessels through the Gentiles' court, interrupting all devotion, so that God's house ceased to be "an house of prayer for all nations" (Mark xi. 17, Isa. lvi. 7). Now He was not armed with the "whip of small cords" as before; awe of His majestic presence sufficed to check all opposition whilst He overthrew the tables and cast out the sellers.

Works of mercy followed judgment; the blind and lame came to Him, though at all other times excluded (Matt. xxi. 14; Lev. xxi. 17, 18; 2 Sam. v. 8; Acts iii. 2), as Lord of and greater than the temple (Matt. xii. 6), fulfilling Hag. ii. 6, 9, Mal. iii. 1. The children about took up the cry of their elders on the previous day, "Hosanna to the Son of David!" The ruling priests, full of "fear" for their own influence being supplanted and "envy" (Mark xi. 18, Matt. xxvii. 18), indignantly remonstrated with Him, and heard that it was the due fulfilment of Ps. vii. 2, "out of the mouth of babes . . . Thou hast perfected praise." Again He returned to Bethany.

Next day (Tuesday) on His way to the city the disciples saw "the figtree dried up from the roots." Jesus thence drew the lesson, already taught after their inability to cast out the demon (Matt. xvii. 20), that faith can remove mountains and believing prayer attain all our desires. But lest the previous miracle should mislead them, as if faith would enable them to take vengeance on enemies, He charges them to forgive others whenever they prayed, else God would not forgive them (Mark xi. 20-26). Again in the temple He preached early to the people hanging on His lips (Luke xix. 48 ["were very attentive," exekremato], xxi. 38). A deputation from the sanhedrim, consisting of chief priests (heads of the 24 courses), scribes (expounders and transcribers of the law), and elders (heads of the Jews' chief families), questioned Him, "by what authority doest Thou these things?" viz. the temple cleansing and the cure of the blind and lame in it which they had witnessed (Matt. xxi. 15). If He replied by a claim of Godhead it would afford a charge before the sanhedrim against Him; if not, why did He act as Divine, misleading the people? He replies by a question situated between the like alternative difficulties into which they tried to draw Him: "the baptism of John, was it from heaven or of men?" It was fit they should declare their view of John's mission first, for John had testified to a similar deputation of them the answer to the very question they now ask concerning Jesus (John i. 19-27). They reply, "we cannot (really will not) tell." Then by two parables, those of the two sons, and the vineyard, He showed them their perversity individually and nationally, and its fatal end. The publicans were the son that said to God's commands, "I will not," but afterwards repented; the Pharisees, etc., were the second son, who hypocritically professed but never performed. The husbandmen slaying the heir points to their murderous designs as official representatives of the nation; the nation's rejection is foretold as the just punishment of their rejecting Messiah. Again, when perceiving His meaning and wishing to seize Him the chief priests were deterred by fear of the multitude, He spake the parable of the marriage of the king's son.

The hypocritical Pharisees enlisted their political opponents, the time-serving Herodians, to entangle Him into some speech which would compromise Him with Caesar's stern representative, the Roman procurator Pontius Pilate. Feigning themselves sincere inquirers on a case of conscience, they ask, "Is it lawful to give tribute unto Caesar or not?" Judas the rebel of Galilee (Acts v. 37) made this his plea, that "God alone is king." The temple of God, thronged with passover keepers on one hand, and the Roman fortress Antonia at its N.W. corner on the other hand, suggested conflicting answers. His tempters flattered Him first that He might answer it is not lawful; "we know Thou art true and teachest the way of God in truth, neither carest Thou for any man, for Thou regardest not the person of men." If so, Pilate would have had no scruple about shedding His blood at the altar, as he had mingled other Galileans' blood with their sacrifices (Luke xxi. 1). If He said it is, His influence with the multitude who looked for Messiah to shake off Rome's yoke would be lost. [See HERODIANS for His reply.] To give to Caesar what is Caesar's is not giving a gift but paying a due. Duty to God and duty to Caesar are not to be put in opposition, but to be united in all lawful things, for by God Caesar rules (Rom. xiii. 1). The rabbins themselves owned, "where the king's coin is current, there the inhabitants recognise the king" (Maimonides, in Gezelah, 5). Marvelling at His answer, His foes by their silence admitted its force.

The Pharisees and Herodians having been foiled, the Sadducees, who in spite of denying a future life had members in the sanhedrim, try Him with a question: "when seven brothers in succession had the same wife without issue, according to the law (Deut. xxv. 5, for the Sadducees accepted the law but rejected tradition), in the resurrection whose shall she be?" He tells them: "ye err, because (1) ye know not the Scriptures, (2) neither the power of God" (Mark xii. 24). In the very pentateuch ("Moses showed at the bush," i.e. in the passage concerning the burning bush) which ye quote, God's declaration (Exod. iii. 6) "I am the God of Abraham" suffices to prove Abraham lives, for God said it to Moses when Abraham's body was long dead, and "God is not the God of the dead but of the living." Moreover, when God covenanted with Abraham he was in the body, therefore God's promise will be fulfilled to him not as a disembodied spirit but in his renewed body. "God is not ashamed to be called their God, for He hath prepared for them a city" (Heb. xi. 16). The functions of life require the presence of the body. Abraham's soul now receives blessings from God, but when raised in the body will live unto God, even as Jesus "in that He liveth liveth unto God" in the resurrection life (Rom. vi. 10, 11). Further you ignore (in your disbelief if not in your question) God's power to make those counted worthy to obtain the resurrection from the dead (Phil. iii. 11, 21) equal to the angels, no longer marrying as in the earthly state (1 Cor. vi. 13, 14), nor liable to death, but fully enjoying the perfections of "the children of God, being the children of the resurrection" (Luke xx. 27-38, Rom. viii. 23, 1 John iii. 2, 1 Cor. xv. 44). The multitude were astonished; even certain scribes said, Thou hast well said; and one, whilst the mouthpiece of his party who "tempted" Jesus (seeking to compromise Him with some of the conflicting schools of religious opinion), had a real desire himself to learn from Him who had shown such marvellous spiritual wisdom "which is the first commandment of all?" (comp. Matt. xxii. 35 with Mark xii. 28.) Jesus put first love to God supremely, then love to one's neighbour as one's self. The scribe's better feelings, breaking through the casuistry of party, heartily recognised that such love is "more than all whole burnt offerings and sacrifices." Jesus commended him, "thou art not far from the kingdom of God." A lawyer had once before (Luke x. 25) similarly answered Jesus' query, "what is written in the law?" which was our Lord's reply to his tempting question, "what shall I do to inherit eternal life?" But that lawyer's definition was an answer to the general question as to the whole law's substance; this lawyer tried whether Jesus would single out one command as preeminent above the rest. Then Jesus, having baffled His foes' attempts to entrap Him as to His authority, politics, doctrine, and speculative opinions, and having left them unable to ask further, in His turn asks the silenced Pharisees and scribes in the people's hearing, "How say they that Christ is David's Son?" They could or would not see that as man He is David's Son, as God David's Lord. Rev. xxii. 16 is the answer, at once "Root" and "Offspring" (Is. ex. 1, Acts ii. 31). Upon their silence avowing their defeat He adds the warning to them. Matt. xxiii., closing with repeating the apostrophe to Jerusalem (comp. Luke xiii. 34, 35).

After denouncing them as "devouring widows' houses," as "He sat over against the treasury" He beheld the rich casting in much into the chests, 13 in number, the openings shaped like trumpets, narrow above, broad below (Lightfoot); a poor widow, such as Jesus said were the scribes' victims, came and cast in two mites, her all, (she might have kept one, but she gave both: Mark xii. 40-41), illustrating "love to God with all one's strength" (ver. 30, 2 Cor. viii. 12). They gave of their abundance, she of her penury (Luke xxi. 4). So her act is in everlasting remembrance, a pattern to all ages. Whilst still He was within the temple precincts, perhaps in the women's court, the farthest they could enter, giving them too the privilege of hearing Him, certain Greeks accosted Philip, "we would see Jesus." Philip with wise caution told Andrew his fellow townsman of Bethsaida (John i. 41, xii. 20-22). Being "Greeks" (not merely Hellenists or Greek speaking Jews) they were "proselytes of the gate," wont to attend the great feasts; instinctively they apply to one whose Graecised name attracted them, and who belonging to Galilee of the Gentiles would sympathise with them in their desire to see "the Light to lighten the Gentiles." Jesus accepted this as a pledge of His speedy glorification and the gathering in of the Gentiles; addressing ver. 23 to Philip and Andrew, and the rest of His reply in the hearing of the Greeks and the people (29). From nature He takes the seed corn as an image; if falling into the ground and dying, it continues no longer solitary, but multiplies itself manifold. "His (human) soul was troubled," not at mere physical death, but at death in its close connection with sia, from which the Holy One shrank, but which now is to be laid immediately on Him though none was in Him. "Save Me from this hour (if it be possible, consistently with saving men); but (as it is not possible, I willingly meet it, for) for this cause came I unto this hour" (Luke xxii. 53). He shrank too from the now renewed and sharpest conflict with the powers of darkness deferred "for a season" after the temptation (Luke iv. 13, xxii. 42-44, 53). But God's glory (John xii. 28, etc.) was still uppermost in His desires: "Father, glorify Thy name." That filial cry, so honouring to God, brought, as at His baptism and His transfiguration (Luke iii. 21, 22; ix. 29-35), the audible echo of His prayer, "I have both glorified it and will glorify it again"; to the people it seemed only "thunder," to the more receptive a speech, which they thought an angel's; to His own intimate disciples the Father's words, which one of them, John, records. Jesus declared this voice to be for their sakes, a pledge of Satan's overthrow, and of His own drawing all to Himself in His death.

Jesus then hid Himself from His foes, and from the people who notwithstanding His miracles believed not, fulfilling, according to John, Isaiah's prophecy (vi. 1, 9, 10), the evangelist identifying JEHOVAH there with Jesus here (John xii. 39-41). Several "chief rulers" however believed; but, fearing expulsion from the synagogue by the Pharisees, they did not confess Him (ver. 42, 43; v. 44); contrast the noble blind beggar (ix. 34-41). Before His leaving the temple a disciple, remembering His former words, "behold your house is left unto you desolate" (Luke xiii. 35), remarked on the stupendous stones of the temple (Mark xiii. 1, Luke xxi. 5), implying that its speedy overthrow seemed amazing. He confirms His former prophecy, adding "there shall not be left one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down." Upon reaching Olivet, as He sat facing the temple on the W., Peter, James, John, and Andrew, as spokesmen of the twelve who were present, ask Him privately, "when (1) shall these things be, and what the sign of (2) Thy coming and of the end of the world?" (the consummation of the age, Gr.) Matt. xxiv. 3; Mark xiii. 3, 4. Their idea connected Christ's coming with the destruction of the temple and the Jewish theocracy. Jesus makes this destruction to prefigure that of the outward church of Christendom by the apostasy which shall immediately precede His visible personal coming to gather His elect (2 Thess. ii.). At Matt. xxiv. 28, 29 He passes from the destruction of Jerusalem to its antitypical analogue, the destruction of the apostate church and the antichristian confederacy at the Lord's coming to judge them and gather the saints and His dispersed elect nation Israel. The corrupt Jewish church was then the "carcase" with the human form, but not the life reflecting God's image; the eagles were the Roman world power. The apostate woman or harlot must therefore be judged by the beast or world power on whom she had leaned instead of upon God (Rev. xvii.). The same eternal principle (Ezek. xxiii.) shall be manifested again, when apostate Christendom shall be judged by the God-opposed world (to whom she has conformed) in its last form, antichrist. Then on the same Olivet on which Jesus sat, and from which He ascended, shall He descend and judge antichrist and save Israel (Zech. xiv. 4; Ezek. xi. 23, xliii. 2). Luke parts the answers to the two queries into separate discourses: xvii. the end of the age or dispensation, xxi. the destruction of Jerusalem; adding also that when "the times of the Gentiles" are fulfilled, and "Jerusalem trodden down of the Gentiles" the appointed time, "they shall see the Son of man coming in a cloud with power and great glory." The "beginning of all these things coming to pass," i.e. the events preceding Jerusalem's overthrow, about to take place in "this generation," is a pledge that the rest will follow, as the budding "fig-tree" indicates summer's approach. "But of that day (in contrast to 'all these things' in 'this generation') knoweth no man," etc. (Matt. xxiv. 32, 34, 36; Luke xxi. 24-32). The parables of the ten virgins and the talents, and the explicit description of the King's separation of the sheep and the goats, complete the answer to the disciples' question and to the Saviour's public ministry.

The sanhedrim consulted together, during Jesus' retirement (John xii. 36) on the Wednesday (Matt. xxvi. 3), "how to kill Him by subtlety"; but it was ordained to be a public act of Jews and Gentiles, kings and people, together. So Satan now entered Judas Iscariot, "the son of perdition" (a title restricted to him and antichrist: John xvii. 12, 2 Thess. ii. 3), and availing himself of his Master's retirement he went and covenanted to betray Jesus for 30 pieces of silver (Luke xxii. 3). The last supper He celebrated so late on Thursday as to be really on the beginning of the 14th Nisan, the day of killing the lamb in preparation for the passover. The 14th Nisan, though not strictly part of the festival but one day before the time (John xviii. 28), was popularly counted so and called "the first day of unleavened bread" (leaven being carefully put away): Matt. xvi. 17, Luke xxi. 8-11. [But see PASSOVER for a different view of John.] On His disciples asking where He would have them to prepare for Him the passover, He sent Peter and John to follow a man whom they should meet bearing a pitcher of water into the house, and say to the owner of the house (evidently a disciple), The Master saith, Where is the guest-chamber where I shall eat the passover with My disciples? The message implies something extraordinary and unusual; also Luke xxii. 15, "with desire I have desired to eat this passover." John xix. 14 calls the day "the preparation of the passover," i.e. the day before it; the sabbath in that passover week was "a high day" (xix. 31, 42), because it coincided with the sacred Nisan 15. The day on which Jesus suffered was Nisan 14, on the eve commencing which day He ate the passover supper. The priest party had despaired of taking Him at the feast because of His popularity: "not on the feast day, lest there be an uproar of the people" (Mark xiv. 2). After His triumphant entry they had said, "perceive ye how ye prevail nothing? behold the world is gone after Him" (John xii. 19). How then did it come to pass, He was crucified at the time of slaying the lamb between 12 and 3 o'clock, 14th of Nisan? Pilate did not wish it, nor Herod, nor the Jews originally. It was God's ordering, carried out by agents unconsciously fulfilling the prophetic types and announcements (Acts iv. 25). That on the day of His crucifixion there was not the sabbatical rest proper to Nisan 15 appears from Matt. xxvii. 59, 60; Mark xv. 21, 42, 46; Luke xxiii. 54, 56. He died the very day and hour (the ninth) when the paschal lamb was slain. Exod. xii. 6 marg., "between the two evenings," i.e. from afternoon to sunset about two hours and a half (1 Cor. v. 7). John xiii. 1, 2 expressly says the supper was "before" the passover feast. In A.D. 30, the year of His crucifixion, Nisan 14 was on Friday, which accords with this view.

"Supper having begun" (John xiii. 2; not "being ended"; γενομενον, "having begun to be"), Jesus performed an act of condescending love (twice before performed by woman's love for Himself: Luke vii. 38, John xii. 3) well calculated to repress the spirit of rivalry among the disciples as to who should be nearest Him (Luke xxii. 24-30). Rising from table, laying aside His garments, taking a towel, and pouring water into a basin, He began to wash His disciples' feet (even perhaps the devil-moved Judas' feet) and wipe them with the towel. He then drew the lesson: if I your Master have washed your feet (a slave's office) ye also ought to wash one another's feet. The converted jailer did so literally (Acts xvi. 33). All Christians should in spirit do the same "by love serving one another" (Gal. v. 13; vi. 1, 2); especially in regard to our brethren's faults, which are the soils contracted by the feet in the daily life walk, and which need the Lord's washing (Rom. xv. 1, Heb. xii. 13). Jesus "troubled in spirit" testified, "one of you shall betray Me," speaking generally. "One of the twelve that dippeth with Me in the dish" (Mark xiv. 20, fulfilling Ps. xli. 9), then specially indicating to the beloved disciple privately (which He could do from John's "lying on Jesus' breast"), "be it to whom I shall give a sop," and giving it to Judas. Vat. and Sin. MSS. make Peter (reclining on the other side of Jesus) first, and then John, ask Jesus, "Who is it?" reading, "Simon Peter beckons, and saith to Him, Say, who is it?" Alex. MS. reads, as A.V., Judas among the rest (John xiii. 22, Luke xxii. 23) asked, "Master, is it I?" Jesus replied (It is as) "thou hast said" (Matt.

xxvi. 22, 25). After receiving the sop Judas yielded himself up wholly to Satan, and immediately went out in the night. It was "after supper" Jesus took the cup and made it the sacrament of His blood. But after this still Jesus saith, "the hand of him that betrayeth Me is with Me on the table" (Luke xxii. 20-22, 1 Cor. xi. 25); so that the giving of the sop to Judas must have been after both the paschal supper and the Lord's supper. The fulfilment of the passover in Himself He marks in Luke xxii. 16-18; He institutes the Lord's supper (ver. 19, 20); the strife which should be greatest elicited His condescension in washing the disciples' feet (ver. 24-30). The announcement of Judas' treachery and his departure took place either before the washing (Luke) or after it (John), the Spirit marking the chronological order in one Gospel, the spiritual in the other. Loving ministrations to the brethren is to be shown, even though false brethren be present, for we are not the judges; much more so when all are true brethren in Christ. "Drink ye all" implies that the whole twelve, Judas included, were at the Lord's supper. His words "I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine until I drink it new with you in My Father's kingdom" point on to the marriage supper of the Lamb at His coming again (Matt. xxvi. 29, Rev. xix. 9, 1 Cor. xi. 26). He alludes to the fruit of the vine just consecrated as a sacrament in His similitude, John xv. 1, which chapter and xvi., xvii. (in the latter of which He reviews His all but finished work, and commends it and His beloved disciples to the Father), He spoke in the act of departure from the paschal chamber, being the resumption of His discourse (xiv. 31). He evidently lingered among His loved ones, it being His last opportunity of private communion with them, and confirming them against the trial under which He foresaw their faith would temporarily fail, before going to the agony of Gethsemane (Luke xxii. 31-34).

Crossing the Kedron brook at the foot of the ravine which divides Olivet on the E. from the city, He reached His favourite resort, the garden named from its soil presses (Geth shemance); here the True Olive was bruised to give light to the world (Exod. xxvii. 20). Leaving the rest in its outskirts, with Peter, James, and John, whom He took at once to be eyewitnesses to the church of His agony and to afford Him their sympathy, He advanced from the moonlit part into the deep shade thrown by the rocks and buildings on the other side of the ravine. Matt. xxvi. 37-40: "watch with Me." There is a beautiful gradation in His prayer. Shrinking from contact with Satan, sin, and death (Luke xxii. 41, 53), He knelt and fell forward on the earth (Mark xiv. 35) a stone's cast distant from the disciples, praying (1) "if it be possible (consistently with Thy glory and man's salvation) let this cup pass from Me, nevertheless not as I will but as Thou wilt." (2) "Abba, Father, all things are possible unto Thee," etc. (lest He in His first prayer should seem for a moment to doubt the Father's power.) (3) "Father, if Thou be willing," etc. (for Thy will is the only limit of Thy power.) (4) "If this cup may not pass away from Me except I drink it, Thy will be done." (5) John's record (xviii. 11), though not mentioning the AGONY [see] at all, yet undesignedly coinciding with the synoptical Gospels in giving Jesus' subsequent words, the climax of His victory of faith, "the cup which My Father hath given Me shall I not drink it?" Vat., Alex., and Sin. MSS. omit Luke xxii. 43, 44 as to the angel strengthening Him, and His using that imparted physical strength only to agonize in prayer even to bloody sweat, falling in drops to the ground. But MS. of Beza, the Guelferbitine MS. and the oldest Latin versions have the verses. Thrice Jesus returned to the slumbering apostles, each time to find them slumbering, and so having lost the precious opportunity which afterwards they would look back on with bitter regret; but for their want of watchfulness they might have comforted their Lord by sympathy, a work which angels might desire, and which in lack of their human ministry an angel, so far as strengthening Him was concerned, supplied. As it was, He endured the conflict bereft of human sympathy and alone.

A band from the Roman cohort stationed in Antonia came now, under the guidance of the priestly party's officers, elders, captains of the temple, chief priests, and Judas, with torches and lanterns, though it was full moon, to prevent the possibility of escape under the shadow of the olive trees. Jesus in calm dignity came forth to meet them. The traitor gave his studied kiss (kataphileo, not merely phileo). Jesus is first to question them, "whom seek ye?" "Jesus of Nazareth." "I am He." At the words they fell back to the ground; the Divine I AM showed how they were at His mercy and how voluntary was His surrender. So He could dictate His terms in behalf of His disciples, for whom His only solicitude was (John xviii.). These in their turn sought to defend Him, and Peter with the sword rashly smote off the highpriest's servant Malchus' ear, which Jesus immediately healed with a touch, and uttered His meek protest at their coming out as against a thief. Then the disciples all fled, among them a young man having a linen cloth (stoudon, elsewhere used only of a shroud) cast about his naked body; the young men laid hold on him, and he fled naked, leaving the linen cloth. Possibly Lazarus, who hastily put it on, the trophy of his restoration, and followed Jesus from Bethany, roused up on hearing of Jesus' seizure in Gethsemane across the Olivet ridge; or else Mark himself (xiv. 50-52). John and Peter soon returned.

Jesus was bound and led for a private informal examination (till the sandalrim met) before Annas first, who though deposed by the former Roman procurator, Valer. Gratus, from the highpriesthood, wielded much of its real power, being regarded as highpriest in point of right, and being fitter in law to the actual one Caiaphas. The two had a common official residence. Annas questioned Jesus about His disciples and teaching; Jesus told him to ask those who had heard Him, whereupon an officer struck Him with the palm of his hand. Peter's three denials now took place; and the second cockerowing, at the beginning of the fourth watch, between three and four o'clock, announced the first dawn, just as Jesus was being led to Caiaphas across the court where Peter was standing. (Transl. the Græcorist, John xvii. 24, "Annas sent Him bound unto Caiaphas"). The sanhedrim was already assembled at Caiaphas' house, the case being urgent and privacy suiting their purpose: "as soon as it was day" (Luke xxii. 66) refers to the close of the trial which he summarises. Beginning it before day was informal (Gemara Babyl. Sanhedr., vi. 1); but the council went through the form of producing witnesses whose testimony so disagreed that it broke down (Mark xiv. 55-59). "He opened not His mouth," as was foretold (Isa. lvi. 7), alike before the scornful Herod and before the legal but unjustly proceeding tribunal, the sanhedrim. Before Annas' informal examination He replied with repelling dignity; before Pilate with forbearing condescension witnessing to the truth. The highpriest, foiled in his hope from the false witnesses (Isa. xxix. 20 end), himself adjoins or puts Jesus under the obligation of an oath (Lev. v. 1), asking "art Thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?" Tradition held that Messiah should build a more glorious temple; so the testimony of the false witness as to Jesus' saying that "in three days He would build one without hands" suggested the highpriest's question. Jesus avowed, "I am, and moreover (besides My assertion) ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power (not 'nevertheless,' but furthermore, moreover: Matt. xxvi. 64), and coming in the clouds of heaven" (as foretold Dan. vii. 13). This claim to Godhead was the ground of His condemnation by the Jews (John xiv. 7). Caiaphas (standing up) rent his clothes (from the neck straight down in front, not behind). The excited sanhedrim put a ran the same question (Luke xxii. 70), and on His reaffirming His Divine Sonship without further witnesses condemned Him as a blasphemer and "guilty of death" (Lev. xxiv. 16, Deut. xviii. 20).

After the grossest insults to the meek Sufferer, spitting (Isa. l. 6), buffeting, and jeers, after covering His face, Prophecy who smote Thee? His foes assembled the court again in full numbers in (rather "about," q.v.) the morning (Mark xv. 1) and led Him to Pilate, who alone had power to execute sentence of death. The judgment hall, or governor's residence, was Herod's former palace in the upper or western city. The wretched traitor, blinded by covetousness and disappointed ambition, now first sees the atrocity of his act, forces his way into the inner sanctuary (Matt. xxvii. 5, naos) of the priests, in despairing remorse exclaims "I have betrayed the innocent blood," and is told that is no concern of theirs but his, things down the price of blood, and, Abithophel like (2 Sam. vii. 23), went and hanged himself; then "falling headlong, he burst asunder, and all his bowels gushed out" (Acts i. 18, 25); so "he went to his own place" (Isa. xxx. 33).

The council members, true to their characteristic straining out gnats whilst swallowing camels (just as the priests would not put the 30 pieces into the treasury as being the price of blood) similarly stood with their Prisoner before Pilate's residence, not entering the Gentile's house, to shun defilement, shrinking from heaven but not from innocent blood. Pilate comes out to answer their demand for the Prisoner's execution, and with the Roman regard for legal forms requires to know the accusation against Him. They evade the question at first (John xviii. 30), then answer, "we found this Fellow perverting the nation, forbidding to give tribute to Caesar, saying that He Himself is Christ a king" (Luke xxiii. 2); the very thing they tempted Him to, but which He foiled them in so admirably (Matt. xxii. 21). How subtly they changed their accusation from the religious ground, which they held before the highpriest, to what was the only one Pilate would entertain, the political! The Roman governor was too shrewd not to discover speedily that Jesus' claim to kingship was such as constituted no crime against Caesar, and that the charge was the offspring of religious animosity; he knew them too well to believe they would persecute one to death for seeking to deliver them from Rome. Ironically he replied (John xviii. 31) to their first evasive answer (30), "If your decision must be accepted as final, then 'judge' i.e. execute, Him 'according to your law'; but as Rome reserves capital cases to its jurisdiction, both the judicial trial and execution belong to me, and I will not be your mere executioner. It was divinely ordered that Rome should be His executioner, that Jesus' prophecy of His mode of death should be fulfilled, crucifixion being the Romish, stoning the Jewish punishment, one which the Jews had more than once attempted to execute on Him for blasphemy. To the priests' "many" specific accusations Jesus answered nothing (Matt. xxvii. 12-14), so that Pilate marvelled. Jesus' majestic bearing awed and attracted him. His affirmative answer to the governor's query (though He would not answer the priests), "art Thou a King?" "to this end was I born that I should bear witness of the truth," elicited Pilate's question of pity for the impractical Enthusiast as He seemed to this practical man of the world, "what is truth?" Pilate waited for no answer, for he regarded "truth" in religion as the dream of visionaries, underving the attention of sensible men of the world and politicians.

"The Gentile people then regarded all religions equally true, the philosophers equally false, and the magistrates equally useful."

On the accusers mentioning "Galilee" as the starting point of His teaching Pilate made it his plea for sending Him to Herod, who was then at Jerusalem a worshipper (!) at the passover (comp. Acts xxv. 9). Hereby he at once shifted the responsibility off himself, and conciliated by this act of courtesy a ruler whom he had previously offended (Luke xiii. 1, xxiii. 5-12). Herod had long desired to see a miracle wrought by Jesus, but when foiled in his superstitious curiosity he mocked and arrayed Him in a gorgeous robe as a mock king, and sent Him back to Pilate (ix. 7-9, Matt. xiv. 2). Superstition and profanity are near akin and soon succeed one another.

A second time He stands before Pilate, who was now fully satisfied that He was innocent. The governor calls together the priests and people, and tells them that neither he nor Herod had found any guilt in Him, but proposes, in order to satisfy them, to scourge Him, whom he himself pronounced innocent! This concession betraying his readiness to concede principle to external pressure only stimulated them to demand more loudly His execution. The people meanwhile were clamouring for the customary release of a prisoner to them at the passover. Pilate still hoped the multitude who had so recently escorted Jesus in triumph would, upon being appealed to, call for Jesus' release, for he knew that His apprehension was the act of the envious priests not of the people (Mark xv. 8-13). But the chief priests moved the people to call for Barabbas, a notorious robber, city insurrectionist, and murderer. Ascending the judgment seat (a movable tribunal from which judgments were given), in this case set on a pavement, the Gabbatha (from gab, Heb., a ridge on which it was laid) in front of his official palace, he receives a message from his wife (by tradition named Proenla, who probably had previously heard of Jesus; contrast Herod's bad wife as to John, Matt. xiv. 1-8. Former Roman laws prohibiting magistrates taking wives with them were now ignored) warning him, "have thou nothing to do with that just man, for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of Him." He now puts it to the people whether they will have Jesus or Barabbas, and they with prompted unanimity clamour, "not this Man, but Barabbas." The disappointed governor, from no natural tenderness but from the workings of conscience, remonstrated with them, "why, what evil hath He done?" But trifling with convictions and delay in duty could only have one result. Pilate yields to the threatening tumult, and by symbolically washing his hands (Deut. xxi. 6, 7) tries to transfer from himself to them the guilt of the innocent blood; but in vain, for to all ages the Christian creeds brand his name as Jesus' judicial murderer, "suffered under Pontius Pilate." The people all accepted that awful legacy of guilt, to the misery of themselves and of their children to this day.

Then followed the preliminary scourging, the crown [see] of thorns, the reed as a mock sceptre put in His right hand, and the smiting His head with the reed, and spitting on Him, the scarlet robe (the soldiers' cloak): the Gentiles' mockery, as the Jews' mockery had been before. Pilate made a last appeal to their humanity at that moving sight, Jesus coming forth wearing the thorn crown and purple robe, "Behold the Man." The priestly cries were only the more infuriate: "Crucify Him; by our law He ought to die, because He made Himself the Son of God." Pilate returned to question Jesus. Receiving no answer, he said: "Knowest Thou not that I have power to crucify and to release Thee?" Jesus answered (John xix. 11): "Thou couldest have no power against Me except it were given thee from above; therefore he (Caiaphas) and the Jews: Mark xv. 1, John xi. 48-52) that delivered Me unto thee hath the greater sin." Pilate, to whom the supreme Judge delegated power as a magistrate, sins indeed in letting himself be another's tool to kill Jesus against his convictions; but Caiaphas, who had not this plenary power of execution but who had the power given of knowing Jesus' Divine Sonship, and yet delivered Jesus to Pilate to be executed, has the greater guilt, for he sins against light and the clearest evidence. The Lord's words awed and moved Pilate to make a last effort to save Him. But convictions all gave way before the dangerous cry, "if thou let this Man go thou art not Cæsar's friend, whosoever maketh himself a king sinneth against Cæsar." He knew well how small a matter was enough to ground a charge of treason on before the cruel and jealous Tiberius; but he escaped not by sacrificing Jesus, but was disgraced, banished by the emperor, and died by his own hand: we often bring on us the evil we fear, by doing evil to escape it. Again he mounts the judgment seat to give the unjust sentence, yet shows that his own moral sense revolted against it by his bitter taunt against his instigators, "behold your King." Away with Him; crucify Him." "Shall I crucify your King?" "We have no king but Cæsar." God took them at their hypocritical word. Judah's "sceptre" centred in Jesus the "Shiloh" (John xviii. 33); delivering Him up to Rome, they delivered up their kingdom until Israel's final restoration (Gen. xlix. 10); meantime "unto Him is the gathering of the (Gentile) people." Pilate passes sentence, and Jesus, stripped of the scarlet robe, is led to GOLGOTHA [see], a slightly rising ground without the gate. The sanhedrim members were the crucifiers, the Roman soldiers but the instruments (Acts v. 30).

Luke (xxiii. 27-31), who especially records the women's ministrations, mentions that "a great company of women bewailing followed Him; but Jesus turning said, Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for Me but for yourselves and your children": viz. for the woes coming on Jerusalem; since if He the green (ever living, fruitful) vine suffer so in judgment for men's imputed sin, how terrible will be the judgment of the impenitent who as a dry withered branch (void of life and fruit of righteousness) are cast forth (John xv. 1 Pet. iv. 18). The Saviour's exhausted strength now sank under the cross; Simon of Cyrene, passing by as he came in from the country, is laid hold upon to bear it after Jesus (an enviable honour spiritually: Luke xiv. 27). They offer vinegar and gall to stupefy Him; but He will consciously meet His pain in all its unmitigated bitterness. They strip off His outer mantle and inner vest, and then crucify Him, the sacred body being raised aloft and the feet being separately nailed. The apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus represents a linen cloth to have been bound round His loins.

Pilate wrote the trilingual title over His head, and would not alter it for the chief priests, "Jesus of Nazareth the King of the Jews" (John giving the Gr. form; Matthew the Heb., "This is Jesus the King of the Jews"; mark with characteristic brevity the Lat. without admixture of foreign words, "The King of the Jews," to which Luke prefixes "this is" from the Heb.). The three elements of humanity appear here united by Him on the cross: Greek refinement; Roman law, polity and dominion; and Hebrew Divine revelation. God made Pilate in spite of himself proclaim a blessed verity, which the Jews' remonstrance could not make him retract: His kingship of the Jews the mean of universal blessing to the Gentiles. The soldiers divided in four the outer mantle, and cast lots for the seamless inner vest: the former (as Elijah's mantle fell on Elisha, so Christ's on His church) symbolising the diffusion of the gospel externally to the four world quarters, the latter the inner unity of the true church. As the Jewish church represents the unity, so the Gentile churches the diversity and worldwide diffusion. The four soldiers then sat down, stolidly impassive as they watched Him. It was now, when they crucified Him, the third hour or about nine o'clock (Mark xv. 25, 33); His death was six hours subsequently at the ninth hour. John calls the hour of His sentence the sixth hour (ix. 14); John probably counted the hours differently from the Jewish mode, and in the Asiatic mode, so that Pilate's sentencing Jesus was at six o'clock in our mode of counting from 12 midnight to 12 noon, and the actual crucifixion was at nine.

Between nine and twelve o'clock occurred the mockeries by the ruling priests, the soldiers, the passers by, and the thieves; whereas the people "stood beholding" probably with silent relentings (Matt. xxvii. 39-43, Luke xxiii. 35-37). The arch tempter's voice betrays itself again under his agents' taunt, "if Thou be the Son of God" (Matt. iv. 3, 6). "Himself He cannot save," because He cannot deny Himself, and He had covenanted man's redemption; and, such is His love, He cannot sacrifice us by saving Himself. "He saved others." Yes, He came to seek and save the lost, they unconsciously confess. Throughout God provided for His Son's glorification amidst His sufferings: the priests who could find no witness against Him, Herod, Pilate, the soldiers decking Him as a king, the penitent thief (robber), and the centurion. From His cross as a throne He gave admission to paradise to the penitent, "remembering" when there His former companion in sorrow, as worldly men seldom do (Gen. xi. 14, 23). From it too He committed the bereaved virgin mother, who with Mary her sister, Clopas' wife, and Mary Magdalene, stood by, to John's care. That apostle at once took her away from the harrowing scene (Luke ii. 35, John xix. 27; in undesigned coincidence with which the virgin is not mentioned among the women "beholding afar off," but Mary Magdalene is, Matt. xxvii. 55, 56), and returned in time to witness what he records in ver. 28-37.

Sympathising nature at the sixth hour spread a supernatural pall of gloom over the land till the ninth hour; comp. Amos viii. 9. He all this time, unseen by mortal gaze, encountered the last desperate onslaught of the powers of darkness amidst the infinitely more trying darkness of the Father's withdrawal of His consciously felt presence, of which the external gloom was but the shadow. No evangelist records the mysteries of these three hours. The first glimpse of them we get is the complaining yet trusting cry (Isa. l. 10) from the Son at the close, His pent up feelings seeking relief in the prayer, "My God, My (Mine still though I be apparently forsaken) God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" (Ps. xxii. 1, comp. Job xiii. 15.) Like the psalm, which begins with His fidal cry of complaint yet trust, and ends in triumph, so Jesus, who appropriated the 22nd Psalm, passed inwardly and outwardly from darkness to brightness. As the bright light illumined the night of His birth (Luke ii. 9), so it dispelled the gloom at His death directly after and in consequence of His cry (Heb. v. 7). When the darkness cleared away there stood the inscription "The King of the Jews," foreshadowing His coming reign over Israel and the nations in the flesh with His transfigured saints. The Jews, knowing well His meaning, yet blasphemously perverted His moving cry, Eli, My God, into a mock, as though He called for Elias. One of them however in mercy offered a sponge with vinegar (the soldier's acid wine refreshing to the palate) when He said, "I thirst," whilst the rest checked him, saying, "let be, let us see whether Elias will come" (Matt. xxvii. 48, 49; Mark xv. 36); he took up their contemptuous phrase, yet, under cover of mockery, perseveres in his humane act. With a loud cry of redemption accomplished for man, "It is finished." His farewell to men, and then trustful committal of His spirit to God, "Father, into Thine hands I commend My spirit," His entrance greeting to paradise, Jesus gave up the ghost.

His sentences on the cross were the perfect seven: Luke xiii. 34; 43; John xix. 26, 27; Matt. xxvii. 46; John xix. 28; 30; Luke xxiii. 46. The physical cause of His death seems to be rapture of the heart; so Ps. lxxix. 20, "reproach hath broken My heart." Crucifixion alone, not touching any vital part (Mark xv. 44), would not soon have killed Him, as it did not the thieves (John xix. 31-33). His bloody sweat on the chilly night, and His piercing cry, Eli, Eli, etc., prove the intensity of the strain on His heart. His loud voice just before He died shows He did not die of exhaustion. The pericardium, or sac in which the heart pulsates, bursting, the blood separated into crassamentum and serum, so that when the soldier thrust the spear in the side "blood and water" flowed out. The rending of the temple veil answers to His flesh, i.e. pericardium, burst open, whereby spiritually a new and living way, by water and blood (1 John v. 6), i.e. the sanctifying Spirit and the justifying atonement, is opened to us into His inmost sanctuary, His heart, as well as His immediate presence (Matt. xxvii. 51, Heb. x. 19-22). But Christ voluntarily Himself laid down His life (John x. 18). The highpriest on the day of atonement entered on one side of the veil, but now it "was rent in the midst . . . in twain, from the top to the bottom." "The earth quaked, the rocks rent, graves opened, at the moment of the death of Him who by death conquered death, and many saints' bodies arose, and came out of the graves (not till) after His resurrection (for He being 'the first-fruits' of the resurrection must take precedence of them: 1 Cor. xv. 23, Col. i. 18), and appeared unto many" during the 40 days of His post resurrection's journ. The centurion in charge, and those with him, were awestruck in seeing the earthquake and the things done, and, remembering His claim for which the Jews condemned Him (John xix. 7), are constrained to confess "truly this was the Son of God." Transl. Luke xviii. 47, "truly this Man was righteous," i.e. justified in His claim to the Divine Sonship for which He was condemned.

The centurion's spiritual perception was deeper than that of the others with him: they were astonished by the earthquake, he also by the Divine words and tone in which Jesus sealed with His dying breath His Sonship ("when he saw that He so cried out," "with a loud voice," Mark xv. 37, 39, "Father into Thy hands I commend My spirit," a deliberate voluntary delivering up of His "spirit," as an act in His own power, John x. 18). Like Simon the type, "He slew more at His death than in His life" (Jud. xvi. 30). "All the people" who came as spectators, at the prodigies, the darkness and earthquake, now smite their breasts in unavailing self reproach, renewed afterwards on pentecost (Acts ii. 37). So also the women who stood "afar off" (Ps. xxxviii. 11).

Two now come forward to honour His sacred body. Joseph, a rich man of Arimathea, "a disciple of Jesus (waiting for the kingdom of God), but secretly for fear of the Jews . . . went boldly (now casting off unworthy fear) to Pilate and craved" it. Pilate marvelled if He could be already dead, but on the centurion's testimony freely gave Joseph the body. The Father rescued that holy temple from the indignity of committal to one of the two common sepulchres of malefactors. Joseph "wrapped in linen" and took the body to "his own new sepulchre (a loculus tomb, with rolling stone at the cave entrance [see Tomb]) which he had hewn out in the rock," "wherein was never man yet laid"; it was "in the garden, in the place where He was crucified." Nicodemus, who at first "came to Jesus by night," now fearlessly in open day comes forward to honour with a princely gift of 100 pounds of mixed myrrh and aloes, to be sprinkled freely in the linen swathes wrapping the body of the Crucified One. (Isa. liii. 9, 12.) Like Joseph he too was a ruler of the Jews. Two of the council that condemned Jesus thus not only practically protest against the condemnation, but at all risks avow their reverent love to Him. Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of James and Josse, stupefied with sorrow, sat over against the sepulchre, whilst the two rulers performed the last rites. When the latter rolled the stone from the side recess down the incline into its proper place, closing the low mouth of the tomb, in the face of the rock, the women returned to the city to buy spices and ointments, in order to complete after the approaching sabbath the rites (which necessarily had been done in haste) by spreading liquid perfumes over the sacred body, besides the powdered spices already sprinkled in the linen swathes.

On the close of the sabbath (Saturday evening) the chief priests, still fearing their sleeping Victim, determined to foil His prophecy, "after three days I will rise again." So they got a Roman guard to be placed at their disposal to watch the tomb ("ye have a watch" implies that already they had a Roman guard granted during the feast), and they sealed the stone; but as in the case of Daniel (vi. 17), His type, they only made His miraculous resurrection the more unquestionable. The Father raised Him, as He was God's prisoner, and He waited for God to set Him free (Acts ii. 24). But His resurrection was also His own act (John ii. 19, x. 18). His resurrection body is a sample of what His saints' bodies shall be (Phil. iii. 21); on the one hand having flesh and bones capable of being touched (Luke xxiv. 39, John xx. 27); on the other appearing and disappearing with mysterious powers such as it had not before (19, 26; xxi. 4-7). Angels witnessed to Mary Magdalene, Mary mother of James, Joanna, and Salome, who went early to the tomb to anoint Him, that Jesus was risen. The brevity of the two first evangelists on the resurrection, as compared with the fuller record of the two last, who detail selected appearances to show His identity, accounts for the difficulty of harmonizing the particulars which a little more knowledge would at once clear up. The first two attest the fact; the latter two the reality of His risen body, as proved by His being handled and His eating (Luke xxiv. 30-43; Acts i. 3, x. 41; John xx. 20, 27; xxi. 12, 13). Matthew attests His appearance first in Judaea, then by His own appointment in Galilee. So also Mark. Luke does not mention the appearance in Galilee, but dwells upon those in Judaea supplementary to the first two. John (xxi.) details an appearance in Galilee unnoticed by the first two, and by Paul (1 Cor. xv.). The resurrection of Jesus Christ, including His ascension tacitly as its necessary sequel, was the grand theme of the apostles' preaching (Acts i. 22, ii. 31, iv. 33). Hence John (xx. 17) takes the ascension for granted, without recording it; for it virtually began from the moment of His resurrection, "I ascend unto My Father," etc. His return to His Divine throne began already when He arose. Mark (xvi. 19) and Luke (xxiv. 51, Acts i. 9) alone of the four explicitly record it, but all presuppose it.

The women, besides "the spices and ointments" they "prepared" on Friday evening before the sabbath (Luke xxiii. 56), "bought spices" (only) at the close of the sabbath, Saturday evening (Mark xvi. 1). So "very early," "when it was yet dark," "as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week" (Easter Sunday; "at the rising of the sun," in Mark xvi. 2, can only be a general definition of time, for his "very early" implies the sun had not actually risen, for if it had the time would not be "very early") they set out for the tomb. On their way, whilst they anxiously thought "who shall roll us away the stone from the sepulchre door?" an earthquake rocked the ground under their feet, as a dazzlingly bright angel from heaven rolled back the stone and sat thereon. The guards through fear became as dead men. The women, beholding the sight partially and from some distance, were afraid; but when they reach the garden all is quiet, and the angel said, "fear not ye (emphatical in the Gr.) for I know, ye seek Jesus." The "for" in Mark xvi. 4, "when they looked they saw the stone rolled away, for it was great," gives the reason why "looking up" they could see it from a distance. It also gives the reason for their previous anxiety and for God's interposition, for our extremity is His opportunity. The angel's appearing and removing the stone announced that Jesus had already risen indeed. The removal of the stone was not to set Jesus free, but after He had risen, when exactly is not revealed; John xv. 6, 7, shows it was without haste, in calm and deliberate order. Mary Magdalene, on seeing the stone rolled into its receptacle on one side of the rocky tomb's mouth, ran away to Jerusalem at once to tell Peter. Fearing from the stone's removal that the tomb had been violated and the sacred body stolen, she instinctively ran to men for help, and those the Lord's foremost disciples Peter and John, generally associated, and now probably in John's house with the Virgin (xix. 27). The women left behind afterwards went in different directions to the homes of the other apostles, and so did not meet Peter as he came to the tomb (John xx. 1-3).

In harmonizing the accounts we must remember "the sacred writer who records more particulars includes the fewer of the other writers, he who records fewer does not deny the more" (Le Clerc). Thus John includes tactically other women besides Mary Magdalene; her words (xx. 2) "we know not where," etc., prove that other women had been with her to the tomb. Mark records the women's seeing an angel, "a young man," on the right side, on their entering the tomb after Mary Magdalene's departure. Matthew mentions the angel as sitting on the stone outside the tomb. Luke mentions that when they were "much perplexed" at not finding the Lord's body in the tomb they saw two men in shining garments stand by them and say, "why seek ye the living among the dead?" etc. In their excitement some of the women saw but one, others both, of the angels. One angel, being the speaker, moved from his position on the stone at the entrance outside to the inside and declared Jesus' resurrection, and that according to His promise He would appear to them in Galilee, as recorded in Matthew (xxvi. 32, xxviii. 10) and Mark (xvi. 7, xiv. 28). Mark, writing under Peter's superintendence, records Jesus' special message of love to Peter, to cheer him under his despondency because of his threefold denial of Jesus, "go, tell His disciples and Peter."

The women trembling returned from the sepulchre, not saying aught to any they met through awe, but when they reached the apostles telling the tidings "with great joy" that Jesus is risen, and as He said on the eve of His passion "is going before" the heretofore "scattered sheep" into Galilee, to gather them together again (Matt. xxviii. 8; Mark xvi. 7, 8, xiv. 27, 28; John x. 4). When Mary Magdalene and the other women first reported the tidings to "the eleven" (viz. Mary Magdalene to Peter and John, the other women to the remaining nine apostles), "they seemed to them idle tales, and they believed them not" (Luke xxiv. 9). Peter however and John, on Mary Magdalene's report, ran to the tomb. John reached it first, and stooping down saw the linen clothes lying, but with reverent awe shrank from entering. Peter with impulsive promptness entered, and contemplated with deep interest (theorei) the linen swathes and the head napkin duly folded, laid aside separately. Contrast Lazarus rising "bound hand and foot with graveclothes," because he was to return to corruption (John xx. 4-7, xi. 44); but Jesus being "raised dieth no more," therefore the graveclothes were laid aside orderly, without haste or confusion, such as would have been had the body been stolen away. John saw this evidence and believed. Mary Magdalene followed to the tomb, but Peter and John were gone before she reached it, otherwise John would have imparted to her his faith. He and Peter soon communicated what they had seen to the other apostles and brethren (Luke xxiv. 12, 24). Meantime Mary Magdalene stood without at the sepulchre weeping. Stooping she saw within the sepulchre two angels in the attitude of watching, one at the head the other at the feet, where His body had lain, so that she might be sure none could have stolen Him so guarded. Stier suggests that her rapt and longing eye saw the angels whom the apostles owing to their lesser degree of susceptibility saw not. The other women had been afraid at the angelic vision; eagerness to recover the lost body of her Lord banishes from Mary Magdalene every other feeling. "They say, Woman, why weepest thou?" "Because they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where," etc. (When the other women were with her she had said, "they have taken away the Lord, and we know not where they have laid Him"; now how naturally, when feeling all alone, she says "my Lord," and "I know not.") Turning back, as though even angels' sympathy in His absence could not console her, she saw Jesus standing, but knew Him not. Her absorbing sorrow so shut out hope that she recognised not the very One whom she longed for. "Her tears wove a veil concealing Him who stood before her; seeking the dead prevents our seeing the living" (Stier). To His query, the same as the angel's, why weepest thou? she replied, "If thou have borne Him hence tell me where thou hast laid Him, and I will take Him away." How true to nature her taking for granted that the unknown stranger would know whom she meant, though she forgot to name Him, her heart was so full of Him. His one word in tones fondly remembered, "Mary," reveals Him. At once she reverts to His former relation to her, "Rabboni," "my Master" or "Teacher," not yet rising to His higher relations as her Lord and God. Her deep joy could find vent in no other utterance than the one. A touch of her clasping hand accompanied it, to assure herself it is her Lord, the very one whose loving disciple she had been. Her eager touch He checked, "Be not touching Me" (haptou), implying that a mere earthly love expressed in the embrace between friends in the flesh is unsuited to the new relations between His people and Himself now in His resurrection body (comp. 2 Cor. v. 16): "for I am not yet ascended to My Father," assuring her for her comfort that the close intercourse, now not yet seasonable, shall be restored, and that His people shall touch Him, but with the hand of faith, more palpably than ever though no longer carnally, when He shall have ascended and the Spirit shall have consequently descended (Eph. iv. 8). "But go tell My brethren, I am ascending (My ascension has already begun) to My Father," etc. Finally when He shall return, of which His ascension is the pledge and type (Acts i. 11), He shall be in nearest contact of all with His people, themselves also then in their resurrection bodies. Thus she was the first divinely commissioned preacher of His resurrection and ascension to those whom "He is not ashamed to call brethren" (Heb. ii. 10, 11). "They when they heard that He was alive and had been seen of her believed not." Some believed Peter's and John's confirmation of the women's report that His body was not in the sepulchre; but as "Him they saw not," they regarded her report of having seen Him as the hallucination of an excited mind. Whether the angels just seen had borne away His body as Moses' (Deut. xxxiv. 6), or what had become of it, they knew not; but hope of His appearing in person they had given up (Luke xxiv. 23, 24). But now the other women, just after (for the clause "as they went to tell His disciples," Matt. xxviii. 9, is not in Vat. and Sin. MSS. and oldest versions) they had brought the tidings as to the empty tomb and the angels to the other apostles besides Peter and John, on their way back to the tomb met Jesus, who said, "All hail," and they clasped His feet and "worshipped Him," not merely as their Teacher (like Mary Magdalene, John xx. 16) but as their risen Lord (before His resurrection it was usually others rather than the disciples that worshipped Him). The Lord added, "Go tell My brethren (viz. the eleven and all the rest then at Jerusalem, Luke xxiv. 9) that they go into Galilee, there shall they see Me."

Meantime the watch informed the sanhedrim, who after consultation gave large money to the soldiers, and invented a lie for them: "Say His disciples came by night and stole Him away while we slept." If they slept how could they know the disciples stole Him? Would they have charged themselves with a capital offence, sleeping on guard, unless they were assured of impunity? Would the sanhedrim and Roman authorities have let them escape punishment? If they were awake the Gospel account is true. The carefully folded graveclothes confute the notion of theft. The sanhedrim never examined the soldiers and the disciples publicly as to the alleged theft. Evidently they did not believe their own story; yet they propagated the lie, as Justin Martyr (Trypho, 168, 117, 17) charges them, by missionaries sent "over the whole world" to counteract Christianity.

The third testimony to the still doubting eleven was that of the disciples who started for Emmaus (now Khamasa, close to the Roman road from Jerusalem by Solomon's pools to Beit Jibrin) about noon on the same day, after having heard possibly but not credited Mary Magdalene's and the other women's statement of having seen Him. One was named Cleopas, Chapater, not to be confounded with Chapater Alphæus (John xix. 25). Their sad report to Jesus, who joined them unrecognised, as to the apostles who went to see whether the women's report as to the empty tomb were true, was "Him they saw not"; they took no direct notice of the women's having subsequently seen Jesus, whether from disbelieving or from not having heard it. Jesus rebuked their slowness to believe, and showed "in all the scriptures (Jesus thus authenticating as inspired the O. T.) the things concerning Himself," that "Christ ought to have suffered these things and (then) enter into His glory." Then at their constraining entreaty, it being "toward evening," He stayed with them, and in blessing and breaking bread "He was known of them," their eyes being "opened" so as no longer to be "holden" and incapable of discerning through His appearing "in another form" (Mark xvi. 12, Luke xxiv. 13-35). The transfiguration before His passion shows how His resurrection body could be the same body, yet altered so as at will to be more or less recognisable to beholders. The process of its progressive glorification probably began from His resurrection, and culminated at His ascension. Returning to Jerusalem after His vanishing from them, they found "the eleven and those with them" (the other disciples, Acts i. 14) with eager joy exclaiming "the Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon" (1 Cor. xv. 5). They did not credit the women, but they are convinced by one of the apostles, and that one Peter. The Emmaus disciples told concerning His being recognised by them in breaking of bread. As neither of the two were of the twelve, they had not been at the institution of the Lord's supper, and therefore this "breaking of bread" was an ordinary meal, at which His well remembered gestures and mode of blessing the bread (Matt. xiv. 19, xv. 36) by thanksgiving occasioned their recognition of Him. "The eleven" is either used as a general designation (Luke xxiv. 33), not exactly, as there were but ten, Thomas being away; or else Thomas left them just after the Emmaus pair came in, and before Jesus appeared (ver. 36-49, John xx. 19-25). Other disciples (Luke xxiv. 33) besides the apostles were present, so that Christ's commission (John xx. 19-23) belongs to the whole church (John says, ver. 19, "the disciples," not merely the apostles), which exercises it generally by its ministers as its representatives, but not exclusively. The apostles "remitted sins," just as they saved souls, instrumentally by the ministry of the word (Acts xiii. 38, x. 43), not by priestly absolution. The apostles infallibly also wrote the word; their successors learn and teach it (Jas. v. 20). The parallel Luke xxiv. 47 expresses how they remitted sins; ver. 49, in what sense "He breathed on them the Holy Ghost," viz. gave them a measure of grace and faith, assuring them of "the promise of His Father" to be fulfilled in the Spirit's outpouring on pentecost, for which till then they were to wait in believing prayer (Acts i. 14). The words John xx. 22, 23, were not used in ordinations for the first 12 centuries. The apostles' inspiration was not transmitted by ordination to their successors. Thomas's absence alone would prove that no final gifts of apostleship were then bestowed, else he would have forfeited them. In Matt. xvi. 19 Peter, and xxviii. 18 all the disciples, constituting collectively "the church," are given the power to loose and bind things, i.e. to legislate and declare obligatory or otherwise (Acts x. xv.); in John xx. 23 to remit or retain persons' sins. The apostles by the miraculous gift of discerning spirits in part did so (Acts v. 1-11, viii. 21, xiii. 9), but mainly by ministry of the word. The former is not transmitted; the latter is the whole church's province in all ages, exercised through its ministers chiefly but not exclusively.

Doubts still mingled with the faith of the disciples, even after Christ's appearance to Peter and then to the two Emmaus disciples. His humble appearance as an ordinary traveller, and His sitting down to a social meal in the body, seemed at variance with their ideas of His being an unsubstantial "spirit" (Mark xvi. 12, 13). In spite of their profession "the Lord is risen indeed," they were "affrighted" when He actually stood in the midst of them (Luke xxiv. 36, etc.). "The doors were shut for fear of the Jews," so that His risen body had properties to which material substances were no hindrance (comp. 31, 40; John xx. 19). To reassure them He showed them His hands and side and feet, and desired them to handle Him and see that He had "flesh and bones."

The "handling" is peculiar to Luke; but John undesignedly hints (a strong corroboration of the authenticity of both evangelists) at it by recording the form which Thomas's unbelief took just afterwards, "except I put my finger into the print of the nails (the cavity left by them being smaller, and such as the finger could fit into), and thrust my hand into His side (the cavity left by the spear being large, and such as the hand would fit into), I will not believe." They could scarcely believe for joy and wonder (comp. the type, Gen. xlv. 26), but their fright was all gone. He vouchsafes then the sign before given to show the reality of the raising to life of Jairus' daughter (Mark v. 4), by partaking of fish and honeycomb. Like the angels who ate of Abram's food (Gen. xviii. 8), He had the power, not the need, to eat; not from hunger or thirst, but to teach and convince His disciples (Acts x. 41). His appearing on two successive first days of the week stamped that day with sanctity as "the Lord's day" (Rev. i. 10). The consecration of one day in seven rests on the O. T. law from the beginning; the transference from the last day of the week to the first was gradual, the apostolical usage resting on the Lord's hallowing it in act by His resurrection and reappearances on it. In gracious condescension He vouchsafed to Thomas the tangible material proof which his morbid slowness to believe demanded. Thomas, now convinced, recognises not merely that which feeling Christ's body demonstrated, namely His humanity, but rises to avow what faith, not sense, revealed, His Divinity, "my Lord and my God!" Jesus gently reproves whilst commending him, "because thou hast seen Me thou hast believed; blessed are they that have not seen, yet have believed" (Heb. xi. 1, 1 Pet. i. 8, 2 Cor. v. 7).

John (xxi.) in an appendix recounts the Lord's appearance to seven of the apostles (or else five apostles and two disciples) at the sea of Tiberias. At first they did not recognise Him standing on the shore, though near enough to hear His voice. The phrase "showed (manifested) Himself" implies perhaps that after His resurrection He was visible only by a distinct act of His will. However, their non-recognition may have been due to the dimness of the twilight. Supposing possibly His inquiry, "children, have ye any meat?" was a stranger's friendly call whether they had any fish to sell, they replied, no. At His suggestion they cast the net on the right side of the ship, then could not draw it for the multitude of fishes. John with his greater spiritual discernment first perceived, "it is the Lord." Peter with his impulsive ardour was the first to go to Him. As this miraculous draught answers to that in Luke v., so Peter's plunging into the water answers to his desire to walk to Jesus on the water; but there are characteristic differences. In Luke v. the net broke; here not so. Type respectively of their past breaking of their resolution of devotedness to Jesus (their very fishing now was a temporary desertion of their higher calling), and of their henceforth not breaking it. There an indefinite number of fish, small and great; here "153 great fishes." In Matt. xiv. 28-31 Peter's faith failed through fears; here he plunges fearlessly into the water to reach Jesus. The present dispensation with good and bad mixed answers to Luke v. (comp. Matt. xiii. 47, 48.) All are not secure who are in the gospel net; just as the net broke. But the future dispensation will be (as in John xxi.) an unbroken net, containing the full definite number of the elect, all "great" before God. Christ at the dawn of that day shall be waiting on the shore to welcome His ministering servants. The fish brought to the ship still in the sea (Luke v.) answer to the present gathering in of converts by the ministry in the midst of a still perilous tempting world. Those drawn to shore (John xxi.) answer to the saints safely landed and with Jesus, who makes them sit down to His banquet (comp. ver. 12, "come and breakfast," the morning meal, ariston, with Rev. xii. 9). The "fire of coals, and fish laid thereon, and bread" were of Jesus' miraculous provision, and typified the heavenly feast to which He will invite His servants; then shall every man's special work have its special reward of grace, answering to "bring of the fish which ye have caught" (Dan. xii. 3, Luke xix. 16-19, 2 John 8, 1 Cor. iv. 5).

Something mysterious and majestic about Jesus' form, rather felt than seen, combined with the extraordinary provision He had made for their meal, awed the disciples; they might have been inclined to ask explanations, but reverent fear and their knowledge "that it was the Lord" checked them. This early meal was a kind of resumption of the last supper. Again Peter and John are nearest their loved Lord. He tests Peter's love so loudly professed at the last supper (Luke xxii. 33, 34). As then He foretold his threefold denial, so now He elicits thrice his "love" patent to the all-knowing Saviour. He delicately glances at Peter's past overweening self-confidence, "though all (the disciples) shall be offended because of Thee, yet will I never" (Matt. xxvi. 33); "lovest thou Me more than these?" thy fellow-disciples? Peter needed to be set right as to these, as well as in respect to Jesus. Then Jesus explicitly foretells Peter's crucifixion, already at the last supper implied obscurely (John xiii. 36), adding "follow Me," the same call as the first of all (Matt. iv. 19). Jesus then commenced withdrawing, Peter followed, and on turning he saw John too following, and asked, "Lord, and what shall this man do?" Jesus replied, "if I will that he tarry (on earth) till I come (till the destruction of Jerusalem, when begins the series of events which together constitute the theme of the Apocalypse, called 'the coming of the Lord' Matt. xxiv., to be consummated in His personal appearing in order to reign), what is that to thee?" The danger of oral tradition (to guard against which the Gospel word was soon written) is illustrated in that the brethren, even so near the Fountain of truth, misinterpreted "this saying" as if it meant John should not die.

The Lord's promise and command (Matt. xxviii. 7, 10, 16, etc.) previously announced by the angel led the disciples in general (besides "the eleven" specified by Matthew) to go to a mount in Galilee (perhaps that of the beatitudes) where "He was seen of 500 brethren at once" (1 Cor. xv. 6). Some even still doubted the evidence of their senses (probably until He drew nearer, for at first He was seen at a distance, perhaps on the mountain top). But the eleven worshipped Him. Jesus confirmed His claim to worship by drawing near and declaring "all power is given unto Me in heaven and earth," realizing Dan. vii. 14, and commissioning all His disciples (not the apostles only, Acts viii. 2, 4), "go and disciple all the nations, baptizing them (the persons) into the name (not names, for God is ONE) of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost," i.e. into living union with God in the threefold personality as revealed: "teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you," for full instruction in Christ's word is the necessary complement of baptism; "and (on this condition, not otherwise) I am (Jesus the great I AM, not merely 'I shall be') with you always unto the consummation of the age" (John xiv. 16, xvi. 13). The commission is to all the church, and is mostly executed by its ministers and teachers, the mode of whose appointment is not definitely prescribed. He has never left Himself without witnesses, however the church as a general body has apostatized.

The Lord's appearance to JAMES the Less [see] was after that to the 500, and marked him as one specially honoured, whence afterwards he presided over the Jerusalem church (1 Cor. xv. 6). In Galilee remote from Jerusalem the 500 could meet more safely. Thus 120 who met at Jerusalem after the ascension were exclusive of those in Galilee. Towards the close of the forty days (Acts i. 3) the disciples went up to Jerusalem, as the feast of pentecost was near. Then for the last time they ("all the apostles," 1 Cor. xv. 7, besides the twelve, probably others, e.g. Andronicus and Junia, "of note among the apostles" or witnesses of the resurrection, "in Christ before Paul," Rom. xvi. 7) saw Him, Luke xxiv. 41-49 answering to Acts i. 4-8; and He charged them not to leave Jerusalem until they received the promised Spirit from on high. He led them out from the city over the ridge of Olivet, descending towards Bethany, the district being called "Bethany"; comp. Luke xxiv. 50 with Acts i. 12, where the distance of Olivet from Jerusalem "a sabbath day's journey" is thought by Alford to be specified, because the ascension was on the Saturday or sabbath of the seventh week from the resurrection, which suits the phrase "forty days" as well as the Thursday, usually made Ascension day. "They asked, wilt Thou at this time restore again (the apo of the compound marks the establishing as something due by God's oft repeated promises) the kingdom to Israel?" He recognises the fact, and only rebukes their requiring to know "the times or seasons put in the Father's own power" (Dent. xxix. 29, Dan. vii. 27, Isa. i. 26).

After His promise that they should be His witnesses from Jerusalem to the uttermost parts of the earth, their last glimpse of Him was in the act of blessing them (Luke xxiv. 51) with uplifted hands, even as His sermon on the mount began with blessing (comp. Acts iii. 26). He was "carried up into heaven," "a cloud receiving Him out of their sight," even as His elect shall be caught up in clouds (1 Thess. iv. 17) and as "behold He cometh with clouds" (Rev. i. 7). Angels announced to the disciples, gazing with strained eyes upwards, that "the same Jesus shall return in like manner as they saw Him go into heaven," probably at the same mount (Zech. xiv. 4, 5). Thus there were ten appearances of the risen Saviour recorded, nine in the Gospels and Acts, and one in 1 Cor. xv., viz. to James, on the independent testimony of Paul, who mentions all those to men which the Gospels record, also the special one to himself after the Lord's ascension. Most of the above is gathered, with occasional differences however, from Bishop Elliott's valuable Life of Christ. Four stages of development in the order and fulness of Christ's teaching have been traced: (1) In the first year a slight advance on the teaching of John the Baptist. (2) The second year inaugurated by the sermon on the mount. (3) The third year the teaching of parables, setting forth the nature, constitution, and future prospects of the church. (4) The fourth year, the sublime discourses in the upper chamber, recorded by John, just before His betrayal and crucifixion.

Jethier. 1. Gideon's eldest son. Afraid as a youth to slay Zebah and Zalmunna at his father's bidding. Slain by Abimelech (Jud. viii. 20, ix. 5). 2. Same as ITHRA [see] and ABIGAIL. 3. 1 Chron. ii. 32. 4. 1 Chron. iv. 17. Quæst. Heb. in Paralipom. makes Ezra Auram, J. Aaron. 5. Ithrau (1 Chron. vii. 38).

Jetheth. Gen. xxxvi. 40; 1 Chron. i. 51. From an Arabic root "a nail" or "tent pin," symbolising stability; "a prince" (Ezra ix. 8; Isa. xxii. 23).

Jethlah. A city of Dan (Josh. xix. 42).

Jethro. [See HOBAB.] Reuel's eldest son. Brother in law of Moses, by whose counsel Moses chose chief men from the tribes to be rulers of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, and to judge minor causes, reserving the weightier ones to himself (Exod. xviii.). "Jethro took a burnt offering and sacrifices for God," being a priest of the true God. The primitive faith still had its representatives here and there in the Gentile world after Abraham's call, e.g. J. and Melchizedek. Reuel's name, from El=(God), implies he too was a God-worshipping priest-prince of his tribe, though the majority of the tribe bordering on the Hamite Canaan were idolaters (Exod. ii. 16). Zipporah's repugnance to circumcision (Exod. iv. 24-26) shows that it was not universal even among worshippers of the true God. She circumcised the younger son only to save Moses from God's wrath, the elder was evidently already circumcised. Moses' delay in circumcising the younger was a sinful yielding to his wife. The occurrence induced him to send her back and his sons, and not take them to Egypt; J. brought them to him after Israel's arrival at Sinai. J. of Midian (Abraham's descendant) celebrated a sacrificial meal with Aaron and Israel's elders; the representative firstfruits of the heathen who would afterwards enter into fellowship with God and His people; as Amalek, another descendant of Abraham, represents on the contrary the heathen world hostile to the Lord and His people.

Jetur. Gen. xxv. 15. Ithraa.

Jeuel. 1 Chron. ix. 2, 6.

Jeush. 1. Gen. xxxvi. 5, 18. 2. 1 Chron. vii. 10, 11. 3. A Gershon-ite Levite, reckoned as one house with Beriah in David's census (1 Chron. xxiii. 10, 11). 4. 2 Chron. xi. 18, 19.

Jeuz. Born in Moab (1 Chron. viii. 8, 10).

Jew. At first one belonging to the kingdom of Judah, as distinguished from northern Israel (2 Kings xvi. 6). After the captivity, all members of the one new state were "Jews," i.e. in God's outward covenant, as contrasted with "Greeks" or Gentiles (Rom. i. 16, ii. 9 marg.). "Hebrews" on the other hand expressed their language and nationality, in contrast to "Hellenists," i.e. Greek speaking Jews. Again the term "Israelites" expresses the high theocratic privileges of descent from the patriarch who "as a prince had power with God" (2 Cor. xi. 22, Rom. ix. 4).

John uses "Jews" of the faction hostile to the Lord Jesus. By the time that he wrote the Jews had definitely rejected the gospel offered to them by the apostles at home and abroad (1 Thess. ii. 14-16); so they are no longer regarded as the covenant people, the kingdom of God having passed from them to the Gentiles (Acts xiii. 45, 46). The destruction of Jerusalem and the temple formally effected the transference, for ever since the Jew professes a religion enjoining what God's providence makes it impossible for him to fulfil, viz. the observance of the great feasts and the sacrificial system in the temple at Jerusalem.

B. F. Westcott (Smith's Bible Diet.) notices the preparation for the last or gospel revelation by the disciplining of the Jews under (1) the Persian supremacy (536-333 B.C.), in organization, order, and ritual; (2) under the Greek (333-167 B.C.), in liberty and speculation; (3) under the Asmonean Maccabees, in independence and faith; (4) under the Herods, in the separation between the temporal and the spiritual kingdom. JEWRY means Judaea (Dan. v. 13). "The Jews' language" signifies both the Hebrew (2 Kings xviii. 26) and the Aramaic Hebrew acquired in the captivity (Neh. xiii. 24), "the language (lip) of Canaan" (Isa. xix. 18). [See HEBREW LANGUAGE.]

Jezeaniah. Jer. xl. 8, xlii. 1; apparently identical with Azariah, son of Hoshaiiah (xliii. 2). Associated with Jehanan in the flight to Egypt, in spite of God's warning by Jeremiah. JAZANIAH in 2 Kings xxv. 23.

Jezebel = chaste, free from carnal connection. One whose name belied her nature: licentious, fanatical, and stern. Daughter of Ethbaal, or Ithobal, king of Sidon and priest of Astarte, who had murdered Phœbes his predecessor (Josephus c. Apion. i. 18) and restored order in Tyre after a period of anarchy. Wife of AHAZ [see] who became a puppet in her hands for working a wickedness in the sight of Jehovah (1 Kings xvi. 25). She established the Phœnician idolatry on a grand scale at her husband's court, maintaining at her table 450 prophets of Baal and 400 of Astarte (so "the groves" ought to be translated): 1 Kings xvi. 31, 32, xviii. 19, 13. She even slew the prophets of Jehovah (2 Kings ix. 7). When Elijah under God wrought the miracle at Carmel, and slew her favourite prophets, J. still unsubdued swore by her gods to do to Elijah as he had done to them (1 Kings xix. 1-3). Even he was constrained to flee for his life to Beersheba of Judah and the desert beyond.

Like Clytemnestra or Lady Macbeth she taunted Ahab with want of kingly spirit in not taking what he wished, Naboth's vineyard (1 Kings xxi. 7, 14, 23): "dost thou govern Israel? I (the real monarch) will give thee the vineyard of Naboth." So she wrote in Ahab's name to the Jezreelite elders, and sealed the letters with his seal; and to her it was that they wrote the announcement that they had stoned Naboth for blasphemy. Upon her therefore fell a special share of the divinely foretold doom. She survived Ahab 14 years, and still as queen mother exercised an evil influence in the courts of her sons Ahaziah and Joram of Israel, and in that of her daughter Athaliah's husband Jehoram (2 Chron. xxi. 6, xxii. 2). But judgment was executed upon her by JEHU [see] for all her whoredoms and witchcrafts, which had become proverbial (2 Kings ix. 22, 30-37).

In Rev. ii. 20 J. typically expresses some self styled prophetess, or a set of false prophets (for the Heb. feminine expresses collectively a multitude), as closely attached to the Thyatira church as a wife is to a husband, and as powerfully influencing that church for evil as J. did her husband. Sin. MS. and Paris MS. and Vulg. Latin read as A. V.; but Alex. and Vat. MSS. "thy wife," i.e. the wife of the presiding bishop or "angel." Like her father, the ancient J. had been swift to shed blood. A priestess and devotee of Baal and Astarte herself, she seduced Israel beyond the calf worship (the worship of the true God under the cherub ox form, a violation of the second commandment) to Baal worship, of which whoredoms and witchcrafts were a leading part (a violation of the first). The spiritual J. of Thyatira similarly, by pretended inspiration, lured God's servants to libertinism, fornication, and idol meats (Rev. ii. 6, 14, 15), as though things done in the flesh were outside the man, and therefore indifferent. The deeper the church penetrated into heathenism, the more heathenish she became.

Jeziel. 1 Chron. xii. 1, 3.

Jeziah. 1 Chron. viii. 13.

Jezoar. 1 Chron. iv. 7.

Jezrahiah. Neh. xii. 42.

Jezreel. Sprung from the father, i.e. founder, of ETAM [see] (1 Chron. iv. 3). Else supply from ver. 2, "these are (the families) of the father of Etam" (or Abietam, one name).

Jezreel = God has sown. Esdraelcon. Now Zerin at the foot of mount Gilboa, ten miles S.E. of Nazareth. In Issachar: Josh. xix. 18. Ahab's royal residence was on the E. of the city, and near it was the Jezreelite Naboth's vineyard; whereas Samaria (in the sense of the city) was his capital (1 Kings xviii. 46, xxi. 1, xxii. 10; 2 Kings ix. 15). By the fountain of Jezreel Israel pitched before the battle of Gilboa (1 Sam. xxix. 1). A large fountain still flows out of a cavern in the conglomerate rock at the northern base of mount Gilboa. Zerin commands an extensive view to the mountains E. of Jordan and along the great plain to mount Carmel. On the N.E., the hill on which J. stood, is a steep descent of rock, 100ft. high. Strong and central, the site was admirable for a city. Jezebel's apartments were on the city wall, with a window facing E., and a watchtower for noticing arrivals from the Jordan quarter. An old square tower still standing may occupy its site. The city's eastern gateway was the palace gateway, in front of which was the open space, usual in Eastern cities, called "the mounds," where the dogs, their scavengers, devoured Jezebel's carcase.

HOSEA's [see] eldest son by Gomer was named J. (Hos. i. 4) [see JEZREEL], to imply that as Ahab's family miserably perished there, so would their destroyer Jehu's family perish, because the latter had retained the sin which he had been elevated in order to root out. God saith "I will avenge the blood of J. (2 Kings ix. x. 11, 14) upon the house of Jehu," because the blood so shed by Jehu was not with a view to doing God's will, but to further his own ambition; this he proved by soon disobeying God when the retaining of the calf worship seemed to him politic. J. means both "God scatters" and "God sows." As He "scattered" them under Jehu, and finally by the Assyrian deportation, so He will "sow" them again; and so J. will represent the similarly sounding Israel; "great shall be the day of J." when "Judah and Israel shall be gathered together, and appoint (unto) themselves one head, and shall come up out of the land" (of the Gentiles) where God sowed them (Zech. x. 9, Hos. i. 11). They shall then be the seed of God sown in their own land (Hos. ii. 23; Ezek. xxxvi. 9; Jer. xxxi. 27, xxxii. 41; Amos ix. 15).

THE VALLEY OF J. (or ESDRAELON), as it is called in Judith iii. 9) stretches across the centre of Palestine from the Mediterranean to the Jordan, separating Carmel and Samaria's mountain ranges from those of Galilee. The western portion is the plain of Aecho. The main body is an irregular triangle, its base stretching from Engannim to the hills below Nazareth, about 15 miles; one side formed by the Galilee hills, about 12 miles; the other 18, running on the northern side of the Samaritan range. The top of the triangle is the pass, half a mile wide, opening into Aecho plain. It is the ancient Megiddo plain, the ARMAGEDDON [see] of Rev. xvi. 16. The Kishon drains it, flowing W. by Aecho into the Mediterranean. From this triangular plain's base three branches stretch E., divided by bleak mount Gilboa and Little Hermon. (See Porter, Handbook to Syria.) Though rich and luxuriant in spring, only about a sixth of it is cultivated, and there is not an inhabited village in the main portion, chiefly owing to the insecurity from Bedouin marauders. It mainly belonged to Issachar, which, exposed to every incursion, lived in a nearly nomadic state and sought David's protection (Gen. xlix. 14, 15 "tents," 1 Chron. xii. 32, 40), and formed Zebulun's frontier (Deut. xxxiii. 18). It was Israel's great field of battle with invaders: Sisera, Jud. iv., v.; Midian, Jud. vii.; the Philistines at Gilboa, 1 Sam. xxix., xxxi.; Pharaoh Necho at Megiddo, 2 Kings xxiii. 29.

Jidaph = weeping. Gen. xxii. 22.

Jimna: יִמְנָה. יִמְנָה [see], Num. xvi. 44.

Jiphtah. A city of Judah, in the shephelah, or low maritime hills of Judah (Josh. xv. 43). Its meaning "it opens" points to a site at the opening of the hills to the plain. Now Batlah in the Ghuzzeh (Gaza) province (Robinson).

Jiphthah, El, Valley of. A ravine (rather than valley; ge, not nachal), bounding Zebulun and Asher (Josh. xix. 14, 27). The city Jotapata which resisted Vespasian (Josephus B. J. iii. 7). Now Jefat, in the Galilee mountains, half way between Acre and the lake of Genesareth; stands at the head of the valley, now the great wady Abilin, which stretches W. to the Mediterranean coast plain. It means "God's opening," i.e. an important one. Ethphaneh, a kindred name, stands at the opening to the fruitful plain of Acre.

Joab = Jehovah's father. 1. Eldest of the three sons of Zeruiah, David's sister. The father is not named; his sepulchre was in Bethlehem (2 Sam. ii. 32). Revengful and bold as his brother Abishai, at the same time more able as a statesman (2 Sam. ii. 18, 22; iii. 27). Early joined David, whose family and relatives were not safe from Saul (1 Sam. xxi. 3, 4; xvi. 6). Became "captain of the host." Abishai is mentioned in David's flight before Saul; but J. not till after Saul's death. Then, commanding David's servants, J. encountered Abner at the pool of Gibeon by the challenge of the latter, and defeated him with the loss of only 19 men. Up to Abner's involuntary slaughter of the footfooted Asahel, Abner's relations with J. had been not unkindly. J., at Abner's appeal to his generosity, the Benjamites having rallied round the fleeing chief, forbore to press the vanquished to extremities. He added father (2 Sam. ii. 27), "unless thou hadst spoken (challenged to combat, ver. 14) surely then in the morning the people would have gone away every one from following his brother," i.e. there would have been no such fratricidal strife at all. But J. cherished revenge for his brother's death; and on his return from pursuing a troop, finding that Abner had been favourably received by David, he broke out into a reproof of the king as though Abner had come as a spy; then by messengers recalled the unsuspecting general, and, taking him aside at the gateway of Hebron as if for a peaceable conversation, treacherously stabbed him. Jealousy of a possible rival in David's favour probably was an additional incentive. David, deeply grieved, prayed that the guilt and its penalty might ever rest on J. and his house, and constrained J. to appear at the funeral with rent clothes and in sackcloth. Yet David felt himself powerless to punish J. and his brother; "these men, the sons of Zeruiah, be too hard for me," at once necessary to him and too formidable to provoke. He left the punishment with the Lord (2 Sam. iii. 29, comp. xix. 7).

J. speedily attained the command in chief by his being first gallantly to scale the Jebusite stronghold and drive out the enemy. Then he was employed by David to aid him in fortifying the stronghold which became "the city of David" (1 Chron. xi. 4-8). J. had an armourbearer, Nabari the Beerotite (2 Sam. xxii. 37), and ten young men as bearers of his equipment (xviii. 15). He had a lordly title (xi. 11), "my lord . . . general of the king's army" (1 Chron. xxvii. 34). Besides his usual residence at Jerusalem J. had a house and barley fields in the country not far from the capital (2 Sam. xiv. 30, 1 Kings ii. 34); and "he was hurried in his own house in the wilderness," probably that of Judah, as J.'s mother, David's step sister, would naturally dwell near Bethlehem. However Absalom's residence next J. seems rather to point to the N. near BAALHAZOR [see] (2 Sam. xiii. 23, xiv. 30; 1 Chron. ii. 54).

In the war with Ammon, undertaken to avenge the indignity offered David's ambassadors by Hanun, J. defeated Ammon's ally the Syrians whilst Abishai was defeating the Ammonites. His exhortation before the battle was worthy of a better man: "be of good courage, and let us play the men for our people, and for the cities of our God; and the Lord do that which seemeth Him good" (2 Sam. x. 12). Bad men may utter good religious sentiments; practice is the test. David gave the final blow to the rallying Syrians with their brethren from beyond Euphrates under Shobach, Hadarezer's captain. J., after David's defeat of Edom in the Valley of Salt (2 Sam. viii. 13, 14), was six months engaged in slaying the Edomite males, in revenge for their invasion of Israel in David's absence (1 Kings xi. 15, 16; Ps. xlv.). his first care was to bury the Israelites slain during the invasion by Edom. The victory over Edom is variously attributed to David as king, to J. as commander in chief, who slew 12,000, and to Abishai, who slew 6000, under J. (1 Chron. xviii. 12.) Ps. lx. (title) was composed by David after he had beaten Aram of the two floods (Naharaim); this victory the psalmist takes as an earnest that the expedition setting out to occupy Edom would succeed; comp. ver. 8, 9, 12, with 2 Sam. viii. 14.

So terrible was J.'s name to Edom that their prince Hadad did not venture to return from Egypt till he knew "that J. the captain of the host was dead" (1 Kings xi. 21, 22). The completion of the war with Ammon was due to J. who, going forth at the beginning of the next year, took Rabbah the lower city on the river (2 Sam. xi., xii.). J. loyally and magnanimously desired David to come and take the acropolis on the N.W., commanding the rest of the city, that the general might not receive the glory which ought to belong to the king. J. showed a wickedly unscrupulous fidelity as David's tool for murdering Uriah, by setting him in the forefront to encounter a sortie from the city, and then deserting him. J. thus was in possession of the awful secret of the king, and henceforth exercised an almost complete sway over him (xix. 7). David could no longer revenge Abner's blood on his own accomplice in the murder of Uriah.

J. next, by the wise woman of Tekoa and her parable, induced the king to restore Absalom, which J. saw was David's own wish, though justice constrained him to severity. He thus at once ingratiated himself with the reigning king, and with Absalom his probable successor, one less likely to punish J. for murdering Abner than Solomon. David discerned J.'s hand in the Tekoan woman's application. Like the clever schemes of bad men generally, the issue baffled his calculations. Absalom with characteristic recklessness, when he failed to induce J. to come to him, set fire to his barley and so forced J. to mediate for his admission to the king's presence. The rebel son was slain by J. himself, and J. did not escape his own condign punishment (Job viii. 13-19). Possibly J. at first was disposed to join the rebel; but Absalom's appointment of Amasa to the command "instead of J." determined J.'s course (2 Sam. xvii. 25), and made him thereafter forward letter against Absalom, so that after thrusting three darts through his heart he had his corpse cast into a pit and heaped with stones. Aware of the anguish the act would cause David, J. restrained Ahimaaz who was eager to carry the tidings to the king. The grief of David was overwhelming, and was only restrained by J.'s indignant warning that, unless he went forth and spoke encouragingly to his victorious soldiers, all would desert him. David stung by his disrespectful plainness, and feeling that J. if his own interest was at stake was as little to be depended on as the adversary just defeated, appointed Amasa to supersede J. But Amasa was as dilatory as J. was prompt. David therefore, when Sheba's rebellion broke out, had to send Abishai to pursue the rebel at once, with J.'s men and all the mighty men. J., meeting Amasa at the great stone in Gibeon, pretended to kiss him in friendship, holding his beard with the right hand, and then stabbed him with the sword in his left hand. Jealousy made this "bloody and deceitful man" reckless what blood he shed when a rival came across his path. One of J.'s aides de camp stood by the corpse and invited all to follow J.; but all stood still at the ghastly sight. Then he removed the body out of the highway, and east a cloth over it; so the people moved on, and J. resumed the chief command, with the blood of the treacherously murdered victim still upon his girdle and sandals (1 Kings ii. 5). David felt himself powerless to punish him (2 Sam. xxiii. 6, 7). J. so effectually besieged Abel of Beth Maachah that the townsmen were glad to save their town by sacrificing Sheba, throwing his head, at the suggestion of a wise woman in the town, over the wall to J.

He was adverse to David's command to him to number the people, "why will he (or else it) be a cause of trespass to Israel?" i.e., why by seeking thine own glory in the power and resources of thy kingdom wilt thou bring the penalty from God upon Israel? Dissatisfaction too might be bred among the people. J. was therefore slow in executing the command, so Levi and Benjamin had not been counted when David revoked the command before the census was complete (1 Chron. xxi. 2, 6, xxvii. 24; 1 Sam. xxiv.). Conscience at times works on the most daring, as in this case. J. even dedicated of the spoils won in battle to maintain the house of the Lord (1 Chron. xxvi. 27, 28). But the true character so on showed itself again, and even the worldly sagacity which heretofore had kept him on the winning side in the end forsook him, for with Abiathar J. joined in Adonijah's rebellion, and Solomon, by David's dying charge, had him slain at the altar of Gibeon whither he had fled for sanctuary, but which afforded no protection to a treacherous murderer (Exod. xxi. 14). The curse of David and of Solomon doubtless pursued his descendants (2 Sam. iii. 29, 1 Kings ii. 33). Enrofel is still called "the well of Job" (Joab) from his share in Adonijah's coronation there. For the spiritual lesson of his history see Eccles. viii. 11-13.

2. Son of Seraiah. 1 Chron. iv. 14. "Father (founder) of the valley of Charashim," i.e. craftsmen; "for they (J.'s descendants) were craftsmen." This valley was a little N. of Jerusalem (Neh. xi. 35). Tradition represented (Jerome, Quæst. Heb. in Paralip.) that the temple architects were chosen from his sons. 3. Head of a numerous family which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 6, viii. 9; Neh. vii. 11). J.'s and Jeshua's sons were; probably, in the registration of those who returned, represented by the sons of Pahath Moab, so instead of "of" transl. "for (i.e. representing) the sons of Jeshua and Moab."

Joah. 1. Asaph's son, Hezekiah's keeper of the records. One of the three sent to meet Nabshaboh (Isa. xxxvi. 3, 11, 12). 2. 1 Chron. vi. 21. Ethan is substituted in ver. 42. 3. 1 Chron. xxi. 4. 4. 2 Chron. xxiv. 12. 5. Joahaz's son, "recorder" or "annalist" to Josiah; took part in repairing the temple (2 Chron. xxxiv. 8).

Joahaz. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 8. One of Kennicott's MSS. reads Ahaz.

Joanna. 1. Son of Rhesa (Luke iii. 27). [See HANANIAH (7).] 2. Wife of Herod's steward Chuza. She ministered of her substance to Jesus. It is a coincidence obviously undesigned, therefore confirming the truth of the Gospel history, that Herod therein is recorded as having "said to his servants, This is John the Baptist" (Matt. xiv. 2). She being our Lord's disciple He would be naturally often spoken of among Herod's servants, and to them Herod would speak concerning Him. Manaen, Herod's foster brother, was a church teacher subsequently (Acts xiii. 1). J. was also one of the women who brought spices early to the Lord's tomb (Luke xxiv. 10).

Joash, Jehoash = Jehovah gifted.

1. GIBBEON'S [see] father, an Abiezerite of wealth. During the Midianite oppression he conformed to the popular idolatry, and had an altar to Baal and a "grove," i.e. Asherah, in his own ground. But on his son's destroying both J. defended his son with a sarcastic sneer at Baal's impotence to "plead for himself" (Jud. vi. 11, 25, 29-31; vii. 14; viii. 13, 29, 32).

2. 1 Chron. iv. 22. Ruled anciently in Moab. 3. 1 Chron. vii. 8. 4. 1 Chron. xii. 1-3, 21. One of David's "helpers in the battle" "against the band (gedud), the same word as in Samuel is used of the Amalekite spoiling 'troop' or company) of the rovers," i.e. the Amalekites who spoiled Ziklag in David's absence (1 Sam. xxx. 1-10, 15). 5. 1 Chron. xxvii. 28. 6. Ahab's son, viceroy in his absence at Ramoth Gilead (1 Kings xxii. 26, 2 Chron. xviii. 25), or else left with the governor of the city, Amon, for military education.

7. The only son of Ahaziah king of Judah that escaped Athaliah's murderous hand, and the only surviving descendant of Solomon, for his grandfather Jehoram had killed all his brethren (2 Chron. xxi. 4, 17; xxii. 1, 8-11), and all his own sons except Jehoahaz or Ahaziah the Arabians had slain; and on Ahaziah's destruction by Jehu ATHALIAH [see] his mother (the instigator of sin becoming the instrument of punishment, comp. ver. 3 with 10) destroyed all the seed royal of Judah except J., hidden by his aunt Jehoshabeath, Ahaziah's sister, Jehoiaada's wife. After remaining six years hidden in the temple, JEHOIADA [see] by a well contrived revolution raised him to the throne. For 23 years J. prospered, so long as he adhered to the "covenant between the Lord and the king and the people, that they should be the Lord's people." Baal's house, altars, and images were first of all destroyed by the people under Jehoiaada; and Mattan, Baal's priest, was slain (2 Chron. xxiii. 17, 2 Kings xi. 17-19). The high places alone were spared, the people still sacrificing and burning incense on them. But after his faithful counsellor Jehoiaada was dead the princes with flattering "obsequance" (comp. Prov. xxix. 5) persuaded the weak king to forsake Jehovah for Ashterah and idols.

Wrath from God visited Judah for their trespass; then Zechariah, Jehoiaada's son, standing in the inner higher court, "above the people" in the outer court, denounced their apostasy and declared God's consequent withdrawal of blessing (2 Chron. xxiv. 20; comp. xii. 5, xv. 2). They stoned the prophet "at the king's commandment in the court of Jehovah's house," "between the temple and the altar" (Matt. xxiii. 35); contrast Jehoiaada's reverent care not to slay Athaliah there (2 Chron. xxiii. 14). J. slew other "sons" of Jehoiaada also (xxiv. 25). Zechariah left his cause in the Lord's hands, "the Lord look upon it and require it." So Hazael, as executioner of God's judgment, with a small Syrian army came to Judah and Jerusalem, and in battle destroyed all the princes (a just retribution on the instigators of the apostasy, ver. 23). J. bought his withdrawal only at the cost of all his own and the temple treasures (2 Kings xii. 17, 18). Sorely wounded and sick, in his helpless state he was slain on his bed in the house of Millo by two conspirators, Zabad or Joachaz, son of an Ammonitess, and Jehoabad, son of a Moabitess; from the nations whose idols he adopted came also God's punishers of his idolatry. His body at death was excluded from the royal sepulchres, to which good Jehoiaada for his special goodness had been admitted. His reign lasted 40 years (878-838 B.C.). Ahaziah, J., and Amaziah are the three omitted in Matthew's genealogy of Jesus Christ.

8. Jehoahaz' son and successor as king of Israel. (810-825 B.C.) For two years contemporary of Joash of Judah (2 Kings xiv. 1; comp. xii. 1, xiii. 10). God, in pity to Israel's extreme oppression by Hazael and the Syrians, remembered "his covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob," and by Elisha on his deathbed promised deliverance through J. The king had lamented the prophet's near decease as the loss of "the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof," using the same language as Elisha had used of Elijah. By Elisha's direction J. put his hand on a bow, Elisha put his hands on the king's hands (for God must bless our handiwork, else we labour in vain: comp. Gen. xlix. 24). Then J. shot eastward and Elisha promised that J. "should smite the Syrians in Aphek till he consumed them." Then by Elisha's direction J. smote on the ground with arrows. Smiting only thrice he was reproved by the prophet: "thou shouldst have smitten five or six times, then hadst thou smitten Syria till thou hadst consumed them, whereas now thou shalt smite Syria but thrice." So J. took again out of the hands of Hazael's successor, Benhadad, Israel's cities and beat him thrice. J. overcame at Beth-shemesh, and took AMAZIAH [see], who challenged him because of the depredations of Israelite mercenaries whom Amaziah had sent away (2 Chron. xxv.) and brake down the wall of JERUSALEM [see] from the Ephraim gate (or that of Benjamin leading northward) to the N.W. corner gate, 400 cubits, (the N. side being Jerusalem's only accessible side,) and carried away the gold and silver found under Obel Edom's charge in the temple and in the palace. J. after his return to Samaria died in the 15th year of Amaziah's reign, and was buried in the sepulchres of the kings of Israel. Jeroboam II. was his successor.

Job. Age, and relation to the canon. The book has a unique position in the canon. It is unconnected with Israel, God's covenant people, with whom all the other scriptures are associated. "The law" (torah), the Magna Charta of the rest, occurs but once, and then not in its technical sense (xxii. 22). The exodus is never alluded to, though the miraculous events connected with it in Egypt and the desert, with both of which J. shows his acquaintance, would have been appropriate to his and the friends' argument. The destruction of the guilty by the flood (xxii. 15), and that of Sodom and Gomorrah (xviii. 15) possibly, are referred to; but no later facts. The inference seems natural that the book was of an age anterior to Israel. J.'s own life was of patriarchal length, 200 years. The only idolatry alluded to is the earliest, Sabeanism, the worship of the sun, moon, and sea or heavenly hosts (xxxi. 26-28). J. sacrifices as priest for his family according to patriarchal usage, and alludes to no exclusive priesthood, temple, or altar. Lastly, the language is Heb. with an Arabic and Syriac infusion found in no other sacred book, answering to an age when Heb. still retained many of the elements of the original common Semitic, from which in time branched off Heb., Syriac, and Arabic, carrying with them severally fragments of the common stock. The obscurity of several phrases, the obsolete words and forgotten traditions (e.g. that of the bushmen, xxx. 4-7), all mark a remote antiquity. The admission of the book into the Hebrew canon, notwithstanding the absence of reference to Israel, is accounted for if Lee's theory be adopted that Moses became acquainted with it during his stay in Arabia, near Horeb, and added the prologue and epilogue. To the afflicted Israelites J.'s patience and restoration were calculated to be a lesson of special utility. The restriction of "Jehovah" (the Divine name revealed to Moses in its bringing the fulfilment of the promise to God's covenant people just at that time: Exod. vi. 3) mostly to the prologue and epilogue favours this view. The Holy Spirit directed him to canonize the oriental patriarch's inspired book, just as he embodies in the pentateuch the utterances of Balaam the prophet from the mountains of the East.

The grand theme of the book is to reconcile the saint's afflictions with God's moral government in this present world. The doctrine of a future life in which the seeming anomalies of the present shall be cleared up would have given the main solution to the problem. But as yet this great truth was kept less prominent until "the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ who hath abolished death and brought life and immortality to light through the gospel." J. plainly refers to the resurrection, but not with that persistent prominence with which the N. T. saints rest on it as their continual hope; J. does not make it his main solution. Even still we need something in addition, to clear off the clouds which hang over God's present government of this fallen earth. The first consideration suggested in this sublime history and poem is, "an enemy hath done this." The veil which hides the world of spirits is drawn aside, and Satan, the accuser of the brethren, appears as the mediate cause of J.'s afflictions. Satan must be let do his worst to show that his sneer is false that religion is but selfishness, "doth J. fear God for naught?" (i. 9). The (i. 21, ii. 10, xiii. 15) patience and the final perseverance of the saints, notwithstanding temporary distrust under Satan's persecutions which entailed loss of family, friends, possessions, and bodily health, are illustrated in J.'s history. God's people serve Him for His own sake, not merely for the temporary reward His service generally brings; they serve Him even in overwhelming trial (Gen. xv. 1). Herein J. is a type though imperfectly of Him who alone, without once harbouring a distrustful thought, endured all this as well as death in its most agonizing, humiliating form, and worse than all, the hiding of even God's countenance from Him. J.'s chief agony was not so much his accumulated losses and sufferings, not even his being misunderstood by friends, but that God hid His face from him, as these calamities too truly seemed to prove (Job xxiii. 9). Yet conscience told him he was no hypocrite, nay though God was slaying him he still trusted in God (ver. 10-15, xiii. 15; comp. Abraham, Gen. xxii.). J.'s three trials are progressive. 1. His sudden loss of all blessings external to himself, possessions, servants, and sons; he conquers this temptation: "naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither; the Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord." 2. His loss of bodily health by the most loathsome sickness; still he conquers: "shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" 3. His mental conflict brought on by the three friends' suspicion of his insincerity, which he felt untrue, but which seemed justified by his trials from God; this was the poignant sting to his soul, for he accepted their premises, that great suffering proved great sin. Here he failed; yet amidst his impatient groans he still clung desperately to his faith and followed hard after God, and felt sure God would yet vindicate him (xxiii. 10, xiv. 25-27). His chief error was his undue self justification before God, which he at last utterly renounces (xxx. 25-xxxi., xxxii. 1, xxxiii. 9, ix. 17, x. 7, xvi. 17, xxvii. 5, xxix. 10-17, xl. 4, 5, xli. 5, 6). After fretfully demanding God's interposition (xxiii.) to vindicate his innocence he had settled down into the sad conviction that God heeds not, and that His ways of providence are as a theory inexplicable to man whilst practical wisdom is the fear of the Lord (xxviii., xxxi. 35).

Elihu gives a leading solution of the problem. God not only hereafter shall judge the world, but even now providentially and morally controls all its affairs. Even the righteous have sin which needs correction. God speaks to them by chastisement; He is not really silent (xvi. 21, xxiii. 3, xxxi. 35), as J. had complained (xxxiii. 14, etc.); He teaches them humility, and prepares them for pardon and life through the mediating Angel of the covenant (of whom Elihu is the type: xxxiii. 6, 7, 23-30). To J.'s charge against God of injustice Elihu answers that God's omnipotence (xxxiv., xxxv., xxxvi.), upholding man in life when He could destroy him, and His universal government, exclude the idea of injustice in Him. To J.'s charge that God's providence is unsearchable, Elihu answers that suffering is to teach humility and adoration of His greatness. Affliction to the saint is justice and mercy in disguise; he is thereby led to feel the heinousness of sin (via crucis via salutis), and not being permitted by God's love to fall away for ever he repents of the impatience which suffering betrayed him into for a time. Then, justifying God and condemning himself, he is finally delivered from temporal afflictions. Now already the godly are happier amidst afflictions than the godly (Mark x. 29, 30). Even these considerations do not exhaust the subject; still difficulties remain. To answer these, God Himself (Job xxxviii.) appears on the scene, and resolves all that remains unclear into the one resting thought of faith, the sovereignty of God. We must wait for His solution hereafter of what we know not now (John xiii. 7). Elihu is the preacher appealing to J.'s reason and conscience. God alone, in His appearing, brings home the truth experimentally to J.'s heart.

"Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
But trust Him for His grace;
Behind a frowning Providence
He hides a smiling face.
Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan God's work in vain;
God is His own interpreter,
And He will make it plain."

CONSTRUCTION. The artificial construction of the poem appears in the oft recurring sacred numbers three and seven. J. had seven thousand sheep, seven sons, and three daughters, both before and after his trials. His three friends sit with him seven days and nights. "Job" in Arabic means repentance, the name given him in after life from his experiences. His personal reality appears from his being named with "Noah and Daniel," real persons, in Ezek. xiv. 14, 16-20. St. James (v. 11) refers to J. as an example of patience, which he would hardly do were J. an imaginary person. Persons and places are specified as they would not be in an allegory. The exact doubling of his possessions after restoration is probably the nearest round number given, as is often the case in books undoubtedly historical. The arguments of the speeches were substantially those given, the studied number and poetic form were given by the sacred writer under the Holy Spirit. J. lived 140 years after his trials; and nothing is more natural than that he should at leisure mould into form the arguments of the momentous debate for the edification of the church. The debate occupied several sittings with intervals of a day or more between them. The number of speeches assigned to each was arranged by preconceived agreement, so that none spoke out of his turn.

Uz (see) means a light sandy soil (Gesenius). It was probably N. of Arabia Deserta, between Palestine and the Euphrates; called Ausitai by Ptolemy (Geogr. 19). In Gen. xxii. 21 Uz is son of Nahor, Abraham's brother. Another Uz in Gen. x. 23 was grandson of Shem and son of Aram; the latter is probably the source of the name, as the Arameans dwelt between the Euphrates and Tigris. The sons of Shem dwelt in "a mount of the East" (Gen. x. 30), answering to "men of the East" (Job i. 3). Rawlinson says Uz is the prevailing name of the country at the Euphrates' mouth, where the Chaldees mentioned in chap. i. resided. The Idumean quarter however, and Arabia, would agree better with Moses' finding it during his exile in Midian. Moreover Eliphaz is an Idumean name; so is "Femane" (Gen. xxxvi. 4, 15). "Shubite" answers to Syecia in Arabia Deserta.

Eusebius fixes J.'s time as being two ages before Moses. Besides the arguments for this above, others are the number of oxen and rams sacrificed, seven, as in Balaam's case; this agrees with a time before the law defined God's will otherwise. Also the writing he speaks of is the most ancient, sculpture (Job xx. 23, 24); "printed" means engraved, "pen" a graver. Riches were then cattle. The Heb. "piece of money" is rather a lamb.

The Writer. The thought, imagery, and manners accord with what we should expect from an Arab emir. J. in his speeches shows himself more competent to compose the book than Elihu, to whom Lightfoot attributes it. The style is distinct from that of Moses. Its inspiration is attested by Paul under the Spirit quoting it with the formula "it is written" (Job v. 13). Our Lord in Matt. xxiv. 28 refers to Job xxix. 30; comp. also Jas. iv. 10, 1 Pet. v. 6, with Job xxi. 29; Rom. xi. 34, 35 with Job xv. 8; Jer. xx. 14, 15, endorses Job iii. 3; Isa. xix. 5, Job xiv. 11; Ps. xxxvii. lxxiii., discusses the same problem as J. Prov. viii. develops J.'s description of wisdom in chap. xxviii. It stands among the hagiographa (chethubim, "sacred writings") in the threefold division, "the law, the prophets, and the psalms," or hagiographa, of which the Psalms are a leading book (Luke xxiv. 44).

Divisions. To each of the three friends three speeches are assigned; J. is allowed a reply to each of the three. Eliphaz the eldest leads; Zophar at his third turn fails to speak, virtually owning himself defeated (Job xxvii.). Therefore J. continues his reply which forms three speeches: xxvi.; xxvii., xxviii.; xxix.—xxxii. Elihu (xxxii.—xxxvii.) is allowed four speeches. Jehovah makes three addresses (xxxviii.—xli.). Thus throughout there is a tripartite division. The whole consists of three parts: the prologue, poem, and epilogue. The poem three: (1) J.'s dispute with his three friends; (2) Elihu's address; (3) Jehovah's. The epilogue has three parts: J.'s justification, reconciliation with his friends, and restoration. The speakers regularly advance from less to greater vehemence. The explicitness (xiv. 14, xix. 25) of J.'s anticipation of the resurrection, as contrasted with the obscurity on the subject in the early books of O. T., is due to J.'s enjoyment of the Divine vision (xxxviii. 1, xlii. 5). The revelations outside of Israel, being few, needed to be more explicit. Balaam's prophecy (Num. xxiv. 17) was clear enough to lead the wise men of the East by the star (Matt. ii.). In the age before the written law God left not Himself without witnesses, e.g. Melchizedek, J., Jethro. J. only dimly realized the Spirit-designed significance of his own words (1 Pet. i. 11, 12). Even Asaph, who had in David's psalms (xvi. 10, xvii. 15) plain prophecies of a future retribution in the body to the righteous and to the wicked, still felt the difficulty as regards God's government here in this present time (lxxiii.). "Prosperity is the blessing of O. T., adversity that of N. T. . . . Yet even in O. T. the pencil of the Holy Ghost has laboured more in describing J.'s afflictions than Solomon's felicities" (Bacon). Elihu showed how God can be just, and yet the righteous be afflicted; Jehovah's address shows that He must be just, because He is God. God reprimands the three friends, but not Elihu. The simpler and less artificial forms of poetry prevail in J., a mark of the early age. The orientals used to preserve their sentiments in a terse, proverbial, poetic form, called masbal; to this form J.'s poetry is akin. [See JOHAR.]

Jobab. 1. Last of Jektan's sons (Gen. x. 29, 1 Chron. i. 23). Ptolemy mentions the Jobarita (perhaps Jobabita ought to be read) among the Arabs. 2. King of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 33, 34); son of Zerah of Bozrah; successor of Bela, first king. His association in kindred with Eliphaz (2) gives colour to the conjecture that J.=Job. 3. Josh. xi. 1. 4. 1 Chron. viii. 9.

Jochebed=Jehovah her glory. Aunt and wife of Amram (Exod. ii. 1, vi. 20; Num. xxvi. 59). But J. could not be strictly daughter of Levi, for three centuries must have intervened between Levi's death and Moses' birth. Amram and J. were descendants of Levi, seven or eight generations removed. In Moses' time the Kohathites, from Kohath Levi's son, were divided into four branches, Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel, amounting to 8600 males, of whom the Amramites were 2000. Amram Kohath's son is therefore not Amram Moses' father. Omission of links in Scripture genealogies is frequent.

Joel. Neh. xi. 7.

Joel=Jehovah is God. 1. Samuel's eldest son (1 Sam. viii. 2; 1 Chron. vi. 28 (read "the first born [J.] and the second [Jashui] Abiah"), 33; xv. 17). Father of Heman the singer. He and his brother Abiah were judges in Beersheba, when their father was too old to go on circuit. Their bribery and perversion of justice occasioned the cry for a monarchy. 2. J., a corruption of Shaul (1 Chron. vi. 24, 36).

3. Of the twelve minor prophets. Son of Pethuel. The many (Joel i. 14; ii. 1, 15, 22; iii. 1, 2, 6, 16-21) references to Judah and Jerusalem and the temple imply that his ministry was in the southern kingdom. "Israel," when mentioned (iii. 2), represents the whole twelve tribes. Date. The position of his book in the Hebrew canon between Hosea and Amos implies that he was Hosea's contemporary, slightly preceding Amos who at Tekoa probably heard him, and so under the Spirit reproduces his words (iii. 16, comp. Amos i. 2). The sentiment and language of the three prophets correspond. The freshness of style, the absence of allusion to the great empires Assyria and Babylon, and the mention of Tyre, Sidon, and the Philistines (Joel iii. 4) as God's executioners of judgment on Israel, accord with an early date, probably Uzziah's reign or even Josiah's reign. No mention is made of the Syrians who invaded Judah in the close of the reign of Joash of Judah (2 Kings xii. 17, 18; 2 Chron. xxiv. 23-25), but that was an isolated event and Syria was too far N. to trouble Judah permanently. The mention of "the valley of Jehoshaphat" (Joel iii. 12) alludes to Jehoshaphat's victory (2 Chron. xx.), the earnest of Israel's future triumph over the heathen; though occurring long before, it was so great an event as to be ever after a pledge of God's favour to His people.

Chap. i. describes the ravages caused by locusts, a scourge foretold by Moses (Deut. xxviii. 38, 39) and by Solomon (1 Kings viii. 37, 46). The second chapter makes them symbols of foreign foes who would destroy all before them. So Rev. ix. 1-12, Amos vii. 1-4. Their teeth like those "of lions" (Joel i. 6), their assailing cities (ii. 6-9), and a flame of fire being their image (i. 19, 20; ii. 3, 5), and their finally being driven eastward, westward ("the utmost sea," the Mediterranean), and southward ("a land barren," etc.), whereas locusts are carried away by wind in one direction only, all favour the symbolical meaning. They are plainly called "the heathen" (ii. 17), "the northern (a quarter whence locusts do not come) army" (ii. 20), "all the nations" (iii. 2), "strangers" (iii. 17). Their fourfold invasion is to be the last before Jehovah's glorious deliverance (ii. 18-20, etc.) in answer to His people's penitent prayer (ii. 12-17).

LOCUST.

Arrangement. I. Chaps. i.—ii. 17 the fourfold invasion answering to the four successive world empires, Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, Rome. Each of the four species of locusts in Heb. letters represents the exact number of years that each empire oppressed, until they had deprived the Jews of all their glory (J. C. Reicheardt). Gazam, the first, "the palmerworm," represents the 50 years of Babylon's oppression, from the temple's destruction by Nebuchadnezzar (588 B.C.) to Babylon's overthrow by Cyrus (538 B.C.). Arbeh, the second, "the locust," represents Persia's 208 years' sway over the Jews, from 538 to 330 B.C., when Persia fell before Alexander the Great. Yeleq, the third, "the cankerworm," represents 140 years of the Greco-Macedonian oppression, from 330 to 190 B.C., when Antiochus the Jews' great enemy was defeated by the Roman, Lucius Scipio. Chasil, "the caterpillar," the fourth, represents the 108 years of the Romans' oppression, beginning with their minion Herod the Great, an Idumean stranger, 38 B.C., and ending A.D. 70 with the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple. The whole period thus comprises that between the destruction of the first and the second temple; and the calamities which befell the Jews by the four world empires in that period are those precisely which produced the ruin under which they are still groaning, and form the theme of their Kinnoth or songs of lamentation. This first portion ends in a call to thorough and universal repentance. II. Chap. ii. 18-29. Salvation announced to the repentant people, and restoration of all they lost, and greater blessings added. III. Chap. ii. 30—iii. 21. Destruction of the apostate nations confederate against Israel on the one hand; and Jehovah's dwelling as Israel's God in Zion, and Judah abiding for ever, on the other, so that fountains of blessing from His house shall flow, symbolised by waters, milk, and new wine.

References to the law, on which all the prophets lean, occur: ii. 13, comp. Exod. xxxiv. 6, xxxii. 14; ii. 28, comp. Num. xi. 29, fulfilled in the pentecostal outpouring of the Spirit in part (Acts ii. 16, 21, xxi. 9; John vii. 39), but awaiting a further fulfilment just before Israel's restoration, when "the Spirit shall be poured upon all flesh" (of which the outpouring on all classes without distinction of race is the earnest: Acts ii. 28, 38; Rom. x. 12, 13; Zech. xii. 10; Joel ii. 23). Also iii. 19-21, comp. Dent. xxxii. 42, 43, the locusts, of which it is written "there hath not been ever the like, neither shall be" (Joel ii. 2, comp. Exod. x. 14). Pusey transl. ii. 23 ("the former rain moderately") "He hath given you [in His purpose] the Teacher unto righteousness," viz. who "shall bring in everlasting righteousness" (Dan. ix.). This translation is favoured by the emphasis on eth hamoreh, not found in the latter part of the verse where rain is meant; the promise of Christ's coming thus stands first, as the source of "rain" and all other blessings which follow; He is God's gift, "given" as in Isa. lv. 4.

J.'s style is pure, smooth, rhythmical, periodic, and regular in its parallelisms; strong as Micah, tender as Jeremiah, vivid as Nathan, and sublime as Isaiah. Take as a specimen (chap. ii.) his graphic picture of the terrible aspect of the locusts, their rapidity, irresistible progress, noisy din, and instinct-taught power of marshalling their forces for devastation. 4. 1 Chron. iv. 35, 41-43. 5. 1 Chron. v. 4. 6. 1 Chron. v. 11, 12. 7. 1 Chron. vii. 3, 4. 8. 1 Chron. xi. 38; in 2 Sam. xxiii. 36 1 GAL. 9. 1 Chron. xv. 7, 11, 12; xxiii. 8; xxvi. 22. 10. 1 Chron. xxvii. 20. 11. 2 Chron. xxix. 12, 15. 12. Joelah. 1 Chron. xii. 7.

Joezer. 1 Chron. xii. 6.

Jogbehah. A city E. of Jordan, fortified by Gad (Num. xxxii. 35). Jaazer (Jazer, one in Gilead) and J., N.W. of Amman, between it and Es Salt, now Jebelha, a ruin seven miles to the N.E., formed the second group of Gadite settlements. The first group was headed by Dibon. Chemosh Gad (=he whose good fortune is Chemosh) the father of Mesha was a Dibonite. The third Gadite settlement lay in the Jordan valley, W. of the second group, Beth Nimrah, etc. (ver. 33-35).

Jogli. Num. xxxiv. 22.

Joha. 1. Son of Beriah of Benjamin, who was "a head of the fathers of the inhabitants of Aijalon who drove away the inhabitants of Gath" (1 Chron. viii. 13, 16). A similar border encounter of Ephraim's sons with the marauding Philistines of Gath is recorded in vii. 21-23, and Beriah is there also mentioned. But this name occurs often, e.g. Asher's son (vii. 30; Gen. xvi. 17). 2. 1 Chron. xi. 45.

Johanan = JEHOHANAN = Jehovah's gift = John. 1. 1 Chron. vi. 9, 19. Highpriest in Rehoboam's reign, as his father AZARIAH [see] was in Solomon's reign. This requires the transposition of the clause, "he it is that executed the priest's office in the temple that Solomon built in Jerusalem" from 1 Chron. vi. 10 to follow J.'s father "Azariah" in ver. 9. Keil objects to this, and there is probably some omission of names in the genealogy (comp. 1 Kings iv. 2). 2. Son of Kareah. Captain of a band, a remnant of the Jewish army, after Jerusalem's overthrow by the Chaldees. [See GEDALIAH, ISHMAEL, JEREMIAH.] J. consulted the prophet that Jehovah, Jeremiah's God, might show the Jewish remnant "the way wherein to walk, and the thing to do" (Jer. xlii.); imitating pious Hezekiah's request for Isaiah's intercession (Isa. xxxvii. 4), "lift up thy prayer for the remnant that is left." J. had already determined to go to Egypt whether it were God's will or not, but he wished if possible to have God's sanction (Jer. xlii. 20; comp. 1 Kings xxii. 13, 14). Jeremiah reminds J. and his company that Jehovah is their God as well as his (whole-hearted obedience is therefore their part: Exod. xix. 5, 6; 1 Cor. vi. 19, 20); and that he will pray, and whatsoever Jehovah shall answer he will declare, "keeping nothing back" (Acts xx. 20). They called God to witness they would obey whatever Jehovah might command. Ten days they were kept waiting, to give them time to deliberate, that the sincerity of their professions might be tested (Dent. viii. 2). True obedience accepts God's time, as well as God's will, at all costs (contrast 1 Sam. xiii. 8-14, xv.); the ardour of hasty professions soon cools down. Whilst he was declaring God's will that they should stay where they were, Jeremiah saw indications, in their countenance and manner, of disinclination to fulfil what they had so solemnly engaged. Men want to have the reputation of piety, yet to retain their darling lusts. The very evils which they thought to escape by going they brought on themselves thereby, the sword and famine; they would have escaped them had they stayed, for God had promised it, and they might have been sure of His keeping His promise. Change of position brings no change of disposition, and evil follows sinners wherever they go (Ezek. xi. 8); none lose who venture on His promise. After the lesson just given in Jerusalem's overthrow, one would have thought the Jews would never more have doubted God's faithfulness to His threats as well as to His promises. But J. and his party charged Jeremiah with false prophecy (though their city and temple in ruins attested his truth), as if he were instigated by Baruch so as to deliver them up to the Chaldees. Bad men when resolved on a bad act never want a pretext for it. All they gained by forcing Jeremiah and Baruch to accompany them to Egypt was that Jeremiah there under the Spirit foretold their doom and that of Pharaoh upon whom they trusted instead of God.

3. 1 Chron. iii. 15. 4. 1 Chron. iii. 24. 5. 1 Chron. xii. 1, 4. 6. Eighth of the lion faced Gadite warriors who joined David during Jordan's overflow (when it is dangerous to cross) in the spring, the river being swollen by the melted snows of Lebanon; and put to flight all Saul's adherents among the valley dwellers eastward and westward (1 Chron. xii. 12). 7. 2 Chron. xxviii. 12. 8. John. 1. With Annas and Caiaphas, tried Peter and John for curing the impotent man and preaching in the temple (Acts iv. 6). The same as Rabbi Johanan ben Zaccai, who lived 40 years before the temple's destruction, and presided over the great synagogue after its removal to Jabne or Jamnia (Lightfoot). 2. The evangelist Mark's Heb. name (Acts xiii. 12, 25, xiii. 5, 13, xv. 37). [See Mark.]

John the Apostle. Younger than his brother James; being named after him in Matthew and Mark, the earlier Gospels; but Luke (ix. 28; Acts i. 13, Sin., Vat., Alex. MSS.), writing when J. had gained so much greater prominence in the church, ranks him in the order of church esteem, not that of nature. Youngest of the twelve, probably of Bethsaida upon the sea of Galilee (John i. 44, Luke v. 10), the town of their partners Simon and Andrew. Caspari (Chron. and Geogr. Intro.) to Life of Christ accounts for J.'s brief notice of Christ's Galilean ministry and fuller notices of His ministry in Judea thus: Jewish tradition alleges that all Israelites dwelling in the Holy Land were entitled to fish in the sea of Genesareth a month before each passover, and to use the fish for the many guests received at the feast in Jerusalem. J. used to stay in Galilee only during that month. However, no hint of this occurs in our Gospels. Zebedee his father owned a fishing vessel, and had "hirelings" (Mark i. 20). Salome his mother ministered to the Lord "of her substance" (Luke viii. 3), and was one of the women who came with Him in His last journey from Galilee to Jerusalem (Luke xxiii. 55, xxiv. 1; Mark xvi. 1), and after His death bought spices to anoint His body. J.'s acquaintance with the highpriest (John viii. 13) had been in early life, for it is not likely it would commence after he had become disciple of the despised Galilean. Hence probably arose his knowledge of the history of Nicodemus which he alone records. J. had a house of his own to which he took the Virgin mother, by our Lord's dying charge (xix. 27). The name, meaning the favour of God, had become a favourite one in the age where there was a general expectation of Messiah, and members of the highpriestly families bore it (Acts iv. 6). These hints all intimate that J. belonged to the respectable classes, and though called by the council "unlearned and ignorant" he was not probably without education, though untrained in their rabbinical lore (Acts iv. 13). Zebedee's readiness to give up his son at Jesus' call speaks well for his religious disposition. Salome went farther, and positively ministered to Jesus. Even her ambitious request that her two sons, James and J., might sit on either side of our Lord in His coming kingdom shows that she was heartily looking for that kingdom. Such a mother would store her son's memory with the precious promises of O. T. The book of Revelation in its temple imagery shows the deep impression which the altar, the incense, the priestly robes, and the liturgy had made on him.

J.'s first acquaintance with the Lord was when John Baptist pointed his two disciples Andrew and J. to the Lamb of God. J. followed Jesus to His place of sojourn. J. probably accompanied Him on His homeward journey to Galilee from Jordan (John i.), and then to Jerusalem (ii., iii.), again through Samaria to Galilee (iv.), and again to Jerusalem (v.), for he describes as an eye witness. Resuming his fishing occupation he received his call to permanent discipleship after the miraculous draught of fishes (Luke v. 10, Matt. iv. 18-22). In the selection of the twelve subsequently the two sons of Jonas and Zebedee's two sons stand foremost. Peter, James, and J. form the innermost circle. They alone witnessed the raising of Jairus' daughter, Jesus' transfiguration, His agony in Gethsemane, and with the addition of Andrew heard His answer to their private inquiry as to when, and with what premonitory sign, His prediction of the overthrow of the temple should be fulfilled (Mark xiii. 3, 4). Grotius designates Peter as the lover of Christ, J. the lover of Jesus. J. as a "son of thunder" (Mark iii. 17) was not the soft and feminine character that he is often portrayed, but full of intense, burning zeal, ready to drink the Lord's bitter cup and to be baptized with His fiery baptism (Isa. lvi. 1, Jer. xxiii. 29, Matt. xx. 22, Luke xii. 49, 50), impatient of any one in separation from Jesus' company, and eager for fiery vengeance on the Samaritans who would not receive Him (Luke ix. 49, 53, 54). Nor was this characteristic restricted to his as yet undisciplined state; it appears in his holy denunciations long afterwards (1 John ii. 18-22; 2 John 7-11; 3 John 9, 10). Through his mother J. gained his knowledge of the love of Mary Magdalene to the Lord, which he so vividly depicts (John xx). The full narrative of Lazarus' restoration to life (xi.) shows that he was an eye witness, and probably was intimate with the sisters of Bethany. He and Peter followed Jesus when apprehended, whilst the rest fled (xviii. 15), even as they had both together been sent to prepare the passover (Luke xxi. 8) the evening before, and as it was to J. reclining in Jesus' bosom (comp. S. of Sol. viii. 3, 6) that Peter at the supper made eager signs to get him to ask our Lord who should be the traitor (John xiii. 24). Whilst Peter remained in the porch J. was in the council chamber (xviii. 16-28). J., the Virgin, and Mary Magdalene accompanied the Saviour to Calvary, and to him Jesus committed as to a brother the care of His sorrowing mother. Peter and J. were in the same abode the ensuing sabbath, and to them Mary Magdalene first runs with the tidings of the tomb being empty. Ardent love lent wings to J.'s feet, so that he reached the tomb first; but reverent awe restrained him from entering. Peter more impulsive was first to enter (xx. 4-6). For at least eight days they stayed at Jerusalem (ver. 26). Then they appear in Galilee (xxi.) again associated in their former occupation on the sea of Galilee. As yet they were uncertain whether the Lord's will was that they should continue their apostolic ministrations or not; and in the interval their livelihood probably necessitated their resuming their fishing occupation, which moreover would allay their mental agitation at that time of suspense. J. with deeper spiritual intuition was first to recognise Jesus in the morning twilight, Peter first in plunging into the water to reach Him (ver. 7). Peter's bosom friendship for J. suggested the question, after learning his own future, "Lord, and what shall this man do?" (ver. 21.)

In that undesigned coincidence which confirms historic truth, the book of Acts (iii. 1, iv. 13, viii. 14) represents the two associated as in the Gospels; together they enter the temple and meet the impotent man at the Beautiful gate; together they witness before the council; together they confirm in the faith, and instrumentally impart the Holy Spirit by laying hands on the deacon Philip's converts in Samaria, the very place where J. once would have called down fire to consume the Samaritans. So complete was the triumph of grace over him! At Stephen's death he and the other apostles alone stayed at Jerusalem when all the rest were scattered. At Paul's second visit there J. (esteemed then with James and Peter a "pillar") gave him the right hand of fellowship, that he should go to the heathen and they to the circumcision (Gal. ii. 9). J. took part in the first council there concerning circumcision of the Gentiles (Acts xv. 6). No sermon of his is recorded, Peter is always the spokesman. Contemplation and communion with God purified the fire of his character, and gave him that serene repose which appears in his writings, which all belong to the later portion of his life. He is not mentioned as married in 1 Cor. ix. 5, where, had he been so, it would probably have been stated. Under Domitian (about A.D. 95) J. was banished to Patmos (Rev. i. 9,

PATMOS.

11). "I John . . . your companion in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ, was in the isle . . . Patmos, for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ." The seven churches of western Asia were under his special care. In the Acts, epistles to Ephesians, and Timothy, recording Paul's ministry in connection with Ephesus, no mention occurs of J. being there. Again J. does not appear in Jerusalem when Paul finally visited it A.D. 60. Probably he left Jerusalem long before settling at Ephesus, and only moved there after Paul's martyrdom, A.D. 66.

Paul had foreseen the rise of gnostic heresy in the Ephesian region. "Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them" (Acts xx. 30; comp. 1 Tim. i. 6, 7, 19, 20, iv. 1-7; 2 Tim. i. 13, 15, ii. 16-18, iii.; Tit. i. 9, 16). These heresies, as yet in the germ, J. in his Gospel and epistles counteracts (John i. : 1 John iv. 1, ii. 18-22; 2 John 7, 9-11; 3 John 9, 10). His tone is meditative and serene, as contrasted with Paul's logical and at the same time ardent style. His sharp reproof of Diotrophes accords with the story of his zeal against error, reported as from Polycarp, that entering the public baths of Ephesus he heard that Cerinthus was there; instantly he left the building lest it should fall whilst that enemy of the truth was within. In J.'s view there is no neutrality between Christ and antichrist. Clement of Alexandria (Quis Dives Salvus?) reports of J. as a careful pastor, that he commended a noble looking youth in a city near Ephesus to the bishop. The latter taught, and at last baptized, the youth. Returning some time afterwards J. said to the bishop: "restore the pledge which I and the Saviour entrusted to you before the congregation." The bishop with tears replied: "he is dead . . . dead to God . . . a robber!" J. replied, "to what a keeper I have entrusted my brother's soul!" J. hastened to the robber's fortress. The sentiments brought him before their captain. The latter fled from him: "why do you flee from me, your father, an unarmed old man? You have yet a hope of life. I will yet give an account to Christ of you. If need be, I will gladly die for you." J. never left him till he had rescued him from sin and restored him to Christ. Jerome records as to his characteristic love, that when J., being too feeble through age to walk to the Christian assemblies, was carried thither by young men, his only address was: "little children, love one another." When asked why he kept repeating the same words he replied, "because this is the Lord's command, and enough is done when this is done."

J.'s thought and feelings became so identified with his Lord's that his style reflects exactly that of Jesus' deeper and especially spiritual discourses, which he alone records. He lives in the unseen, spiritual, rather than in the active world. His designation, "the divine," expresses his insight into the glory of the eternal Word, the Only Begotten of the Father, made flesh, in opposition to mystical and doctetic gnosticism which denied the reality of that manifestation and of Christ's body. The high soaring eagle, gazing at the sun with unflinching eye, is the one of the four seraphim which represents J. Irenæus, Polycarp's disciple (Adv. Hær. ii. 39, Euseb. iii. 23), states that J. settled at Ephesus and lived to the time of Trajan. Tertullian's story of his being cast into boiling oil at Rome and coming forth unhurt is improbable; none else records it; the punishment was one unheard of at Rome.

John, Gospel according to. Well called "the Gospel of the incarnate God," "the Gospel of witness," that of the Father, that of Scripture, that of miracles, that of Jesus Himself. Written at Ephesus at the request of the Asiatic bishops to set forth more profoundly Christ's Divinity (Jerome, Prolog. in Matt.). Ephesus, after Jerusalem's fall, A.D. 70, took a chief place in oriental Christendom. Containing a large Christian church, a synagogue of zealous Jews, and the most famous of heathen temples that of Artemis or Diana, it was a common meeting ground for widely diverse creeds. Philosophical speculation too had free scope in its xystus; here Cerinthus broached his doctrines, concocted at Alexandria. Its commercial position on the sea linking the East and West adapted it as an admirable centre for the diffusion of gospel truth. John sets forth the positive truth which indirectly yet effectually counteracts gnosticism, Ebionitism, and docetism. The Spirit has made his Gospel virtually supplementary to the other three. [See GOSPELS and JESUS CHRIST.] Theirs is that of "Christ according to the flesh," his that of "Christ according to the Spirit." As he joined Christ early he records facts of His ministry in Galilee and Jerusalem, prior to those in the three synoptists. He writes with a specification of times and places, and a freshness, which mark an eye witness (i. 29, 35, 37-40; ii. 1; iii. 1; iv. 40, 43; vi. 22; xiii. 1-11; xviii. 10-16; xix. 26; xx. 3-10, 24-29). That the beloved disciple (called episteliōs from his reclining on Jesus' breast) was the writer appears from xix. 25-27, 35, xxi. 24, i. 14. Another undesigned propriety identifying him is, though naming John the Baptist 20 times he always omits "the Baptist," whereby the three synoptists distinguish him from John the evangelist.

Place and time. His allusions in the peculiar terms of his prologue to the theosophic notions prevalent at Ephesus accord with that city being the place of his writing the Gospel. Acts xviii. 24 implies the connection between Alexandria, the headquarters of gnosticism, and Ephesus. John xxi. is an appendix written subsequently to xx. 30, 31 (which at first completed the Gospel), perhaps after Peter's martyrdom. The Gospel cannot have been written at the same time and place as Revelation, the styles are so different. His mode of counting the hours as we do was Asiatic (see Townson, Harmony, viii. 1, § 3), and accords with Ephesus being the place of writing. His not feeling it necessary to explain Jesus' prophecy that John should tarry till He came (xxi.) shows that he wrote soon after the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 70), when that event was generally understood as being the Lord's coming, viz. in judgment upon the Jews. In chap. v. 2 the sheep market with five porches is spoken of as still standing, perhaps spared as some other things for convenience by Titus (Josephus, B. J., vii. 1, § 1).

Testimonies of authenticity. It xxi. 24, 25 came from some Ephesian disciples this is the oldest testimony to it. 2 Pet. i. 14 alludes to (xxi. 18) Christ's prophecy of Peter's crucifixion, taking for granted his readers' acquaintance with the Gospel, the strongest kind of testimony as being undesigned. Ignatius (Ep. to Rom.). Polycarp (Ep. to Philipp.), the Epistle to Diognetus, Justin Martyr (Apol. i. 61, Dial. Tryph. 63, 88), contain implied quotations of it; their not expressly quoting it is due to the prevalence of oral more than written teaching at first; whilst the inspired preachings of apostles were fresh in memory definite appeals to writings are less to be expected than in the following age. The general references of the former and the definite quotations of the latter are just what we might expect presuming the Gospel genuine. Papias (Eus. II. E. iii. 39) used the first epistle of John which is close akin to the Gospel. Tatian's Diatessaron opens, "In the beginning was the Word"; he quotes this Gospel in Orat. contra Gentil. Thus its currency A.D. 170 is proved. Theophilus of Antioch (Autol. ii.) first expressly attributes it to John; he wrote a commentary on the four and a harmony (Jerome Alg. 53, Vir. Illust. 25). He and Tatian therefore, in the second century, considered the four the exclusively canonical standard. Irenæus, a hearer of Polycarp, the disciple of John, argues for the propriety of the number four; his argument proves their long and universal acceptance by the church more conclusively than if it had been his aim to demonstrate it. The Alogi of Asia Minor were the only sect that rejected this Gospel, owing to their opposition to Montanus, whose heresies they thought were favoured by it.

The diversity of the scene and incidents of Christ's ministry in it, as compared with the three preceding Gospels, is just what we might expect if the author were acquainted with them. For whilst as an independent witness he does not with formal design supplement them, yet he generally omits under the Spirit those particulars already handled by his predecessors. Excepting the crucifixion and resurrection, respecting which he gives new information, he has only two sections in common with the synoptists (vi. 1-21, xii. 1). He omits Christ's baptism, temptation, mission of the twelve, transfiguration (of which he was one of the three selected eye witnesses), the Lord's supper, and the agony in Gethsemane, yet incidental hints show his taking them for granted as known already (i. 14, 32, xiii. 2, xiv. 30, xviii. 1, 11), which last refers to the very words of His prayer during the agony, recorded by the synoptists, an undesigned coincidence and so a proof of authenticity: xiv. 30 is the link between the temptation (Luke iv. 13) and His agony (Luke xxii. 40-53); John xi. 1 assumes the reader's acquaintance with Mary and Martha, from Luke x. 38. So John iv. 43, 44, vii. 41, tacitly refer to the facts recorded in Matt. xiii. 54, ii. 23; xviii. 33 takes for granted the fact recorded in Luke xxiii. 2. Chap. vi., wherein he repeats the miraculous feeding of 5000 recorded by the synoptists, is introduced to preface the discourse which John alone records. In chap. xii. the anointing by Mary is repeated for its connection with Judas' subsequent history.

The objections to John's acquaintance with the synoptical Gospels are based on the presumption that in that case he was bound to slavishly supplement them and guard against the appearance of discrepancies between him and them. But he was an independent witness, not formally designing to supplement; yet as knowing their Gospels he would mostly use materials heretofore not handled. As they presented Jesus' outer and popular life, so it remained that he should represent the deeper truths of His Divine mission and Person. They met the church's first needs; he, its later wants. Luke's Gospel was written under Paul's superintendence at least 20 years before John's. Considering the intercourse between the Christian churches it is incredible that his Gospel should have been unknown at Ephesus, John's and previously Paul's scene of labours, and this to John a "pillar" of the church.

Design. John, the last surviving apostle, would surely be consulted on the canonicity of N. T. Scriptures which by God's providence he lived to see completed. Theodore of Mopsuestia, 4th century (Catena Johann. Corder. Mill N. T.) says John did attest it. Clement Alex. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 14) states on the authority of old presbyters (and the Murator. Fragm., Ant. M. Adv. iii., confirms the statement) that John wrote at his friends' request to give Christ's "spiritual" aspect, the former Gospels already having given His "bodily" aspect. John, who leaned on Jesus' breast, His closest intimate, was the fittest to set forth the deeper spiritual truths of the Son of God. Thus the "ye" (xix. 35, xx. 31) will refer to J.'s "friends" primarily, the general church secondarily. To prove "that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God" is this Gospel's declared design, that men so "believing might have life through His name." A continued polemic reference is not likely, considering John's contemplative and usually loving spirit. An incidental guarding of the truth against incipient heresies in that region certainly there is in the prologue and xix. 34, xx. 27; comp. i. 14. Paul in epistle to Colossians alludes to the judaizing form of gnosticism. Oriental and Grecian speculations combined at Alexandria to foster it. As the Docetæ denied that the Divine Word assumed a real body, so the Ebionites denied His real Godhead. John counteracts both incidentally in subordination to his main design. He uses in a sense congruous to O. T., and sanctioned by the Spirit, the terms used by gnostics in a false sense.

The prologue gives the keynote of the Gospel: the eternal Godhead of the Word who was made flesh that, as He created all things, so He might give light and life to those born again of His Spirit; on the other hand Satan's counterwork, His rejection by His own creatures, though in His own person fulfilling all their love. His adversaries are called "the Jews," the nation by the time of John writing having become through continued resistance of the truth identified with their hierarchical chiefs, Jesus' opponents; whereas in the synoptists the several classes of opponents are distinguished, "Pharisees," "scribes," "lawyers," "chief priests," etc. After Jerusalem's fall John living among the Gentiles regarded the Jews as no longer the people of God; an undesigned confirmation of authenticity. That the writer was a Jew appears from his quoting the Heb. O. T. (not LXX.): xii. 40, xix. 37. His own brother James he never names; a pseudo John of later times would have been sure to name him. The synoptists and Acts similarly never introduce him individually. John dwells most on the deep spiritual truths, Christ's essential oneness with the Father, His mystical union with believers, the promise of the Comforter, and love the "new commandment." Yet Matthew, Mark, and Luke have the germs of them, and Paul further develops them (Matt. v. 44, xi. 27, xvi. 16, xviii. 20; Luke x. 22, xxiv. 49). Matt. xxvi. 11 verbally agrees with John xii. 8. Comp. 1 Cor. xiii., Col. i. 15, 16, 2 Cor. v. 17.

[On the passovers in John see JESUS CHRIST.] As John, though mainly treating of Jesus' ministry in Judea, yet has occasional notices of that in Galilee (John i. 43—ii. 13, after the temptation, recorded by the synoptists as following the baptism, i. 32; viz. the Galilean ministry before John's imprisonment, iii. 24, whereas they begin with it after John's imprisonment: Mark i. 14), so they, though mainly treating of the Galilean ministry, plainly hint at that in Judea also (Matt. iv. 25, xxiii. 37, xxvii. 57; Luke x. 38, xiii. 34; Mark iii. 7, 8). Thus John iv. 1-3 is the introduction to the Galilean ministry described by them. Chap. vii. 1, 9, intimates a transfer of Jesus' ministry to Galilee after the second last passover (vi. 4, 5). The feeding of the 5000 links him to Matt. xiv. 15. This passover He did not attend, but in the same year attended the feast of tabernacles, six months before His death (John vii. 2, 10). Chap. x. 22, 40, Jesus' retirement to beyond Jordan after His visit to Jerusalem at the feast of dedication, answers to Matt. xix. 1. The continuous Galilean ministry of two years and a third (excepting the Jerusalem short visit, John v.) was naturally first recorded as having most internal unity. John's later record dwells on the omitted parts; this accounts for the Gospel being fragmentary, but possessing spiritual unity. It is significant that in the Gospel setting forth the glory of the Son of God the Judean ministry is prominent, for there is the appointed "throne of the great King"; whereas in the Gospels setting forth the Son of man the scene is "Galilee of the Gentiles." In John as in the synoptists Jesus sets forth His Divine Messiahship not so much by assertions as by acts: v. 31, 32; Matt. vii. 28, 29; Luke iv. 18, 21; comp. John ix. 36, x. 24. His disciples' vacillation arose from the conflict between faith resulting from His miracles and disappointment at His not openly setting up His Messianic kingdom.

The sameness of John the Baptist's style and John's (i. 16, iii. 31-36) is just what was to be expected, the evangelist insensibly catching his former master's phraseology.

The synoptists having already recorded the parables which suited the earlier ages of the church, it remained for John to record the parabolic allegories: x. 1-6 (parable nowhere occurs in John, but parabolical), iii. 8, xv. 1, etc., iv. 35, 38; comp. Matt. ix. 38.

The language is pure Gr., the thought Hebraic, especially the mode of connecting sentences by conjunctions, and, but, then, etc. The periodic sentences of the logical Paul, and John's simplicity of style, clothing the profoundest thoughts, answer to their respective characters. His characteristic phrases are testimony or witness, glory, the truth, light, darkness, eternal life, abide, the world, sin, the true (i.e. genuine, "alethinos") God, the Word, the only begotten Son, love, to manifest, to be begotten or born of God, pass from death, the Paraclete or Comforter, flesh, spirit, above, beneath, the living water, the bread of life. Authorised Gospel terms were most needed in the matured age of the church when John wrote, and were adopted by John from Jesus Himself. Peculiar to John are "truly, verily" (Amen, Amen) beginning a sentence (others use it at the end of a sentence, Jesus alone at the beginning), i. 51; "little children" (xiii. 33), as in 1 John; "in the name" (v. 43), i.e. representing the person—"lay down life" (x. 11, 17).

John, Epistles of. FIRST EPISTLE. Genuineness. Polyep. John's disciple (ad Philipp. vii.), quotes iv. 3. Eusebius (H. E., iii. 39) says of Papias, John's hearer, "he used testimonies from the first epistle of John." Irenæus (Eus. H. E., v. 8) often quoted it; he quotes (Hæres. iii. 15, § 5, 8) from John by name ii. 18; and in iii. 16, § 7 he quotes iv. 1-3, v. 1, 2 John 7, 8. Clement Alex. (Strom. ii. 66, p. 664) refers to v. 16 as in John's larger epistle; comp. Strom. iii. 32, 42; iv. 102. Tertullian adv. Marcion, v. 16, refers to iv. 1; adv. Praxeas xv. to i. 1; also xviii. and contra Gnost. xii. Cyprian (Ep. xxviii. 24) quotes as John's ii. 3, 4; and, de Orat. Domini, v., quotes ii. 15-17; De opere et Eleemos. quotes i. 8; De bono Patientie quotes ii. 6. Muratori's Fragment on the Canon states "there are two (the Gospel and epistle) of John esteemed catholic," quoting i. 3. The Peshito Syriac has it. Origen (Eus. vi. 25) designates the first epistle genuine, and "probably second and third epistles, though all do not recognise the latter two"; he quotes i. 5 (tom. xii. vol. ii.). Dionysius of Alexandria, Origen's scholar, cites this epistle's words as the evangelist John's. Eusebius (H. E. iii. 24) says John's first epistle and Gospel are "acknowledged without question by those of the present day, as well as by the ancients." So Jerome (Catalog. Eccl. Script.). Marcion opposed it only because it was opposed to his heresies.

The Gospel and first epistle are alike in style, yet evidently not mere copies either of the other. The individual notices, it being a catholic epistle, are fewer than in Paul's epistles; but what there are accord with John's position. He implies his apostleship (ii. 7, 26), alludes to his Gospel (i. 1, comp. John i. 14, xx. 27), and the affectionate tie uniting him as an aged pastor to his spiritual "children" (ii. 18, 19). In iv. 1-3 he alludes to the false teachers as known to his readers; in v. 21 he warns them against the idols of the world around. Docetism existed in germ already, though the Docetæ byname appear first in the second century (Col. i. 15-18, 1 Tim. iii. 16, Heb. i. 1-3). Hence 1 John iv. 1-3 denounces as "not of God every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh" (comp. John ii. 22, 23). Presently the Spirit through John forewarns the church against the coming heresy.

Tonchom addressed. Augustine (Quæst. Evang. ii. 39) says it was addressed to the Parthians, i.e. the Christians beyond the Euphrates, outside the Roman empire, "the church at Babylon elected together with" (1 Pet. v. 13) the churches in the Ephesian region, whither Peter sent his epistles (1 Pet. i. 1: Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, Bithynia). As Peter addressed the Asiatic flock tendered first by Paul, then by John, so John, Peter's close companion, addresses the flock among whom Peter was when he wrote. Thus "the elect lady" (2 John 1) answers to "the church elected together."

Time and place. This epistle is subsequent to the Gospel, for it assumes the reader's acquaintance with the Gospel facts and Christ's speeches, and His aspect as the incarnate Word, God manifest in the flesh, set forth in John's Gospel. His fatherly tone addressing his "little children" implies it was written in old age, perhaps A.D. 90. The rise of anti-Christian teachers he marks as a sign of "the last time" (ii. 18), no other "age" or dispensation will be till Christ comes; for His coming the church is to be ever waiting; Heb. i. 2, "these last days." The region of Ephesus, where gnostic heresy sprang up, was probably the place, and the latter part of the apostolic age the time, of writing.

Contents. Fellowship with the Father and the Son is the subject and object (i. 3). Two divisions occur: (1) i. 5—ii. 23, God is light without darkness; consequently, to have fellowship with Him necessitates walking in the light. Confession and consequent forgiveness of sins, through Christ's propitiation for the world and advocacy for believers, are a necessary preliminary; a further step is positive keeping God's commandments, the sum of which is love as contrasted with hatred, the sum of disobedience. According to their several stages of spiritual growth, children, fathers, young men, as respectively forgiven, knowing the Father, and having overcome the wicked one, John exhorts them not to love the world, which is incompatible with the indwelling of the Father's love. This anointing love dwelling in us, and our continuing to abide in the Son and in the Father, is the antidote against the antichristian teachers in the world, who are of the world, not of the church, and therefore have gone out from it. (2) ii. 29—v. 5 handles the opening thesis: "He is righteous," therefore "every one that doeth righteousness is born of Him." Sonship involves present self purification, first because we desire now to be like Him, "even as He is pure," secondly because we hope hereafter to be perfectly like Him, our sonship now hidden shall be manifested, and we shall be made like Him when He shall be manifested (answering to Paul's Col. iii.), for our then "seeing Him as He is" involves transfiguration into His likeness (comp. 2 Cor. iii. 18, Phil. iii. 21). In contrast, the children of the devil hate; the children of God love. Love assures of acceptance with God for ourselves and our prayers, accompanied as they are with obedience to His commandment to "believe on Jesus Christ, and love one another"; the seal is "the Spirit given us" (1 John iii. 24). In contrast (as in the first division), denial of Christ and adherence to the world characterize the false spirits (iv. 1-6). The essential feature of sonship or birth of God is unslavish love to God, because God first loved us and gave His Son to die for us (iv. 18, 19), and consequent love to the brethren as being God's sons like ourselves, and so victory over the world through belief in Jesus as the Son of God (v. 4, 5). (3) v. 6-21. Finally, the truth on which our fellowship with God rests is, Christ came by water in His baptism, the blood of atonement, and the witnessing Spirit which is truth, which correspond to our baptism with water and the Spirit, and our receiving the atonement by His blood and the witness of His Spirit. In the opening he rested this truth on his apostolic witness of the eye, the ear, and the touch; so at the close on God's witness, which the believer accepts, and by rejecting which the unbeliever makes God a liar. He adds his reason for writing (v. 13), answering to i. 4 at the beginning, viz. that "believers may know they have (already) eternal life," the spring of "joy" (comp. John xx. 31), and so may have "confidence" in their prayers being answered (1 John v. 14, 15; comp. iii. 22 in the second part), e.g. their intercessions for a brother sinning, provided his sin be not unto death (v. 16). He sums up with stating our knowledge of Him that is true, through His gift, our being in Him by virtue of being in His Son Jesus Christ; being "born of God" we keep ourselves so that the wicked one toucheth us not, in contrast to the world lying in the wicked one; therefore still, "little children, keep yourselves from idols" literal and spiritual.

Style. Aphorism and repetition of his own phrases abound. The affectionate hortatory tone, and the Hebraistic form which delights in parallelism of clauses (as contrasted with Paul's logical Grecian style), and his own simplicity of spirit dwelling fondly on the one grand theme, produce this repetition of fundamental truths again and again, enlarged, applied, and condensed by turns. Contemplative rather than argumentative, he dwells on the inner rather than the outer Christian life. The thoughts do not move forward by progressive steps, as in Paul, but in circles round one central thought, viewed now under the positive now under the negative aspect. His Lord's contrasted phrases in the Gospel J. adopts in his epistles, "flesh," "spirit," "light," "darkness," "life," "death," "abide in Him"; "fellowship with the Father and Son, and with one another" is a phrase not in the Gospel, but in Acts and Paul's epistles. It marks enjoyment experimentally of Christian verities as living realities, not abstract dogmas. Burning zeal, all absorbing love, appear in John combined with contemplative repose. Simple, without profound, his writing is unrhctorical and undialectic, gentle, comforting loving, the reflex of Jesus his Lord whose beloved disciple he was. Ewald speaks of its "unruffled heavenly repose . . . the tone not so much of a father talking with beloved children as of a glorified saint from a higher world."

Place in building up the church. Peter founded, Paul propagated, John completed it. The O. T. puts prominent the fear of God; John, the last N. T. writer, the love of God. Yet as O. T. also sets forth love, so John as a Boanerges also sets forth the terror of the Lord against unbelievers. Three leading developments of Christian doctrine are: the Pauline, the Jacobean (between which the Petrine is the intermediate link), and the Johannian. James, whose moulding was in Judaism, presents as a rule of life the law, under the gospel, established in its spirit, the letter only being superseded. John had not, like the apostle of the Gentiles, been brought to faith and peace through conflict, but through a quiet development from the personal view of Christ, and from communion with Him. So in John everything turns on the contrast: life in fellowship with Christ, death in separation from Him; life, light, truth, opposed to death, darkness, lie. James and Peter represent the gradual transition from spiritualized Judaism to independent Christianity; Paul, independent Christianity contrasted with Judaism. John by the contemplative element reconciles the two, and forms the closing point in the training of the apostolic church (Neander). SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES. Authenticity. The similar tone, style, and sentiments prove both to be by the same writer. Irenæus (adv. Har. i. 16, § 3) quotes 2 John 10, 11, and 7 in iii. 16, § 8, as John's writing. Clement Alex. (Strom. ii. 66), A.D. 192, speaks of John's larger epistle, and in Adumbr. p. 1011, "John's second epistle to the Parthians (so it ought to be read for parthenous; see Augustine quoted, JOHN'S FIRST EPISTLE) is the simplest; it was to a Babylonian, the elect lady." Dionysius of Alexandria (Euseb. H. E., vii. 25) says "John never names himself in his epistles, not even in the second and third, though short, but calls himself the presbyter (elder)": 2 John 1, 3 John 1, so 1 Pet. v. 1. Alexander of Alex. cites 2 John 10, 11 as John's (Socrates H. E. i. 6). Cyprian, in referring to the council of Carthage (De Hæc. Bapt.), appeals to 2 John 10, "John the apostle in his epistle said, If any come to you," as recognised by the N. African church. The Peshito old Syriac version wants these two epistles. Eusebius reckons them among the controverted (antilegomena) scriptures [see CANON OF SCRIPTURE], as distinguished from those universally acknowledged (homologoumena); his own opinion was that they were genuine (Demonstr. Evang. iii. 5). Origen (Euseb. H. E., vi. 25) implies that most, though not all, recognised their genuineness. Jerome (de Vir. Illustr. ix.) mentions them as John's, whose sepulchre was shown at Ephesus in his day. The antilegomena were generally recognised after the council of Nice, A.D. 325. So Cyril of Jerusalem, A.D. 349; Gregory Naz., A.D. 389; and the councils of Hippo (A.D. 393) and Carthage (A.D. 397). So the oldest extant MSS. Eight of the 13 verses in 2 John are in 1 John. A forger would never term John "the elder." Their brevity and the private nature of their contents caused the two epistles to be less read in church assemblies, and less quoted; hence their non-universal recognition at first. Their private nature confirms their genuineness, for there seems no purpose in their forgery. The style and colouring accord with those of 1 John.

Persons addressed. 3 John is directed to GAIUS [see] or CAIUS, probably of Corinth, a "host of the church." See Rom. xvi. 23, 1 Cor. i. 14. Mill believes Gaius, bishop of Pergamos (Apost. Const. vii. 40), a convert of John, and a man of wealth (ver. 4, 5), is meant.

2 John is addressed to the elect lady, and closes with "the children of thy elect sister greet thee." Now 1 Pet. i. 1, 2, addresses the elect in Asia, and closes (ver. 13) "the Church at Babylon, *elect*d together with you, salute thee." "Lady" (kuria) in Gr. is the root of church (kuriakē, belonging to the Lord). So John writes to the elect church in Babylon where his old associate Peter ministered, as Peter thence had sent salutations of the elect church in the then Parthian (see Clement Alex. quoted above) Babylon to her elect sister in Asia where John presided (Bp. Wordsworth).

Duty and place. Eusebius (H. E. iii. 25) relates that John, after Domitian's death, returned from Patmos to Ephesus, and went on missionary tours into the heathen regions around, and visited the churches, ordaining bishops and clergy (comp. 2 John 12, 3 John 9, 10, 14). On one tour he rebuked Diotrephes. If this be so, both epistles were written after Revelation, in his old age, which harmonizes with their tone, and in the Ephesian region.

John the Baptist. Son of Zacharias (of the course of Abijah, 1 Chron. xxiv. 10) and Elisabeth (of the daughters of Aaron), who both "walked in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless." Elisabeth was related to the Virgin Mary; but Scripture does not state the exact relationship; the Gr. in Luke i. 36 (sungenees), which our Bible renders "cousin," means any "relation" or "kinswoman," whether by marriage or birth. It is noteworthy that Jesus, of the Melchizedek order of priesthood, was related to but not descended from the Aaronic priests. Zacharias was old, and Elisabeth barren, when, as he was burning incense at the golden altar, Gabriel announced the answer to his prayers (not directly for a son, but, as Israel's representative, for Messiah the Hope of Israel) in the coming birth of a son, the appointed forerunner of Messiah; John (Jehovah's gift) was to be his name, because his supernatural birth was a pledge of the Lord's grace, long looked for, now visiting again His people to their joy (Luke i.). John was to be "great in the sight of the Lord" (contrast Baruch, Jer. xlv. 5). He should be in himself a pattern of that self-denial which accords best with his subject of preaching, legal repentance, "drinking no strong drink, but filled with the Holy Ghost" (see the same contrast, Eph. v. 18, the minister's enthusiasm ought to be not from artificial stimulant but from the Spirit's unction) from the mother's womb," a Nazarite (Num. vi. 1-21). Like the great prophet-reformer (comp. 1 Kings xviii. 36, 37) Elijah in "spirit and power" of preaching, though not in miracles (John x. 41), he should turn the degenerate "children to the Lord and to" their righteous "fathers, and the heart of the fathers to the children," their past mutual alienation being due to the children's apostasy; fulfilling Mal. iv. 4-6; bringing "Moses' law" to their remembrance, "lest Jehovah at His coming should smite the earth with a curse." Thus John should "make ready a people for the Lord." Zacharias for unbelief in withholding credit without a sign was punished with dumbness as the sign till the event came to pass. In the hill country, whither Elisabeth had retired, her cousin Mary saluted her, and the babe leaped in Elisabeth's womb. His birth was six months before our Lord's. At his circumcision on the eighth day Zacharias gave him name John; and his returning faith was rewarded with returning speech, of which his first use was to pour forth a thanksgiving hymn, in which he makes it his son's chief honour that he should be "prophet of the Highest, going before the Lord's face to prepare His ways" as His harbinger. John had the special honour of being the subject of prophecy ages before, and of being associated in close juxtaposition with Messiah Himself. John "waxed strong in spirit and was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel" (Luke i. 80). Meanwhile God's interposition in the wonders of his birth caused "all the people to be in expectation, musing in their hearts whether he were the Christ" (iii. 15). The thinly peopled region adjoining the hill country of Judæa was his haunt; there communion alone with God prepared him for his work. At 30, when "the word of God came to" him (iii. 2), he went forth, his very appearance a sign of the unworldliness and legal repentance which he preached; his raiment a camel's hair garment secured with leathern girdle (2 Kings i. 8) as Elijah's; his food that supplied by the desert, locusts (Lev. xi. 22) and wild honey (Ps. lxxxi. 16). All classes, Pharisees, Sadducees, the people, publicans, and soldiers, flocked to him from every quarter, Jerusalem, Judæa, and the region round Jordan (Matt. iii. 5, Luke iii.). The leading sects he denounced as a "generation of vipers" (comp. Gen. iii. 15, the serpent's "seed"), warning them that descent from Abraham would not avail without doing Abraham's works (comp. John viii. 39), and telling all practically and discriminatingly that the repentance needed required a renunciation of their several besetting sins; and that whereas, on their confession, he baptized with water [see BAPTISM], the Mightier One would come baptizing with the Holy Ghost and fire (Matt. iii. 11, 12). When the ecclesiastical authorities sent priests and Levites from Jerusalem to ask, Who art thou? John replied, "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord" (John i. 19-23). The natural wilderness symbolised the moral (Isa. xxxii. 15), wherein was no highway for the Lord and for righteousness. The hills of pride and the valleys of degradation must be brought to the one holy level before the Lord (Isa. xl.). John was the forerunner of the reigning Messiah (Matt. iii. 2, Mal. iii. 1), but through the nation's rejection of Him that reign was deferred (comp. Num. xiv. 34 with Matt. xxiii. 37-39).

John baptized JESUS [see, also BAPTISM] and though knowing Him before as a man and his kinsman, yet then first knew His Divine Messiahship by the Spirit's visible descent (John i. 30-34). John thenceforth witnessed to Jesus, desiring to "decrease that He might increase." By his testimony at Bethany (so oldest MSS. for Bethabara) beyond Jordan, "Behold the Lamb of God," he led two of his disciples to Him, Andrew and John the apostle and evangelist (i. 35, etc., iii. 23-36, iv. 1, 2; Acts xix. 3). Yet John never formally joined Jesus; for he was one of the greatest among the O. T. prophets, but not strictly in the N. T. kingdom, the least in which, as to spiritual privileges, was greater than he (Luke vii. 28). His standing was the last of O. T. prophets, preparatory to the gospel. He taught fasting and prayers, rather in the spirit and therefore with the forms of, the old dispensation which the new would supersede, its new spirit creating its appropriate new forms (v. 33-38, xi. 1).

HEROD ANTIPAS [see] beheaded him in the fortress Macharus E. of the Dead Sea, to gratify Herodias' spite for John's faithfulness in denouncing her adultery, and in slavish adherence to his reckless oath to give Herodias' daughter Salome, for dancing on his birthday, whatever she might ask. From the prison John had sent two (Sin. and Vat. MSS. read Matt. xi. 2 "by," dia, for duo, two) disciples to Jesus [see] to elicit from Himself a jest of His Messiahship, for their confirmation in the faith. Jesus at once confirmed them and comforted John himself (who probably had expected to see Jesus more openly vindicating righteousness, as foretold Mal. iii. 2-5, iv. 1-3), by an appeal to His miracles and preaching, the very credentials promised in Isa. xxxv. 5, lxi. 1. Jesus at the same time attested John's unshaken firmness, appealing to His hearers' own knowledge of him (Matt. xi.). No need shaken by the wind, no courtier in soft raiment, was John. But whether it was the ascetical forerunner, or the social Lord Himself, that preached, that generation was dissatisfied, with John because he was too self denying, with Jesus because He would not commend their self righteous fastings: "we have piped unto you (unto John) and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you (unto Jesus) and ye have not lamented." Of John as of Jesus they said, he hath a devil. John fell just before the third passover of Christ's ministry; his disciples buried him. Self denial, humility, where-with he disclaimed Messiahship and said he was not worthy to unloose His shoes' latchet, zeal for the Lord's honour, and holy faithfulness at all costs, were his prominent graces. [On the "Elias who shall yet come," see ELIJAH, end.] John's ministry extended at its close into Persea at the S.E. end of the lake of Galilee. When the herald was silenced the Master took up the message (Mark i. 14) in the same quarter. John's labours there so impressed Herod that "he feared and observed him, and when he heard him did many things, and heard him gladly"; but would not do the one thing needed, give up his adulterous paramour, his brother Philip's wife. Elijah was translated in a chariot of fire; but John died a felon's death, for the forerunner was to be as his Lord. The worthless Ahab reappears in Herod with similar germs of good struggling with evil. Herodias answers to the cruel Jezebel. As Ahab in spite of himself respected Elijah, so Herod John; but in both cases the bad woman counteracted the good. John in prison fell into the same dejection concerning the failure of the Messianic kingdom, because it did not come in outward manifestation, as Elijah under the juniper. In both cases God came in the still small voice, not the earthquake and fire (Matt. xii. 15-21).

Joiada. Neh. xii. 28; xii. 11, 22. Highpriest after his father Eliashib. His son married the Heronite Sanballat's daughter.

Joiakim. Neh. xii. 10. Contracted from "Jehoiakim."

Joiarib. 1. Ezra viii. 16. 2. Neh. xi. 10; xii. 6, 19. 3. Neh. xi. 5.

Jokdeam. A city of Judah in the mountains (Josh. xv. 56), S. of Hebron.

Jokim. 1 Chron. iv. 22. A Hebrew legend made J. Elimelech, Naomi's husband (Jerome, Quæst. Heb. in Paralipomena).

Jokmeam. A city of Ephraim, attached to the Kohathite Levites (1 Chron. vi. 68); in the Jordan valley, the extreme E. of Ephraim. Named Kibzaim in Josh. xxi. 22.

Jokneam. A city of Zebulun, allotted to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 34, xix. 11). 1 Kings iv. 12, read Jokneam. Its Canaanite king (J. of Carmel) Joshua slew (xii. 22). Now Tel Kaimon, an eminence below eastern Carmel, with the river Kishon at its foot a mile off.

Jokshan. Son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2, 3; 1 Chron. i. 32); father of Sheba and DEDAN [see]. J. is identified by some with the Cassanite on the Red Sea (Ptol. vi. 7, § 6).

Joktan. Son of Eber (Gen. x. 25, 30; 1 Chron. i. 19). Head of the Joktanite Arabs. His settlements were in S. Arabia, "from Mesha unto Sephar a mount of the East" (Zufari, a seaport E. of Yemen; an emporium of trade with Africa and India). The Arab Kahtan whose sons peopled Yemen or Arabia Felix. Cushites from Ham (Gen. x. 7) and Ludites from Shem (ver. 22) were already there, and intermingled with them. The seafaring element was derived from the Cushites, the Shemites not being seafaring; also the Cyclopean masonry and the rock cut Himeritic inscriptions indicate the presence of Cushites. Arab tradition makes J. or Kahtan progenitor of the purest tribes of central and southern Arabia. The Scripture list of his descendants confirms this; almost all the names are certainly connected with this locality: "Almodad (El-Mudad), Sholeph (Sulaf or Silfan), Hazarmaveth" (Hadrarnaut), etc.

Joktheel=subdued by God. 1. A city in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 38), called so probably from the triumph there of God's people over the idolatrous Canaanites (Jud. i. 9, 18); now the ruin Keitulanah. 2. The name given to Selah or Petra (the rock), Edom's capital, by Amaziah king of Judah. Its capture brought Edom again under Judah for 80 years (2 Kings xiv. 7, where "unto this day" limits the date of 2 Kings to not beyond 80 years after Amaziah, xvi. 6; 2 Chron. xxviii. 17). Having beaten Edom in "the Valley of Salt," S. of the Dead Sea, he threw 10,000 captives from the cliff (xxv. 11-13).

Jona. Father of Simon Peter (John i. 42). Heb. Johanan.

Jonadab. 1. Shimeah's son, David's nephew; "very subtil," worming out the secrets of the heir apparent, Amnon his cousin, to gain favour. Pretending "friendship," he insinuated that a "king's son" ought to gratify his passions without scruple, and not make himself lean by restraining them; and gave the bellicose advice whereby that wicked prince incestuously forced his half sister Tamar. Then, when Absalom had in revenge killed Amnon, and the king was heartbroken at the exaggerated story that all the king's sons were slain, J. practised the same sycophancy to David; not a word does he breathe of his own abominable share in the matter; no sorrow has he for Amnon whose professed "friend" he was, but whose ruin he hurried; "by the appointment of Absalom this hath been determined from the day that he forced his sister Tamar"; "Amnon only is dead, Amnon only is dead"; "let not my lord the king take the thing to his heart" (2 Sam. xiii.). Evil communication is fatal; the friendship of the wicked is hollow for it is based on selfishness (Ps. xii. 2, cxli. 4, 5), and when regard for self comes in collision with regard for a friend, the latter will be set aside for the former; see 1 Kings xiii. 30, 32. 2. [See JEHONADAB.]

Jonah=dove (Gen. viii. 8, 9, seeking rest in vain, fleeing from Noah and the ark; so J.). Parentage, date. Son of Amittai of Gath Hepher in Zebulun (2 Kings xiv. 25-27, comp. xiii. 4-7). Jeroboam II. "restored the coast from the entering of HAMATH [see] unto the sea of the plain, according to the word of the Lord God of Israel which He spake by the hand of His servant J." etc. "For the Lord saw the affliction of Israel, that it was very bitter; for there was not any shut up, nor any left, nor any (i.e., none married or single, else confined or at large, as a) helper for Israel." Israel was at its lowest extremity, i.e. early in Joash's reign, when Jehovah (probably by J.) promised deliverance from Syria, which was actually given first under Joash, in answer to JEHONAHZ' [see] prayer, then completely under Jeroboam II. Thus J. was among the earliest of the prophets who wrote, and close upon Elisha who died in Joash's reign, having just before death foretold Syria's defeat thrice (2 Kings xiii. 14-21). Hosea and Amos prophesied in the latter part of the 41 years' reign of Jeroboam II. The events recorded in the book of J. were probably late in his life. The book begins with "And," implying that it continues his prophetic work begun before; it was written probably about Hosea's and Amos' time.

Hosea (vi. 2) saw the prophetic meaning of J.'s entombment: "after two days will He revive us, in the third day He will raise us up"; primarily Israel, in a short period (Luke xiii. 32, 33) to be revived from its national deadness, antitypically Messiah, raised on the third day (John ii. 19, 1 Cor. xv. 4); as Israel's political resurrection typifies the general resurrection, of which Christ's resurrection is the firstfruits (Isa. xvi. 19, Ezek. xxxvii. 1-14, 1 Cor. xv. 22, 23, Dan. xii. 2). The mention of Nineveh's being "an exceeding great city" implies it was written before the Assyrian invasions had made them know too well its greatness.

Personal reality. The heathen fable of Heracles springing into a sea monster's jaws and being three days in its belly, when saving Hesione (Diodor. Sic. iv. 42), is rather a corruption of the story of J. than vice versa, if there be any connection. Jerome says, near Joppa lay rocks represented as those to which Andromeda was bound when exposed to the sea monster. The Phœnicians probably carried the story of J. to ANCIENT GEM, SHOWING THE STORY OF JONAH.

Greece. Our Lord's testimony proves the personal existence, miraculous fate, and prophetic office of J. "The sign of the prophet J., for as J. was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights (both cases count the day from, and that to, which the reckoning is) in the heart of the earth" (Matt. xii. 39-41). J.'s being in the fish's belly Christ makes a "sign," i.e. a real miracle typifying the like event in His own history, and assumes the prophet's execution of his commission to Nineveh; "the men of Nineveh repented at the preaching of J., and behold a greater than J. is here." The miracle is justified by the crisis then in the development of the kingdom of God, when Israel by impotence was about to fall before Assyria, and God's principle of righteous government needed to be exhibited in sparing Nineveh through the preaching of J., started himself after living entombment. The great Antitype too needed such a vivid type.

Canoncity, design. It seemed strange to Kimchi that this book is in the canon, as its only prophecy concerns Nineveh, a heathen city, and does not mention Israel, of whom all the other prophets prophesy. The strangeness is an argument for the inspiration of the sacred canon; but the solution is, Israel is tacitly reprov'd. A heathen city repents at a strange prophet's first preaching, whereas Israel, God's elect, repented not, though admonished by their own prophets at all seasons. An anticipatory dawn of the "light to lighten the Gentiles," J. was a parable in himself: a prophet of God, yet a runaway from God; drowned, yet alive; a preacher of repentance, yet one that repines at repentance resulting from his preaching. God's pity and patience form a wonderful contrast to man's self will and hard hearted pettiness. His name, meaning "dove," symbolises mourning love, his feeling toward his people, either given prophetically or assumed by him as a watchword of his feeling. His truthfulness (son of Amittai, i.e. truth) appears in his so faithfully recording his own perversity and punishment. His patriotic zeal against his people's adversaries, like that of James and John, was in a wrong spirit (Luke ix. 51-56). He felt repugnance to deliver the Lord's warning to Nineveh ("cry against it," Jonah i. 2), whose destruction he desired, not their repentance. J. was sent when he had been long a prophet, and had been privileged to announce from God the restoration of Israel's coasts. God's goodness had not led them to repent (2 Kings xiii. 6, xiv. 24). Amos (v. 27) had foretold that Israel for apostasy should be carried "captive beyond Damascus," i.e. beyond that enemy from which Jeroboam II. had just delivered them, according to the prophecy of J., and that they should be "afflicted from the entering in of Hamath unto the river of the wilderness" (the southern bound of Moab, then forming Israel's boundary), i.e. the very bounds restored by Jeroboam II., for "the river of the arabah" or "wilderness" flowed into the S. end of "the sea of the plain" or Dead Sea (2 Kings xiv. 25, Amos vi. 14). Hosea too (ix. 3) had foretold their eating unclean things in Assyria. Instinctively J. shrank from delivering a message which might eventuate in Nineveh being spared, the city by which Israel was to suffer. Pul or Ivalush III. (Babylonian, Herodotus) was then king (see ASSYRIA), and by Pul the first weakening of Israel afterward took place. "J. sought the honour of the son (Israel), and sought not the honour of the Father" (God) (Kimchi, from rabbinical tradition). J. is the only case of a prophet hiding his prophetic message; the reluctance at first was common to many of them (Isa. vi. 5, Jer. i. 6, 17, Exod. iv. 10). His desire was that Nineveh's sudden overthrow, like Sodom's, might produce the effect which his words failed to produce, to rouse Israel from impotence.

History. J. embarked at Joppa for the far off Tartessus of Spain or Tarshish in Cilicia; comp. as to the folly of the attempt Ps. cxxxix. 7-10, Gen. iii. 8-10, Jer. xxiii. 24. However, "from the presence of the Lord" (Jonah i. 3) means not from His universal presence, which J. ought to have known is impossible, but from ministering in His immediate presence in the Holy Land. The storm, the strange sleep (of self hardening, weariness, and God forgetfulness; contrast Mark iv. 37-39, spiritually Eph. v. 14), the lot casting, and detection of J. and casting into and consequent calming of the sea, followed.

Typical significance. J. reflected Israel's backsliding and consequent punishment; type of Messiah who bears our imputed guilt and its punishment; comp. Ps. xlii. 7, lxix. 1, 2; John xi. 50. God spares the prayerful penitent: (1) the heathen sailors, (2) J., (3) Nineveh. He sank to the "bottom" of the sea first, and felt "the seaweed wrapped about his head" (Jonah ii. 5, 6), then the God-prepared great fish (the dog fish, Boelart; in any view a miracle is needed, the rest is conjecture). The prophet's experiences adapted him, by sympathy, for fulfilling his office to his hearers. God's infinite resources in mercy, as well as judgment, appear in J.'s devourer becoming his preserver. J. was a type to Nineveh and Israel of death following sin, and of resurrection on repentance; pre-eminently of Christ's death for sin and resurrection by the Spirit of God (Matt. xii. 40). J. in his thanksgiving notices that his chief punishment consisted in the very thing which his flight had aimed at, being "cast out of God's sight" (Jonah i. 3, ii. 4, 8; Jer. ii. 13, xvii. 13). Hezekiah's hymn is based on it (Isa. xxxviii. 17, Jonah ii. 6).

Jehovah's next message (more definite and awful than the former) was faithfully delivered by J.: "yet 40 days and Nineveh shall be destroyed." J., himself a living exemplification of judgment and mercy, was "a sign (an embodied significant lesson) unto the Ninevites" (Luke xi. 30). Guilty J., saved from his living tomb, gave a ray of hope to guilty Nineveh. To the Pharisees who, not satisfied with His many signs, still demanded "a sign (Messiah coming gloriously) from heaven," Christ gave a sign "out of the belly of hell" (Jonah ii. 2), i.e. the unseen region beneath. Christ's death, entombment three days without corruption, and resurrection, is the grand proof of His Messiahship, and of His power and will to save just as J.'s message derived its weight with the Ninevites from his past entombment and restoration. Forty is the number indicative of judgment for sin, as Israel's 40 years in the wilderness. God granted to Nineveh, however, a double mercy: (1) that the people repented immediately after threatening, (2) that pardon immediately followed repentance. Their deep reverence for their gods (as appears from their inscriptions), as well as J.'s deliverance (which was known to them, Luke xi. 30), and probably his previous prophecy which had been fulfilled, of Israel's deliverance under Jeroboam II. from Syria with which Nineveh had been long warring, all made them ready to heed his message. By general acclamation they proclaimed a fast, which the king confirmed, enjoining all to "cry mightily unto God, turning from every evil way" in hope that "God would turn from His fierce anger." "So God repented of the evil He had said He would do, and did it not."

J.'s anger and its correction. J. was "exceedingly displeased" (Jonah iv.). Not merely at his word not coming to pass; for it would have been inhuman if J. had preferred the destruction of 600,000 rather than his prophecy should be set aside through God's mercy triumphing over judgment; God would then have severely chastised, not merely expostulated gently with him. Moreover J. in apologising for his vexation does not mention, as its cause, the failure of his prediction, but solely God's slowness to anger. The end of his commission had not failed, viz. leading Nineveh to repentance. If Nineveh had been the prominent object with him he would have rejoiced at the result. But J. regarded Nineveh's destruction by God's judgment as likely to startle Israel out of its apostate security, heightened by its prosperity under Jeroboam II. Moreover Nineveh was the foretold (Hos. ix. 3, xi. 5, 11; Amos v. 27) executioner of God's coming judgment on Israel. Nineveh's destruction, in J.'s view, meant Israel's safety. But God's plan was by heathen Nineveh's example to teach the covenant people Israel how inexcusable is their impenitence; Israel must, if she continue impenitent, go down, and heathen Assyria rise over her. Hope to the penitent however sunken, condemnation to the impenitent however elevated in privileges, are the lessons our Lord draws from Nineveh (Matt. xii. 41).

J. still stayed near the city, possibly expecting some judgment still to fall. To teach him what he knew not, the largeness of God's mercy and its reasonableness, God made a "gourd" [see] (used on trellises in the East shading arbours) to grow over the booth which J. raised. "Grief," not selfish anger, was J.'s feeling (Jonah iv. 6). Some little external comfort will turn away a simple minded man from his grief, so J. was "exceeding glad." A small worm at the root was enough to destroy the large gourd, so with our greatest earthly joys (Ps. xxx. 7). J. was "grieved even unto death" (Heb.); contrast the Antitype (Matt. xxvi. 38). J. was making himself rather like Cain (comp. iv. 9 with Gen. iv. 6, Jas. i. 20). J.'s grief was owing to his own inherent sin, Christ's owing to our imputed sin. Still J.'s sorrow even to death was that of one desiring his country's repentance and salvation, and bitterly disappointed as if there was no hope: like Elijah (1 Kings xix. 4). God's pathetic and condescendingly touching appeal winds up the book; God's tender accents are the last that reach the ear, the abruptness of the close making them the more impressive: "thou hast had pity on the gourd for the which thou hast not laboured, neither madest it grow; which came up in a night and perished in a night; and should not I spare Nineveh, that great city, wherein are more than six score thousand persons (120,000 children under four, Deut. i. 39) that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand (giving a total, if the children be a fifth, of 600,000 population), and also much cattle?" God saw the root of faith in J., therefore corrected his perverse self will by an appropriate discipline. J.'s figurative gourd, Israel's preservation through Nineveh's destruction, though not selfish, was self willed. It sought a good aim, reckless of the death of 600,000 men, and without making God's will the foremost consideration.

The book is narrative throughout, except the thanksgiving hymn (chap. ii.). Some Aramaean expressions naturally occur in the language of one who lived in Zebulun bordering towards Syria, and who had communications with Assyria. The purity of the language implies the antiquity of the book. None but J. could have written or dictated details so peculiar, known only to himself. The so called "tomb of J.,"

TOMB OF JONAH NEAR MOSUL.

Nebbi Yunus (prophet J.), took its name probably from its being the site of a Christian church named after him. Jerome preserves the older tradition of the tomb being in his native village of Gath Hepher.

Jonan. Johanan, in Christ's genealogy (Luke iii. 30); comp. the similar names, as often occurs in a family, ver. 26, 27.

Jonath Eilem Rechokim, upon.

Title of Ps. lvi. Hengstenberg transl. "Concerning the dumb dove among strangers." The "dove" represents defenceless innocence. Instead of impatient self justification David in meek silence committed his cause to God (Ps. xxxviii. 13; comp. as to his being like a "dove" far from home iv. 6, 7). He was sojourning among the "far off" Philistine "strangers," to whose king Achish at Gath he fled from Saul (1 Sam. xxi. 13, 14). David's being "sore afraid" because of the Philistine question, "is not this David the king of the land? Did they not sing . . . David hath slain his ten thousands?" answers to Ps. lvi. 3. Saul's "wresting his words" into treason is alluded to, ver. 5; his vain attempt by iniquitous persecution to escape his foretold doom, ver. 7. Meek, dumb trust, and prayer to God, were David's resource. In Ps. xxiv. David gives thanks for the deliverance here prayed for.

Jonathan = Jehovah's gift. 1. Son of GERSHON [see]. Sprung from Moses (changed to "Manasseh" in the keri or marg. Heb.): Jud. xviii. 30. It marks how prone to idolatry were the Israelites, that the priest to Micah's images and afterwards to the Danites was a Levite, whose special duty it was to maintain pure Jehovah's worship, and he a descendant of Moses himself! Idolatry begins with the people, it being natural to our sensuous cravings; then it seeks the sanction of the church. Micah began with robbery of his own mother; her curses extorted restitution; she as a meritorious act consecrated the money for a graven image (pesel) and the "molten pedestal" (massechah) on which it stood like Aaron's calf (Exod. xxxii. 4), to be a representation of Jehovah; it was the forerunner of Jeroboam's CALVES long after and IDOL [see both]. Micah had a domestic sanctuary in which he consecrated his son as priest: here the image was set. The ephod was an imitation of the high priest's shoulder dress. The teraphim or household gods were also worshipped as givers of prosperity and as oracles. The time was very shortly after Joshua's death, an age when there was no king, and the law and the judges were not as yet well established (Jud. xvii. 1-6). Micah afterwards found a Levite for the service, who had sojourned in Bethlehem Judah and left it to seek maintenance where he could, in mount Ephraim. It was J. With the self deceiving folly of idolaters Micah then said, "now I know that Jehovah will do me good seeing I have a Levite to my priest," as if a Levite's presence could bless where both priest and patron were apostates from the God of all blessing.

Five Danite spies, on their way to search for a settlement in the far N. for their tribe, recognised J. At their request he consulted God for them, and promised them success. Six hundred Danites of Zorah and Eshtaol, led by the spies' report, marched to DAN [see] or Laish. On their way the five carried off the graven image, ephod, teraphim, and molten (cast) pedestal (Keil). J. at their invitation was "glad" to accompany them; ambition readily prompted the desire to be priest to a tribe and clan rather than to one individual. Micah with self convicting folly expostulated in vain, "ye have taken away my gods which I made (!) and the priest, . . . and what have I more?" His loss was his gain, and their gain a fatal loss, if only he and they knew it. The priesthood remained hereditary in the family of J. "until the captivity of the ark" (the taking of the ark by the Philistines), and Micah's images of his own making remained set up "all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh." Their idolatry was in the land of spiritual light and privileges (Luke xii. 47, 48).

2. Saul's eldest son. About 30 when first introduced, commanding a thousand at Gibeath (1 Sam. xiii. 2; comp. 2 Sam. ii. 8, 10, which shows that Ishbosheth his younger brother was 40 at Saul's death). Meribbaal, or Mephibosheth, was born to him five years before his death (iv. 4; 1 Chron. viii. 34). Famed for swiftness and strength as a warrior (2 Sam. i. 23); and especially for skill with the bow (ver. 22, 1 Chron. xii. 2). His "how turned not back," his invariable accompaniment (1 Sam. xvii. 4, xx. 35). Dutifully devoted to his father, whose constant companion he was (1 Sam. xx. 2, 25), yet true to his bosom friend David, whose modesty, youthful beauty, and heroic bravery won his whole heart at their first meeting after Goliath's fall, against whom nevertheless Saul cherished such deadly spite. He knew David's loyalty amidst all his father's suspicions. Knowing also God's revealed will to exalt David to Saul's forfeited throne, J. bowed to it with pious submission. Instead of jealousy, unselfish love made him rejoice in his friend's prospective exaltation at his own cost, and only covet to be next in rank to David: as he said when he went to David "and strengthened his hand in God," his last interview with him in the wood of Zoph (1 Sam. xxiii. 16, 17). Loving David "as his own soul" (xx. 17, 42), he withstood his father's reproaches and attempts to alienate his affections by representing "as long as the son of Jesse liveth . . . thou shalt not be established, nor thy kingdom." He privately intimated to David his father's resolve to kill him (xix. 2); but at the intercession of J. (ver. 4-6) Saul for the present gave up his design, saying "as the Lord liveth, he shall not be slain." Soon he renewed his attempt, and David fled to Naioth. J. then covenanted with David that he should show kindness to him and his house for ever, when David's kingdom would be established (xx.), a promise faithfully fulfilled by David to Mephibosheth. In vain he remonstrated with Saul in David's behalf; his father actually hurled a javelin at himself. J. then only "rose from (his place beside his father at) table in fierce anger (the only time of his losing self command toward his father) and did eat no meat," etc. Yet he clung to his father through life, and "in death they were not divided" (2 Sam. i. 23). The second last parting scene was especially touching; David and J. "kissed one another and wept with one another until David exceeded" (1 Sam. xx. 41).

J. by smiting the Philistine garrison (1 Sam. xiii. 2, 3; or else an officer, Netzib, as Wm. Tell rose against Gesler) at Geba gave the signal for a general revolt of Israel against its oppressors [see GIBEATH]. The Philistines poured in marauding parties, and Israel's cause seemed more hopeless than ever (1 Sam. xiii.). Saul and Joab had but 600 men in Gibeah, who were without sword and spear (the Philistines having taken away all their smiths); many Israelites had fled beyond Jordan. As J. had provoked this aggravation of Philistine tyranny in concert with Saul, so J. determined alone to deliver Israel (xiv.). His armour-bearer agreed with all his heart to join in the hazardous enterprise; J.'s strong faith in God inspired his companion in arms with the same chivalrous devotion; "there is no restraint to the Lord, to save by many or few." Having fixed on an omen from God of success, they received it in the scolding invitation of the Philistine guards on the other side of the steep Michmash dells, the key to command the E. in ascending from the Philistine plain: "come up to us and we will show you a thing" (comp. 2 Sam. v. 6). J. and his armourbearer smote 20 in rapid succession. A panic ensued, the Philistines thought themselves outnumbered, and an earthquake completed the confusion; and the Israelites, with the Philistines in the camp and those hidden heretofore in mount Ephraim and now emerging, joined in the pursuit as far W. as Ajalon. Saul, by his rash curse on any who should eat that day till the foe should be overthrown, retarded his own aim through weakening his people, involved them in violating the law by flying ravenously on the spoil at evening and eating flesh with the blood, and bound himself to put to death for tasting honey, and so receiving refreshment, his own beloved son, from which he was rescued only by the people's interposition.

"J.'s soul was knit with David's," so that the latter testifies, "thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women"; like a Homeric hero, he gave his friend all his own arms, stripping himself (comp. the Antitype, Phil. ii. 7, 8): 1 Sam. xviii. 1-4, 2 Sam. i. 26. J. holds the chief place in DAVID'S [see] touching elegy, "the bow song" (the song on J. famed for the bow) on his death with Saul and his two brothers in the battle of Gilboa (1 Sam. xxxi.). His corpse with the others was fastened to the wall of Bethshan; whence the men of Jabesh Gilead rescued it. Finally it was removed to Zelah in Benjamin (2 Sam. xxi. 12-14).

J.'s pious and filial self devotion appears in his readiness (like Isaac) to die at his father's command because of the rash adoration of the latter; type of the Son of God, volunteering to die for us because Adam by eating the forbidden fruit had his "eyes opened" (Gen. iii.; 1 Sam. xiv. 27, 43); again in his continuing to the last faithful to Saul, though his father had attempted his life, and though he knew that his father's kingdom was doomed to fall and David to succeed.

3. David's nephew, son of Shimeah, Jonadab's brother. At once "a wise man and learned scribe and counsellor" (for the Heb. dod, "uncle," means a relative and so "nephew": 1 Chron. xxvii. 32, 2 Sam. xxi. 21, 1 Chron. xx. 7), and a brave warrior who like David slew a giant Philistine, of Gath, remarkable for six toes and six fingers. 4. The highpriest Abiathar's son. In Absalom's rebellion returned with his father from Olivet to act as David's spy with Ahimaaz, conveying the tidings from Abiathar and Hushai in the city (2 Sam. xv. 36, xvii.). Announced at Adonijah's feast to the guests, including Abiathar, the unwelcome tidings of Solomon's being anointed (1 Kings i. 41-43). 5. Son of Shage the Aramite, i.e. mountaineer (1 Chron. xi. 34). "Shamnah" in 2 Sam. xxiii. 33 stands instead of "son of Shage," probably an error of the transcriber from ver. 11; Chronicles has the true reading. 6. Ezra viii. 6. 7. Ezra x. 15. 8. Neh. xii. 14. 9. Jer. xl. 8. 10. The high-priest Joiada's son and successor. The genealogies of the priests and Levites were kept in his highpriesthood, and the national chronicles were continued to his time (Neh. xii. 11, 22, 23). Notorious for murdering in the temple his own brother Jesus, who had tried to supplant him by the Persian general Bagas's help. The latter in consequence entered and polluted the temple and imposed a tax of 50 shekels for every lamb sacrificed (Jos. Ant. xi. 7, §1). J. or John was highpriest 32 years. 11. Neh. xii. 35; of the course of Shemaiah (so Lord A. C. Hervey reads for "son of").

Joppa. From Japhah "to shine," from its sunny look. Now Jaffa. The port of Jerusalem. The fabled scene of Andromeda's exposure to the whale: the legend is a tradition derived from Jonah's history, through the Phœnicians. Situated in Dan, S.W. of Palestine (Josh. xix. 46). On a high hill; with a harbour of difficult approach, hence not used much except in going to and from Jerusalem. It was by way of J. that Hiram sent to Solomon the timber from Lebanon for the temple; also Cyrus for Zerubbabel's temple (2 Chron. ii. 16, Ezra iii. 7). Here Jonah embarked for Cilician Tarsus. Here too on the bonsetop of Simon the tanner (tradition still points out the house?) [see SIMON THE TANNER] by the seaside, Peter, in full view of the Mediterranean washing the Gentile lands of the W., had his vision teaching that the middle wall separating Jew and Gentile is broken down, and that the gospel is for all nations (Acts x.). He had come from the neighbouring Lydda to J. to raise Tabitha from death; that became the raising of many to spiritual life (ix. 36-42). Thence at Cornelius' call he went to quicken the Gentiles through the word then first preached to them with the Holy Ghost accompanying it.

A vast plain surrounded it. Its situation was between Jamnia and Caesarea, which latter town Peter could reach on "the morrow" from leaving J. (x. 24). It has now a soap manufacture. The oranges, pomegranates, and water melons are noted. It is one of the oldest cities in the world. Cepheus, its earliest king, may represent Caphor (Gen. x. 14, Deut. ii. 23). It belonged to the Philistines, a Mizraimite colony of Caphorim. The kindred to the Phœnicians is implied in the name of Cepheus' brother Phineus. It is N. of Askelon, S. of Caesarea, and 36 miles N.W. from Jerusalem.

Jorah. Ezra ii. 18. In Neh. vii. 24 Hariph.

Jorai. Among those "reckoned by genealogies" in the days of Jetham king of Judah and Jeroboam II. of Israel (1 Chron. v. 13, 17).

Joram. [See JEHOHAM.] 1. 2 Chron. xvii. 8. 2. 1 Chron. xxvii. 25. 3. Toi's son, sent from Hamath to congratulate David on his victories over Hadadezer (2 Sam. viii. 10).

Jordan. From gurad "to descend," Arab. "the watering place." Always with the Heb. article "the J." except Job xl. 23, Ps. xliii. 6. 200 miles long from its source at Antilebanon to the head of the Dead Sea. It is not navigable, nor has it ever had a large town on its banks. The cities Bethshan and Jericho on the W., and Gerasa, Pella, and Gadara on the E. of J., produced intercourse between the two sides of the river. Yet it is remarkable as the river of the great plain (ha Arabah, now el Ghor) of the Holy Land, flowing through the whole from N. to S. Lot from the hills on the N.W. of Sodom seeing the plain well watered by it, as Egypt is by the Nile (Lot's allusion to Egypt is apposite, Abram having just left it: Gen. xii. 10-20), chose that district as his home, in spite of the notorious wickedness of the people (Gen. xiii. 10).

Its sources are three. The northernmost near Hasbeya between Hermon and Lebanon; the stream is called Hasbany. The second is best known, near Banias, i.e. Caesarea Philippi (the scene of Peter's confession, Matt. xvi. 16); a large pool beneath a high cliff, fed by gushing streamlets, rising at the mouth of a deep cave; thence the J. flows, a considerable stream. The third is at Dan, or Tel el Kady (Daphne); from the N.W. corner of a green eminence a spring bursts forth into a clear wide pool, which sends a broad stream into the valley. The three streams unite at Tel Dafneh, and flow sluggishly through marsh land into lake Merom (Huleh). Capt. Newbld adds a fourth, wady el Kid on the S.E. of the slope, flowing from the springs Esh Shar. Indeed Antilebanon abounds in gushing streams, which all make their way into the swamp between Banias and Huleh and become part of the J. The traditional site of Jacob's crossing J. (Jisr Benat Yacobe) at his first leaving Beersheba for Padan Aram is a mile and a half from Merom, and six from the sea of Galilee: in those six its descent with roaring cataracts over the basaltic rocks is 1050 ft. This, the part known to Naaman in his invasions, is the least attractive part of its course, and unfavourably contrasted with Abana and Pharpar of his native land (2 Kings v. 12). From the sea of Galilee it winds 200 miles in the 60 miles of actual distance to the Dead Sea. Its tortuous course is the secret of the great depression (the Dead Sea being 663 ft. below the lake of Galilee) in this distance. On Jacob's return from Padan Aram he crossed near where the Jabbok (Zerka) enters the J. (Gen. xxxii. 10, 22). The next crossing recorded is that of Joshua over against Jericho, the river being then flooded, in harvest time in April, in consequence of the rainy season and the melting of the snow of Hermon (Josh. iii. 15, 16; iv. 12, 13; v. 10-12). The men of Jericho had pursued the spies to the fords there (ii. 7), the same as those "toward Moab" where the Moabites were slain (Jud. iii. 28). Higher up were the fords Bethkurah or Bethabara (house of passage), where Gideon intercepted the fleeing Midianites (vii. 24) and the Gileadites slew the Ephraimites (xii. 6), probably the place also of Jacob's crossing. Near was "the clay ground between Succoth and Zartlian" used for Solomon's foundry (1 Kings vii. 46).

JACOB'S BRIDGE

Three banks may be noted in the Ghor or J. valley, the upper or first slope (the abrupt edge of a wide table land reaching to the Hauran mountains on the E. and the high hills on the W. side), the lower or middle terrace embracing the strip of land with vegetation, and the true banks of the river bed, with a jungle of agnus castus, tamarisks, and willows and reed and cane at the edge, the stream being ordinarily 30 yards wide. At the flood the river cannot be forded, being 10 or 12 ft. deep E. of Jericho; but in summer it can, the water being low. To cross it in the flood by swimming was an extraordinary feat, performed by the Gadites who joined David (1 Chron. xii. 15); this was impossible for Israel under Joshua with wives and children. The Lord of the whole earth made the descending waters stand in a heap very far from their place of crossing, viz. by the town of Adam, that is beside Zartlian or Zaretan, the moment that the feet of the priests bearing the ark dipped in the water. The priests then stood in the midst of the dry river bed till all Israel crossed over. Joshua erected a monument of 12 large stones in the river bed where the priests had stood, near the E. bank of the river. This would remain at least for a time as a memorial to the existing generation, besides the monument erected at Gilgal (Josh. iv. 3, 6, 7, 9, 20).

By this lower ford David passed to fight Syria (2 Sam. x. 17), and afterwards in his flight from Absalom to Mahanaim E. of J. Thither Judah escorted him, and he crossed in a ferry boat (xvii. 22; xix. 15, 18). Here Elijah and Elisha divided the waters with the prophet's mantle (2 Kings ii. 4, 8, 14). At the upper fords Naaman washed off his leprosy. Here too the Syrians fled, when panic struck by the Lord (2 Kings vii. 15).

John the Baptist "first" baptized at the lower ford near Jericho, whither all Jerusalem and Judea resorted, being near: where too our Lord took refuge from Jerusalem, and where many converts joined Him, and from whence He went to Bethany to raise Lazarus (John x. 39, 40; xi. 1). John's next baptisms were (John i. 29-34) at BETHABARA (or "Bethany") [see] the upper ford, within reach of the

FORDS OF THE JORDAN.

N.; thither out of Galilee the Lord Jesus and Andrew repaired after the baptisms in the S. (Luke iii. 21), and were baptized. His third place of baptism was near Enon and Salim, still farther to the N., where the water was still deep though it was summer, after the passover (John ii. 13-23), for there was no ford there (iii. 23); he had to go thither, the water being too shallow at the ordinary fords. John moved gradually northwards towards Herod's province where ultimately he was beheaded: Jesus coming from the N. southwards met John half way.

The overflow of J. dislodged the lion from its lair on the wooded banks (Jer. xlix. 19); in xii. 5 some transl. "the pride of J." (comp. 2 Kings vi. 2.) "if in the champaign country alone thou art secure, how wilt thou do when thou fallest into the wooded haunts of wild beasts?" (Prov. xxiv. 10.) Between Merom and lake Tiberias the banks are so thickly wooded as often to shut out the view of the water.

Four fifths of Israel, nine tribes and a half, dwelt W., and one fifth, two and a half, dwelt E. of J. The great altar built by the latter was the witness of the oneness of the two sections (Josh. xxii. 10-29). Of the six cities of refuge three were E., three W. of J., at equal distances.

J. enters Gennesareth two miles below the ancient city Julias or Bethsaida of Gaulonitis on the E. bank. It is 70 ft. wide at its mouth, a sluggish turbid stream. The lake of Tiberias is 653 ft. below the Mediterranean level. The Dead Sea is 1316 ft. below the Mediterranean, the springs of Hasbeiya are 1700 above the Mediterranean, so that the valley falls more than 3000 ft. in reaching the N. end of the Dead Sea. The bottom descends 1308 ft. lower, in all 2600 below the Mediterranean. The J., well called "the Descender," descends 11 ft. every mile. Its sinuosity is less in its upper course. Besides the Jabbok it receives the Hieromax (Yarmuk) below Gennesareth. From Jerusalem to J. is only a distance of 20 miles; in that distance the descent is 3500 ft., one of the greatest chasms in the earth; Jerusalem is 2581 ft. above the Mediterranean. Bitumen wells are not far from the Hasbeiya in the N. Hot springs abound about Tiberias; and other tokens of volcanic action, tufa, etc., occur near the Yarmuk's mouth and elsewhere. Only on the E. border of lake Huleh the land is now well cultivated, and yields largely wheat, maize, rice, etc. Horses, cattle, and sheep, and black buffaloes (the "bulls of Bashan") pasture around. W. of Gennesareth are seen corn, palms, vines, figs, melons, and pomegranates. Cultivation is rare along the lower J., but pink oleanders, arbutus, rose hollyhocks, the purple thistle, marigold, and anemone abound. Tracks of tigers and wild bears, flocks of wild ducks, cranes, and pigeons have been seen by various explorers. Conder considers the tells in the J. valley and the Esdraelon plain as artificial, and probably the site of the stronghold of ancient towns; the slopes are steep; good water is always near; they are often where no natural elevation afforded a site for a fortress. There are no bridges earlier than the Roman. The Saracens added or restored some. The Roman bridge of 10 arches, Jisr Semakh, was on the route from Tiberias to Gadara. In coincidence with Scripture, the American survey sets down three fords: that at Tarichæa, the second at the Jabbok's confluence with J., and that at Jericho. The J. seldom now overflows its banks; but Lieut. Lynch noticed sedge and driftwood high up in the overhanging trees on the banks, showing it still at times overflows the plain. Anciently, when forests abounded more than now, mount Hermon had more snow and rain falling on it, and J. was therefore flooded to overflow. It is plain from Josh. iii. 15, iv. 18 comp. with Isa. viii. 7, that J. was not merely full to the brim, but overglowed its banks. The flood never reaches beyond the lower line of the Ghor, which is covered with vegetation. The plain of the J. between the sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea is generally eight miles broad, but at the N. end of the Dead Sea the hills recede so that the width is 12 miles, of which the W. part is named "the plains of Jericho." The upper terrace immediately under the hills is covered with vegetation; under that is the Arabian or desert plain, barren in its southern part except where springs fertilise it, but fertile in its northern part and cultivated by irrigation. Grove remarks of the J.: "so rapid that its course is one continued cataract, so crooked that in its whole lower and main course it has hardly a half mile straight, so broken with rapids that no boat can swim any distance continuously, so deep below the adjacent country that it is invisible and can only be with difficulty approached; refusing all communication with the ocean, and ending in a lake where navigation is impossible; useless for irrigation, it is in fact what its Arabic name signifies, nothing but a great watery place," Shariat el Khebir." Geologists find that the J. valley was caused by a sudden violent depression after the late cretaceous period, having a chain of lakes at three levels. The level is gradually lowering, and the area of the lakes diminishing by denudation and evaporation.

Jorim. Matthat's son in Christ's genealogy (Luke iii. 29). About Abaz's time.

Jorkoam. A place in Judah, near Hebron, of which Raham was prince (1 Chron. ii. 44; Jarchi). Else a person sprung from Caleb son of Iezron, through Hebron.

Josabad. 1 Chron. xii. 4.

Joseph. The elder of Jacob's two sons by Rachel. Having been long barren, she said at his birth "God hath taken away (asaphi) my reproach"; "the Lord (I regard this son as the earnest that He) will add (jasaph) to me another son," a hope fulfilled afterwards in Benjamin's birth. Seventeen years old when sold into Egypt (Jacob being 108, and Isaac living 12 years afterwards), 30 when made governor (Gen. xxx. 23, 24; xxxvii. 2; xli. 46), 39 before Jacob came into Egypt; so born 1906 B.C. He is called "son of Jacob's old age," as the comfort of his father's declining years, when his elder brothers by misconduct grieved their father, and Benjamin as yet was too young to minister to him. Whilst Jacob was with the aged Isaac at Hebron his sons were tending flocks. J. reported their evil doings to Jacob, early manifesting moral courage and right principle under temptation (Exod. xxiii. 2). Jacob marked his love to J. by giving him a "coat of many colours" (ketoneth pasim), the distinctive mark of kings' daughters who were virgins (2 Sam. xiii. 18), strictly a long "tunic reaching to the extremities" or ankles. These robes generally had a stripe round the skirts and sleeves. On the tomb of Chnumhotep at Benihasan, under the 12th dynasty, the Semitic visitors are represented in coloured robes, of pieces sewn together. Jacob probably designed hereby to give J., the firstborn of Rachel who, but for Laban's trick, was his rightful first wife as she was his dearest, the primogeniture forfeited by Reuben (1 Chron. v. 1; Gen. xxxv. 22, xlix. 4). The Arab chief to this day wears an aba or garment of different coloured stripes as emblem of office. The more his father loved the more his brethren hated him, and could not speak peaceably to him (Eccles. iv. 4; comp. the Antitype John i. 11, v. 17-20, vii. 5, xv. 24-25). The preeminence given him by his earthly was confirmed by his heavenly Father in two successive dreams. In his simplicity, possibly with some degree of elation, but certainly with the Divine approval (for the revelation was given to be made known, Matt. x. 27), he told the dreams to his brethren, which only aggravated their hatred: the first, their sheaves bowing to his sheaf (pointing to his coming office of lord of the Egyptian granaries); the second, the sun, moon, and 11 stars bowing to him (these heavenly bodies symbolising authorities subject to his chief rule; comp. the coming eclipse of the natural luminaries and earthly potentates before the Antitype, Matt. xxiv. 29, 30, Rev. vi. 12). In the Antitype the O. T. prophecies answer to J.'s dreams; the Jewish rulers rejected Him, though knowing, yet practically knowing not, the prophecies concerning Him (Acts xiii. 27). Leah or else Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid, answers to the "moon," "thy mother," as Jacob to the "sun," and the 11 stars to the 11 brothers (Gen. xxxvii. 6-10). He told his second dream to his father as well as to his brethren, because it affected not merely them but Jacob and his mother also. His father at first was displeased with what seemed at variance with a son's submission to his parent. But, like Mary in the case of the Antitype, he "observed the saying" (Luke ii. 19, 51). Unbelief, along with a secret misgiving that it might prove true after all, and bitter envy, wrought upon the brothers. So upon their father sending J. from the vale of Hebron in the S. to Shechem in the N. to inquire after their welfare and the flocks, when they saw him afar off at Dothan, they conspired to slay him, saying "we shall see what will become of his dreams." So as to the Antitype, Matt. xxi. 38, xxvii. 1. Stephen and the apostles evidently contemplated J. as type of Jesus (Acts vii. 9-14, iii. 13-18). Jacob's special love shadows God's love to His Only Begotten (Matt. iii. 17). J.'s readiness at his father's calls answers to the good Shepherd, the Son of God's volunteering to come securing our eternal welfare at the cost of His life (Ps. xl. 6, 7; John x. 11). Providence turned aside their first plan. Reuben persuades them to avoid the guilt of blood by casting him into a dry pit or cistern, intending to return and deliver him. In his absence (the narrative with the artlessness of truth never explains why Reuben was absent at the crisis; a forger would have carefully made all plain) they strip off his coat of many colours (type of the human body with its manifold perfections which the Father "prepared" the Son, and which His unnatural brethren stripped Him of: Heb. x. 5. Phil. ii. 6-8); and whilst he was in the pit "eat bread" (Prov. xxx. 20; comp. John xviii. 28, Zech. ix. 11). Ishmaelite or Midianite merchants from Gilead, with spicery, balm, and myrrh (gum ladanium), for Egypt, the land of embalming the dead (Gen. l. 2, 3), passed by; and Judah, type of Judas, proposes the new plan of selling their brother for 20 pieces of silver (Lev. xxvii. 5) to the strangers (comp. Matt. xx. 19, Luke xviii. 32, xx. 20, the Jews delivering Jesus to the Gentile Romans). Thus they thought they had foiled for ever the prediction of his elevation, but this was the very means of realizing it, by God's overruling and matchless counsels. Comp. the Antitype (Acts iv. 25-28, Isa. xxviii. 29, Prov. xix. 21). J.'s anguish of soul is noticed incidentally in the brothers' self reproach (Gen. xlii. 21). Affection for his father is a trait characterizing him throughout, even as the father loved him, so that at his supposed loss through a wild beast (his sons having sent him J.'s tunic dipped in blood) Jacob refused to be comforted. Severance from his father was the bitterest ingredient in his cup of slavery. So the Antitype, Matt. xxvii. 46. His chief inquiries long afterwards were about his father (Gen. xliii. 7, xlv. 13, 28, xli. 51), and the remembrance of "his father" was with him the strongest plea after Jacob's death, that the brothers thought they could urge for their being forgiven (I. 16, 17).

Reuben with characteristic instability forbore to tell his father the truth, whilst he had not consented to their deed. Jacob's cry, "I will go down into sheol unto my son," implies his belief in a future state, for he thought his son devoured by wild beasts, therefore not in the "grave."

The Midianites sold J. to Potiphar (= one devoted to the royal house; phar), an eunuch, i.e. court attendant, of Pharaoh, chief of the executioners (Heb., or commander of the body guard), the superintendence of executions belonging to the chiefs of the military caste. Potiphar controlled the king's prison (xxxix. 20), which was in "the house of the captain of the guard" [Potiphar's successor according to some, but see POTIPHAR], where also J. was prisoner (xl. 3).

J. at first "prospered" as Potiphar's steward ("Jehovah making all that he did to prosper in his hand"), supervising his gardens, lands, fisheries, and cattle. Farming in Egypt was carried on with the utmost system, as the Egyptian monuments attest; the stewards registering all the operations, to check the notorious dishonesty of the workmen. J.'s knowledge of flocks qualified him in some degree for the post, and his integrity made him trustworthy in it, so that his master felt he could safely entrust to his charge his household and all that he had, and "the Lord blessed the Egyptian's house for J.'s sake" (as in Jacob's case, xxx. 27): Ps. i. 3. But now his virtue encountered a severer test than that of his brothers' bad example; Potiphar's wife, with the lustfulness of Egyptian women, conceived a passion for his beauty and tempted him. Seemingly his safety was in compliance, his danger if he should provoke her by non-compliance. Had he given way to animal appetite he would have yielded; but his master's absolute confidence in him, which gave him the opportunity with probable impunity ("my master wotteth not what is with me in the house"), was just the reason he gives for not abusing that confidence. Above all, regard for God restrained him instinctively: "how CAN (not merely shall) I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?" So Matt. vii. 18, 1 John iii. 9, "cannot." Wilful sin is impossible so long as one is under the principle of grace. On "against God," the feature of sin which constitutes its chief heinousness, see Ps. li. 4, 2 Sam. xii. 13. When she importuned him day by day, he avoided being with her; they who would escape sin should flee temptation and occasions of sin. When she caught his garment he fled, leaving it in her hand. Then she accused him of the very sin to which she tried in vain to tempt him.

An Egyptian story, in the papyrus d'Orbigny in the British Museum, The Two Brothers, in later times, seems founded on that of J., the elder brother's wife tempting the younger with almost the same words as Potiphar's wife used to J. The story of Sancha in one of the oldest papyri records his elevation to high rank under a Pharaoh of the 12th dynasty, and his developing the resources of Egypt just as J. did. Potiphar's not putting J. to death implies that he did not feel sure of his wife's story, and half suspected J. might be innocent. It cannot have been he but another who entrusted the prisoners to J.; for if Potiphar believed him innocent, as the committing of prisoners to him would imply, he would not have left him in prison. His doing so was provisionally ordered for J.'s elevation. J.'s fettering, "the iron entering into his soul," is alluded to in Ps. cv. 17, 18. The keeper of the prison, however, discovered his trustworthiness, and committed to him all the prisoners, "the Lord giving him favour in the keeper's sight" (Prov. xvi. 7). After a time the chief of Pharaoh's cup-bearers (Heb.), and the chief of his bakers or confectioners, were cast into prison by the king; the captain of the guard committed them as men of rank to J.'s custody. His interpretation of their dreams, the vine with three branches and the pressing the grape juice into Pharaoh's cup, and the three baskets of white bread (the Egyptians being noted for their fancy bread and pastry) out of the uppermost of which the birds ate, came to pass; Pharaoh restored the chief cup-bearer, and decapitated the chief baker. The mention of wine is confirmed by the monuments, which make it the beverage of the rich, beer that of the poor, and represent the process of fermenting wines in early times. The chief cup-bearer forgot his promise and his benefactor J. (Amos vi. 6): comp. the Antitype, Ps. xxxi. 12, He "remembered" the companion of His suffering (Luke xxiii. 42).

After two years Pharaoh's two dreams of the seven fat and seven lean kine out of the river (Nile, year Heb., as our Egyptian, "great river": also Hapi, i.e. Apis, the sacred name; appropriately "kine" come out of "the river," fertilising the land by its overflow in the absence of rain, for corn and pasture of cattle, Apis the god being represented as a bull, and Athor, Isis, or mother earth, as a cow, feeding in a meadow (the sedge or rank grass by the river's edge, achu), and the seven rank ears of corn on one stalk, such as still is grown in Egypt, devoured by the seven thin ears which were blasted by the

SEVEN-EARED WHEAT.

S.E. wind, called J. to the chief cup-bearer's remembrance. Having in vain consulted his magicians [see DIVINATION] or "sacred scribes" (chartummin, bearers of spells; the "sozcerers" do not occur till Exod. vii. 11), Pharaoh through J. learned the interpretation, that seven years of famine (doubtless owing to failure of the Nile's overflow) should succeed to and consume all the stores remaining from the seven plenteous years. Like Daniel in the great heathen world-king's court at the close of Israel's history, so J. at its beginning, in like circumstances and with like abstinence from fleshly indulgences, interprets the Gentile monarch's dreams; marking the immeasurable superiority of the kingdom of God, even at its lowest point, to the world kingdoms. It is an undesigned mark of genuineness that J. is represented as "shaving" before entering Pharaoh's presence, for the Hebrews wore a beard, but the Egyptians cut it and the hair close, and represent on the monuments the idea of slovenliness or low birth by giving a beard to a man. J. recommended the king to appoint a chief officer and subordinates to take up by taxation a fifth of the produce in the plenteous years against the famine years. The king raised J. as one "in whom the Spirit of God was," to be grand vizier over his house and his people, reserving the throne alone for himself. He put his signet ring (the names of the Pharaohs were always written in an elongated, signet-like, ring) on J.'s hand in token of delegated sovereignty, a gold chain about his neck, and arrayed him in the fine linen peculiar to the Egyptian priests; and made him ride in his second chariot, whilst the attendants cried "Abrech," Rejoice thou (Egyptian), calling upon him to rejoice with all the people at his exaltation (Canon Cook, Speaker's Comm.). Pharaoh named J. "Zaphnath Paneah," the food of life or of the living. Comp. the Antitype (John vi. 25) occupying the mediatorial throne with the Father's delegated power, giving the bread of life first to His own brethren the Jews, then to the world.

Then J., who shrank from adulterous lusts, in righteous retribution received pure wedded joys in union with Asenath (= devoted to Neith and Isis) daughter of Potiphar (= devoted to Ra, the sun god) priest of Os [see], Heliopolis or Bethschemesh (the city of the sun god), the religious capital. Pharaoh doubtless ordered the marriage, to link his prime minister with the noblest in the land. Pharaoh himself was invested with the highest sacerdotal dignity, and could remove all disqualifications, so as to enable J. to be allied to the proud and exclusive priest caste. The Egyptian religion, though blended with superstitions, retained then much of the primitive revelation, the unity, eternity, and self existence of the unseen God. The sun was made His visible symbol, the earliest idolatry (Job xxxi. 26, Sabeanism). J. probably drew Asenath to his own pious faith. J. certainly professed openly his religion without molestation (Gen. xlii. 18), and Pharaoh recognises the God of Joseph and His Spirit as the true God (xli. 32, 38, 39).

OBELISK OF HELIOPOLIS

Like the Antitype (Luke iii. 23), J. was 30 in entering on his public ministry, so that he was 13 years in Egypt, in Potiphar's house and in prison, before his elevation. With characteristic energy as a steward he made an immediate tour throughout Egypt, and laid up grain in immense quantities, all registered accurately by scribes when the granaries were being filled (as Egyptian monuments represent). God gave him two children, to whom he gave Hebrew names, showing he remembered as ever the God of his fathers: Manasseh, "forgetting," "for God," said he, "hath made me forget all my toil and all my father's house" (i.e. not literally forgetting his relatives, for "his father" was uppermost in his affections; but has swallowed past sorrow in present joy; comp. Ps. xc. 15; Isa. lxxvi. 16, 17, lxi. 7, lxii. 4; Rev. vii. 14-17; spiritually, Ps. xlv. 10); and Ephraim, "doubly fruitful," J. again attributing all to God, "God hath caused me to be fruitful in the land of my affliction" (comp. Gen. xlix. 22, John xv. 2 end). See Egypt, on J.]

Apophis the last of the shepherd kings was supposed to be the Pharaoh over J. But Apophis was not master of all Egypt, as J.'s Pharaoh was. "Shepherds were an abomination" in J.'s time, which could not have been the case under a shepherd king. Osirtasi I., the second king of the 12th dynasty, was perhaps J.'s Pharaoh. This dynasty was specially connected with On. There still stand Osirtasi's name and title on the famous obelisk, the oldest and finest in Egypt. Chnumhotep, Osirtasi's relative and favourite, is described upon the tombs of Beni-hassan as possessing the qualities so esteemed in J. "When years of famine occurred he ploughed all the lands producing abundant food." The tenure under the crown, subject to a rent of a fifth of the increase, could only emanate from a native Pharaoh. Had it been a shepherd king's work, it would have been set aside on the return of the native dynasties. Amenemha III., sixth of the 12th dynasty, established a complete system of dykes, locks, and reservoirs, to regulate the Nile's overflow. He fitted the lake Moeris for receiving the overflow; near it was Phaneh, "the house of life," answering to Zaphnath P'aneah, "the fool of life." If he be J.'s Pharaoh J. was just the minister to carry out his grand measures.

In the seven famine years the Egyptians as well as the people of adjoining lands, W. Africa, Ethiopia, Arabia, Syria, which shared in the drought (for the tropical rains on the Abyssinian mountains, on which the Nile's rise depends, have the same origin as the Palestine rains), and which partially depended on Egypt the granary of many countries (Acts xxvii. 6, 38), came to buy corn. Pharaoh's one reply to all was: "go to J., what he saith to you, do" (comp. the Antitype: John vi. 45 end, ii. 5). His brethren too came and bowed before him, unconsciously fulfilling the dream which they had so striven to frustrate (Acts iv. 27, 28; Prov. xix. 21, xxi. 30). His speech and manners were Egyptian, so that they knew him not though he knew them. So the Antitype's brethren shall at last, like all others, bow before Him who is supremely exalted just because He humbled Himself (Phil. ii. 6-11, Ps. xxii. 22, 26-29). He knows His people before they know Him (John xv. 16, x. 14; Gal. iv. 9). J. spoke roughly to his brethren, at once to avoid recognition and to bring them to repentance: "ye are spies, to see the nakedness (the assailable, because defenceless, points) of the land ye are come." Egypt [see] was exposed to incursions of Canaanite Hittites and Arabs, and the invasion of the shepherds or Hyksos was already impending. J. bartered corn successively for the Egyptian money (the money was in the form of rings not coined but weighed), cattle and land, of which he retained only a fifth of the produce for Pharaoh and took nothing from the priests. Diodorus adds the warriors as possessing land, but this was the king's special favour to them and apparently after J. Not J. but Pharaoh it was who made the exception in behalf of the idolatrous priests, giving them corn without requiring their land (Gen. xlvii. 22). Herodotus mentions the allotment of the soil by the crown among the people. The monuments record several famines and precautions taken against it. J.'s statesmanship appears in the policy adopted. The Egyptians became the king's servants, and their property his, by their own voluntary act. His generous principle of dealing with them then, asking only a fifth after establishing the right to all, won their universal approval of an evenly distributed instead of an unequal taxation. A fifth was probably the sole tax on them.

J.'s policy was to centralize power in the monarch's hands, a well ordered monarchy being the best in the existing state of Egypt to guard against the recurrence of famines by stores laid by systematically, and by irrigation in the absence of the Nile's overthrow, and by such like governmental works, instead of leaving all to the unthrifty and unenterprising cultivators. The removal to cities (xlvii. 19-26) facilitated his providing the people with food. The Egyptians did not regard one fifth as an exorbitant rent, but acknowledged "thou hast saved our lives" (comp. the Antitype, Acts v. 31).

J.'s brethren in replying as to their father and family kept up the old lie, "one is not." J. required that one of them should fetch the youngest who was they said with his father, and kept them three days in ward, then let them take back corn for their households, but bound Simeon before their eyes as a hostage for their bringing Benjamin and so proving their truthfulness. As they had separated him from his father so he separated one from them, possibly the ringleader in their cruelty to J. (comp. Gen. xxxiv., xlix. 5-7.) As they had seen his anguish of soul so now their souls were in terrified anguish, with the stings of conscience superadded (xlii. 21, 22): retribution in kind (Num. xxxii. 23 end, Matt. vii. 2). J. heard their self reproaching, remorseful cry, "we are verily guilty concerning our brother in that we saw . . . and we would not hear" (Prov. xxi. 13). J., though cherishing no revenge nay feeding his enemy when hungry (Rom. xii. 20), saw that temporary affliction was needed to bring them to penitence (Hos. v. 15, Job xxxvi. 8, 9). He filled their sacks (Heb. vessels) and restored their money (Luke vi. 34, 35). Divine guidance led J. to require Benjamin, the surest way of bringing Jacob and the whole family into their Egyptian house of bondage and training. His real kindness to them here shows that the severity was used in the interests of justice and their ultimate good by humiliation, whilst he retained all a brother's tenderness. The discovery of their money alarmed both the brothers and Jacob; "all these things are against me," but see Rom. viii. 31. Reuben offered to let his two sons be slain if he did not bring Benjamin back. At last, when want of corn forced him, Jacob gave a reluctant consent on Judah's undertaking to be surety for Benjamin. So with double money and a present of balm (balsam gum), honey (else grape juice boiled down to syrup, dibs), spices (storax), myrrh (ladanum), and nuts (pistachio nuts), they brought Benjamin. Tremblingly they told the steward as to their money, for they feared on being brought into the house they should be imprisoned there. The steward reassured them and brought forth Benjamin. Again they fulfilled the dream, bowing before J. twice to the earth. His tender affection all but burst out at the sight of Benjamin, but as before by turning from them and weeping (Gen. xlii. 24), so now by entering into a chamber and weeping there, he maintained composure (comp. the Antitype's yearning love for His brethren after the flesh: Jer. xxxi. 20, Isa. lxi. 15). At dinner the Egyptians, dreading pollution from those who killed cows, which were sacred in Egypt, sat apart from the Hebrews, and J. sat alone according to his high rank. Each was served separately; all were ranged according to age, but the youngest had five messes for their one sent from before J. The monuments accord with this representation. They drank freely ("were merry"). On the morrow, by putting his silver cup (bowl from which wine was poured into smaller cups) in Benjamin's sack, and sending his steward after them upon their leaving the city where J. lived, he elicited Judah's generous offer to be bondsman and so not bring his father's grey hairs with sorrow to the grave, bound up as Jacob's life was with Benjamin's. [See DIVINATION.] Divining cups were used by gazing into the water as a mirror. The Nile was "the cup of Egypt," the sacred cup symbolised it. J. to keep up his disguise spoke as an Egyptian. He was not faultless; here he exceeded legitimate bounds of disguise, and implied his use of divination, which his former disclaiming of all knowledge otherwise than by God's revelation proves he did not practise (Gen. xli. 16). J. could refrain no longer. The thought of his father's loving anxiety moved him to make himself known to them. He wept aloud whilst "they were troubled at his presence"; it was as if the ghost of one whom they had murdered stood before them. They shrank from him, but he said "come near to me" (comp. Matt. xiv. 26; the Antitype and His future comforting of Zion, Isa. xl. 2, lxi. 2, 3). J. soothes their remorse, "be not angry with yourselves, for God did send me before you to preserve life." So Acts iii. 12-18, iv. 27, 28. He gave them the kiss of reconciliation and wept over them. Above all he tells them: "haste ye . . . to my father and say, God hath made me lord of all Egypt, come down and thou shalt dwell in GOSHEN [see] near me." Pharaoh and his court were pleased at the arrival of his brethren, and rendered him all help in removing his father and the whole household. His knowledge of his brethren suggested his charge, "see that ye fall not out by the way," one laying the blame of their unnatural conduct on the other. His filial reverence and love appear in his meeting his father in his own state chariot and escorting him to Goshen, Judah having preceded Jacob to announce to J. his approach. Goshen was assigned as a separate settlement to the Hebrews as shepherds, to avoid offence to the Egyptians, who being themselves tillers of the ground looked down on their nomad neighbours. Already the latter had made inroads on lower Egypt, and after J.'s time established the dynasty of shepherd kings or Ilyksos (Gen. xlii. 28-34).

Jacob gave J. "one portion above his brethren, taken from the Amorites with sword and bow," therefore not Shechem (portion) which he bought (see 1 Chron. v. 1, 2). J., though the birthright was transferred to him from Reuben by Jacob, was not entered into the family registers as firstborn, because Judah prevailed above the rest and king David was chosen from his tribe. Still Jacob the progenitor marked J. as firstborn by assigning to his two sons Ephraim and Manasseh two tribal domains according to the law of the firstborn (Deut. xxi. 15-17); his dying blessing on J. beautifully expresses J.'s "fruitfulness amidst affliction," as his "arms were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob." Jacob's blessing on J. once "separate from his brethren" exceeded that of Abraham on Isaac, and of Isaac on Jacob, and lasts as long as "the everlasting hills." The mention of J.'s "servants the physicians" (Gen. 1. 2) accords with the Egyptian usage of great men having many physicians attached to each household, one for each kind of sickness and to embalm the dead. After embalming and burying his father he was accosted by his brethren, who judged him by their own ungenerous and deceitful characters; he reassured them by renouncing vengeance as God's prerogative not his (Rom. xii. 19), and by speaking kindly. J. lived to 110 years, of which 93 were spent in Egypt; seeing Ephraim's and Manasseh's grandchildren, and showing his faith to the end by still clinging amidst all his grandeur in Egypt to God's promise of his seed's settlement in Canaan and therefore commanding Israel on oath to carry his remains thither (Heb. xi. 22). His body was embalmed, and in due time carried by Israel to Shechem his burying place (Exod. xlii. 19, Josh. xxiv. 32, Acts vii. 16). Ephraim and Manasseh followed the idolatries out of which their mother had come rather than the pure faith of J.

He is one of the most faultless human heroes of Scripture. Decision in good, yet versatility in adapting itself to all circumstances, strong sense of duty, strict justice combined with generosity, self control in adversity and prosperity alike, strength of character with sensitive tenderness and delicacy, modesty and magnanimity, strong filial love, above all abiding faith in God, appear throughout his remarkable history. As a statesman he got men unconditionally into his power that he might benefit them, and displayed extraordinary administrative ability.

8. Son of Heli, husband of the Virgin Mary, daughter and heiress of his uncle Jacob. The frequent recurrence of the name in Luke's GENEALOGY [see] and its absence from Matthew's confirm the view that Luke's gives J.'s line of parentage down from Nathan, David's son, but Matthew's the line of succession to the throne. "A just and yet" (Matt. i. 19) merciful and tenderly considerate man. Recognised by his contemporaries as of David's lineage (Luke ii. 4, Matt. i. 20, John i. 45). J. as well as Mary lived at Nazareth before their actual marriage; probably their common grandfather Matthew had settled there (Luke i. 26, 27). His faith appears in his immediate obedience to the Divine vision in a dream, no longer fearing to take to him Mary his wife (Matt. i. 24, 25). Soon afterwards Augustus' decree for the taxation obliged both to go to Bethlehem where Jesus was born (Luke ii.). There the shepherds "found Mary and J., and the Babe lying in a manger." After the wise men's departure another dream from the Lord caused him to flee from Herod's murderous agents by night with mother and Child to Egypt, where he remained till the angel of the Lord in another dream intimated Herod's death. He arose and returned; but fearing Archelaus who reigned in Judaea, and warned of God in a fourth dream (the Divine mode of revelation in the early stage of the kingdom of God, less perfect than those vouchsafed in the advanced stages), J. turned aside to his old home Nazareth. J. is mentioned as with Mary in presenting the Babe in the temple and as "marvelling at those things spoken of" Jesus by Simeon, and as "blessed" by him. Lastly, when Jesus was taken at 12 years of age to the temple and tarried behind, J. and His mother knew not of it; and Mary on finding Him said, "Thy father and I have sought Thee sorrowing." He replied, "Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?" Henceforward there is no more mention of the earthly father, and the heavenly and true Father is all in all. He was a "carpenter," and doubtless instructed the holy Jesus in this work (Matt. xiii. 55, Mark vi. 3). Mary and Jesus' brethren are occasionally mentioned during His ministry, but J. never; evidently he had died previously, which Jesus' committal of the Virgin mother to John (ix. 27) confirms. Tradition has supplied by fiction what the Gospels under the Spirit's guidance do not contain.
9. OF ARIMATEA [see]. "An honourable counsellor," i.e. member of the sanhedrim (Mark xv. 43). J. "waited for the kingdom of God" (Luke ii. 25, 38; xiii. 51), i.e. for Messiah and His kingdom, in accordance with prophecy. "A good man and a just." He had not consented to the sanhedrim's counsel and deed in crucifying Jesus. Timidity was his failing. Mark was conscious of it; John (xiv. 38) expressly records it, "a disciple of Jesus, but secretly for fear of the Jews." Hence Mark records it as the more remarkable that "J. went in boldly unto Pilate and craved the body" just at a time when the boldest disciples might and did shrink from such a perilous venture. Feeble faith when real sometimes rises with the occasion, to face the most formidable dangers. The undesigned coincidence of Mark and John confirms their genuineness. The mighty signs both J. and Nicodemus witnessed at Jesus' crucifixion, and His own Divine bearing through-out, changed towards into brave disciples. God had foretold ages ago (Isa. liii. 9), "they (His enemies) appointed (designed) His grave with the wicked (by crucifying Him between two thieves), but He was with a rich man at His death," i.e. when He was dead. Up to the end this prophecy seemed most unlikely to be fulfilled; but when God's time had come, at the exact crisis came forward two men, the last one would expect, both rich and members of the hostile body of rulers. The same event which crushed the hopes and raised the fears of the avowed disciples inspired J. with a boldness which he never felt before. All four evangelists record his deed. He had the privilege of taking down from the cross the sacred body, wrapping in fine linen which he had bought, and adding spices with Nicodemus' help, and consigning to his own newly hewn rock tomb wherein no corpse had ever lain, and in his own garden near Calvary, and then rolling the stone to the door of the sepulchre. Tradition represents J. as sent to Great Britain by the apostle Philip (A.D. 63), and as having settled with a band of disciples at Glastonbury, Somersetshire.

Joseph Barsabas, surnamed Jastus. One of the two chosen as candidates for Judas Iscariot's vacant apostleship; therefore he must have followed Jesus from His baptism to His ascension, and so was fitted to be a witness of His resurrection (Acts i. 22). Lightfoot suggests that he was Jesus son of Alphaeus, and that Judas Barsabas was his brother and the apostle Jude. Said (Papias, Euseb. H. E. iii. 39) to have drunk deadly poison without hurt, by our Lord's grace.

Joshua. [See CANAAN, on Protopius' inscription in Mauritania confirming the historical facts.] = JESHOUA. 1. He was Hoshea only ("he will save") up to his noble witness after spying Canaan. Henceforth Jehovah's name is prefixed, Jehovah by him would save Israel (Num. xiii. 16). This forms the contrast in the Antitype (Matt. i. 21), "thou shalt call His name Jesus, for Himself (Gr., not merely 'Jehovah by him') shall save His people." Son of Nun, of Ephraim (1 Chron. vii. 27). Born about the time when Moses fled to Midian, he endured in youth the slave labour amidst Egyptian brick-kilns. Probably he even in Egypt was recognised as an officer among his brethren; for at his first public act, choosing and leading picked men of Israel against the attacking AMALÉKITES [see] at Rephidim (Exod. xvii. 9) he is introduced abruptly without description as one already well known by the designation Joshua (not Hoshan) given by anticipation. Moses discerned by the Spirit his sterling qualities, solid rather than brilliant. J. learnt to rule by obeying first; then he ruled for God, not self. God commanded Moses to write in the book (Heb., viz. the history of God's dealings with Israel) and rehearse it in J.'s ears. J. inflicted the first decisive blow on the doomed nations; this was an earnest to him of the subsequent conquest of Canaan. Next as Moses' "minister" J. accompanied him along with Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and 70 elders up the mount of God; but Moses went alone into the cloud (xxiv. 9, 13-15). On the descent J. heard the noise of the people shouting, and with a warrior's thought he said to Moses, "there is a noise of war in the camp"; but it was the noise of singers in the calf worship. When Moses removed the tabernacle of meeting between God and His people from the camp, J., then "a young man" (perhaps an official term for an attendant, Num. xi. 28, Dent. i. 38 "J. who standeth before thee"), departed not out of the tabernacle; the Lord's house and communion is the best qualification for those who are afterwards to fight the Lord's battles.

Sent to spy out Canaan as representing Ephraim; CALEB [see] represented Judah. They two alone of the 12 brought a good report, and encouraged the people not to fear the inhabitants for the Lord was with Israel (contrast Ps. cvi. 24; Num. xiii. 8, 16, xiv.). The people would have stoned both, but the glory of Jehovah suddenly appeared in the tabernacle. The ten other spies were smitten with the plague and died. J. and Caleb alone of all that generation above 20 years of age survived the 40 years' wilderness wanderings that ensued, because "they wholly followed the Lord" (Num. xxxii. 11, 12). Moses shortly before death, by Jehovah's direction, solemnly invested J. with authority as his successor. The Spirit was already in J. Moses by laying on hands added the formal and public sign, and instrumentally gave him thereby more of "the spirit of wisdom." The previous receiving of inward grace does not dispense with the outward sign (xxvii. 18-25; Acts ix. 1-18, x. 44-48). Moses put some of his own honour (dignity and authority) upon J., making him vice leader, that Israel might obey him preparatory to his becoming chief after Moses' death. J. was inferior to Moses in standing before Eleazar the highpriest to inquire through him and his Urim and Thummim, of Jehovah; Moses enjoyed direct communion with God. When J. omitted to inquire in the Gibeonites' case he suffered for it. Moses gave J. a charge before the highpriest and congregation. J.'s solemn inauguration to the office to which he had previously been called is in Dent. xxxi. 14-23. God Himself recognises J. in it by summoning him into the tabernacle with Moses, whilst the Divine pillar of cloud manifested Jehovah's presence (comp. Num. xi. 25, xii. 5). He commands Moses and J. to write Moses' song, and teach it to Israel as a witness against them of God's benefits, their duties, and the penalty of their apostasy. Jehovah's "charge" by Moses was: "be strong and of a good courage, for thou shalt bring the children of Israel into the land which I swear unto them, and I will be with thee." Once only did J. show an envious spirit, but it was in behalf of his beloved master Moses, not for self. When Eldad and Medad prophesied in the camp separately from the rest of the 70 who received of the spirit that was upon Moses, in his presence, J. said, "my lord Moses, forbid them"; he replied, "enviest thou for my sake? would God that all the Lord's people were prophets," etc. (Num. xi. 28, 29; comp. John iii. 26; Luke ix. 49; Acts xv. 8, 9, xi. 17).

Jehovah repeated the charge (Josh. i. 1-9), enjoining "courage" in "doing according to all the law, turning not from it to the right or left," and promising consequent prosperity and Jehovah's continual presence as "his God whithersoever he went." God kept His promise, working mighty miracles in his behalf, and giving Israel all the land and rest round about; no good thing failed which the Lord had spoken (xxi. 43-45). The people honoured J. as they had Moses. During his lifetime Israel came nearest to realizing the ideal of the people of God (xi. 15, xxiv. 31). J. took the command at Shittim, sent spies to Jericho, crossed Jordan, fortified his camp at Gilgal, circumcised the people (for Israel's work was a spiritual one, and men still having the badge of fleshliness were not fit agents for the Lord's work: Josh. x. 40, Jud. v. 31), kept the passover, (after which on their eating the old corn of the land the manna ceased,) and received the assurance of Jericho's fall and God's fighting against Israel's foes from the uncreated Angel of Jehovah (Josh. v. 13-15, vi. 2-5), the Captain of Jehovah's host (Matt. xxvi. 53, Exod. xxxiii. 20, 23, Rev. xix. 11-14). The charge "loose thy shoe from off thy feet" identifies him with the Jehovah of Exod. iii. 5. Gamuey suggests that Sarabab the mountain was the spot whereon the Captain of Jehovah's host, Heb. Sarsaba, appeared to J., and thence takes its name. It is invisible W. of Jericho; but to one starting from Riha to the E. it appears at all points. The Divine Captain was on a height above J., for "he lifted up his eyes" towards Him, and went unto Him. JERICHO [see] fell by miracle. The repulse at AI, through ACHAN's [see] sin, taught Israel their success depended on their doing God's work of wrath in God's holy way, without greed. AI then fell. J. wrote the law on EBAL [see], and read it before the assembled people, half on that side and half over against GERIZIM [see]. By neglecting to consult Jehovah J. was entrapped into the league with GIBBEON [see]; but having sworn he honourably kept his oath (Ps. xv. 4, Eccles. v. 2; contrast 2 Sam. xxi. 2-6, etc.). This brought on the attack of the five confederate kings whom he defeated at Makkedah, aided by a divinely sent hailstorm and prolongation of daylight: the condition of the air was probably rendered by God, at J.'s believing prayer, highly refractive so as to cause the sun to be seen long after its actual descent beneath the horizon, as the fata morgana in Sicily and the arctic region; comp. the recession of the sun's shadow under Hezekiah (2 Kings xx. 11). The miracle was local, not universal, if we are to judge from the language, "stand . . . upon Gibeon, . . . in the valley of Ajalon"; so Exod. viii. 22, x. 23. The mention of the moon with the "sun" hints at the true theory of the earth's rotation on its axis, which requires that if the sun apparently stood the moon should apparently stand too. Habakkuk (iii. 10, 11) refers to it: "the sun and moon stood still in their habitation." The words "hasted not to go down" imply a gradual not a sudden check to the ordinary phenomena of the sun's apparent motion.

J. subdued the S. to Kadesh Barnea and Gaza, then the northern confederated kings under Jabin, at Merom, and the country even unto Baalgal in the valley of Lebanon under mount Hermon and unto "great Zidon." (Tyre was still inferior, merely a stronghold subordinate to Zidon. In the books Samuel and Kings this is reversed, marking the early date of the book of J.)

Israel often disliked destroying all; but God's command required utter extermination of the Canaanites (Josh. x. 40). Like the earthquake or pestilence, they were simply God's executions, without personal blood-thirstiness, required to exhibit His hatred of idolatry, and learning themselves to hate it. For 500 years God had borne with long-suffering those guilty nations. Neither the piety of Melchizedek nor the awful punishment of Sodom and Gomorrah had led them to repentance. Now their "iniquity was full" (Gen. xv. 16). In six years six nations and 31 kings, including the giant ANAKIM [see], their former dread, fell before J. Their extermination was "a work of mercy for all the countries of the earth to the very end of the world."

Next J., now aged, allotted the land, along with Eleazar and the tribal heads (Josh. xiv. 1, xvii. 4). Timnath Serah in Ephraim was assigned to

J. himself, "the city which he asked" (xix. 49). His singular unselfishness herein appears; he who might have claimed the first and best is served the last, and with no extraordinary possession above the rest. The congregation set up the tabernacle at Shiloh (xviii.). Six cities of refuge were appointed, 48 to the Levites; and the two and a half transjordanic tribes were dismissed home with blessings (xx., xxi., xxii.). The slackness of Israel in taking possession of the promised land and destroying the Canaanites was the drawback to the completeness of J.'s work (xviii. 3); after their long nomad life the people were slow in settling down in separate homes; fear of the foes' attack too made them shrink from the trouble of defending themselves severally: a root of bitterness left which bore deadly fruit under the judges.

A long time after Jehovah had given rest unto Israel from all foes, J., now old, convened all Israel (xxiii.) represented by their heads, judges, and officers, to either Timnath Serah his home or Shiloh the sanctuary, and exhorted them to love and serve Jehovah ("be ye very courageous to do all that is written in the law, turn not aside to the right or to the left," xxiii. 6; the same as God had enjoined Himself, i. 7), constrained by His past benefits, His promises of future help, and His threats of leaving the nations to be scourges, scourges, and thorns to vex and destroy Israel in the event of apostasy. Again he gathered all the tribes with their heads and officers to Shechem, as being the place where Abram received God's first promise of the land after his migration into Canaan (Gen. xii. 6, 7); more especially because here Jacob on his return from Mesopotamia settled, and removed his household's strange gods (Gen. xxxiii. 19, xxxv. 2-4), just as J. now wished Israel to renew the covenant binding them to renunciation of all idols. Here too Joseph's bones were buried (Josh. xxiv. 32). J. was buried at 110 years of age in Timnath Serah. His piety comes brightly out in his dying exhortation: (1) God's call to Abraham was one of pure grace, not for his merit; Israel's fathers and Terah had "served other gods" (xxiv. 2, 14; Gen. xxxi. 53, 19, 34), but Jehovah has through miraculous interposition brought Israel to the promised land; put away therefore all the gods ye served in Egypt (Lev. xvii. 7, Ezek. xx. 18, Josh. xxiv. 14); but, if not, (2) choose you (if you are bent on self destruction) which idols you like, "but as for me and my house (Gen. xviii. 19) we will serve the Lord" (comp. Ruth i. 15, 1 Kings xviii. 21, John vi. 67, Luke x. 42). When the people, self confidently (like Peter, Luke xxii. 33), promised faithfulness, J. replied "ye cannot serve the Lord," i.e. without putting away heart idols (for they had no wooden, stone, or metal images to put away): Deut. vi. 5, 6; Matt. vi. 24. Transl. Josh. xxiv. 23, "put away the strange gods which are in you," heart idols, inconsistent with the service of Jehovah who is "a jealous God" (Ezek. xx. 39). On the people expressing still their resolution to serve Jehovah, J. made a covenant between God and them; and wrote the covenant and the words spoken on both sides in the law book of God, adding it to that written by Moses, and set up a stone as a memorial on the spot, under a terebinth tree by the sanctuary (or place hallowed to Jehovah by Abraham), and as a visible silent witness of their engagement. His influence under God kept them faithful both in his own time and that of the elders who outlived him.

A pious warrior, almost without blemish, one who learned to command in advanced age by obeying when a youth, ever looking up to Jehovah with childlike faith, worshipping with devout prostration the Captain of the Lord's host, dispensing kingdoms yet content at the last with a petty inheritance, as disinterested and unselfish as he was brave, generous, and patriotic.

J. typifies Jesus whose name he bears (Acts vii. 45, Heb. iv. 8). Moses representing the law could not bring Israel into Canaan; that was reserved for J. So Jesus perfects what the law could not, and brings His people into the heavenly inheritance (Acts xiii. 39; Heb. iv., vii. 19-25). He leads His people through a Jordan-like flood of troubles and death itself without being overwhelmed (Isa. xliii. 2). He braises Satan under their feet (Josh. x. 24, Ps. cx. 5, Mal. iv. 3, Rom. xxi. 20). Jesus is the minister of the true circumcision (Josh. v. 2-9; comp. Rom. xv. 8, ii. 29, Col. ii. 11, 13). J. was buried in the border of his inheritance in TIMNATH SERAH (which see; probably now Kefr Haris) in mount Ephraim, on the northern side of the hill Gaash (Josh. xxiv. 30). LXX. add: "there they laid with him in the tomb the stone knives with which he circumcised the children of Israel in Gilgal . . . and there they are unto this day." If this addition of the LXX. be trustworthy, it will be a curious proof that flint knives lay in situ for 12 centuries, from the 16th to the third century B.C., the date of LXX. At all events it shows that flint knives are no proof of a barbarous race ages before the historic period; such knives were used by civilized races in the historic times. M. Guerin professes to have discovered at Tigné (Timnath Serah), J.'s tomb. In the hill there one tomb has a vestibule, into which the light penetrates. There are 300 niches for lamps. The vestibule admits to two chambers, one with 15 receptacles for bodies, the other but one; many sharp flint knives were found on removing the dirt from the floor of the tomb, as also in Gilgal, the passage of Jordan. The pillars in the vestibule are surrounded by a fillet of Egyptian style.

day book of Palestine," especially xiii.—xxii. Authenticated by Scripture references to the events recorded in it (Ps. lxxviii. 53-65, xxviii. 21; Hab. iii. 11-13; Acts vi. 45; Heb. iv. 8, xi. 30-32; Jas. ii. 25). Joshua after destroying the kings, so that Israel had rest from war in the open field, divided generally the land; but this is quite consistent with the after statements that years passed before the process of division was completed and the allotments finally settled. Joshua was directed to divide land not yet in Israel's actual possession (Josh. xiii. 1—xiv. 5). God designed that Israel should occupy the land by degrees, lest the beasts should multiply and the land be desolate (Exod. xxiii. 28-30); for instance, though the kings of Jerusalem and Gezer were slain, their people were not rooted out till long after. The slackness of Israel to extirpate the accursed Canaanites was also a cause of non-immediate possession (Josh. xi. 16, 23; xii. 7, 10-12; comp. xv. 63, xvii. 10, xviii. 1, 16; xviii. 1, 3; xix. 51). Joshua is based on the pentateuch (to which it is joined by the conjunction "now" or "and" at its beginning), but distinct from it. Comp. xiii. 7 with Num. xxiv. 13; xiii. 17 with Num. xxxii. 37; xiii. 21, 22 with Num. xxxi. 8; xiii. 14, 33, xiv. 4, with Deut. xviii. 1, 2, Num. xvi. 20; xxi. with Num. xxxv.

Unity. The book evidently is that of an eye witness, so minute and vivid are the descriptions. The narrative moves on in one uninterrupted flow for the first 12 chapters. Jehovah's faithfulness is exhibited in the historical fulfilment of His covenanted promises, with which the book opens (i. 2-9, the programme of the book). I. The promise, ver. 2-5, is fulfilled (chaps. ii.—xii.), the conquest of the land by Jehovah's mighty help, "from the wilderness and this Lebanon unto . . . Euphrates . . . and the great sea (the Mediterranean) towards the going down of the sun." The limit, the Euphrates, was not actually reached till Solomon's reign (1 Kings iv. 21), and the full realization awaits Christ's millennial reign (Gen. xv. 18, Ps. lxxii. 8); but the main step towards its fulfilment was taken. Joshua's conquests, though overwhelming at the time, could only be secured by Israel's faithfully following them up. II. The promise, ver. 6, 7, that Joshua should divide the land is recorded as fulfilled (xiii.—xxii.). III. The means of realizing this twofold promise, "only be very courageous to do . . . all the law . . . turn not to the right hand or to the left . . . this book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth, but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do all that is written therein . . . for then thou shalt have good success . . . Be strong and of a good courage . . . for the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest" (ver. 7-9), are urged upon the people in detail by J. as his last testimony (xxiii., xxiv.). The connection and method traceable throughout prove the unity of the book. The variety in the style of the historical compared with the topographical parts is what we should expect.

The "three days" (i. 11) are not the time within which the crossing actually took place, but the time allowed to the people to prepare for crossing; prepare victuals to be able to leave Shittim within three days, so as to be ready to cross Jordan. The spies sent from Shittim to Jericho (the key of Canaan) on the same day as Joshua gave this charge to Israel had to hide three days after leaving Jericho, so that they could not have returned till the evening of the fourth day after they were sent (ii. 22). The morning after this Israel left Shittim for Jordan, where they halted again; three days afterwards they crossed, i.e. eight days intervened between their being sent and Israel's crossing. The drying up of Jordan is the counterpart of the drying up of the Red Sea under Moses, Joshua's master and predecessor. Throughout the warlike and the peaceful events of this book, comprising a period of 25 years (comp. xiv. 7-10) from 1451 to 1426 B.C., God's presence is everywhere felt. Joshua is His conscious and obedient agent.

Author. That Joshua wrote the book is probable because (1) he certainly wrote one transaction in it (xxiv. 26), and scarcely any but Joshua himself is likely to have written the parting addresses, his last legacy to Israel (xxiii., xxiv.). (2) None but Joshua could have supplied the accounts of his communion with God (i. 1, etc.; iii. 7; iv. 2; v. 2, 9, 13; vi. 2; vii. 10; viii. 1; x. 8; xi. 6; xii. 1, 2; xx. 1; xxiv. 2). (3) Joshua was best qualified by his position to describe the events, and to collect the documents of this book; it was important that the statement of the allotments should rest on such a decisive authority as Joshua. (4) He would be following his master and predecessor Moses' pattern in recording God's dealings with Israel through him; xxiv. 26 looks like his own subscription, as Moses in Deut. xxxi., both being followed by an appendix as to the author's death. (5) In v. 1, 6, he uses the first person, "we passed over"; and in vi. 25, "Rahab dwelleth in Israel even unto this day"; both passages imply a contemporary writer. Keil gives a list of phrases and forms peculiar to this book and the pentateuch, marking its composition in or near the same age.

Jud. iiii. 1-3, i. 27-29, repeat Josh. xiii. 2-6, xvi. 10, xvii. 11, because Joshua's description suited the times described by the inspired writer of Judges. The capture of Hebron and Debir by Judah and its hero Caleb is repeated in Jud. i. 9-15 from Josh. xv. 13-20. Possibly the account of the Danite occupation of Leshem or Laish is a later insertion in Josh. xix. 47 from Jud. xviii. 7. So also the account (Josh. xv. 63, xviii. 28) of the joint occupation of Jerusalem by Israel and the Jebusites may be an insertion from Jud. i. 8, 21. In the case of an authoritative record of the allotment of lands, which the book of Joshua is, the immediate successors who appended the account of his death (probably one or more of the elders who took part in Joshua's victories and outlived him: "we," v. 1, 6; xxiv. 31; Jud. ii. 7) would naturally insert the exact state of things then, which in Joshua's time were in a transition state, his allotments not having been taken full possession of till after his death. The expulsion of the Jebusites from Jerusalem at the beginning of David's reign proves that Joshua and Judges were written before David. The Gibeonites were in Joshua's time (Josh. ix. 27) "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for the sanctuary "even unto this day," but Saul set aside the covenant and tried to destroy them; so that the book of Joshua was before Saul. The only Phœnicians mentioned are the Sidonians, reckoned with the Canaanites as doomed to destruction; but in David's time Tyre takes the lead of Sidon, and is in treaty with David (xiii. 4-6; 2 Sam. v. 11).

Josiah = supported or healed by Jehovah. 1. Son of Amon and Jedidah; began to reign at eight years old (641 B.C.) and reigned 31 years, to 610 B.C. (2 Kings xxii.—xxiv.; 2 Chron. xxxiv., xxxv.). The first 12 chapters of Jeremiah may refer to this period. At 16, "while he was yet young, he began to seek after the God of David his father." As Amon was wicked it is likely that Jedidah (=beloved), like Lois and Eunice (2 Tim. i. 5), had early instilled into her child pious principles which bore fruit betimes, for in spite of the closing error which cost him his life the Holy Spirit, who remembers the graces and ignores the exceptional falls of believers, testifies "he declined neither to the right hand nor to the left." At 20, in the 12th year of his reign, he began to purge Judah and Jerusalem of the high places, groves [see] or Asherah, and images of the sun and Baal, and strewed their dust on the graves of their former worshippers. The events of the purging out idolatry, the temple repair, and the finding of the law, in Kings are arranged according to subject matter; but in Chronicles chronologically. The repairing of the temple recorded 2 Kings xxii. 3-7, in a period by itself, subordinate to the discovery of the law, in the 18th year of J.'s reign, must have been chronologically before that date, since in that year the builders were already repairing and the money for the work had been collected by the Levites who kept the door. The abolishing of the idols must have begun before the people made the covenant (2 Kings xxiii. 3). The discovery of the law [see on it HILKIAH] quickened his zeal in abolishing them throughout the whole kingdom. In 2 Kings their suppression is narrated more minutely, the passover celebration is summarized; in Chronicles their suppression is summarized (xxxiv. 3-7, 23), but the passover fully described (xxxv. 1-19). J. spared not even the high places which pious Hezekiah had left, nor those of Solomon in his apostasy, nor their priests (Chemarim), as Zeph. i. 4 foretold; also Manasseh his grandfather's grove (Asherah) in the Lord's house (2 Kings xxi. 7, xxiii. 6). He defiled Tophet in the valley of the children of Hinnom [see], where the people used to make their children pass through the fire to Moloch; and burned the chariots of the sun, and took away the sacred horses, and destroyed Ahaz' altars on the house-top. He fulfilled on the Bethel calf altar the prophecy of the man of God to Jeroboam, given three centuries before, and declaring his very name (as Isaiah did that of Cyrus ages before), but respected the prophet's sepulchre (1 Kings xiii.). His purgation thus extended to northern Israel as far as Naphtali, as well as to Judah.

It was in repairing the temple that Moses' copy of the law, in his own handwriting, or at least the original temple copy from his, was found. That the law was not previously unknown appears from the king's conduct on its discovery. He at once accepted its authority without mistrust as genuine and authentic; and read or caused it to be read in the ears of all the men of Judah, the priests and the prophets ("Levites" in 2 Chron. xxiv. 39). These too all accepted it, evidently because they and he had always recognised its truth generally (as his extirpation of idolatry already implied), but now he and they are brought into immediate contact, as it were, with Moses himself, through the original temple copy. His tenderness of heart (conscience) and his humbling himself before God with tears and rent garments brought God's promise through Huldah that he should be "gathered to his grave in peace," and "should not see the evil God was about to bring on" Jerusalem. It is true he fell in battle; but his remains were (and were the last) buried in his fathers' sepulchres "in peace," before seeing the enemy overthrow his capital (comp. Jer. xxiv. 5, Isa. lvii. 1, 2). "Because thou humblest thyself when thou heardest what I spake . . . I also have heard thee." God is toward men what they are toward Him (Ps. lviii. 25, 26). In this same year, the 26th of his age, the 18th of his reign, J. and his people entered into a covenant to keep the law of Jehovah with all their heart and all their soul (2 Kings xxiii. 3, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 31-33).

His only fault was his supposition that by frustrating Necho's expedition to the Euphrates against Assyria he might avert God's predicted judgment on Judah. He scarcely realized the depth of Israel's apostasy, and hoped his reformation would enlist God's co-operation against the Egyptians. Nineveh was falling, if not already fallen. The Syrian princes, those independent as J. as well as Assyria's vassals, hoped now to be free from every foreign yoke; it was therefore necessary now to check the Egyptian, for though Necho was not marching against Judah but against Carchemish by Euphrates, J. knew that if once the Egyptians gained Coslosyria his independence would be gone. Necho appealed in vain to J. to leave him alone, as it was "against the house of his war" (his hereditary enemy) that he was marching, and that God commanded him, so that if J. interfered he would be "meddling with God." He thought the reference to God would have weight with J. Of course Pharaoh's view of the Godhead was distinct from J.'s. J. forgot his ancestor Solomon's inspired counsel (Prov. xvii. 14, xxvi. 17). J.'s reformation had not removed the deep seated evil (as Jeremiah and Zephaniah testify), so that the deceased Manasseh's sin, acting still far and wide though hiddenly now, awaited God's fierce anger on Jerusalem, as he was warned by God through Huldah (2 Kings xxii. 16-20). Hence J. was permitted, not without culpability on his part, to meddle in the ungodly world's wars, and so to fall, and with himself to withdraw the last godly ruler from the people henceforth given over to punishment (2 Kings xxiii. 25-30). Necho came by sea to Palestine, landing at Acco. If he had come by Philistia J. would have met him there, and not allowed him to advance to Megiddo. There, in the great battle field of Palestine, Esdraelon plain, Necho, when they met face to face, slew him. J. was carried wounded from Hadadrimmon to die before he reached Jerusalem. He was buried with every honour, and Jeremiah composed a dirge, annually chanted at Hadadrimmon (not the "Lamentations" over Jerusalem after its fall). Comp. Jer. xxii. 10, "weep not for the dead, neither bemoan him" (viz. J. slain at Megiddo = Magdolum in Herodotus); he is at peace. The church, whilst potent in the world for God, must not descend to the world's level and use the world's weapons for even a good end. Her controversy must first be with herself so long as corruption is in her, and then she must yield herself to God to be wielded by Him in the world for His glory. Antichrist superseding spiritual Babylon appropriately falls at Armageddon, i.e. the hill of Megiddo, the scene of golly J.'s fall through descending to the world's carnal strifes as Babylon's ally (Rev. xvi. 14-18); the Jews' future mourning for Him whom they pierced, before God's interposition against all nations confederate against Jerusalem, answers to their mourning for J. at Megiddo (Zech. xii. 10, 11).

J.'s greatness harmonizes with the parallel decline and fall of Assyria. J. exercised a sovereignty over Samaria and Galilee (2 Chron. xxxiv. 6), besides Judah. In 633 B.C. the Medes attacked Nineveh. Then the Scythians (from whom Bethshan got its Gr. name Scythopolis) desolated western Asia. Then Egypt cast off the Assyrian yoke, and Psammetik I. attacked southern Syria. Finally, in 626 or 624 B.C., the Medes, Babylonians, and Sasanians destroyed Nineveh and divided the empire. This gave J. the opportunity to free Judah from the Assyrian yoke which his grandfather had borne, and to enlarge his kingdom. [See for further illustrations of the Scripture harmony with secular history, Necho.]

2. J., son of Zephaniah = ben (grace) (Zech. vi. 9, 15). At his house in Jerusalem the three from Babylon were guests, from whom Zechariah by God's command took silver and gold to make crowns for the high-priest Joshua's head.

Josiah. 1 Chron. iv. 35.

Josiphiah. Ezra viii. 10.

Jotbah. The city of Meshullemeth, Manasseh's queen, mother of Amou (2 Kings xxi. 19). Now Et Taiyib, N. of Jerusalem, in Benjamin. Meaning goodness. The good soil explains the name. Distinct from Jotbathah, Jotbath, one stage of Israel in the wilderness, "a land of torrents of waters" (Num. xxxiii. 33, Deut. x. 7). Now wady Tabah, six miles S.W. of the head of the Elanitic gulf of the Red Sea, abounding in water, tamarisks, and palms. Robinson calls it wady el Adhbeh, a sandy plain descending into wady el Jerajeh; next Gudgodah or Horbagdad.

Jotham. 1. Gideon's youngest son; escaped when his 69 brothers were killed at Ophrah by their half brother Abimelech. Upon the latter being made king, J. from mount Gerizim, which rises 800 ft. above the valley of Shechem on the S. side of the city, uttered against him and the Shechemites the parable or FABLE [see] (the oldest extant) of the bramble and the trees. The olive, fig, and vine, the most valuable products of Palestine, represent the nobler persons like Gideon, who bear fruit to God's glory and man's good, and wish no transference to kingly positions (to float about restless and insecure, nual, instead of being rooted in the soil: Jud. ix. 9). The bramble, good for nothing but to burn, represents Abimelech who can do nothing but harm. The bramble's hollow pretentiousness appears in his invitation, "trust in my shadow!" It could only scratch, not shelter from the heat. Easily catching fire, it can set on fire the noblest trees of Lebanon; the worthless can cause fatal hurt to the noblest (Exod. xxii. 5). J. fled to Beer and dwelt there, out of Abimelech's way.

2. King J., son of Uzziah or Azariah and Jerushah. He was regent during Uzziah's leprosy (2 Chron. xxvi. 21); at 25 he succeeded, and reigned 16 years in Jerusalem (758-742 B.C.). Contemporary of Isaiah. He did right before the Lord; but did not remove the high places, for "the people did yet corruptly," sacrificing and burning incense still on them (2 Kings xv., 2 Chron. xxvii.). He built the higher gate of the house of Jehovah, i.e. the N. gate of the inner or upper court (see Ezek. viii. 3, 5, 14, 16; ix. 2; xl. 38-43), and built much at the wall of the Ophel (the S. slope of the temple mount, a wall from which passed to the W. mount, commonly called Zion [see JERUSALEM]), and cities on Judah's mountains, and castles in the forests to protect the herds, as Uzziah had done (2 Chron. xxvi. 10). He imposed on Ammon, after subduing them, a heavy tribute for three years. 3. 1 Chron. ii. 47.

Jozabad. 1. 1 Chron. xii. 20. 2. 2 Chron. xxxi. 13. 3. 1 Chron. xxxv. 9. 4. Ezra viii. 33. 5. Ezra x. 22. 6. Neh. viii. 7, xi. 16.

Jozachar. Son of Shimeath the Ammonitess; one of Joash's murderers (2 Kings xii. 21). Zabal in 3 Chron. xxiv. 26 is a transcriber's error for Zachar contracted for J. As Joash had forsaken Jehovah for foreigners' idols, so his doom was inflicted by two sons of foreign women.

Jozadak. JEHOZAK. Ezra iii. 2, 8, v. 2, x. 18; Neh. xii. 26.

Jubal. Lamech's son by Adah; invented the harp and organ (pipe), i.e. stringed and wind instruments (Gen. iv. 21). Brother of Jubah, the beginner of pastoral life. The connection herein is implied between nomad life and music, which can be practised in the leisure afforded by such a life. Pan and Apollo, to whom the Greeks attributed the invention of the pipe and lyre respectively, were represented as shepherds.

Jubilee. [See YEAR, SABBATICAL.] The 50th, after seven weeks of years, when alienated lands returned to the original owners and Hebrew bondservants were freed (Lev. xxv. 8-16, 23-55, xxvii. 16-25; Num. xxxvi. 4). At the close of the great day of atonement the blast of the jubilee curved trumpets proclaimed throughout the land liberty, after guilt had been removed through the typically atoning blood of victims. It is referred to as antitypically fulfilled in "the acceptable year of the Lord," this limited period of gospel grace in which deliverance from sin and death, and the restoration of man's lost inheritance, are proclaimed through Christ (Isa. lxi. 1, 2; Luke iv. 19). Literally hereafter (Ezek. vii. 12, 13; xlvii. 17) to be kept. Liberty to bondservants was given every seventh or sabbatical year. The princes and people at Jerusalem first observed it, in accordance with Zedekiah's covenant made under fear of the Babylonian besiegers; afterwards on Pharaoh Hophra interrupting the siege they broke their engagement and enslaved their brethren again; God in retribution gave them a fatal liberty, viz. emancipation from His blessed service, to be given up to the sword, pestilence, and famine (Jer. xxxiv. 8, 22, xxxvii. 5-10; comp. Neh. v. 1-13).

The jubilee prevented the accumulation of land in the hands of a few, and raised legally at regular intervals families and individuals out of destitution to competency; thereby guarding against the lawless and dangerous outbreaks of the penurious against large possessors, to which other states are liable. It tended to foster family feeling, and to promote the preservation of genealogies, and to remind all that Jehovah was the supreme Landlord under whom their tenure was held and the Lord of the Israelites, who therefore could not become lasting servants of any one else.

"The times of the restitution of all things" are the coming grand jubilee (Acts iii. 21), "the regeneration" (Matt. xix. 28) ushered in by "the trump of God" (1 Thess. iv. 16, 17). The Spirit is meantime "the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession" (Eph. i. 13, 14; Rom. viii. 19-23).

As in sabbatical years, there was to be no tillage but the natural produce was to be left open to all. If a Hebrew in poverty disposed of his land the price was regulated by the number of years to run till jubilee, the sabbatical seventh years not being counted. The original proprietor or the nearest of kin (goel) could redeem the land at any time. Houses in walled cities were excepted; the owner might buy them back within a year, otherwise they became absolutely the purchaser's own. But houses in villages went with the lands. Levites too could buy back their houses at any time, which always reverted to them at jubilee; their lands were not affected by the law of jubilee. If a man sanctified his land to Jehovah it could be redeemed before the jubilee on paying the worth of the crops and a fifth. If not redeemed before jubilee it remained sanctified for ever. Even a bondman who bound himself to willing service by boring his ears was freed at jubilee (Exod. xxi. 6). No legislator would have enacted such an institution, and no people would have long submitted to it, unless both had believed that a Divine authority had dictated it and a special providence would facilitate its execution. Nothing could have produced this conviction but the experience of miraculous interposition such as the pentateuch describes. The very existence of this law is a standing monument that when it was given the Mosaic miracles were fully believed; moreover this law, in the pentateuch which the Jews always have received as written by Moses, is coeval with the witnesses of the miracles: therefore the reality of the Mosaic miracles is undeniable (Graves, Pentateuch, vi.).

The root of "jubilee" is jabal, "to flow," a rich stream of sound (Exod. xix. 13, where jubilee is transl. "trumpet," marg. "cornet"; comp. Josh. vi. 5, comp. Ps. lxxxix. 15). It was in the 50th year, so that the 49th also being a sabbath year, two sabbatical years came together, just as pentecost came the 50th at the end of the seven weeks (49 days) closing with the sabbath. It stood between the two series of sabbatical years in the century. See Isa. xxxvii. 30, where the reference to jubilee is not at all certain; also chap. v. 7-10, those who by covetousness prevented the operation of the law of jubilee. Remission of debts was on each sabbatical seventh year; the bondage for debt was all that jubilee delivered from.

The jubilee is the crowning of the sabbatical system. The weekly and the monthly sabbaths secured rest for each spiritually; the sabbatical year secured rest for the land. The jubilee secured rest and restoration for the body politic, to recover that general equality which Joshua's original settlement contemplated; hence no religious observances were prescribed, simply the trumpets sounded the glad note of restoration. The leisure of the jubilee year was perhaps devoted to school and instruction of the people, the reading of the law and such services (Ewald).

Juda. 1. Luke iii. 30. 2. Son of Joanna or Hananiah (Luke iii. 26) = Abiud (Ab being prefixed), Matt. i. 13. Their times agree, omitting Rhesa of Luke, and allowing for Matthew's omission of generations, = Hodaiah (1 Chron. iii. 21). 3. One of Christ's "brethren" or cousins; brother of James; of the twelve; author of the EPISTLE [see JUDE] (Mark vi. 3, Matt. xiii. 55, Luke vi. 16, Acts i. 13).

Judah. 1. The patriarch JUDAH; Jacob's fourth son, by Leah. J. = praise, Leah having praised Jehovah for giving him; Jacob similarly refers to the meaning of J., "thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise" (Gen. xxix. 35, xlix. 8). He saved Joseph from death by the cruel and covetous plan of selling him to the Midianites. Conscience and natural feeling wrought on J., "what profit is it (like the antitype Judas, and in the keen bargaining spirit of the Jews ages afterwards: John xii. 4, 5; Matt. xxvi. 15), if we slay our brother and conceal his blood? Come and let us sell him . . . and let not our hand be upon him, for he is our brother and our flesh." Conscience was stupefied, and cupidity gratified, by this scheme. J. was the brethren's spokesman in prevailing on Jacob to let Benjamin go to Egypt, and he undertook to be surety for him (Gen. xliii. 3-10); and when Joseph's cup was found with Benjamin, professed their guilt and liability to bondservice, though actually innocent of stealing it, in order in oriental fashion to move pity. Then J. touchingly appealed to the supposed Egyptian prince to detain him as a bondservant instead of his youngest brother, by describing his father's love for Benjamin after having lost Joseph, and the danger of bringing down his grey hairs with sorrow to the grave, so that Joseph could refrain no longer but made himself known (xliii.). J. too is the one who prepares the way before his father in going to meet Joseph and settle in Goshen (xlii. 28). Throughout J. "prevailed above his brethren, and of him came the chief prince" (1 Chron. v. 2). Though "the birthright was Joseph's" he was not registered as firstborn, because of J.'s prevalence on the threefold ground, Jacob's blessing, J.'s historic preeminence, and David the prince (1 Chron. xxviii. 4) being chosen from J. The tribe outnumbered all the others under Moses: 74,600 at Sinai (Num. i. 26, 27); 76,500 before entering Canaan (xxvi. 22); outnumbering Dan at Sinai by 11,900. Again after the division of the land J. was called by God to be the vanguard of the army warring with the Canaanites

JUBILEE TRUMPETS.

(Jud. i. 1, 2). J. in his conduct before Joseph in Egypt manifested true nobility; if he had sold his brother yet he was willing to be sold himself for the youngest brother. So, when Reuben forfeited his birth-right by incest, Simeon and Levi by manslaughter, J. the next oldest received from Jacob the best blessing of the elder sons (Gen. xlix. 8-12). J.'s "hand was in the neck of his enemies" in his victories as leading tribe; "his father's children bowed down before him" when J. became the royal tribe, of whom sprang David and David's almighty Son. The "lion," the king of beasts, is Jacob's image for J.; afterwards it was his standard, with the motto "Rise up, Lord, let Thine enemies be scattered" (Targ. in Pseudo-Jon.). J. should hold the tribal "sceptre," and have "lawgivers" (1's. lx. 7) among his posterity ("from between his feet") until Shiloh ("the Prince of peace") should come. So accordingly Augustus' decree (Luke ii. 1, etc.) and the Roman procuratorship, superseding native rule, marked the appearance of Christ of the tribe of J. In Him all J.'s regal and legislative powers merged and found their consummation. J. as to temporal prosperity should "bind his foal unto the vine and his ass's colt unto the choice vine, washing his garments in wine and his clothes in the blood of the grape, his eyes being red with wine and his teeth white with milk." Spiritually the targums of Jerusalem and Pseudo Jonathan refer this also to Messiah. Chrysostom interprets the "vine" the Jewish people, the wild ass the Gentiles brought into the church's vineyard. Christ is the true vine (John xv. 1); He trod the winepress alone, em-purpling His garments with His blood (Isa. lxxiii. 1, etc.). The wine is the inspiring Spirit in believers as milk is the nourishing spiritual food (S. of Sol. v. 1; Isa. lv. 1; Eph. v. 18; 1 Pet. ii. 2). In Moses' dying blessing (Deut. xxxiii. 7) he prays: "Hear Lord the voice of J. (in prayer) and bring him (marching at the head of the tribes back again victorious) unto his people."

J. stopped with his friend Hirah, an Adullamite, and there married a Canaanitess, Shuah's daughter (Bath Shuah), by whom he had sons, Er, Onan, and Shelah. Er died childless; and oriental or Chaldean custom (afterwards permitted and regulated under the Mosaic code: Matt. xxii. 24, Dent. xxv. 5) required Onan to marry his widow Tamar. Onan having been slain by Jehovah for unnatural sin, Shelah ought to have been given her; but J., from superstitious fear lest he too should die, delayed. Then she waylaid J. as a veiled harlot (one apparently consecrated by vow to impurity in the worship of Venus Astarte, the Babylonian Mylitta) at the gate of Enaim (marg.) and received his signet, bracelets, and staff in pledge for the kid he promised her. She resumed her widow's garments. When it was known that she was with child J., by his patriarchal authority, would have burned her as having disgraced his family; but she proved by the signet and bracelet that J. himself was the father of her children, and that she had a claim on him as nearest of kin to marry her when he withheld Shelah (Ruth iii., iv.; Gen. xxxviii. 25, 26). Pharez and Zarah were the offspring, Pharez the ancestor of David and of Messiah Himself (Gen. xlii. 12). God can bring purity out of impurity. The three sons born in Canaan accompanied J. to Egypt on his removal thither (Exod. i. 2). Nahshon, Amminadab's son, was chief at the first census (Num. i. 7, ii. 3, vii. 12, x. 14). David's ancestor (Ruth iv. 20), Caleb represented J. among the spies, and in the allotment of the land (Num. xiii. 6, xxxiv. 19). J. led the van in the wilderness march on the E. of the tabernacle, with Issachar and Zebulun his kinsmen (ii. 3-9, x. 14).

The boundaries of J. are given Josh. xv. 20-63. The territory was thickly studded with towns and villages. Benjamin was on the N. The northern bound ran from the embouchure of Jordan, by the valley of Hinnom under Jerusalem, to Jabbok on the western sea coast; the Dead Sea on E., and the Mediterranean on W. The southern bound ran from the extreme southern end of the Dead Sea to the Mediterranean at wady el Arish. The wilderness of Zin was its extreme southern limit. Its length averaged 45 miles, its width 50.

Four main regions made up the territory. (1) "The south" (Negeb); the southernmost district of Canaan, the pasture lands between the hills and the desert; a portion of this was ceded to Simeon (Josh. xv. 20-32, xix. 1-9). (2) The shephelah, or rolling lower hills, the hilly lowland between the central mountains and the Mediterranean plain (xv. 33). The shephelah was bounded by the Negeb on the S.; on the N. it reached to Lydda, where the plain of Sharon begins, famous for its flowers; the hilly part (ishkedoth) of the shephelah is on the E., the link between mountain and plain, and is more thick with villages than the plain, cornfields alternate with meadows, gardens, and olive groves. (3) The mountain or "hill country of J.," the largest of the four (Josh. xv. 48-60). Beginning at its highest level below Hebron, 3000 ft. above the sea level, it reaches E. to the Dead Sea and W. to the shephelah; an elevated plateau of a tolerably general level; the southern part of the mountain backbone stretching N. till interrupted by Esdraelon plain, and having on it Hebron, Jerusalem, and Shechem; this "mountain of J." abounds in ruins of former towns; springs are numerous, as at Urtas near Solomon's pools, but no streams. It rises from the Negeb precipitously, between the hilly region on the western part of the shephelah and "the desert of J." extending to the Dead Sea (ver. 61): a rugged limestone range, with sides covered with grass, shrubs, and trees; the valleys intersecting it yield plentifully corn, wheat, and millet; orchards, olive yards, and vineyards rise in terraces up the sides. (4) "The desert of J." (midbar), the sunken district near the Dead Sea; from the northern border of J. (Josh. xv. 6, 7) to wady Fikreh on the S. and to Maon, Tekoa, and Bethlehem toward the W.; a soil of chalk, marl, flint, and lime, bare of vegetation on the side toward the Dead Sea; but where springs are, luxuriant, and even in the desolate parts bearing traces of ancient works of man. The present barrenness, so far from disproving, confirms Scripture, which, though describing its former fertility, foretells its desolation for its apostasy. Its towns were six (xv. 61). [See ENGEDI.] The city of Salt was at the southern end of the Dead Sea in the Salt Valley. The priests' nine cities were all in J.; the Levites had no cities in J. (xxi. 9-19).

The allotment to J. was first (Josh. xv. 1, xix. 51). Joshua prepared the way by destroying the chief towns and slaying their kings, penetrating even to Hebron and Debir in the hill country. J. and Simeon followed up the conquest (Jud. i. 9, 19, 20), occupying the mountain and the corn-growing Philistine tract, with Gaza, Askelon, and Ekron, but unable to drive out the Canaanites from the valley (Enech) where their chariots gave the latter the advantage (ver. 19), but in ver. 9 "valley" is shephelah, rather the low hilly region between the mountain and the plain. The Philistine tract was wrested from J.'s hands (1 Sam. iv., v., vii. 14), then J. recovered it. J. took little part in the conflicts under the judges, except (Jud. xx.) the attack on Gibeah. The Philistine incursions were through Dan's and Benjamin's territory, not J.'s. The tribe acted throughout independently of the rest (2 Sam. ii. 4, 11; xix. 40-43).

2. Ezra iii. 9, = Hodaviah (ii. 40), Hodeviah (Neh. vii. 43). 3. Ezra x. 23; Neh. xii. 8, 36. 4. Neh. xi. 9, "second over the city"; comp. 1 Chron. ix. 7.

Judah, Kingdom of. The tribe Judah comprised the whole territory S. of a line drawn from Joppa to N. of the Dead Sea; the largest extent among the tribes, due to their valour in driving out the aborigines from their mountain strongholds. Their hilly region braced their energies for conflict with their neighbouring adversaries; so they retained their vigour, at the same time that their large pastures and wide territory, and commerce with Egypt and by the Red Sea and Joppa with other lands, gave them abundant wealth. Their independence of the northern tribes, and the jealousy of Ephraim, early prepared the way for the severance of the northern and southern kingdoms under Rehoboam. [See ISRAEL.] J. included southern Benjamin and Jerusalem the joint city of both. Simeon, and many cities of Dan. In Abijah's and Asa's reign J. gained parts of Ephraim (2 Chron. xiii. 19, xv. 8, xvii. 2); and after Israel's deportation to Assyria the king of J. exercised a quasi authority in the N. (2 Chron. xxx. 1-18, Hezekiah; xxiv. 6-9, Josiah.) Edom was for sometime subject. Israel interposed between J. and Syria and Assyria; and Egypt in its military marches towards Assyria took the coast line of Philistia, not through J. The fighting men of J. under David were 500,000 (2 Sam. xxiv. 9); under Rehoboam only 180,000 (1 Kings xii. 21); under Abijah 400,000 (2 Chron. xiii. 3); under Asa 580,000 (xiv. 8); under Jehoshaphat 1,160,000 (xvii. 14-19); under Uzziah 307,500 (2 Chron. xxvi. 13). J.'s armies progressively augmented, Israel's decreased; under Ahab against Syria Israel's forces were "like two little flocks of kids"; under Jehoahaz "50 horsemen" (1 Kings xx. 27, 2 Kings xiii. 7). But the grand conservative element of J. was its divinely appointed temple, priesthood, written law, and recognition of the one true God Jehovah as its true theocratic king. Hence many left northern Israel for J. where the law was observed. This adherence to the law (comp. Acts xxiii. 5) produced a succession of kings containing many wise and good monarchs, and a people in the main reverencing the word of God as their rule, at least in theory. Hence J. survived her more populous northern sister by 135 years, and lasted 975-586 B.C. The diminution of numbers intensified the theocratic element by eliminating all that was heathenish and attracting all the golly in northern Israel. The apparent loss proved a real gain, and would have proved permanently so but for J.'s unfaithfulness. God's great purpose did not fail in spite of Israel's and J.'s unfaithfulness, viz. to preserve in the world a standing monument of the unity, supremacy, and providence of Jehovah; this effect was perpetually and uniformly produced in all periods and by all events of the Jewish history, and to prepare for and introduce the gospel of Christ (Graves, Pentateuch, ii. 3, § 2).

Rehoboam, Abijah, and Asa [see] for 60 years warred with Israel in the hope of recovering the northern kingdom. BAASHA [see] on the other hand fortified Ramah to check the migration of religious Israelites to J. Asa hired Benhadad I., of Damascus, to counteract him, for which Hanani reproved him. Abijah, or Abijam, though his speech breathes the theocratic spirit (2 Chron. xiii. 4), in conduct showed a "heart not perfect with the Lord God," for "he walked in all the sins of his father" (1 Kings xv. 3).

A new policy began with JEHOSEPHAT [see], and lasted for 80 years down to Amaziah, that of alliance with Israel against Syria. It was as opposed to J.'s true interests as open war had been. In spite of his pious efforts for the instruction of his people through the princes, Levites, and priests, in God's law (2 Chron. xvii.), and for the administration of justice in the fear of Jehovah (xix.), his affinity with Ahab and Ahaziah nearly cost him his life at Ramoth Gilead (xviii.), and again in the wilderness of Edom (2 Kings iii. 8-11), and caused the loss of his ships in Ezion Geber (2 Chron. xx. 36, 37). He was reproved by the Lord's prophet Jehu, after his escape at Ramoth Gilead (xix. 2, 3); then when he renewed the alliance with Ahab's son Ahaziah, by Eliezer; at last he saw the fatal effects of alliance with the ungodly (1 Cor. xv. 33), and would not let Ahaziah's servants go in his ships (1 Kings xxii. 48). The alliance bore deadly fruit under his murderous son JEHORAM [see], his grandson AHAZIAH, and the bloody queen mother ATHALIAH [see], Ahab's daughter and Jehoram's wife (2 Chron. xxi. xxii.). JEHOIADA deposed her, and restored JOASH [see] to the throne, who governed well till Jehoia's death; then gave ear to the princes, and restored idolatry, slew Zechariah his faithful reprove, and failing to withstand a Syrian invasion was killed by his own servants.

Amaziah, elated with the conquest of Edom and having lost God's favour through apostasy to Edom's idols, challenged Joash of Israel, the conqueror of Syria (xxv., 2 Kings xiii. 14-25). Uzziah and Jotham reigned prosperously. But AHAZ [see], when smitten by the Syrian and Israelite confederacy of Rezin and Pekah (2 Chron. xxviii., 2 Kings xvi., Isa. vii. -ix.), which was the punishment from Jehovah of his idolatry, adopted the fatal policy of becoming the vassal of Assyria, which "distressed but strengthened him not." For a century and a half this vassalage lasted, with occasional periods of independence, as under the golly HEZEKIAH and JOSEPH [see]. The repulse of Sennacherib and the religious revival under these two kings averted the evil day. But, after Hezekiah, Manasseh's enormous wickedness so provoked Jehovah that the piety of his grandson Josiah, Amon's son, could procure only a respite. After the reigns of the worthless Jehoahaz, set aside by Pharaoh Necho who promoted Jehoikim, and Jehoia-chin or Coniah, Zedekiah (promoted by Nebuchadnezzar) through treachery in violation of his oath brought destruction on himself and Jerusalem (588 B.C. or 587, Clinton; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 13; Ezek. xvii. 15-18; Jer. lii. 3). As the influence of the priesthood was at its height under David and Solomon, so the power of the prophets rose between this time and the building of the second temple. In northern Israel they were the only witnesses for God in the face of the state idolatry; in J. they were spiritual teachers bringing out the gospel hidden in the law, and pointing on to the Messianic kingdom. Isaiah, Jeremiah, etc., prepared J. for the 70 years' captivity; Ezekiel and Daniel witnessed for God to them, and to the heathen world power in it. That severe discipline purged out their craving for idols. Ezra and Nehemiah at the return were God's instruments in producing in them a zeal for the law which distinguished them subsequently, and in Christ's time degenerated into formalism and self righteousness.

Restoration of the Jews and Israel.

Moses foretells it (Deut. xxx. 1-6). The original grant of the land to Abraham and the blessing of ALL nations in his seed await their exhaustive fulfilment, only partially realized under Solomon (Gen. xv. 18, xxii. 18). The covenant has six historical stages: (1) the family; (2) expanded into a nation; (3) royalty; (4) the exile and return; (5) Messiah's advent and the church in troublous times; (6) His second advent and the church's and Israel's glory. The "second time" exodus is also foretold by Isa. xi. 10-16; ii.; xxvii. 12; xxxv. 10; liv. 7-11. Also Jerusalem shall be the religious centre of the nations, amidst universal peace, the Lord's manifested presence there (lx.-lxiii., lxx., lxxi.) eclipsing the former ark of the covenant (Jer. iii. 16-18, xxiii. 6-8; Ezek. xxxvii.-xlvi.). Hosea (iii. 4, 5) vividly depicts Israel's state for ages, clinging to the law yet without "altar, priest, or sacrifice," which the law ordains, yet not relapsing into idolatry to which they were so prone in his day, "without teraphim" and "without a king"; then finally "seeking the Lord and David their king." So emphatically "all Israel shall be saved," when "the fullness of the Gentiles shall have come in," i.e. when the elect remnant of Jews and Gentiles now being converted shall have been completed (Rom. xi. 25, 26); so our Lord (Luke xxi. 24; Rev. vi. 10, xi. 2-15). The object of God's election of the Jews was not merely for themselves, as if their perversity frustrated God's purpose; but to be, even in their temporary rejection, a standing monument to the world of the unity, supremacy, and providence of Jehovah ("ye are My witnesses," saith Jehovah: Isa. xlv. 8, xliii. 10, 12), and ultimately to be blessed temporally and spiritually themselves, and to be a blessing to all nations.

Judæa, or Jewry. First so called as a "province" of Persia (Dan. v. 13, Ezra v. 8, Neh. xi. 3, Esth. viii. 9). On the return from Babylon the Jews, besides Judah, included large portions of Benjamin, Levi, Ephraim, and Manasseh (Ezra i. 5, x. 5-9; Neh. xi. 4-36; 1 Chron. ix. 3; "Israel," Ezra ii. 70, 59, iii. 1, x. 5; Neh. vii. 73), and many whose pedigree could not be found. The number twelve was retained in the sin offerings, as though all the tribes were represented (Ezra vi. 17, viii. 35). The amalgamation began when Rehoboam's idolatry drove the golly of northern Israel to Judah, again it took place under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxx., xxxi.). Anna was of Asher (Luke ii. 36); Paul of Benjamin (Rom. xi. 1); Barnabas of Levi (Acts iv. 36). The "twelve tribes" appear Acts xxvi. 7, Jas. i. 1.

J. is strictly the region W. of Jordan, S. of Samaria (though "beyond Jordan" is vaguely included in it Mark x. 1, and Galilee Luke xxiii. 5). The village Anuath marked its northern boundary (Josephus, B. J., ii. 3, § 5), Jordan its southern boundary; comprising the territory of Judah, Dan, Simeon, and Benjamin, 100 miles long, 60 broad. Upon the deposition of the ethnarch Archelaus, A.D. 6, J. was ruled by a procurator subject to the governor of Syria; he resided at Cæsarea on the coast. J. was little frequented by our Lord, except Jerusalem, Beth-lehem, and Bethany (comp. John vii. 1 for the reason in part). Jeremiah's prophecy (xxxiv. 22) is fulfilled; "the cities of J." are "a desolation without inhabitant," the vine-clad terraces and cornfields have only left their traces behind, ruins alone abound, and the scenery has but little beauty.

Judas. At whose house, in the street called Straight at Damascus (now the "street of bazaars," reaching long, straight, and wide from the S. gate into the heart of the city), Saul of Tarsus lodged after his conversion (Acts ix. 11). The house is still professedly shown a few steps out of the "street of bazaars," in an open space, "the sheikh's place." It has a stone floored square room, partly walled off for a tomb shown as "the tomb of Ananias."

Judas Barsabas. A leading man among the brethren at Jerusalem (Acts xv. 22). A "prophet" (ver. 32). Along with Silas accompanied Paul and Barnabas to deliver the epistle concerning the obligations of Gentiles, from the council at Jerusalem to the church at Antioch, and to confirm the same by word of mouth (27). J. accordingly with Silas under the Spirit "exhorted the brethren with many words, and confirmed them" (32). After tarrying there a space "they were let go in peace from the brethren unto the apostles" (Sin., Vat., Alex. MSS. omit ver. 34). Probably J. was brother of Joseph Barsabas (Acts i. 23).

Judas of Galilee. Led the rebellion in the days of the taxing under Pub. Sulp. Quirinus, A.D. 6, as Gamaliel notices (Acts v. 37). A Galilonite Pharisee of Gamala; called "the Galilean," as his revolt began in Galilee. His watchword was, "we have no Lord or master but God"; so he stigmatized paying tribute to Cæsar as treason to the Mosaic law. This illustrates how subtle was the trap laid for Jesus, that He might compromise Himself either with the people, who largely sympathized with this view, or with the Roman governor. Jesus too might be supposed to concur in J.'s watchword (Matt. xxii. 15-22, xxiii. 8-10). A lawless multitude joined J., but was "dispersed" by Roman arms, but not finally destroyed till the destruction of Jerusalem. Stubborn love of freedom was their characteristic, so that they bore torments and death rather than call any man master. These "Gaulonites" (Josephus, Ant. xviii. 1, § 1, 6; B. J. ii. 8, § 1) were precursors of the Zealots and Sicarii, through whose sanguinary fanaticism mainly Jerusalem fell. James and John sons of J. led a revolt against the procurator Tib. Alexander, A.D. 47, and were crucified. In A.D. 66 Menahem, youngest son of J., at the head of a fanatical mob pillaged Masada and took Jerusalem, where he assumed kingly state, but was taken by the highpriest Eleazar's partisans, tortured, and killed.

Judas Iscariot. Son of Simon (John vi. 71, xiii. 2, 26). Ish Kerieth, "the man of Kerieth," in Judah (Job. xv. 25), like Ish Tob, "the man of Tob." This distinguishes him from the other Judas, also from the other eleven apostles who were of Galilee. He thus was connected with Judah his prototype who sold Joseph, and the Jews who delivered Jesus up to the Roman Gentiles. He obeyed the call of Jesus like the rest, probably influenced by John the Baptist's testimony and his own Messianic hopes. Sagacity in business and activity were the natural gifts which suggested the choice of him afterwards as bearer of the common purse (John xii. 6). He is placed last among the twelve because of his subsequent treachery; even previously he was in the group of four lowest in respect to zeal, faith, and love. The earliest recorded hint given by Christ of his badness is in John vi. 64, 70, a year before the crucifixion: "some of you . . . believe not; for Jesus knew from the beginning who . . . believed not, and who should betray Him"; "have I not chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil" (not merely "demon," the Gr. always for the evil spirit possessing a body, but "devil," used only of Satan himself to whom J. was now yielding himself). Yet even then repentance was not too late for J. Peter the foremost of the twelve had so shrunk from the cross as to be called "Satan," yet Peter recovered more than once afterwards (Matt. xvi. 23). John, who had an instinctive repugnance to J., whose base selfish character was so opposite to John's own, delineates the successive stages in his fall. Jesus' many warnings against mammon love were calls to J. whilst yet he had not made his fatal and final choice (Matt. vi. 19-34, xiii. 22, 25; Luke xvi. 11; Mark x. 25, 26). Before that crisis J. had salvation and even a high place of honour in Christ's future kingdom within his reach. Temptation fell in his way when larger contributions were made (Luke viii. 3), part of which were spent for the necessities of Jesus and the disciples travelling about with Him, and the rest given to the poor. Hence J., being almoner, grudged the 300 pence worth of ointment lavished by Mary on Jesus, as money which ought to have come in to him, and led some of the other disciples to join in the cry. He had no care for the poor, but for self. Censoriousness and covetousness even to theft prompted his objection (John xii. 5, 6). Mary spent her all to do honour to Jesus' burial; J., grasping at all, betrayed Him to death and burial. Her love kindled no sympathetic spark in him towards the common Lord. Hope of larger gain alone kept him from apostasy a year before (John vi. 64). Now the lost chance of the 300 pence (denarii), vindictiveness at Jesus' reproof (xii. 7, 8), secret consciousness that Jesus saw through his baseness, above all the Lord's mention of His "burying" which dispelled his ambitious hopes of sharing a Messianic kingdom of power and wealth, drove him to his last desperate shift to clutch at 30 pieces of silver, the paltry price of a slave (Exod. xxi. 32; Zeck. xi. 12, 13; Phil. ii. 7), and betray his Lord. The title "the son of perdition," given by Jesus in His highpriestly prayer (John xvii. 12) to J. and to none else but "the man of sin" (2 Thess. ii. 3), as doomed and essentially belonging to perdition, also Christ's declaration, "woe unto that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! it had been good for that man if he had not been born" (Matt. xxvi. 24), oppose the notion that J. betrayed Christ mainly in order to force Him to declare His true nature and kingdom, that J. might occupy the foremost place in it. The narrative gives little ground for this clever theory; rather, covetousness wrought in him unchecked spite and malignity, possibly not unminged with carnal expectations from Messiah's kingdom, until, in the face of light, he yielded himself up to be Satan's tool, so that he received his sentence before the last day.

Prophecy foreshadowed his doom (Ps. cix. 4-8). "Satan" was the "wicked" one "set over" J., first causing him to murder Christ, then himself. In Acts i. 16-20, 25, Peter says, "this Scripture must needs have been fulfilled which the Holy Ghost by the mouth of David spake before concerning J. . . he obtained part of this ministry . . . from which by transgression he fell, that he might go to his own place" (comp. Isa. xxx. 33). Ahithophel, his type, combined shrewd sagacity with intimate knowledge of David, which he turned against David, giving the hellish counsel to incest and parricide (2 Sam. xv. 12, xvi. 23, xvii. 1-3, 23; comp. Ps. xli. 9, lv. 13). So J. in relation to Christ, knowing His favourite haunt for prayer, Gethsemane. Suicide was the end of J. as of the type. Even J. shared in Christ's washing of the disciples' feet, and Jesus said "ye are clean, but not all" (John xiii. 10). Troubled in spirit at J.'s presence, He said at the last supper, "verily, verily . . . one of you shall betray Me" (ver. 26); "exceeding sorrowful they began every one to say, Lord, is it I?" J. asked the same lest his silence should betray guilt, and received the whispered reply in the affirmative (Matt. xxvi. 22, 25). Meantime John next Jesus on one side, as J. was on the other, leaned back so as to be on Jesus' bosom, and at Peter's suggestion asked secretly "who is it?" (John xiii. 23, etc.) He answered "he it is to whom I shall give a sop when I have dipped it." Then He gave the sop to J., an act of love (dipping a morsel of unleavened bread in the broth of bitter herbs and handing it to a friend), but it only stirred up his hatred (Ps. cix. 4, 5). So after the sop Satan entered J. Then said Jesus, "that thou doest do quickly." A paroxysm of mad devilishness hurried him on, as the swine of Gadara rushing into the deep. Jesus' awful words were enough to warn him back: but sin by wilful resistance of light had now become a fixed law of his being. God gives him up to his own sin, and so to accomplish God's purpose; even as God did to Balaam (Num. xvii. 22), and Jesus to the Pharisees (Matt. xxiii. 32). (Gr. "what thou art doing (with full determination already being carried into action) do more quickly." The disciples thought, judging by Jesus' habit, though the fact is not elsewhere recorded except the allusion in John xii. 6, that His direction to J. was to give something to the poor.)

[See JESUS CHRIST, in proof that J. too partook of the Lord's supper, a proof that John vi. 51, 56, cannot be understood of eating that supper, but of feeding on Him by living faith.]

J., having given a token beforehand, "whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is He, take Him and lead Him away safely" (Mark xiv. 44, 45; Matt. xxvi. 48), led the Roman hand and priestly officers to apprehend Jesus in Gethsemane, and gave his studied kiss, saying "Hail, Master!" or as Mark graphically represents his overdone show of deference, "Master, Master!" Jesus, as J. approached, said, "Friend, wherefore art thou come?" and as J. drew nigh to kiss Him, "J., betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" (Luke xxii. 47, 48). When the Lord was condemned by the highpriest and sanhedrim, J. probably being present, the reaction came; not that the condemnation took him by surprise, his confession shows he contemplated the result. His former Lord's love and righteousness now remembered brought into his soul remorse (metanoeia) not repentance (metanoia): Matt. xxvii. 3, 4. "I sinned in that I betrayed the innocent blood," he cried to the highpriests, his tempters. "What is that to us? See thou to that," they sneeringly reply. Having served their end he is now cast aside as vile even in their eyes. Having forced his way into the sanctuary of the priests (naos) he flung down the money, his bait to sin, now only hateful and tormenting to him (not as Alford, "speaking without and throwing the money into the naos"; for en ta naos, not eis ton naon, implies he was inside when he flung down the money), and departed and went and hanged (or strangled) himself.

Acts i. 18 describes the sequel. He burst asunder when the suicide was half accomplished, and his bowels gushed out (even as he had laid aside bowels of compassion, Ps. cix. 16), his body lying ignominiously on the face, not on the back as the dead generally lie. He had designed, Gehazi like (2 Kings v. 26), to provide a possession for himself and his, despairing of gain by Messiah, since he saw at last that

His kingdom was not then a temporal one (Ps. cix. 9); but the only possession he purchased was a bloody burial place, Aeldama, which the priests bought with the price of blood, being characteristically too punctilious to put it into the treasury (Matt. xxiii. 24). The potter's field was "to bury strangers in," fulfilling the foretold doom of J. (Ps. cix. 11). The potter's clay, the emblem of God's sovereignty so as to give the reprobate to perdition, is first introduced by Jeremiah (xix. 11), and so "Jeremi" is quoted as the original of Zech. xi. 12, 13. [See ACELDAMA on the double reason for the name.]

Jude. JUDE LEHBÆUS, THADDEUS. Jude calls himself "servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of JAMES" [see], viz. the apostle James "the Lord's brother" (a title which James omits in humility, as he was strictly only cousin of Christ), bishop of Jerusalem (comp. Gal. i. 19). Similarly Jude was both an apostle and brother of our Lord. All Christ's brethren were not apostles, only James and Jude, sons of Alphaeus or Clopas and Mary. James being better known, Jude designates himself "brother of James." Like Paul in epistles to Philippians, Thessalonians, and Philemon, Jude omits his apostleship. A forger would have been sure to head the epistle with the designation "apostle." Jude is distinguished from Judas Iscariot by the names Lebbaeus and Thaddæus, i.e. courageous, from Heb. leeb "heart," thad "breast," or kodah "praise" (Adai is the name in Syriac); Matt. x. 3, Mark iii. 18. Luke and John writing later, when no confusion with Judas Iscariot was likely, call him "Judas." The only notice of him is in John xiv. 22; where, not understanding Jesus' promise (ver. 21), Jude asked "Lord, how is it that Thou wilt manifest Thyself unto us and not unto the world?" His position in the last group of four among the twelve implies, like his question, low views at that time of the spirituality of Messiah's kingdom.

Eusebius tells that Abgarus, king of Edessa, being sick sent begging Jesus to come and heal him; the Lord replied, praising his faith because, though he had not seen, he believed, and promising when He should ascend to send one of His disciples to heal and give him life. Thomas then was inspired to send Thaddæus. Such a message may have been sent verbally, and its substance afterwards written (comp. Matt. xv. 22, 2 Kings v.). Hegesippus (Euseb. E. H. iii. 20) states that when the emperor Domitian inquired after David's posterity, grandsons of Jude "the Lord's brother" were brought before him; they stated their possessions were 39 acres, and that they paid him taxes thereout and lived by labour, pointing as a proof to their hard hands. They added, Christ's kingdom is not of this world, but heavenly, and will be manifested when He shall come again in glory.

Jude, Epistle of. Authenticity. Eusebius (H. E. iii. 25) reckons it among the disputed (antilegomena) scriptures, but recognised by the majority. The doubts about it arose probably from the reference to the mysterious conflict of Michael the archangel with Satan concerning Moses' body, nowhere else mentioned in Scripture, but found in the apocryphal Book of Enoch. So Jerome, Catalog. Scriptor. Eccl. iv. Its being addressed generally, and to no particular church, also retarded its recognition as canonical; also its identity in the main with 2 Pet. ii. If Jude indeed quotes the passage from the Book of Enoch he thereby stamps with inspired approval that passage, not the whole book, just as Paul sanctions particular sentiments from Aratus, Epimenides, and Menander (Acts xvii. 28; Tit. i. 12; 1 Cor. xv. 33). But as Jude differs a little from the Book of Enoch [see], written probably by a Jew thoroughly imbued with Daniel's sacred writings, it is likely he rather sanctions the current tradition of the Jews as to Enoch's prophecies, just as Paul names the Egyptian magicians "Jannes and Jambres," though the O. T. does not. Jude, under the Spirit, took the one gem out of the mass of earthy matter surrounding it, and set it in the gold of inspiration. So Jude also stamps as true the tradition as to the archangel Michael's dispute with Satan concerning Moses' body (Jude 9; comp. Deut. xxxiv. 6).

As John (second and third Epistles) calls himself "the elder," so James and Jude call themselves "servants of Jesus Christ." Clemens Alex. (Admbr. 1007) says, "Jude through reverential awe did not call himself brother, but servant, of Jesus Christ, and brother of James." He cites Jude as Scripture (ver. 8, 17; Strom. iii. 2, § 11; and ver. 5 in Pædagog. iii. 8, § 44). Tertullian (de Cultu Fem. iii.) cites the epistle as that of the apostle Jude. The Muratori Fragm. A.D. 170, asserts its canonicity (Routh Reliq. Sacr. i. 306). Origen (comm. on Matt. xiii. 55) says "Jude the Lord's brother wrote an epistle of few lines, but full of the strong words of heavenly grace." Also he quotes ver. 6 (comm. on Matt. xxii. 23) and ver. 1 (comm. on Matt. xviii. 10). Jerome (Catalog. Scriptor. Eccl.) reckons it among the Scriptures. Oldest MSS. of the Peshito Syriac omit it, but Ephraem Syrus recognises it. It was circulated in the E. and W. in the second century.

To whom addressed. The references to O. T. history (ver. 5, 7) and to Jewish tradition (ver. 14, etc.) render it probable Jude addressed Jewish Christians primarily, then all Christians (ver. 1). The kindred epistle, 2 Peter, is similarly addressed. The persons stigmatized were heretics in doctrine, "denying the only Lord God and our Saviour Jesus Christ," and libertines in practice. Hence Jude urges his readers "earnestly to contend for the faith once delivered unto the saints." Insubordination, self seeking, and licentiousness, resulting from antinomian teachings, are the evils stigmatized, against which Jude gives the only safeguards, viz. that believers should "build themselves in their most holy faith and pray in the Holy Ghost." These evils, combined with mocking scepticism, shall characterize the days immediately before the Lord's coming to judgment, as when Enoch warned the ungodly just on the eve of the flood. As Peter wrote his first epistle (see chap. v. 13) and probably his second also at Babylon it is not unlikely that Jude too addressed primarily the Jewish Christians in and about Mesopotamian Babylon (a place of much resort of the Jews), or else the Christian Jews dispersed in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, whom Peter, his model, addresses. For Jerome (Annot. in Matt.) says that Jude preached in Mesopotamia; and his epistle of 25 verses contains no less than eleven passages from 2 Peter. Probably ver. 4 witnesses to the fulfilment of Peter's prophecy, "there are certain men crept in unawares, who were before of old ordained (Gr. forewritten), i.e. announced before-hand, viz. by Peter's written prophecy) to this condemnation, ungodly men, denying the only Lord God and our Lord Jesus Christ." Comp. 2 Pet. ii. 1, "there shall be false teachers among you who privately shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction." Also ver. 17, 18 quote 2 Pet. iii. 3, "remember the words which were spoken before of the apostles of our Lord Jesus; how they told you that there should be mockers in the last time who should walk after their own ungodly lusts." As Peter confirms Paul's inspiration (2 Pet. iii. 15, 16), so Jude confirms Peter's. The distinction between Jude and Peter is that Jude portrays adversaries of Christianity and heretics in general, Peter heretical teachers in particular.

Time and place of writing. If the time were after the fall of Jerusalem (A.D. 70), some think Jude would have scarcely omitted allusion to an event which uprooted the whole Jewish polity. But John in his epistles, certainly written after the destruction of Jerusalem, makes no allusion to it. The tone is that of a writer in Palestine; the title "brother of James" best suits a region where James was well known as the bishop of its metropolis. Jude 17, 18 imply some time had elapsed since the date of the second epistle of Peter, written probably A.D. 68 or 69; if so, our epistle was written after the destruction of Jerusalem.

Judges. Moses was the nation's judge after Israel left Egypt. At Jethro's suggestion, just before the giving of the Sinaitic law (Exod. xviii., Deut. i. 9, etc.), he appointed captains, rulers of thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens, viz. the recognised heads of tribes or of chief houses in them, to judge at all seasons small matters, reserving the great ones for himself to decide, upon the principles which he should learn from God. These would number 78,600. But the elders (chosen from the elders who headed Israel in seeking freedom, and from the officers, the reluctant instruments of Egyptian tyranny: Exod. iii. 16, v. 6, etc.), appointed Num. xi. 16, etc., were only seventy (the same number as had gone up with Moses unto the Lord in the mount, Exod. xxiv.), endued by God with the Spirit as Moses' council. This council fell into desuetude under the judges and kings; but after the monarchy the sanhedrim was modelled on this prototype. regard to locality modified the genealogical principle of selection upon Israel's entrance into Canaan (Deut. xvi. 18). The Levites, as the ultimate sources under God of jurisprudence, taught the people the law, to enable the judges and those judged to understand the right principle of decisions (xvii. 8-13). The "judges" are mentioned Josh. xxiv. 1. Their sacro-sanctity is marked by their bearing the designation "gods," as exercising some of God's delegated power: Ps. lxxxi. 1, 6; Exod. xxi. 6, Heb. "gods" for "judges," God being the source of all justice. The qualifications of a judge are given (Exod. xviii. 21), "able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness"; "not wresting judgment, not respecting persons, neither taking a gift" (so universal a practice with Eastern judges), Deut. xvi. 19; "not respecting the person of the poor, nor honouring the person of the mighty" (Lev. xix. 15); "not afraid of the face of man, for the judgment is God's" (Deut. i. 17). Especially comp. Jehoshaphat's charge to his judges (2 Chron. xix. 6, 7).

Judging was the only royal function, under the theocracy, which was committed to man, and being moreover in the hands of the people's natural leaders it held a very high place in popular estimation. The place of judgment was the open space before the gate, the place of public resort (Ps. lxxix. 12, Prov. viii. 15). The higher order of judges were called "princes," the lower "elders" (Jud. viii. 14, Exod. ii. 14; representing the Heb. nasi, sar, nadib, nagid; nasi expressing high birth, nadib princely qualities, nagid prominent station, sar active official authority). In Jud. viii. 14 the elders of Succoth are 77, i.e. 70, the number of Jacob's family with which Succoth was connected (Gen. xxxiii. 17, xlv. 27), with the sacred seven added (Exod. xxiv. 9). The custody, in the sanctuary, of the standard weights and measures made an appeal to the priesthood in disputes a necessity; and in final appeals the high priest, as chief legal authority, decided difficult cases before the time of the kings (Deut. xvii. 8, 12). The Heb. shophetim, "judges," answer to the suffetes, the chief magistrates of Phœnician colonies.

None of the nation's deliverers called "judges" (Jud. ii. 16-19, Acts xiii. 20) were of a priest's family; Eli was not a deliverer or saviour (Obad. 21; Jud. iii. 9, 15). Their main office was to judge or rule righteously ("feed" or tend, 1 Chron. xvii. 6) in deciding cases (Jud. iv. 5, x. 2; 1 Sam. vii. 15, viii. 3), this function of the priesthood being in abeyance after the time of Joshua; their delivering Israel was an act of Jehovah's "righteousness" or faithfulness to His covenant, consequent upon the people's penitently turning to Him (Jud. v. 11, Isa. xlv. 8). These extraordinary judges, raised by God, the temporal as well as spiritual King of Israel, as His vicegerents, between Joshua and the kings were 13: Othniel, Ehud, Shamgar, Deborah and Barak, Gideon, Abimelech (an usurper), Tola, Jair, Jephthah, Ibzan, Elon, Abdon (Bedan 1 Sam. xii. 11), Samson. [On the dates see Chronology.] "Saving" Israel is applied to them frequently (Jud. iii. 9 marg., 21, vi. 15, vii. 7, xi. 1 marg.); the Lord "raised them up" (ii. 16) at intervals, as need required, by causing His Spirit to come upon them (iii. 10, vi. 34, xi. 29, xiii. 25); Barak was called by a propheticess, Deborah (iv.); His providence overruled the people's choice in Jephthah's case. The judges ruled more continuously from Gideon's time: his sons are regarded as his natural successors (ix. 1-3); so Samuel's sons (1 Sam. viii. 1, vii. 15), he ruled till his death; so too Eli (iv. 18). Afterwards the king was expected to hear causes in person, and therefore should write and read continually a copy of the law (2 Sam. xv. 1-4; Deut. xvii. 18, 19). David probably delegated some of the judicial office to the 6000 Levites, and specially Chenaniah and his sons (1 Chron. xxi. 4, xxvi. 29). Solomon was most famed for his judgments (1 Kings iii. 9, 16; Ps. lxxii. 1-4; 1 Kings ii. 5, 6, 33, 34, 46). Two examples of forms of procedure occur: a civil case (Ruth iv. 2), in which Boaz calls in ten elders to witness the redemption by him of the kinsman's right from the one whose claim was first, and whom he summoned to appear "in the gate," the usual place of judgment; and a criminal one (1 Kings xxi. 8-14), where the elders and nobles judge, on the testimony of witnesses, in the presence of the people. So in the case of the manslayer (Josh. xx. 4-6; Deut. xix. 12; Num. xxxv. 24, 25). Few were not allowed judges (1 Sam. xii. 3), but were regarded as bribery. Professed advocates were unknown in early times; but voluntary pleading for the defenceless was esteemed meritorious (Job xvi. 21, Prov. xxxi. 9, Isa. i. 17).

Judges, Book of. The time comprised extends from Joshua to Eli. Divisions: (1) Introduction (i.—iii. 6). Chap. i., Israel's relations to Canaan, geographical and political, what the several tribes and houses achieved, or otherwise, in conquering the land: ii.—iii. 6, Israel's relations religiously to the Lord, this second portion tells us the reason of Israel's failure to drive out the Canaanite remnant and of their falling under oppressors, viz. apostasy; Jehovah leaving those nations in order to prove Israel whether they would obey Him. Hengstenberg suggests that chap. i. presents the events before Joshua's death, chap. ii. the death itself and the events following it. The general lessons of the book are summed up in ii. 11, etc., viz. Israel's high calling and yet apostasy, Jehovah's chastening, and then raising up of judges because of this own pity for their groanings; then Israel's relapse into idolatry upon each judge's death.

- (2) Chap. iii. 7—xvi. The opening formula (iii. 7) is resumed from ii. 11, "the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord," etc. Political events are subordinated to spiritual. Of the 13 judges, the account of six (Ehud, Deborah and Barak, Gideon, Abimelech, Jephthah, Samson) is full, that of the remaining seven very brief. In Gideon's case alone his sons' history is detailed, because it illustrates the great lesson of the book. His sin in making the ephod issued in his family's slaughter by Abimelech with the men of Shechem's aid, these in turn mutually punishing one another. Abimelech's was the first effort to substitute an earthly king for the Lord of the theocracy. Samson's history illustrates Israel's, whom he represents, strength and weakness, strength in separation to Jehovah, utter weakness when the consecration became severed, as Samson's locks, by lust. Othniel is the only representative of Judah; the greater number of judges belonged to northern and eastern Israel.

- (3) Chap. xvii.—xix. The appendix. It records (1) Micah's idolatry in mount Ephraim, and the Danite adoption of it in Laish, the conquest of which is narrated. A time "when there was no king in Israel" (xix. 1), before Samson's days (comp. xiii. 25 marg. with xviii. 12); also before Jabin, 150 years after Joshua, had established a strong Canaanite kingdom in the N., when Dan could not have taken Laish; perhaps shortly after Joshua's death (xviii. 30). A comparison of xviii. 1 with i. 34, Josh. xix. 47, implies that this history occurred at the earliest part of the judges' period. The Danites set up Micah's graven image, and Jonathan's sons were its "priests until the day of the captivity of the land," i.e. the removal of the ark by the Philistines (comp. Ps. lxxviii. 59-64, Jer. vii. 12-14, 1 Chron. xvi. 34, 35). Jehovah's giving up His glory (the ark) into captivity was a virtual giving over of Israel to captivity, i.e. to their enemy's power; for the sanctuary was the land's "kernel and essence" (Hengstenberg), and the completeness of Israel's prostration under the Philistines appears in 1 Sam. xiii. 19-23. No mention of the judges occurs in this appendix. The appendix records (2) Gideon's awful wickedness and Benjamin's countenancing it, and Israel's unitedly punishing almost to extermination the sinning tribe. The unanimity of the tribes implies an early date; also the mention of Aaron's grandson Phinehas (comp. xx. 28 with Josh. xvii. 13, xiv. 33). These two histories appended depict the spirit of the age morally and religiously.

Historic truth. The comparison with the heroic age of Greece is unwarrantable. Though the judges were heroes, it was an age preceded by the Mosaic legislation and the due settlement of the people by Joshua in their inheritance; not an age of lawless semi barbarism. Jahn (Heb. Commonwealth) truly says the Book of Judges is a record of the exceptional diseases of the body politic, whilst the years of health are passed over in silence. The ability to write a description of the Succoth elders, 77 men, on the part of a young man taken at random implies it was no age of ignorance; contrast the Homeric age, in which only dubious traces of the existence of writing occur (Jud. viii. 14 marg.). Israel's servitudes occupy 111 years, the time of peaceful independence 319 years (i.e. taking the whole period as 430). Hence the oft recurring phrase, "the land had rest . . . years" (iii. 11, 30, v. 31, viii. 28). Hence too in the millennial future restoration of Israel Isaiah (i. 26) announces from God, "I will restore thy judges as at the first," as in Israel's most peaceable days: Joshua, the judges, and Samuel (comp. Isa. xxxii. 1, Matt. xix. 28). The chequered history of Israel at this period is too modest to be the work of a forger to glorify Israel. The mention of the Canaanite chariots accords with the Egyptian accounts which make the Cheta chariots their main strength. A hieroglyphic inscription of Rameses II. mentions Astert as the Cheta or Hittite divinity, so Jud. ii. 11-13. The Shasous in Egyptian monuments resemble in habits the Midianites and Amalekites (vi.—viii.). Philistine power increases in Jud. and 1 Sam. parallel with Egypt's decline in the monuments. The usages, mutilation (Jud. i. 6, 7), blood feuds (viii. 19), the intermixture of ruling people and subject tribes (i. 19-36), the hiding of the oppressed in caves (vi. 2), earrings worn by men (viii. 24-26), women peeping through the lattice (v. 28), fables (ix. 7), riddles (xiv. 12) to be solved at a forfeit, all accord with oriental usage, and occur so naturally and incidentally as to exclude suspicion of design.

Design. The aim is not to give a continuous history of the period between Joshua and Samuel, but to illustrate in striking particular deliverances the Divine principle of dealing with Israel laid down in Jud. ii. 16-19. The judges imperfectly realize the ideal. Each only delivered one part of Israel: Shamgar the region towards Philistia; Deborah and Barak northern Israel (iv. 10); so Gideon (vi. 35), Jephthah, eastern Israel; Samson, Judah, Dan and the region adjoining Philistia. Gideon corrupted the worship of God, Samson yielded to lust, Jephthah made a rash vow and took revenge upon Ephraim. The possession of inspired gifts did not always ensure the right use of them, just as the miraculous gifts at Corinth were abused (1 Cor. xiv.). This is analogous to God's mode of dealing as to natural gifts; we are not judges of what God does, but learners from what He has done when He was pleased to create free agents. The time was one of transition before the kingly era. As yet Israel developed itself freely under the Mosaic law and theocracy, which are taken for granted; each did what was "right in his own eyes" (Jud. xvii. 6), thus giving scope, as a common central government could less do, to the operation of that particular providence which gave prosperity or adversity according to the obedience or disobedience, not only of the nation but of each tribe and family (i. 1-19, 21-33). The judges were God's vicegerents in carrying out part of that particular providence which distinguished Israel's God from the idols of the heathen around. Historical facts not subserving the Spirit's design are passed by, as Ephraim's victory over Orch and Zeeb (viii. 3, Isa. x. 26). Eli and Samuel are not included, because Eli was highpriest, and as such was officially judge, not, as the rest, specially called to be judges. Samuel was the Lord's prophet, delivering Israel, not by the sword, but by the word and by prayer (1 Sam. vii. 3-10). Samson was the last extraordinary judge. Samson was born during Eli's highpriesthood, for before his birth the Philistines ruled Israel (Jud. xiii. 5); "he shall begin to deliver Israel out of the hand of the Philistines." Samuel completed Israel's deliverance from them which Samson began. Throughout the inspired writer views Israel's history in the light of God's law. Israel's unfaithfulness punished by the foe's oppression, and Jehovah's faithfulness in raising up judges to deliver them at their cry, are the two hinges upon which the history turns (Keil). Only the tribes oppressed at a particular time are noticed; the rest walking according to the law, and therefore at peace, do not come under consideration. Intermarriages with heathen neighbours, Gentile associations, the beauty of the Canaanite women, the pomp, gaiety, and voluptuousness of their rites, the hope of learning the future by idolatrous divination, superstitious fears of the alleged gods of the locality where they settled, inclined Israel to add to Jehovah's worship the heathen idolatries (for they had too strong proofs of the Divine law to renounce it wholly). Extraordinary judges, following severe chastisement from those very nations whose sin they copied, were just the discipline they needed and God raised. Thrice Jehovah threatened Israel with oppression for apostasy: at Bechim (ii. 1-4), at the Midianite invasion (vi. 7-10), at the Ammonite and Philistine oppression (x. 10-14). He fulfilled His threats in the ever deepening oppression of the foe, the Philistine crowning all, and in the internal disunion of the nation's tribes. Under Othniel and Ehud all Israel rose against the foe; under Barak Reuben, Gilead, Dan, and Asher took no part (v. 15-17). Gideon scarcely appeased Ephraim's jealousy. Abimelech's usurpation of the kingship of Shechem illustrates further the national decay. Ephraim fought with Jephthah and the eastern tribes to its own sore loss. The men of Judah were so degenerate as to seek to give up Samson, their deliverer, to the Philistines (xv. 9-14).

The Angel of Jehovah, the Son of God, at the call of Moses appeared to him, then the Spirit of Jehovah qualified him (Exod. iii. 1-6, xiii. 21). So the Divine Angel four times appears, the Spirit following to qualify the judge for delivering Israel: (1) Jud. ii. 1-5, iii. 10; (2) vi. 11, 34; (3) x. 10-16, comp. Isa. lxiii. 8, 9, Jud. xi. 29; (4) xiii. 3-25. The servitudes increase in length successively for the most part: Chushan Rishathaim 8 years, Eglon 18, Jabin 20; also in the humiliation (1) a distant king, (2) a neighbouring king, (3) a king in Canaan itself. The three first servitudes brought Israel under the nations destined to scourge it in after history: Moab, Philistia, Mesopotamia or Babylon. Jabin despoiled (as in 1 Sam. xiii. 22 the Philistines are stated to have done) and brought them into union with Canaan by constraining them to worship his idols (Jud. iv. 3, v. 8). Or rather, "Israel chose new gods"; therefore in penal retribution from God "war was in their gates," and among the 40,000 (see Josh. iv. 13) Israelites fit for war no shield nor spear was to be seen wielded against the enemy. The fourth (Midian), fifth (Ammon), and sixth (Philistines) servitudes rise in progressive severity for 7, 18, and 40 years respectively. Jabin's time is one of those peaceful intervals of which it is said, a people is happiest when it has least to record; the allusion in Jud. x. 4 is to the happy days of the conquest under Moses (Num. xxxii. 41). But the great decline of Israel necessitated the kingdom, which followed, as better for a carnal people than the theocracy of which they showed themselves unworthy.

CHRONOLOGY AND UNITY. [On the length of the period of the judges see CHRONOLOGY, probably 430 or else 450 years.] The period between the division of the land and Jephthah was 300 years (Jud. xi. 26), which alone disproves the view of the Speaker's Comm. as to the period of the judges being only 160 or 140 years. The book, as we have seen, carries out the design with which it set out. At the close, as repeated declensions leave the guilty, in spite of revivals, lower than at the first, Samson is left by the degraded people, single handed, to resist the foe, and in his death accomplishes under God what previous judges failed to effect by their lives. The appended histories are placed at the end not to interrupt the historical sequence of judges according to the plan stated at the first, also chiefly because these histories are not isolated facts but permanent influences for evil (xviii. 30, 31); Gibeon's evil was not eradicated by Benjamin's terrible punishment, but must have affected the tribes generally, as their sore chastisement at first proves; and Hosea testifies the evil continued ever afterwards (ix. 9, x. 9).

Date, author. It must be not earlier than the end of that servitude to the Philistines which Samson "began" (Jud.

xiii. 5) to deliver Israel out of, and from which Samuel completed their deliverance (1 Sam. vii. 9-14). And it must have been before David's capture of Zion from the Jebusites, for they had dwelt with the Benjaminites in Jerusalem to the time of writing Judges (i. 21; comp. 2 Sam. v. 6). Tyre is not mentioned, but Zidon oppressed Israel (Jud. x. 12), and was the protector to whom the neighbouring Canaanites looked up (xviii. 7). Tyre on the contrary took the lead in David's time; moreover Tyre and Sidon were his allies, not enemies. But royalty was already set up, and the blessing of organized government was realized, as appears from xviii. 1: "in those days when there was no king in Israel; but every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (comp. Deut. xii. 8); Jud. xvii. 6, xviii. 1, xix. 1. This points to Saul's reign, or the very beginning of David's reign. Either Samuel or one of his school of prophets probably wrote it. The words (xviii. 30, 31), "until the day of the captivity of the land . . . they set up Micah's image . . . all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh" (awful perversity! in the face of Divine light close to them) imply that the book was written after the Philistine capture of the ark, and after its return and setting up at Nob in Saul's reign (1 Sam. xxi.); it remained at Shiloh only until its capture at Eli's death (1 Sam. i. 3, iii. 21, iv. 3), in David's reign the tabernacle was at Gibeon (1 Chron. xvi. 39, xxi. 29).

The connection of Judges with Joshua, of which it is the sequel, appears in the reference to Joshua's death, Jud. ii. 6-9 (comp. the same words from which Judges draws them, Josh. xxiv. 28-31), which verses resume the narrative suspended from chap. i. 1, "now after the death of Joshua," by i. ii. 5. Also comp. passages common to both: Jud. i. 10-15, 20, 21, 27, 29, with Josh. xv. 14-19, 13, 63, xvii. 12, xvi. 10; Jud. xviii. with Josh. xix. 47. Again the Spirit links Judges with the books of Samuel and Kings which follow; thus i. 28, 30, 33, 35 accords with the tributary condition subsequently of the Canaanite remnant under Solomon (1 Kings ix. 13-22). So i. 16 accounts for Saul's and David's subsequent kindness to the Kenites (1 Sam. xv. 6, xxx. 29). Chap. ix. records Abimelech's mode of death, alluded to 2 Sam. xi. 21.

Judgment Hall. Lat. prætorium Græcised (John xviii. 28, 33, xix. 9; Acts xxiii. 35). It is transl. Matt. xxvii. 27, Mark xv. 16, "common hall"; and in Phil. i. 13 "palace." It is (1) Pilate's residence when at Jerusalem, where Jesus was examined, scourged, and mocked. The Jews, to avoid defilement before the passover, waited outside, near the judgment seat which was erected on the pavement before the Prætorium, and on which Pilate sat in pronouncing sentence. Probably the tower of Antonia was the Prætorium of Pilate. Herod was then at Jerusalem, doubtless in his father's palace, which therefore is distinct from the Prætorium (Luke xxiii. 7). However Josephus (B. J. ii. 14, § 8) represents the Roman governor as sometimes residing in Herod's palace, and setting up his judgment seat in front of it [see JERUSALEM]. In Acts xxiii. 35 Herod's Prætorium was part of the magnificent buildings erected by king Herod (Josephus, Ant. xx. 9, § 6, B. J. i. 21, § 5, 8), used as the official residence and head quarters of Felix at Caesarea. "Palace," in Phil. i. 13, means the quarters of prætorian guards immediately attached to Caesar's palace on mount Palatine (comp. iv. 22, Acts xxviii. 16).

Judith=the praised one. Esau's wife, daughter of Beeri the Hittite (Gen. xxvi. 34). [See ANOLIBAMAH, ESAU, BEERI.]

Julia. A Christian woman at Rome, whom Paul salutes (Rom. xvi. 15), wife or sister of Philologus.

Julius. Centurion of "Augustus' band" (a detachment probably of the emperor's prætorian body guards, attached to the Roman governor at Caesarea); had charge of Paul from Caesarea to Rome (Acts xxvii. 1, 3). As all the centurions in N. T., so J. was an estimable character. He "courteously gave Paul liberty to go unto his friends to refresh himself." God raises friends to His people even among enemies.

Junia, Junias. A Christian at Rome, one of Paul's "kinsmen (fellow countrymen, Rom. ix. 3) and fellow prisoners who are of note among the apostles, who also were in Christ before him" (Rom. xvi. 7).

Juniper: rothum, the Spanish broom, Genista monosperma, white blossoming (1 Kings xix. 4-6, Job xxx. 4, Ps. cxx. 4). Abundant in the desert of Sinai. The bushy shrub, eight or ten feet high, shaded Elijah from the heat. The Bedouins still make charcoal of the wood, as the psalmist describes. The eating of its bitter roots for food is Job's illustration of the degradation and famine to which the outcasts he describes were reduced.

Jupiter. The Greek and Roman supreme god. After the cure of the impotent man the people of Lystra called Barnabas (the more commanding in appearance) J. and Paul (the speaker) Mercury, the god of eloquence (Acts xiv. 12, 13, "J. before the city," i.e. his temple was in front of the city).

Antiochus Epiphanes (Dan. viii. xi.), the O. T. antichrist, to subvert the Jewish religion, dedicated the temple of Jehovah at Jerusalem to the Greek Olympian Jupiter. (2 Macc. vi.)

Jushab Hesed=lovingkindness is returned (the name expressing the gratitude to God of pious Jews at the return from Babylon: 1 Chron. iii. 20). The "five" in this verse are grouped together as of one mother, those in ver. 19 were by another mother.

Justification. [See IMPURE.] "The

just shall live by faith" (Hab. ii. 4) is thrice quoted by Paul: (1) Rom. i. 17, where the emphasis is on "just," the gospel plan of saving men sets forth "the righteousness (justice) of God" as excluding the righteousness of man, Gentile and Jew alike (i. 17, etc., ii. iii. 25). (2) Gal. iii. 11, etc., where the emphasis is on "faith" as distinguished from works, either distinct from or combined with faith, in the act of justification, this is by faith alone. (3) Heb. x. 38, 39, where the emphasis is on "live"; as in the first instance in the matter of justification, so throughout, spiritual life is continued only by faith as opposed to "drawing back."

Again, the gratuitousness of God's gift of justification is brought out by comparing Rom. iii. 24, "being justified freely (doreau) by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus," with John xv. 25, "they hated Me without a cause" (doreau). As gratuitous as was man's hatred, so gratuitous is God's love justifying believers through Christ. Man had every cause to love, yet he hated God; God had every cause given by man to hate, yet He loves man.

The Heb. tsahaph, Gr. dikaioo, expresses, not to infuse righteousness into but to impute it to, man; to change his relation to God legally or forensically, not in the first instance to change his character. "Justification" is no more an infusion of righteousness than "condemnation," its opposite, is an infusion of wickedness, as is proved by Deut. xxv. 1, "the judges shall justify the righteous and condemn the wicked," Prov. xvii. 15, Isa. v. 23, Ps. cxliii. 2, which shows that by inherent righteousness no man could be justified. In 40 O.T. passages the Heb. is used in the forensic sense. Isa. liii. 11, "by His knowledge shall My righteous Servant justify many" is no exception, for the mode of His justifying them follows, "He shall bear their iniquities." So in Dan. xii. 3 ministers "justify" or "turn to righteousness" their converts instrumentally, i.e. bring them to God who justifies them. In Dan. viii. 14 marg. "the sanctuary shall be justified" means "shall be vindicated from profanation," shall stand in a relation of right before God which it had not done before its cleansing. Similarly the Gr. verb means not to make righteous or pure, but to count righteous before God. Opposed to katakrino, to condemn. Rom. viii. 33, 34: "who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth; who is he that condemneth?" Also Rom. v. 16, Luke xviii. 14. Matt. xi. 19 means like Dan. viii. 14, "wisdom is vindicated from the condemnation" cast on her by "this generation." Also Matt. xii. 37, Luke vii. 29, the publicans "justified God"; i.e. vindicated His righteousness, showed they counted Him righteous in His "counsel" by accepting the gospel; opposed to the Pharisees who "rejected" it, to their own condemnation (Rom. ii. 13).

Before man's bar, ordinarily, the righteousness on account of which he is justified or counted righteous is his own; before God's bar, the righteousness on account of which he is justified is Christ's, which is God's (2 Pet. i. 1). Therefore pardon accompanies justification before God's bar, but pardon would be scorned by one innocent and therefore justified before man's bar. Again, acquittal before man is not always accompanied with justification; but the sinner pardoned before God is always justified also. In 1 John iii. 7, "he that doeth righteousness is righteous even as He is righteous"; not his doing righteousness makes him righteous, but shows that he is so, i.e. justified by the righteousness of God in Christ (Rom. x. 3-10). A man "deceives" himself if he think himself "righteous," and yet does not righteousness, for "doing righteousness" is the sure fruit and proof of "being righteous," i.e. of having the only principle of true righteousness and the only mean of justification, faith. Paul's epistle to Romans proves Jew and Gentile guilty of breaking God's universal law, therefore incapable of being justified by their own righteousness, i.e. obedience to the law. "By the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in God's sight; but now (under the gospel) the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe; for there is no difference, for all have sinned," etc. (iii. 20-23). Still plainer is iv. 3-8: "to him that worketh not but believeth on Him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith (i.e. not as a merit, but Christ's merit apprehended by faith: Eph. ii. 5, 8-10) is counted for righteousness. David describeth the blessedness of the man unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works (as man has no righteousness of his own the 'righteousness imputed' to him can only be the righteousness of God in Christ) . . . blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin." The justified man is not only acquitted as innocent but regarded as having perfectly obeyed the law in the person of Christ. There is to him both the non-imputation of sin and the imputation of righteousness. "Being justified by God's grace he is made heir according to the hope of eternal life" (Tit. iii. 7; Rom. v. 18, 19). Christ is "of God made unto us righteousness," so that to believers He is "the Lord our righteousness" (1 Cor. i. 30, Jer. xxiii. 6). Faith is the instrument or receptive mean of justification (Rom. iii. 28; Gal. ii. 16, iii. 8). We are justified judicially by God (Rom. viii. 33), meritoriously by Christ (Isa. liii. 11, Rom. v. 19), instrumentally or mediately by faith (v. 1), evidentially by works. This is the sense of JAMES [see, and FAITH] (ii. 14-26), otherwise James could no more be reconciled with himself than with Paul, for he quotes the same instance and the same scripture, "Abraham believed God and it (his faith) was counted to him for righteousness," as Paul does. Luther called the doctrine of justification by faith only "the article (test) of a standing or falling church." Justin Martyr in the second century (Ep. ad Diog.) writes: "what else could cover our sins but His righteousness? in whom could we transgressors be justified but only in the Son of God? O sweet exchange! O unsearchable contrivance! that the transgressions of many should be hidden in one righteous Person and the righteousness of One should justify many transgressors." (2 Cor. v. 21.) The Church of England Homily says: "Faith doth not shut out repentance, hope, love, and the fear of God in every man justified, but it shutteth them out from the office of justifying." So: "faith, receiving and resting on Christ and His righteousness, is the alone instrument of justification, yet is it not alone in the person justified, but is ever accompanied with all other saving graces." (Westm. Conf. xi. 1, 2.) Rome makes justification the infusion of righteousness by God's Spirit and the rewarding of the good works done under His influence, at the day of judgment. This confounds justification with sanctification whereas Rom. v. and vi. carefully distinguish them, and makes it a continuous process not completed till the judgment, whereas Scripture makes it completed on believing (Rom. v. 1-9, vii. 1; John v. 24).

Justus. 1. Surname of Joseph Barsabbas (Acts i. 23). 2. A Christian at Corinth; Paul lodged with him (Acts xviii. 7). 3. Surname of Jesus, Paul's friend (Col. iv. 11).

Juttah, Jutah—stretched out. A city in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 53), allotted to the priests (xxi. 16). Omitted by copyist's error in 1 Chron. vi. 57-59; now Jutta, near Maon (Maon) and Karmul (Carmel). Herein appears the value of the repetitions of names in parallel passages; the one corrects errors which creep into the other. As Joshua herein supplies the omission in Chronicles, so Chronicles gives Ashan the right reading for Ain in Joshua, as LXX. prove. In the Egyptian monuments J. appears as Jah or Jahn, a fort of the Anakim near Arba or Hebron. In Luke i. 39 "a city of Juda" is a doubtful translation; for Judah or Judaea, the region, has usually the article in Gr. (see ver. 5, 65); and "Juda" had long been superseded by "Judaea." Probably "the city J." or "Juda" is meant, the residence of Zacharias and Elisabeth, and the birthplace of John Baptist. However "Juda" is used of the region of Judah, Matt. ii. 6.

K

Kabzeel—collected by God. Standing at the confluence of wady el Jebel and Fikreh and Kuseib; the farthest S. of Judah's cities (Josh. xv. 21). BENATAH [see] was of K. (2 Sam. xiii. 20, 1 Chron. xi. 22.) On its re-occupation after the return from Babylon it was called Jekabzeel (Neh. xi. 25, where "its hamlets," Heb., are spoken of, viz. onlying pastoral settlements). A wady, El Kuseib, seemingly answers to it; S. of the Dead Sea, the bed of a torrent descending from the Arabah to the Ghôr. At its mouth is its fountain, the only good water of the region, where the road from Jerusalem diverges E. by the Dead Sea to Moab and S. to Petra; a spot likely to be occupied, though remote, as a stronghold, the key of Palestine toward Moab and Edom, guarding the pass Ez Zuweirah, by which the Moabites under Sauballat, the Ammonites under Tobiah, and the Arabians under Geshem, might attack the Jews (Neh. iv. 12). Hot as the summer is, snow falls deep at times in winter. Benaiah's "slaying two lionlike men of Moab" accords with the position of K. toward Moab; also "the lion in a pit on a snowy day" accords with there being dense jungle, the haunt of wild beasts, in the neighbourhood.

Kadesh Barnea. Ain el Weibeh in the Arabah, 10 miles N. of the place where mount Hor abuts on that valley. Three fountains issue from the chalky rock. Here wady el Ghuweir affords access north-westwards through mountainous Edom; from here accordingly Moses sent to ask a passage through Edom by "the king's highway." Barnea=son of wandering, i.e. Bedouin (Furst). "Country of convulsion," comp. Ps. xxix. 8 (Speaker's Comm.). "The wilderness of K.," i.e. the desert adjoining K.; the northern part of the Paran wilderness was called Zin (Num. x. 12, xiii. 21). The encampment from which the spies were sent and to which they returned (xiii. 26, xxii. 8); sometimes called Kadesh alone. Meribah Kadesh is the same (Ezek. xlvii. 19, xlviii. 28 marg.; Josh. xv. 3, 23). The encampment at K. is called Rithmah from retem, "the broom," the most conspicuous shrub of the desert (Num. xxxiii. 18). Probably the encampment at Rithmah was during Israel's first march towards Canaan; that at K. was in the same locality, though on a different spot, 38 years afterwards, in the 40th year, when they were about entering Canaan. The ancient name of K. was En Mishpat (Gen. xiv. 7). El Ain (identified by some with K. because this site is called Gadis and the neighbouring plain, Abu Retemet, is like Rithmah) is too far N.W., 70 miles from mount Hor and 60 from mount Seir; but K. was only one march from mount Hor (Num. xx. 16, 22; xxxiii. 37), "on the edge of Edom," "on its uttermost border"; on low ground (whereas El Ain is on high ground) whence the spies "go up" to Canaan. A line drawn from El Ain to the river of Egypt (Josh. xv. 21-27) would cut the middle of the Negeb, and so cut away part of Judah's inheritance. The true K. must be more S.; Petra or Selah was too far in the heart of Edom to be Judah's frontier, and "in the uttermost border of Edom."

However Palmer identifies K. with El Ain as "one of the natural borders of the country; the Tih, a comparative desert, the Negeb or South, Palestine, and Syria forming an ascending scale of fertility." The encampment at Rithmah (Num. xxxiii. 18, 19) was in summer the second year after the exodus (xiii. 20), that at K. in the same district the first month of the 40th year (xx. 1). At the first encampment Israel stayed probably for months; they waited for the spies 40 days (xiii. 25); Moses and the tabernacle remained (xiv. 44), whilst the people vainly tried to reverse God's sentence and to occupy Canaan (Deut. i. 34-46): "ye abode in K. many days" (a long indefinite time). Then Israel "compassed mount Seir," i.e. wandered in the desert of Paran, till all that generation died (ii. 1). In this period were the 17 stages, Num. xxxiii. 19-36. Lastly Israel again was at K. in the first month of the 40th year, and stayed for three or four months (xx. 1, 22-28; xxxiii. 38). Here Miriam died and was buried. Here water failed, and Moses by impatient striking of the rock, attribution of the miracle to himself and Aaron ("must we fetch," etc.), and unbelief ("ye believed Me not, to sanctify Me") in the goodness of God to an unworthy people, dishonoured God, and he and Aaron were adjudged the penalty of not entering Canaan (xx. 12, 13; comp. Ps. cvi. 32, 33). From hence Moses sent to the king of Edom (Num. xx. 14, etc.). On the messengers' return Israel turned from Edom, leaving K. finally, and after Aaron's death at mount Hor marched round Edom to Moab (xxxiii. 41-49). Kadesh=holy may have been named from the long presence of the sanctuary and priests. En Mishpat, "fountain of judgment," corresponds, judgment and sanctity emanating from the one Divine source. Meribah K., "strife," is a perversion of judgment; the opposites in the one name marking graphically the sad events connected with K. K. gradually sank to its original obscurity as a watering place for the nomads of the desert. The cliffs at the mouth of wady el Ghuweir near Ain el Weibeh, and in front of the host in marching eastward through mount Seir, may have been the scene of Moses' striking the rock (sela, not tzur) (xx. 7, etc.). Merely certain occurrences and enactments are recorded of the 38 years' wandering, in xv. 1-xix. 22.

Kadmiel. A Levite who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 40, Neh. vii. 43); set forward the temple workmen, and joined in the thanksgiving at the laying of the foundation (Ezra iii. 9). His house took part in the general confession (Neh. ix. 4, 5) and in the covenant (x. 9).

Kadmonites. From Kedem, "children of the East," the tribes roaming in the wilds S. and S.E. of Palestine.

Kallai. Neh. xii. 20.

Kanah. 1. A bound of Asher, next "great Zidon" (Josh. xix. 28). Perhaps Ain Kana, eight miles S.E. of Sidon (Saida). 2. The river dividing between Manasseh on the N. and Ephraim on the S. (Josh. xvi. 8, xvii. 9). Wady Kanah is too far S. Wady Khassab, "the reedy stream," beginning at Nablûs, is more in the right position, and means like K. "reedy."

Kareah. Father of JOHANAN and JONATHAN [see].

Karkaa. A southern bound of Judah (Josh. xv. 3). From the Arabic kerak "an even floor," and kau "a plain." K. is a large expanse, the receptacle of a large body of water. The wady Arish receives on the E. the waters of wady el Kureiyeh and its tributaries. K. was situated perhaps where the northern Kaa or "plain of pools" touches this outlying district of the Holy Land, in the confluence of the wady el Kureiyeh with the Mayein.

Karkor. Where Gideon finally dispersed the remains of Zebah and Zalmunna's host (Jud. viii. 10, 11), E. of Jordan, in the open region of the nomad tribes. The rich plain En Nukrah in the Hauran. From a root "to dig," expressing deep soft level ground; akin to Kerak, "an even floor."

Kartah. A town of Zebulun, assigned to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 34).

Kartan. A city of Naphtali, assigned to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. xxi. 32); in 1 Chron. vi. 73 expanded into Kirjathaim.

Kattath. A city of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15).

Kedar=black skinned. Ishmael's second son (Gen. xxv. 13; Isa. xxi. 16, 17, xlii. 11, lx. 7; Jer. xlix. 28; Ezek. xxvii. 21), occupying the pastures and wilds on the N.W. side of Arabia. Representing the Arabs in general, with flocks, and goat's or camel's hair tents, black as their own complexion (S. of Sol. i. 5; Ps. cxx. 5). "I dwell in the tents of K., my soul hath long dwelt with him that hateth peace." Warriors and archers, among the marauding "children" or "men of the East," Bene Kedom; loving strife, true sons of Ishmael, of whom the Angel of Jehovah said "he will be a wild man, his hand will be against every man and every man's hand against him" (Gen. xvi. 12).

Kedemah=eastward. Youngest of Ishmael's sons (Gen. xxv. 15).

Kedemoth=easternmost parts. A town E. of the Dead Sea, assigned to Reuben (Josh. xiii. 18), then to the Merarite Levites (xxi. 37). A wilderness or uncultivated pasture adjoining was named from it; where Israel encamped when Moses asked leave of Sihon to pass through the Amorite country (Deut. ii. 26, etc.).

Kedesh. 1. A town in Judah's extreme S. (Josh. xv. 23)=sanctuary.

2. Of Issachar, assigned to the Gershonite Levites (1 Chron. vi. 72); Kishon in Josh. xxi. 28 probably the better reading. 3. K. Naphtali, or K. in Galilee (xix. 37), a Levitical city of refuge assigned to the Gershonite Levites (xx. 7). Barak's birthplace (Jud. iv. 6, 9, 10), where he and Deborah assembled Zebulun and Naphtali as being a "holy" place, which K. means. K. Naphtali is now Kades at the western edge of Huleh, the marshy basin through which Jordan passes into the sea of Merom, from which K. lies N.W. four miles distant. Its site is on a high ridge jutting out from the western hills, well watered, and environed by plains well cultivated and peopled. Conder (Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., Jan. 1877, p. 25) conjectures that the K. to which Barak called Israel together is distinct from Kadesh (or Kedesh) Naphtali, Barak's native place. For Kadesh Naphtali is 30 miles from Tabar, the scene of the battle, and separated by some of the most difficult country in Palestine. Probably Bezanaim was E. of Tabar, and answers to the modern Bessân. Harosheth of the Gentiles will thus be Harothiyeh. In this direction probably stood K., at the place now called Kadis, on the shore of the sea of Galilee. Taken by Tighlath Pileser (2 Kings xv. 29). Tell Hara, standing out prominently to the S.E., is connected by Lieut. Kitchener with Harosheth the head quarters of Sisera (Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., Oct. 1877, p. 197).

Kedron. From kadar, "black," from the turbidness of the stream and the gloom of the valley. The latter begins a mile and a half N.W. of the Damascus gate of Jerusalem; for three fourths of a mile it runs toward the city, then inclines E. and is crossed by the Nablûs road; half a mile farther it sweeps close under the N.E. end of the city wall, where Scopus on the other side joins on to Olivet. Then it sinks down southward as a deep gorge between Olivet and the E. side of the city. David crossed it in his flight from Jerusalem when Absalom rebelled (2 Sam. xv. 23, 30). The Divine Son of David too crossed it on His way to Gethsemane, the scene of His agony (John xviii. 1, Mark xiv. 26, Luke xxii. 39). The road still leads from St. Stephen's gate due E. of Jerusalem down to the bridge across it. The bottom is 100 ft. lower than the base of the city wall, and 500 lower than the summit of mount Olivet on the other side. A little farther S. the

HOME OF THE KEDRON.

K. valley becomes a narrow cleft between the hill of offence on the E. and the precipitous Moriah and Ophel on the W. Here the bottom is 150 ft. below the base of the city wall. The fountain of the Virgin is at the foot of Ophel, and is thought to be fed from the cisterns beneath the old temple. This gives point to Ezekiel's vision (xlvii. 8); the waters from under the right side of the temple went E. through the desert into the Dead Sea, making life succeed to barrenness, so the gospel; where the waters fail, barrenness begins; so where the gospel is not. Beyond Ophel, K. valley meets Tyropœon and Hinnom valleys. The enclosure here between the hill of offence on the E., the hill of evil counsel on the W., and modern Zion on the N., is very fertile, furnishing the vegetable market of Jerusalem, and was anciently the "king's gardens." The stream K. flows only in winter, as its Gr. designation cheimarrhos implies. The valley K. passes through the wilderness of Judah to the N.W. shore of the Dead Sea. It was the scene of Asa's demolishing his mother Maachah's idol (2 Chron. xv. 16). Also under Hezekiah all the impurities removed from the temple were cast into the K. (xxix. 16, xxx. 11). So under Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 4-12); it was then the common cemetery (ver. 6).

The "valley" of K. is in Heb. called nachal, "wady," including both valley and stream, whereas the valley of Hinnom is called ye; so that the "brook" (nachal) which Hezekiah "stopped running through the midst of the land" (2 Chron. xxxii. 4) was K. He sealed its source, "the upper spring head of Gihon," where it came forth N. of the city, and led it underground within the city (ver. 30). [See GIHON and JERUSALEM.] This accounts for the disappearance of water in the ancient bed of K. The water possibly still flows below the present surface. Barclay mentions a fountain flowing several hundred yards in a valley before it enters the K. from the N. Again he heard water murmuring below the ground two miles below the city; a subterranean stream probably connects the two.

Kehelethah. A desert encampment of Israel (Num. xxxiii. 22). The name, K., = assembling, Israel gave. During the 35 years of penal wandering the "congregation" was broken up, only round the tabernacle an organized camp of Levites, priests, and chiefs continued, and it moved from place to place. Being the nucleus and head quarters of the nation, and rallying point for the warriors, its movements were the only ones which the sacred historian records (Num. xxxiii. 18-36). K. = assembling, and Makeloth = assemblies (ver. 25), mark extraordinary but temporary gatherings of Israel at those places.

Keilah = fortress. In the shephelah or lower hills of Judah (Josh. xv. 44), hence the phrase "go down to K." David in dependence on Jehovah's promise, notwithstanding his men's protest on the ground of their weakness, rescued it from the Philistines (1 Sam. xxiii.); here Abiathar joined him with the ephod, having escaped from the massacre of priests at Nob. The proximity of HARETH [see], where David was, accounts for his helping it though he did not help other towns when robbed by the Philistines. Saul too looked to God, as if His providence had "delivered" David to him by David's entering a town with "gates and bars." Saul's hope was presumption, for God would never be the minister to gratuitous and murderous malice. David again consulted God in sincere faith, whether the men of K. would betray him. Like the Antitype, David was being betrayed by the ungrateful men whom he came to save. The corn abounding character of the Judean lowland accords with the Philistines robbing the "threshing floors" of K. Its strength, as a key to the hill country of Judah, is implied in the "armies" of the Philistines, and in Saul's calling "all the people together to go down to K."

All "the inhabitants of K." probably did not join in the treachery against David, only the Baalites, Heb. Baali for "men" of K. (ver. 11, 12), i.e. the Canaanite portion, votaries of Baal, to whom David's devotion to Jehovah and the presence of the sacred ephod with the priest Abiathar were an offence. Ps. xxxi. 6, 8, 21 alludes, with the undesignedness which characterizes genuineness, to this: "I have hated them that regard lying vanities (idols as Baal), but I trust in Jehovah." "Thou hast known my soul in adversities" (David's phrase in the independent history, 2 Sam. iv. 9). "Thou hast not shut me up into the hand of the enemy, Thou hast set my feet in a large room. . . . Blessed be Jehovah, for He hath shown me His marvellous kindness in a strong city," the very description of K.

In Neh. iii. 17, 18 Hashabiah is "ruler of the half part (pelek) of K." and Bavaï ruler of the other half part. Pelek means a "breast," a round hill, or mamelon; applied to Jerusalem composed of two swelling hills with the Tyropœon valley passing between. Each half had its military ruler. El Khureitfeh on the edge of the great plain, the road between Gaza and Hebron, answers probably to the double stronghold K. It consists of two tells or round hills, with a valley between.

Kelaiah, Kelita. Ezra x. 23; Neh. x. 10, viii. 7.

Kemuel. 1. Nahor's son by Mileah, father of Bethuel (Kebekah's father) and Aram or Ram (Gen. xxii. 21; comp. Job xxxii. 2). 2. Num. xxxiv. 21. 3. 1 Chron. xxvii. 17.

Kenath. Now Kenavat, near the S. end of the tract of Lejah, and on the W. slopes of the Ilanran mountains (Num. xxvii. 41, 42). Its conqueror Nobah named it after himself (Jud. viii. 11): the original name has supplanted his name. Transl. 1 Chron. ii. 23 "Geshur (its people N.W. of Bashan) and Aram (the Aramaeans or Syrians) took the towns of Jair (rather Havoth Jair) from them (the Jairites) with K. and the towns thereof, 60 cities," i.e. 23 of the Havoth Jair (i.e. Jair's life, conquered by Jair) and 37 of K. and her dependent towns (conquered by Nobah), 60 in all.

Kenaz. [See JEPHUNNEH.] 1. Son of Eliphaz, Esau's son. A duke of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 15, 42). Founder of the family of Kenezites (adopted into Israel), of whom were Caleb and Othniel (Josh. xiv. 14). 2. Caleb's grandson, but the "and" (even) before "K." in 1 Chron. iv. 15 shows a name has fallen out. 3. Younger brother of Caleb and father of Othniel (Josh. xv. 17). But Keil with the Masorites transl. "Othniel the son of K. (i.e. the Kenezites) and (younger) brother of Caleb." Caleb gave him his daughter to wife, a marriage in Keil's view not forbidden in the law. "The Kenizzites" of Gen. xv. 19 either had ceased to exist before Joshua, or probably Moses added their name subsequently, as those descendants of K. were adopted into Israel subsequently, to whom Caleb belonged.

Kenites. A Midianite race, for Jethro the Kenite is called priest prince of Midian (Exod. ii. 15, 16, iv. 19; Jud. i. 16, iv. 11). The connection with Moses explains their continued alliance with Israel, a companying them to Jericho "the city of palm-trees" (Jud. i. 16; comp. 2 Chron. xxviii. 15), thence to the wilderness of Judah, where "they dwelt among the people" (Israel), realizing Moses' promise to HOBAB [see], whose name appears slightly altered as that of a wady opposite Jericho (Num. x. 32). Hence Saul in a friendly spirit warned them to leave the Amalekites whom he was about to destroy (1 Sam. xv. 6), and David sent presents to them, having previously pretended to Achish that he had invaded their southern border (xxvii. 10, xxx. 29). [See ILEBER, HAZEON TAMAR, RECHABITES, JERONADAB.] E. Wilton (Imperial Dict.) suggests that K. is a religious rather than a gentile term, meaning a worshipper of the goddess Kain, one form of Ashtoreth or Astarte. This would account for God's denunciation of the K. by Balaam (Num. xxiv. 21, 22 marg.). Evidently the K. to be dispossessed by Israel (Gen. xv. 19) were distinct from the K. to whom Hobab and Jethro belonged. The latter were of Midianite origin, sprung from Abraham and Keturah, occupying the region E. of Egypt and W. of Seir and the gulf of Akabah (xxv. 2); the former were Canaanites of the city Kain, which was taken by Judah (Josh. x. 57). The Canaanite K. Balaam denounces; or else more probably Balaam's prophecy is "Kain (the Midianite K.) shall not be exterminated until Asshur shall carry him away into captivity" (Keil). Thus "strong is thy dwelling place, and thou patest thy nest in a rock," is figurative. The K. did not as Edom dwell in the rocks (Obad. 3, 4), but by leaving their nomad life near Horeb to join Israel wandering in quest of a home the Kenite really placed his rest upon a safe rock, and would only be carried away when Assyria and Babylon took Israel and Judah; with the difference however that Judah should be restored, but the K. not so because they forfeited God's blessing by maintaining independence of Israel though intimately joined and by never entering inwardly into God's covenant of grace with Israel. The connection of Midian and the K. appears in the name Kenney still attached to a wady in the midst of the Muzeiny or Midianites. Midian (and the K.) and Amalek were associated, as still are the Muzeiny and Aleikat (Amalek). The Muzeiny commit their flocks to women, as Jethro committed his to his daughters. The name Medinah betrays connection with Midian. The power of ingratiating themselves with their neighbours characterized the K. (Jud. iv. 17.) Also the love of tent life, hospitality, the use of goat's milk whey, the employment of women in men's work, so that the sexes had free intercourse and yet the female part of the tent was inviolable (iv. v.; Exod. ii. iv.; Num. xxv.).

Kerchief. "Woe to the women that make kerchiefs upon the head of every stature (men of every age) to hunt souls" (to make them their prey): Ezek. xiii. 18. Magic veils, put over the heads of those consulting them, to fit them for receiving a response, rapt in spiritual trance above the world.

Keren Happuch. Job's youngest daughter, born in his renewed prosperity=horn of antimony, the pigment used by Eastern ladies to darken their eyelashes, that the eye might shine more lustrous (xli. 14). In contrast to his "horn defiled in the dust" (xvi. 15).

Kerioth=closely contiguous cities. 1. Read together, without "and," Kerioth Hebron (Kureyeth, "the two cities," now 10 miles S. of Hebron): Josh. xv. 25; in southern Judah. Hazor implies a pastoral spot; K., kir (a wall), kirjah, imply military fortifications; Welsh caer. The Hazors are in the southern or Negev plain; the Kirjahs in the hills. 2. A city of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 24), named with other places "far and near"; if "far" include 60 miles N.E. of Heshbon, then K. is now Kureyeh and Bozrah is Buzrah. Others conjecture Kureyat; Cyril Graham Kiriath and Kiriathun S.W. of Bozrah, containing primitive and gigantic edifices, the roofs formed of stone beams laid side by side, 25 ft. long, and the doors slabs of single stones; the work probably of the giant Emim, the name K. too being perhaps of Anakim origin.

Keros. Neh. vii. 47.

Keturah. A secondary wife or concubine taken by Abraham, whether in Sarah's lifetime or afterwards is uncertain (Gen. xxv. 1; 1 Chron. i. 28, 32). Their sons were Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, Shuah; they spread through the desert E. to the Persian gulf. Hagar's son Ishmael's posterity was the elder branch of the "sons of the concubines."

Key. S. of Sol. v. 4, 5. A piece of wood, from seven inches to two feet long, fitted with pegs which correspond to small holes in the bolt within; the key put through a hole draws the bolt. The symbol of authority to open or shut (Isa. xxii. 22; Rev. iii. 7, i. 18). A chamberlain's (eunuch) badge of office is often a key, hung by a kerchief "on the shoulders" (Isa. ix. 6). The power of the keys was given to Peter and the other apostles only at times (Matt. xvi. 19, xviii. 18) when, and in so far as, Christ made him and them infallible. Peter rightly opened the gospel door to the Gentiles (Acts x., xi. 17, 18; xiv. 27), but he wrongly tried to shut it again (Gal. 1:18; comp. Luke xi. 52).

Kezia=cassia. Ps. xlv. 8, Job xlii. 14. An aromatic herb, expressing the beauty of Job's daughter.

Keziz. A city on the E. border of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 21). A valley (emek, or head of a valley expanding into a plain, triangular, W. of the Jordan, between the base of the hills and the Dead Sea) is named from it; from katzatz "to cut"; from the timber cut down in the large groves that anciently grew near Jericho and the Jordan and in the plain. This cutting of the forest before his eyes would naturally suggest John Baptist's image, "now also the axe is laid to the root of the trees" (Matt. iii. 10). Dr. Sauley found such a head of a valley still called Kaaziz.

Kibroth Hattaavah=graves of lust. Num. xi. 34, xxxiii. 17. At Erweis el Ebeirg near wady el Hadherah (Hazereth) Israelite remains apparently are found, marking the site of Kibroth Hattaavah. [See WILDERNESS OF WANDERINGS end.] Clark makes El Ain to be Kibroth Hattaavah. Laborde makes El Ain to be Hazereth. The S.E. "wind from the Lord" from the neighbouring Elanitic gulf of the Red "Sea" bore quails so as to "throw them upon" (Heb. Num. xi. 31) the encampment and its neighbourhood, "about two cubits above the face of the ground," i.e. not that they were piled up to that height, but the quails wearied with their flight flew so low as to be easily knocked down or caught by the people. The quail flies with the wind and low. The prodigious quantity and the supply of them at that time, in connection with Jehovah's moral dealings with Israel, constitute the miracle, which is in consonance with God's natural law though then intensified. The hot Khamsin or S.E. wind is what quails avail themselves of in their annual flight northwards; the S.W. wind was the extraordinary agent brought in "by the power of God" (Ps. lxxviii. 26). As Jehovah told them (ver. 20), they ate "a whole month until it came out at their nostrils, and was loathsome" to them. The impossibility, to ordinary view, of such a meat supply for 600,000 men for a month long even to satiety ("He rained flesh upon them as dust, and feathered fowls like as the sand of the sea": Ps. lxxviii. 27), staggered Moses' faith: "shall the flocks and the herds be slain for them to suffice them? or shall all the fish of the sea be gathered together for them?" (the proximity to the Red "Sea" suggested the "fish," ver. 31; comp. John vi. 7-9). We too often "limit the Holy One of Israel" (Ps. lxxviii. 41, 20-31). But "while the flesh was yet between their teeth, ere it was consumed" (Speaker's Comm. for "chewed"), "the wrath of Jehovah smote the people with a very great plague." Feeding on quails for a whole month would of itself be injurious. God punished the gluttonous people through their gluttony which they had indulged in to surfeit; He aggravated the natural consequences into a supernatural visitation. God punishes murmurers by "giving them their request, but sending leanness into their soul" (1's. cvi. 15).

The first supply of quails was on the 15th day of the second month after the exodus (Exod. xvi., Ps. cv. 40), just before the manna. The second was at Kibroth Hattaavah in the second year after the camp had removed from its 12 months' stay at Sinai. The Heb. for "quail" is selae, and the locality has several places named from it, wady es Selif the E. road, wady Seluf the road to the W. E. Wilton (Imp. Dict.) fixes on an old cemetery in the wady Berah as Kibroth Hattaavah.

Kibzaim. A city of mount Ephraim (Josh. xxi. 22); given to the Kohathite Levites; = "two heaps." [See JOKNEAM, similarly meaning a gathering or confluence, from kamah and anani.] Identified by E. Wilton (Imp. Dict.) with Kasab, near the confluence of two streams (whence K. is derived) on the N.W. boundary of Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 9, xvii. 9, 10).

Kid. [See FOON, end, on the prohibition to "seethe" or boil it in its "mother's milk": Deut. xiv. 21.]

Kinah. A city in the S. border of Judah, next Edom (Josh. xv. 22). A Kenite settlement made directly after the fall of Jericho (Jud. i. 16). E. Wilton (Imp. Dict.) would read for "Eder, and Jagar, and K." "Arad and Hazor Kinah"; comp. LXX., "Ara and Isor and K." Some must be compound names, otherwise the list would exceed the number specified ver. 22.

King. Moses (Deut. xvii. 14-17) contemplated the contingency of a king being set up in Israel as in all the adjoining nations. The theocracy and the law could be maintained under kings as under a commonwealth. God's promise was, "kings of people shall be of Sarah" (Gen. xvii. 16). Other allusions to kings to come occur (xxxvi. 31, Num. xxiv. 17, Deut. xxviii. 36). The request of the people (1 Sam. viii. 5, etc.), "make us a king to judge us like all the nations," evidently is moulded after Deut. xvii. 14; so Samuel's language in presenting Saul to the people (1 Sam. x. 24) as "him whom the Lord hath chosen" alludes to Moses' direction (Deut. xvii. 15), "thou shalt in any wise set him king over thee whom the Lord thy God shall choose." It was not the mere desire for a king which is blamed, but the spirit of their request and the circumstances under which they made it. They set aside Samuel, though appointed by the heavenly King, on the pretext "behold thou art old," though he took a leading part in state affairs for 35 years afterwards (1 Sam. viii. 5), "they have not rejected thee but . . . Me (that I should not reign over them); they distrusted God's power and will to save them from Nahash (xii. 12), though He had delivered them from the Philistines (chap. vii.). Samuel's sons were corrupt, but that did not warrant their desire to set aside himself, whom none could accuse of corruption (chap. xii.). Impatience of God's yoke (the laws of the theocracy), eagerness to imitate the nations around, and unbelief in trial, instead of seeking for the cause of their misfortunes in themselves, were the sin of their request. God in retribution "gave them a king in His anger" (Hos. xiii. 10, 11). Samuel by God's direction warned them of the evil results of their desire, the prerogative to dispose of their property and their children at will, which he would claim; yet they refused to obey: "nay, but we will have a king, that we also may be like all the nations, and that the king may judge us and go out before us and fight our battles." The sacred record of Solomon's multiplying horses and chariots from Egypt, and foreign wives who turned away his heart, alludes to the prohibition (Deut. xvii. 16, 17; comp. vii. 3, 4; Exod. xxiv. 16), and proceeds to verify the prediction of the results of disobedience to it. God saves not by horses and horsemen, but by the Lord His people's God (Hos. i. 7). Moses' caution against "returning to Egypt" accords with his experience (Num. xiv. 4). After the kingdom was set up in Israel the danger was no longer of a literal (but see Jer. xli. 14) but of a spiritual backsliding return to Egypt (Hos. xi. 5; Isa. xxx. 1, 2, xxxvi. 9; Ezek. xvii. 15). Solomon's multiplication of horses and chariots from Egypt entailed constant traffic with that idolatrous nation, which the prohibition, Deut. xvii. 16, was designed to prevent.

The king when set up, as the judge previously, was but God's viceroy, enjoying only a delegated authority. The highpriest, priests, and Levites, as God's ministers, were magistrates as well as religious officers. Saul was elected by the Divine oracle from an obscure family, so that all saw his authority was held solely at God's pleasure. The king had the executive power under God; God reserved to Himself the executive. The words "Jehovah is our Judge, Jehovah is our Lawgiver, Jehovah is our King," embody the theocracy (Isa. xxxiii. 22). The land itself was His (Lev. xxv. 23, 42, 55); and the people, as His servants, could not be permanently bondservants to men. The king was closely connected with the priesthood, and was bound to "write (i.e. have written for him) a copy of the law out of that before the priests and Levites; he should read therein all his life, to keep all the words, that his heart might not be lifted up above his brethren, to the end that he might prolong his days in his kingdom" (Deut. xvii. 18-20). Instead of being, like Eastern kings, of a distinct royal caste, he was simply to be first among equals, like his subjects bound by the fundamental law of the nation (comp. Matt. xxiii. 9). None of the Israelite kings usurped the right to legislate. The people chose their king, but only in accordance with God's "choice" and from their "brethren" (1 Sam. ix. 15, x. 24, xvi. 12; 1 Kings xix. 16; 1 Chron. xxii. 10). The rule ("one from among thy brethren shalt thou set king over thee," Deut. xvii. 15) that no stranger should reign gives point to the question [see JESUS CHRIST], Matt. xxii. 17, "is it lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar?" (Jer. xxx. 21.) The unlimited polygamy of Eastern kings was forbidden. Samuel wrote down "the manner of the kingdom" (1 Sam. x. 25), i.e. the rights and duties of the king in relation to Jehovah the supreme King, and to the nation. Despotie murders were committed as that of the 85 priests at Nob, besides the other inhabitants, by Saul (1 Sam. xxii. 18, 19); but mostly the kings observed forms of law. Even Ahab did not seize at once Naboth's vineyard, but did it with the show of a trial. David slew Rechab and Baanah because they were self convicted of Ishbosheth's murder. The king was commander in chief, supreme judge, and imposer of taxes (Menahem, 2 Kings xv. 19, 20; Jehoiahim, xxiii. 35) and levies of men (1 Kings v. 13-15). He was "the Lord's anointed," consecrated with the holy oil heretofore reserved for the priests (Exod. xxx. 23-33; 1 Kings i. 39; 2 Sam. vi. 14; Ps. lxxxix. 19, 20, 26, 27; ii. 2, 6, 7). It was sacrilegious to kill him, even at his own request (1 Sam. xxiv. 5, 6, 10, xvi. 9, 16; 2 Sam. i. 14; Lam. iv. 20). Type of Messiah (Dan. ix. 26). The prophets were his advisers, reprovers (2 Sam. xii., 1 Kings xxi.) and intercessors with God (1 Kings xii. 21-24; Isa. xxxvii. 22-36; Jer. xxxvii. 17, xxxviii. 2, 4, 11-26). He was bound to consult God by the Urim and Thummim of the highpriest in every important step (1 Sam. xiv. 18, 19, xxviii. 6; 2 Sam. ii. 1, v. 19, 23). He held office on condition of loyalty to his supreme Lord. Saul, failing herein, forfeited his throne; self will soon usurped the place of God's will: "we inquired not at the ark in the days of Saul" (1 Chron. xiii. 3). David, on the contrary, could not bear that God's throne, the ark, should lie neglected whilst his throne was so elevated, and he stripped off his royal robe for the linen ephod to do homage before the symbol of God's throne (2 Sam. vi. 14). The king selected his successor, under God's direction, as David chose Solomon before the elder son Adonijah (1 Kings i. 30, ii. 22; 2 Sam. xii. 21, 25); comp. 2 Chron. xi. 21, 22, Rehoboam, Abijah: the firstborn was usually appointed (xxi. 3, 4). The queen mother was regent during a son's minority, and always held a high position of power at court (1 Kings ii. 19; 2 Kings xxiv. 12, 15, xi. 13; Athaliah).

His chief officers were the recorder, who wrote annals of his reign (2 Sam. viii. 16); the scribe or secretary wrote despatches and conducted his correspondence (ver. 17); the officer over the house, arrayed in a distinctive robe of office and girdle (Isa. xxii. 15, etc., xxxvi. 3); the king's friend or companion (1 Kings iv. 5); the captain of the body guard

(2 Sam. xx. 23; 1 Kings ii. 25, 34, 46), who was also chief executioner; the commander in chief under the king (2 Sam. iii. 30-39, xx. 23); his counsellor (xvi. 20-23, xvii. 1-14; 1 Chron. xxvii. 32). Besides demesnes, flocks, tenths (1 Sam. viii. 15), levies, he enjoyed a large revenue by "presents," which virtually became a regular tax.

Kingdom of heaven (Gr. "the heavens"); of God. The former is Matthew's phrase, the latter Mark's and Luke's. Derived from Dan. ii. 44, iv. 26, vii. 13, 14, 27. Messiah's kingdom, as a whole, both in its present spiritual invisible phase, the gospel dispensation of grace, and also in its future manifestation on earth in glory, when finally heaven and earth shall be joined (John i. 51; Rev. xxi., xxii.). Our Lord's parables designate several aspects and phases of it by the one common phrase, "the kingdom of the heavens," or "of God, is like," etc.

Kings, I. and II. Title. In LXX. the books are called "the third and fourth of the Kingdoms," in Vulg. "the third and fourth book of Kings." Originally the two were one; Bomberg in his printed editions, 1518, 1549, divided them into two. Three periods are included. The first (1 Kings i.—xi.), 1015-975 B.C., Solomon's ascent of the throne, wisdom, consolidation of his power, erection of the temple, 40 years' reigning over the undivided twelve tribes; the time of Israel's glory, except that towards the close of his reign his polygamy and idolatry caused a decline, and God threatened the disruption of the kingdom (xi.). The second period, from the division into two kingdoms to the Assyrian captivity of the ten northern tribes, 975-722 B.C. The third period, from thence, in Hezekiah's reign, till Judah's captivity in Babylon, 722-560 B.C., down to the 37th year of Jehoiachin's exile and imprisonment. The second period (xii. 1—2 Kings x.) comprises three stages: (1) the enmity at first between Judah and Israel from Jeroboam to Omri, 1 Kings xii. 1—xvi. 28; (2) the intermarriage between the royal houses of Israel and of Judah, under Ahab, down to the destruction of both kings, Joram of Israel and Ahaziah of Judah, by Jehu, 1 Kings xvi. 29—2 Kings x.; (3) the renewal of hostilities, from Jehu's accession in Israel and Athaliah's usurpation in Judah to Israel's captivity in Hezekiah's sixth year, xi.—xvii.

"The book is not a mere chronicle of kings' deeds and fortunes, but of their reigns in their spiritual relation to Jehovah the true, though invisible, King of the theocracy; hence it is ranked in the canon among "the prophets." The prophets therefore as His ministers, guardians of His rights, and interpreters of His counsel and will, come prominently forward in the book to maintain His prerogative before the kings His viceroys, and to counsel, warn, and punish as He who spoke in them deemed necessary, confirming their word by miraculous signs. Thus Samuel by His direction anointed Saul and David to reign over His people; Nathan announced God's promise that David's throne and seed should be for ever (2 Sam. vii.); then when he sinned Nathan announced his punishment, and on his repentance immediate forgiveness (xii.); similarly Gad (xiv.). Nathan announced Solomon's appointment as successor (xii. 25, 1 Chron. xxii. 9); anointed and installed him instead of Adonijah the elder brother (1 Kings i.). Thenceforth, David's seed having been established in Judah in conformity with God's promise (2 Sam. vii.), the prophets' agency in Judah was restricted to critical times and special cases requiring the expression of Jehovah's will in the way of either reproof of declension or encouragement of faithfulness. But in Israel their agency was more continuous and prominent, because of the absence of Jehovah's ordinary ministers the priests and Levites, and because of the state idolatry of the calves, to which Ahab added Baal worship. Jehovah appeared to Solomon at Gibeon shortly after his accession, again after his dedication of the temple, finally by a prophet, probably Ahijah, after his declension (1 Kings iii. 5, etc.; ix. 1, etc.; xi. 11, etc., 29). Elijah "the prophet as fire, whose words burned as a torch" (Eccl. xlviii. 1), as champion of Jehovah, defeated Baal's and Asherah's prophets at Carmel; and averted utter apostasy from northern Israel by banding God's prophets in schools where Jehovah's worship was maintained, and a substitute supplied for the legal temple worship enjoyed by the godly in Judah.

The choice and treatment of materials was determined by the grand theme of the book, viz. the progressive development of the kingdom of God historically, in conformity with the Divine promise through Nathan to David which is its germ: "I will set up thy seed after thee, and I will establish his kingdom . . . for ever. I will be his Father and he shall be My son; if he commit iniquity I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men; but My mercy shall not depart away from him, as I took it from Saul" (2 Sam. vii. 12-17). This is the guiding clue through the whole history. This book records its fulfilment, Jehovah prospering the pious kings of David's seed, chastising the backsliders, then casting away yet not for ever. Notwithstanding Adonijah's attempt, Solomon is at the outset recorded as receiving David's kingdom as Jehovah had promised; he receives at Gibeon the renewal of the promise, on condition of faithfulness, and in answer to his prayer receives wisdom, and also riches and honour which he had not asked for; then after rearing the temple receives God's confirmation of the promise conditionally, "if thou wilt walk before Me as David I will establish thy kingdom for ever; but if ye (thou and thy people) shall at all turn from following Me . . . then will I cut off Israel out of the land"; then in old age was sentenced for forsaking the covenant to have the kingdom rent from him and given to his servant; yet the grace unchangeably promised in 2 Sam. vii. mitigates the stroke, for David's sake the rending should take place not in Solomon's but in his son's days. Moreover one portion (Judah, also Benjamin, Simeon, and Dan in part [see ISRAEL and JUDAH]) was reserved with Jerusalem for David's seed, and should not go with the other ten tribes to Jeroboam.

The reigns of Israel's kings are more elaborately detailed, and previously to those of Judah, because Israel, with its crying evils requiring extraordinary prophetic interposition so frequently, furnished more materials for the theme of the book than Judah of which the development was more equable. All matters of important bearing on the kingdom of God in Judah are described fully. In both alike Jehovah appears as the gracious, long suffering God, yet the just punisher of the reprobate at last, but still for His covenant sake sparing and preserving a remnant, notwithstanding the idolatry of several even of Judah's kings (1 Kings xv. 4; 2 Kings viii. 19, xi. 1, 2). Jehovah promised, on condition of faithfulness, to Jeroboam too a sure house and the throne of Israel, but not for ever, only so long as the separate kingdom should last; for He added, "I will for this afflict the seed of David, but not for ever" (1 Kings xi. 38, 39). Judah survived Israel's destruction because of its firm political basis in the continuous succession of David's line, and its religious basis in the Divinely appointed temple and Levitical priesthood. But Ahaz' impiety (though counteracted in part by godly Hezekiah) and especially Manasseh's awful bloodshedding and idolatry (the effects of which on the people the faithful Josiah could only undo externally) at last provoked God to give up Judah too to captivity; so Jehoiachin first and Zedekiah last were led away to Babylon, and Jerusalem and the temple were destroyed. The book, in happy consonance with its design, closes with Jehoiachin's elevation from the prison to the highest throne of the vassal kings at Babylon, an earnest of brighter days to the covenant people, the first ray of the dawn of God's returning favour, and of His restoring the Jews, and of His fulfilling His promise that the kingdom and seed of David shall be for ever.

Relation to 1 and 2 Samuel. Characteristics. The opening "now" marks that the books of Kings continue the books of Samuel, carrying on the history of the development of the kingdom, as foretold in the fundamental promise (2 Sam. vii.). Nevertheless, the uniformity of the treatment of the history, and the unity of the language, mark that the work is independent of 1 and 2 Samuel. The author quotes from his original sources with standing formulas. He gives chronological notes: 1 Kings vi. 1 (the number 480 is a copyist's error [see CHRONOLOGY and JUDGES]), 37, 38; vii. 1; ix. 10; xi. 42; xiv. 20, 21, 25; xv. 1, 2, 9, 10. Moses' law is his standard for judging the kings (1 Kings ii. 3, xiii. 14; 2 Kings x. 31, xi. 12, xiv. 6, xvii. 37, xviii. 6, xxi. 8, xxii. 8, xxiii. 3, 21). He describes in the same phrase the beginning, character, and close of each reign (1 Kings xi. 43; xiv. 8, 20, 31; xv. 3, 8, 11, 24, 26, 31; xxii. 43, 51, 53; xvi. 19, 26, 30; 2 Kings ii. 2, 3; vii. 24; x. 20, 31; xii. 3; xiii. 2, 9, 11; xiv. 3, 20; xv. 3, etc.). Except variations occasioned by the difference of the sources employed, the language, style, vocabulary, and grammar are uniform throughout. Assyrian and Chaldean forms occur, found in Jeremiah, but not found in the earlier historical books (Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel): ekoh for eko (2 Kings vi. 13); akilah, meat (1 Kings xix. 8); almugim (x. 11, 12); omnoth, pillars (2 Kings xviii. 16); urath, stalls (1 Kings iv. 26); barburim, fowls (ver. 23); gahar, stretch (xviii. 42); apheer for epheer (xx. 38, 41); gab, husbandman (2 Kings xxv. 12); galum, wrap (ii. 8); dobroth, "floats" (1 Kings v. 9); Zif (vi. 1, 37); chapla, act secretly (2 Kings xvii. 9); yatziah, chamber (1 Kings vi. 5, 6, 10); ma'abeh, clay (vi. 40); nada, drive (2 Kings xvii. 21); neshi, debt (2 Kings iv. 7); sar, heavy (1 Kings xx. 43, xxi. 4, 5); pharvar, suburbs (2 Kings xxiii. 11); quab, measure (vi. 25); quabal, before (xv. 10); tahanath, camp (vi. 8); kothereth, chapter, mezuammeroth snuffers, both in Kings, Chronicles, and Jeremiah; mekoaah, base, in Ezra also. Reference is made to writings containing further information concerning particular kings, not introduced in Kings because not falling in with its design to set forth the kingdom of God.

Relation to Chronicles. The language of Kings bears traces of an earlier date. Chaldean forms are rare in Kings, numerous in Chronicles, which has also Persicisms not found in Kings. Chronicles is more comprehensive, comprising genealogies from Adam downwards, and David's reign; 1 Chron. xxviii.—2 Chron. xxxvi. 22 synchronises with 1 and 2 Kings. The prophets are prominent in Kings, as Nathan, Abijah, Elijah, Elisha, the prophet against the Bethel altar, Jonah, etc. The priestly and Levitical element is prominent in Chronicles, e.g. Hezekiah's purification of the temple, Josiah's passover (2 Chron. xxix.—xxxi., xxxv.). The Kings books were written whilst Israel was still fresh in memory; but Chronicles for the Jews only who no longer could have any intercourse with the half-bred Israelites of the N. (comp. 2 Chron. xx. 3, xxv.) Judah and Jerusalem are the chief subject of Chronicles, Israel is in the background. The reason is (see CHRONICLES), the author (probably Ezra) seeks to encourage the returned exiles to restore the temple, service and national polity as they were under the godly kings of David's line in Judah, whereas they had no existence in northern Israel. The idolatries of Solomon, Rehoboam, and Ahaz, etc., are less detailed, because the returned Jews were no longer prone to idolatry.

Unity of authorship. Nowhere in the books can interpolation or combination of different accounts be detected. The history is brought down to past the middle of the Babylonian captivity; yet no allusion occurs to the deliverance from it. The author was probably living with the Babylonian exiles. The Talmud (Baba Bathra, f. 15, § 1) makes him to be Jeremiah. Probably Jeremiah died in Egypt, and hardly lived till 66 years after his call to prophesy, i.e. the 37th year of Jehoiachin. Our author was doubtless acquainted with the prophecies of Jeremiah. The accounts, 2 Kings xxiv. 18, etc., and Jer. lii., are both extracts from a fuller account of Jerusalem's fall. Jer. lii. was probably written by some one else, as Jeremiah having recorded the history in the proper place (xxxix., xl.) was not likely to repeat it over again. But in favour of Jeremiah's authorship is the fact that certain words are used only in Kings and in Jeremiah: baqubugu, cruse (1 Kings xiv. 3, Jer. xix. 1, 10); yagab, husbandman (2 Kings xxv. 12, Jer. lii. 16); chabah, hide (1 Kings xxii. 25, Jer. xlix. 10); 'acar, to blind (2 Kings xxv. 7, Jer. xxxix. 7). The frequent reference to the pentateuch accords with the interest Jeremiah was sure to feel in the discovery under Josiah of the temple copy (Jer. xi. 3-5 comp. Deut. xxvii. 26; Jer. xxxii. 18-21 comp. Exod. xx. 6, vi. 6; Jer. xxxiv. 14 comp. Deut. xv. 12). Jeremiah's prophecies and Kings shed mutual light on one another, and have undesigned coincidences: 2 Kings xxv. 1-3, comp. Jer. xxxviii. 1-9, xxxix. 1-7; 2 Kings xxv. 11, 12, 18-21, comp. Jer. xxxix. 10-14, xl. 1-5; 2 Kings xxiv. 13, xxv. 13, comp. Jer. xxvii. 13-20, xxviii. 3-6; 2 Kings xxiv. 14 comp. Jer. xxiv. 1; 2 Kings xxi., xxii., xxiii., comp. Jer. vii. 15, xv. 4, xix. 3. The absence of mention of Jeremiah in Kings, though he was so prominent in the reigns of the last four kings, is just what we might expect if Jeremiah be the author of Kings. The mention of Seraiah and Zephaniah as slain by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings xxv. 18) accords with Jer. xxi. 1, xxix. 25-29, wherein Zephaniah appears as of the faction that opposed Jeremiah and was headed by priests and false prophets. Comp. also 2 Kings xxiv. 2, 7 with Jer. xxv. 9, 20, 21; xxxvii. 7, 8; xlii. 1-12.

Sources. For Solomon's acts the author mentions as his authority "the book of the acts of Solomon" (1 Kings xi. 41). For the affairs of Judah "the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah" (1 Kings xiv. 29, xv. 7, 23, xxii. 46; 2 Kings viii. 23, xii. 19). For Israel "the book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel" (1 Kings xiv. 19; xv. 31; xvi. 5, 14, 20, 27; xxii. 39; 2 Kings i. 18). Not the national archives kept by the "recorders" or kings' remembrancers; but annals compiled by prophets from the public yearbooks or national archives, and also from prophets' monographs, and collections of prophecies reaching in Israel to Pekah (2 Kings xv. 31), and in Judah to Jehoiakim (2 Kings xxiv. 5), the collection being worked into a book of the times of each kingdom shortly before the overthrow of Judah. The agreement between the books of Kings and 2 Chron. is due to both quoting from these same annals. The book of Chronicles embodies also writings of individual prophets, as Isaiah, Iddo, and Jehu, beside the daybooks of the kings (2 Chron. xx. 34, xxxii. 32). Some of the prophets' individual writings were received into the annals. No public annalists had place in northern Israel. The formula "to this day" refers to the time of the still existing kingdom of Judah, towards its close, and emanated from the sources employed, not from the author of Kings, for it is common to Kings and Chronicles (1 Kings viii. 8, see below, 2 Chron. v. 9; 1 Kings ix. 21 comp. 2 Chron. viii. 8; 1 Kings xii. 19 comp. 2 Chron. x. 19; 2 Kings viii. 22 comp. 2 Chron. xxi. 10. Also xxix. 29, "the books of Samuel the seer, Nathan the prophet, and Gad the seer," answer to "the book of the acts of Solomon" in 1 Kings xi. 41, and 2 Chron. ix. 29, "the book of Nathan the prophet, the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite, and the visions of Iddo the seer against Jeroboam." "The book of the acts of Solomon" was much earlier than the annals of Israel and Judah. The composition of the annals by prophets accounts for the prominence given to Elijah and Elisha.

Impartial candour and reference of all things to the standard of the law characterize the composition. The great Solomon's faults and any grace in northern Israel's kings are undisguisedly narrated; so also the destruction of the very temple where God manifested His glory. Even Elijah's temporary weakness of faith in fleeing from Jezebel is told as candidly and faithfully as his marvellous boldness for God. In 1 Kings viii. 8 the staves of the ark in the holy place the author says "are unto this day"; this must be a retention of the words of his source, for he survived the destruction of the temple (2 Kings xxv.). The repetitions are due to the same cause (1 Kings xiv. 21, 31; 2 Kings xiii. 12, 13; xiv. 15, 16; ix. 14, 15; viii. 28, 29; also 1 Kings xiv. 30, xv. 6). The writer interposes in his quotations his own Spirit-taught reflections (2 Kings xiii. 23, xxi. 10-16, xvii. 7-23, 32-41).

Canonical authority. The books have always stood in the second division of the Jewish canon, "the prophets" (nebi'im), being of prophetic composition and theme (see above, the beginning), viz. God's administration through His prophets in developing the theocratic kingdom under kings. Our Lord thrice refers to the book, speaking of Solomon, the queen of Sheba, and the widow of Sarepta and Naaman (Matt. vi. 29; xii. 42; Luke iv. 25-27). Also Paul refers to Elias' intercession against Israel, and God's answer about the 7000 who bowed not to Baal (Rom. xi. 2-4). Also James as to Elias' prayer for drought, then for rain (Jas. v. 17, 18; Rev. xi. 6). Elisha's charge to Gehazi (2 Kings iv. 23) is repeated in our Lord's charge (Luke x. 4); the raising of the Shunammite's son is referred to, Heb. xi. 35; Jezebel is referred to, Rev. ii. 20.

Confirmation from secular history and monuments. The Egyptian king Psinaches' patronage of Hadad the Edomite (1 Kings xi. 19, 20); Solomon's alliance with his successor Pseusennes who reigned 35 years; Shishak's (Sesonchis I.) accession towards the close of Solomon's reign (ver. 40); his conquest of Judaea under Rehoboam, represented on a monument still at Karnak which mentions "the king of Judah," the time of the Ethiopian dynasty of So (Sabak) and Tirhakah, of the 25th dynasty; the rise and speedy fall of Syrian power, Assyria overshadowing it; the account of Mesha harmonizing with the DIBON [see] stone; Assyria's struggles with Egypt, and Babylon's sudeu supremacy under Nebuchadnezzar over both Assyria and Egypt; all these notices in Kings accord with independent pagan history and inscriptions. The names of Omri, Mesha, Jehu, Menahem, Hoshea, Hezekiah, are deciphered in inscriptions of campaigns of Tiglath Pileser, Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon.

Contemporary prophets, as Isaiah, with Ahaz and Hezekiah, Jeremiah with Jehoiakim and Zedekiah, elucidate the histories of Kings just as the epistles of N. T. are commentaries on Acts.

Kir. A wall, or place fortified with a wall. 1. An Armenian region subject to Assyria, Kurgistan or Georgia between the Black and Caspian seas (Isa. xxii. 6). The river Kur (Cyrus) in it falls into the Caspian Sea. From Kir the Syrians migrated originally; and to it they were removed from Damascus by Tiglath Pileser (2 Kings xvi. 9). Esarhaddon had subdued Armenia (according to Assyrian inscriptions: Rawlinson Herodot. i. 481), warring with it as the harbourer of his father Sennacherib's two parricidal murderers (Amos i. 5, ix. 7). Keil thinks Kir to be Kurena along the river Mardus in Media, or else Karine a town in Media, on the ground that the remote parts of Ariacenia were beyond the Assyrian empire (2 Kings xix. 37); but Esarhaddon subdued it. The LXX., Vulg., and Targum rendering "Cyrene" favour Keil. 2. KIR HARESH, HERES, HARESETH, HARESETH, or OF MOAB. From harith "a hill"

(Arabic), or heres "baked clay," viz., the walls being of brick (?). Moab's two strongholds were Ar (mother) of Moab, the metropolis, and Kir of Moab (2 Kings iii. 25) on the most elevated hill in the country (Isa. xvi. 7, 11; xv. 1; 2 Kings iii. 25; Jer. xlviii. 31, 36). Here the Moabite king made his last stand against confederate Israel, Judah, and Edom [see DIBON]. Here he sacrificed his son and so created "indignation against Israel," because they had reduced him to such an awful extremity; the Israelites' own superstitious fears were excited and they withdrew from the expedition; then followed Mesha's victorious campaign recorded on the DIBON stone. Now Kerak, capital of Moab, on the top of a hill 3000 feet above the Dead Sea, surrounded on all sides by deep ravines, and these by hills whence the Israelite slingers hurled when they could not take the place; entered by a tunnel through the solid rock for 100 feet distance; a deep rock bawn moat separates the massive citadel from the town. Kiriah is the archaic term; Ir and Ar the more recent terms for a city. Kereth the Phœnician form appears in Carthage, Cirta. In the Bible we have Kerioth (i.e. "the cities"). Karah, Kurtan (Josh. xxi. 32, xv. 25; Jer. xlviii. 23, 24, 41; Amos ii. 2).

Kiriathaim. 1. Num. xxxii. 37, Josh. xiii. 19. A town of Reuben. Belonged first to the Emim (Gen. xiv. 5) Shaveh Kiriathaim, "the plain of K.," or of the two cities) whom the Moabites dispossessed before the exodus (Deut. ii. 10, 11). Moab lost and recovered K. when the transjordanic tribes were carried captive (Jer. xlviii. 1, 23; Ezek. xxv. 9). 2. K. of Naphtali, assigned to the Levitical Gershonites (1 Chron. vi. 76).

Kirjath Arba=the city of Arba the Anakite (Gen. xiii. 18, xxiii. 2; Josh. xv. 15, xv. 54, xx. 7, xxi. 11; Neh. xi. 25). Hebron was the original name, then Mamre (the sacred grove near the town), then K. Caleb restored the name HEBRON [see].

Kirjath Huzoth=city of streets. In Moab. Thither Balak led Balaam (Num. xxii. 36, 39, 41). Between the Arnon and Bamoth Baal.

Kirjath Jearim=city of forests. Ps. cxxxii. 6, "we (David and his people) when in Ephrath heard of the ark" as a hearsay, not as the religious centre of the nation as when it was in Shiloh; "we found it in the fields of the wood," i.e. in Kirjath Jearim, the forest town, where it lay neglected under Saul after its restoration by the Philistines (1 Sam. vi. 21, vii. 1; 2 Sam. vi. 2, 3, 4). David brought it up to Zion. Its other names BAALAH, BAAL of Judah, KIRJATH BAAL, betray its original connection with Baal worship (Josh. xv. 9, 60, xviii. 14; 1 Chron. xiii. 3, 6). Contracted into Kirjatharim (Ezra ii. 25). Called simply Kirjath and assigned to Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 28). Now Kuryet el Enab, "the city of grapes," on the right bank of a long wady, with a fine old church, stone houses grouped round two or three castle-like houses, the hereditary residences of the family of Abu Ghaush, a marauding chief, amidst olive groves and terraced slopes. But Chaplin identifies Kirjath Jearim with the village Soba, mount Seir on Judah's border being Batn el Saghir. Caleb's son Shobal was the father or founder over again of Kirjath Jearim (1 Chron. ii. 50-53). It was one of the four Gibeonite cities which obtained peace with Israel by deceit (Josh. ix. 17).

Kirjath Sannah=city of palms (Gesenius), city of doctrine (Bochart). It was in the mountains of Judah, not the usual habitat of palms, rather it was the Canaanite centre of religious teaching (Josh. xv. 49)=KIRJATH SEPIER, "city of a book." Joshua took it and slew its king and inhabitants (x. 38, 39; xii. 13). It was then called also Debir (an inner place, viz. among the mountains) in the centre of Judah, not the Debir on the N.E. frontier (xv. 7, 15, 16, xi. 21, xxi. 15; Jud. i. 11, 12). Assigned now Debirban on a hill an hour's distance W. from Hebron; but more probably Dhoheriyeh: see Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., Jan. 1875, p. 48.

Kish=bow. 1. Saul's father, son of Abiel, of Benjamin, brother of Abner (1 Sam. ix. 1, 21, xiv. 51). 1 Chron. viii. 33 passes over many intermediate links between Saul and Ner, the son of Abi (the father) of Gibeon. 2. A descendant of Benjamin, of the family of Gibeon, distinct from Saul's father (1 Chron. viii. 30). 3. A Merarite Levite, son of Abdi, in Hezekiah's days; sanctified himself to cleanse the temple (2 Chron. xxix. 12). The Levitical house under its chief, rather than an individual, is meant here by K. 4. 1 Chron. xxiii. 21=KISHI, ancestor of Ethan the minstrel (1 Chron. vi. 44, xv. 17)=KUSHIAH. 5. Esth. ii. 5.

Kishon, or Kishion. A town on Issachar's border, allotted to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. xix. 20, xxi. 28).

Kishon River=bent like a bow. A torrent (nachal), perennial for eight miles. Fed from sources along the whole plain of Jezreel as far S.E. as Engannim or Jenin, and as far N.E. as Tabor and mount Gilboa ("Little Hermon"). Springs of mount Carmel and the Samaria range on the S. and the mountains of Galilee on the N., and wady el Malek, supply its perennial part. The scene of Sisera's defeat and of Elijah's slaying of Baal's prophets (Jud. iv. 7, 13, v. 19, 21; Ps. lxxxiii. 9; 1 Kings xviii. 40). The only notice of K. elsewhere is as "the torrent facing Jokneam" (now Kaimam) (Josh. xix. 11). Now nahr Mukatta, flowing N.W. through the Jezreel (Esdrælon) plain to the bay of Acca and the Mediterranean. "That ancient river" (Jud. v. 21): the torrent of the olden times, i.e. the scene of similar battles of old, for Esdrælon was always a great battle field of Palestine, nachal qudumim. It breaks by a narrow pass beneath the height Harothich (perhaps ẕāin to "Harosheth") into the Aero or Aeca plain. The spring of Lejjan answers probably to "the waters of Megiddo," and is a feeder of K. Here and at Tannach Barak assembled his forces. But the battle was fought at mount Tabor, 15 miles off. For Ps. lxxiii. 10 says, "the Canaanites perished at Endor" on the S. side of mount Tabor, to which the kings had marched from the S. Conder identifies "the waters of Megiddo" with the springs which flow from the mound of Majdala ruin, and the countless streams in the valley of Jezreel (Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., Oct. 1877, p. 191). The upper K. swells into a torrent with deep mud in the sudden rain storms in winter and spring; here in the swamps, from which the main stream of the K. rises, the Canaanites fleeing perished in numbers.

At the extreme E. of Carmel is the spot El Maharak, "the burning," the scene of Elijah's sacrifice, a rocky height abruptly shooting up on the E. Nowhere does K. run so close to Carmel as beneath Mahraka, from which the descent to it is by a steep ravine. Mahraka is 1035 ft. above the sea and 1000 above K.; this height one could go up and down in the short time allowed in 1 Kings xviii. 19-14. Moreover, nearer than this water could be got at the vaulted fountain in the form of a tank with steps down to it, 250 ft. beneath the altar plateau.

Kiss. The customary salutation in the East as a mark of respect or affection (Gen. xxvii. 26, S. of Sol. i. 2, Luke vii. 15); hence the token used by the hypocrite to pretend love (2 Sam. x. 5 Absalom; Matt. xxvi. 48 Judas). The "kiss of charity" or love, "an holy kiss" (pure and chaste), was the pledge of Christian brotherhood (Apostol. Const. ii. 57, viii. 11) in the early church (Justin Martyr, Apology i. 65), especially at the Lord's supper, when the kiss was passed through the congregation, the men kissing the men, the women the women (Rom. xvi. 16, 1 Cor. xvi. 20, 2 Cor. xiii. 12, Acts xv. 37, 1 Thess. v. 26, 1 Pet. v. 14). Tertullian calls it (de Orat. 14) "the kiss of peace." Not a mere conventional salutation, "the mystic kiss" (Clemens Alex. Pædag. iii. 10), i.e. symbolising union in Christ. A kiss was the mark also of reverence and subjection. So Samuel after anointing Saul kissed him (1 Sam. x. 1). Also used in religious "adoration" (derived from ad os "to the mouth," viz. kissing the hand in homage), whether of idols (Job xxxi. 27, 1 Kings xix. 18, Hos. xiii. 2) or of Jehovah (Ps. ii. 12). So the Mahometans kiss the Kaaba at Mecca.

Kite: ayyah (Lev. xi. 14). The red kite, Milvus regalis, remarkable for its sharp sight (Job xxviii. 7, where for "vulture" transl. "kite," ayyah, even its eye fails to penetrate the miner's hidden "path"; Deut. xiv. 13). From an Arabic root "to turn," the kite sailing in circles guided by the rudder-like tail. The phrase "after its kind" implies that a genus or class of birds, not merely one individual, is meant. The bony orbits of the eye and the eye itself are especially large in proportion to the skull, in all the Raptores. The sclerotic plates enclose the eye as in a hoop, in the form of a goblet with a trumpet rim; by this the eye becomes a self-adjusting telescope to discern near or far objects. Hence, when a beast dies in a wilderness, in a very short time kites and vultures, invisible before to man, swoop in spiral circles from all quarters towards it.

Kithlish = dashing down of the lion, from Kathath laish. A town of Judah in the shephelah or lower hills (Josh. xv. 40). Now El Jilas, Traces of the "lion" abound on all sides; in the plains of Dan on the N. (Deut. xxxiii. 22, Jud. xiv. 5), in the uplands of Judah on the E. (Gen. xlix. 9, 1 Sam. xvii. 34), and in "the S.," the droughty land between Palestine and Egypt (2 Sam. xxiii. 20, Isa. xxx. 6).

Kitron. A town allotted to Zebulun, but not wrested from the Canaanites (Jud. i. 30). Probably the same as Kattath in Josh. xix. 15.

Knife. Originally of flakes of stone or flint, which was retained for sacred purposes as circumcision, even after the introduction of bronze, iron, and steel (Exod. iv. 25, Josh. v. 2 marg.). The Egyptians never used bronze or steel in preparing the mummies, stone being regarded as purer and more sacred. Used little at meals, but for slaughtering animals and cutting up carcases (Gen. xxii. 6, Lev. vii. 33, 34). Also by scribes for making and mending the reed pen (Jer. xxxvi. 23, "penknife"; see also 1 Kings xviii. 28). [See CIVILIZATION and JOSHUA.]

Knop. Our "knob" (Exod. xxv. 31-36, xxxvii. 17-22). (1) Kaphor, pomegranate-like knops or balls, associated with flowers in architectural ornamentation, also a boss from which, as crowning the stem, branches spring out. In Amos ix. 1 instead of "lintel" (Kaphor), and Zeph. ii. 11 transl. "the sphere-like capital of the column." The Heb. implies something crowning a work and at its top. (2) Pepu'ia (1 Kings vi. 18, vii. 24), gourdlike oval ornaments running in straight rows, carved in the cedar wainscot of the temple interior, and an ornament cast round the great "sea" below the brim; in double row, ten to a cubit, two inches from centre to centre (1 Kings vi. 18, vii. 24). Papu'oth means wild gongs.

Koa. Ezek. xxxiii. 23. "Pekoa (visitation) and Shoa (rich) and Koa" (noble). Babylon is the land of visitation; actively, visiting with judgment Judah; passively, to be visited with judgment (Jer. i. 21). Marg. "rich and noble" in her prosperity above all kingdoms. Maurer explains, "the Babylonians and all the Chaldeans (Pekod), prefects (Shoa and Koa), rich," etc.

Kothath = assembly. Levi's second son; came down to Egypt with Levi and Jacob (Gen. xli. 11). Died 133 years old (Exod. vi. 16, 18). From him sprang Moses and Aaron (1 Chron. vi. 2); but AMRAM [see] their father is separated from the Amram, Kothath's son, by many omitted links in the genealogy, for at the exodus Kothath's posterity numbered 2750 between 30 and 50 years old (Num. iv. 35, 36), and the males young and old 8660, divided into the Amramites, Izharites, Hebronites, and Uzzielites (iii. 25-27, etc.). Their charge on the march was on the S. side of the tabernacle, to bear (iv. 15) the ark, the table, the candlestick, the altars, and vessels of the sanctuary, and the hangings, but not to take off the coverings put on by the sons of Aaron or touch them, on pain of death; Uzzab's fatal error (2 Sam. vi. 6, 7). They held high office as judges and rulers in things sacred and secular, and keepers of the dedicated treasures, and singers in the sanctuary (1 Chron. xxvi. 23-32, 2 Chron. xx. 19). Samuel was a Kothathite, and therefore so was He-man the singer, Samuel's descendant. Their inheritance was in Manasseh, Ephraim, and Dan (1 Chron. vi. 61-74; Josh. xxi. 5, 20-26).

Kolaiah. 1. Neh. xi. 7. 2. Jer. xxix. 21, 22.

Korah = ball. 1. Esau's son, by Aholibamah (Gen. xxxvi. 5, 14, 18). A duke of Edom, born in Canaan before Esau migrated to mount Seir. 2. Sprung from Elipbaz (xxxvi. 16), but probably it is a copyist's error from ver. 18. One MS. of the Samaritan pentateuch omits it. 3. A son of Hebron, descended from Judah (1 Chron. ii. 43).

4. Son (or descendant) of Izhar, son of Kothath, son of Levi. Ring-leader of the rebellion against Moses and Aaron (Num. xvi. xxvi. 9-11); the one solitary anecdote recorded of the 35 years' wandering, uncircumcision, and shame. Not content with his honourable post as a Levite "minister" to the sanctuary, K. "sought the priesthood also." Associated with him in the rebellion Dathan, Abiram, and On (the last is not mentioned subsequently), sprung from Reuben, who sought to regain the forfeited primogeniture and the primacy of their own tribe among Israel's tribes (1 Chron. v. 1). The punishment answered to the Reubenites' sin; their pride was punished by "Reuben's men being made few," so that Moses prayed "let Reuben live and not die," i.e. be saved from extinction (Deut. xxxiii. 6). Elizaphan of the youngest branch, descended from Uzziel (Num. iii. 27, 30), was preferred before K. of the elder Izharite branch and made "chief of the house of the father of the families of the Kothathites"; hence probably arose his pique against Moses. With the undesigned coincidence which characterizes truth we find the Reubenites encamped next the Kothathites, so the two were conveniently situated for plotting together (Num. ii.). K. with "250 princes of the assembly, famous in the congregation, men of renown" (not restricted to the tribe of Reuben: xxvii. 3), said to Moses and Aaron, "ye take too much upon you, seeing all the congregation are holy, every one of them, and the Lord is among them" (comp. Exod. xix. 6). The Kenbenites' sin was in desiring to set aside all special ministries, in which K. to gain their support joined them ostensibly; he did not really wish to raise the people to a level with the Levites, but the Levites alone to the level of the priests. K.'s sin answers to that of sacerdotalist ministers who, not content with the honour of the ministry (nowhere in the N. T. are Christian ministers called "sacrificing" or "sacerdotal priests," hieries, a term belonging in the strict and highest sense to Jesus alone; restricted to Him and the Aaronic and pagan priests, and spiritually applied to all Christians: Matt. viii. 4; Acts xiv. 13; Heb. v. 6; Rev. i. 6, v. 10, xx. 6; 1 Pet. ii. 5, 9), usurp Christ's sacrificing and mediatorial priesthood; also to that of all men who think to be saved by their own doings instead of by His mediatorial work for us (Acts iv. 12). The Kenbenites' sin answers to that of those who would set aside all ministers on the ground that all Christians are priests unto God. The fact that all Christians are "kings unto God" does not supersede the present need of kings and rulers, to whom the people delegate some of their rights and liberties. Moses gave them a respite for repentance till the morrow: "take you censers, fire, and incense before the Lord to-morrow . . . the man whom the Lord doth choose . . . shall be holy; ye take too much upon you, ye sons of Levi," retorting their own words. Men often charge others with the very sin which they themselves are committing. On Moses' sending for Dathan and Abiram they would not come, they retorted his own words: "is it a small thing (Num. xiv. 9, 13) that thou hast brought us up out of a land that floweth with milk and honey . . . thou hast not brought us into a land that floweth with milk and honey," etc. With studied profanity they describe Egypt as that which God had described Canaan to be, "Wilt thou put out the eyes of these men?" i.e. throw dust in their eyes, blind them to your non-fulfilment of your fine promises. Dathan and Abiram, their wives and children, stood at the door of their tents as though defying Moses to do his worst, when Moses by Jehovah's command told the people to get up from about the tabernacle of K., Dathan, and Abiram, i.e. from the tabernacle which these had set up in common opposition to the great tabernacle of the congregation. The three are mentioned here together as joined in a common cause though not now together locally. So the earth "clave asunder and swallowed up their houses and all the men (but not the sons, who probably shrunk from their father's sin and escaped: xxvi. 11) belonging unto K.," viz. all who joined him in rebellion, viz. Dathan, Abiram, and their children. K.'s tent stood with the Kohathites, forming part of the inner line immediately S. of the tabernacle. Dathan's and Abiram's, as in the outer line on the same side, were contiguous to K.'s tent, yet sufficiently separate to admit of his tent not being swallowed up as was theirs. Fire from Jehovah (probably from the altar, Lev. x. 1-7) consumed K. and the 250 incense offerers who were apart, "at the door of the tabernacle" (Num. xvi. 18, 19, 33-35). In ver. 27 K. is not mentioned with Dathan and Abiram, which shows that K. himself was elsewhere, viz. at the tabernacle door, when they were swallowed up. Thus the impression on a superficial reading of chap. xvi., that K., Dathan and Abiram, and the men and goods of all three alike, were swallowed up, on a closer inspection is done away, and chap. xvi. appears in minute and undesigned harmony with xxvi. 10, 11. Similarly Ps. cvi. 17, 18, distinguishes the end of Dathan and Abiram from K.: "the earth . . . swallowed up Dathan and . . . the company of Abiram. And a fire was kindled in their company," viz. K. and the 250; these, having sinned by fire in offering incense, were retributively punished by fire. K. had no opportunity of collecting his children about him, being away from his tent; he only had all the men of his family who abetted his rebellion along with him at the door of the tabernacle. "Despising dominion and speaking evil of dignities" is the sin of K. and he "perished by gainsaying," i.e. speaking against Moses, a warning to all self-sufficient despisers of authority. The effect of this terrible warning on the survivors of K. was that the family attained high distinction subsequently. Samuel was a Korhite (1 Chron. vi. 22-28). Korhites under David had the chief place in keeping the tabernacle doors (1 Chron. vi. 32-37), and in the psalmody (ix. 19, 33). Eleven psalms are inscribed with their name as the authors (xlii., xlv., xlv., xlv., xlvii., xlviii., xlix., lxxxix., lxxxv., lxxxvii., lxxxviii.; comp. 2 Chron. xx. 19). [See JEHOSEPHAT.] Their subject and tone are pleasant and cheerful, free from anything sad or harsh (Origen, Homily on 1 Sam.), more sublime and vehement than David's psalms, and glowing with spirituality and unction. Assir, Elkamah, and Abiasaph were respectively the son, grandson, and great grandson of K. (Exod. vi. 24, comp. 1 Chron. vi. 22, 23-27.)

Kore. 1. 1 Chron. xxvi. 1, ix. 19.
2. 2 Chron. xxxi. 14.

Koz. Ezra ii. 61, Neh. iii. 4, 21.

Laadah. Shelah's son, Judah's grandson; father, i.e. founder, of Mareshah of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 21).

Laadan. 1. 1 Chron. vii. 26. 2. Elsewhere LADAI (1 Chron. vi. 17, xxiii. 7-9, xxvi. 21).

Laban = white. Bethuel's son; grandson of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen. xxviii. 5, xxix. 5). Rebekah's brother (xxiv. 29-31, 50, 51, 55). It was "when he saw the curving and bracelets" given by Eliezer to Rebekah he was lavish in his professions of hospitality, "come in thou blessed of the Lord; wherefore standest thou without?" etc. Bethuel either had just died (Josephus, Ant. i. 16, and Heb. tradition) or was of weak character, so that L. is prominent in arranging for Rebekah's marriage to Isaac [see BETHUEL]; but Niebuhr observes Eastern custom, then as now, gave brothers the main share in defending sisters' honour and settling as to their marriage (xxix. 13, Jud. xxi. 22, 2 Sam. xiii. 20-29). Active and stirring, but selfish and grasping. By his daughters Leah and Rachel he was progenitor of Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah (of which tribe Christ came), Issachar, and Zebulun, one half of the whole Israelite nation, besides Dinah. When Abraham emigrated to Canaan the part of the family to which L. belonged remained in Haran (Gen. xxvii. 43, xxix. 1, etc.). Ungenerously he took 14 years of Jacob his nephew's service, when Jacob had covenanted with him for seven only; he tried to retain his labour without paying his labour's worth (xxxi.). Ten times (i.e. very frequently, Num. xiv. 22) he changed his wages when constrained to remunerate him; and as a covetous master made Jacob accountable for all of the flock that were stolen or torn. Jacob, during the absence of L., sheepshearing, stole away with his family and flocks, crossing the Euphrates for the W.; on the third day L. heard of it, and after seven days overtook him E. of Jordan. His daughters felt they had no longer inheritance or interest in their father's house, as L. had sold them, as if strangers, to Jacob for his service, and took all the profit of that service to himself, virtually, said they, "devouring our money" (Gen. xxxi. 14-16), i.e. consuming the property brought to him by Jacob's service for us. Rachel stole the teraphim perhaps to ensure a prosperous journey. L. would have still sent him empty away but for God's interposition. L. then, suppressing in silence what had been his design really, pretended that his displeasure was only at Jacob's secret departure and the theft of his gods (xxxi. 5, 7, 9, 13, 16, 21, 26, 27, 29, 42), and that otherwise he would have "sent him away with songs, tabret, and harp." L. could cloak his covetousness with hypocrisy too. When about to make merchandise of his own kinsman, he said to Jacob at their first meeting "surely thou art my bone and my flesh."

[On the length of Jacob's service, 40 years probably, see JACOB.] L. imposed at the first seven years' close the unattractive Leah on him instead of the younger Rachel whom he loved and for whom he had served. Yet he was shrewd enough to appreciate the temporal prosperity which Jacob's presence by his piety brought with it, but he had no desire to imitate his piety (xxx. 27), and finally, when foiled by God in his attempts to overreach and rob Jacob, L. made a covenant with him, of which the cairn was a memorial, called by L. JEGAR SAHADUTHA, and by Jacob GALEED and MIZPAH [see]; it was also to be the bound beyond which neither must pass to assail the other.

Unscrupulous duplicity and acquisitiveness and hypocritical craft in L. were overruled to discipline Jacob whose natural character had much of the same elements, but without the hypocrisy, and restrained by genuine grace. L. was overmatched by Jacob's shrewdness, and restrained from doing him real hurt by God's interposition. Henceforth Israel's connection with the family of Haran ceased; providentially so, for the incipient idolatry and cunning worldliness of the latter could only influence for evil the former.

Laban=whiteness, possibly alluding to the white poplars growing near. Deut. i. 1. Perhaps Libnah (Num. xxxiii. 20); near the Euphratic gulf or the Arabian desert. The name may be preserved in El Beyaneh, W. of the Arabian, N. of Ezion Geber.

Lachish. A royal Canaanite city which joined the confederacy against Gibeon for submitting to Israel, and was taken by Joshua (xii. 11, x. 3, 5, 31, 32) "on the second day," which shows its strength; the other cities were taken in one day (ver. 35). Assigned to Judah, in the shephelah or "low hilly country" (xv. 33, 39). Rehoboam fortified it (2 Chron. xi. 9). To L. Amaziah fled from the conspirators, and was slain there (2 Kings xiv. 19, 2 Chron. xxv. 27). Sennacherib was at L. when Hezekiah begged peace. Thence he sent his first message to Hezekiah by Rabshakeh, and then having left L. to war against Libnah, from the latter sent again (2 Kings xviii. 14, 17, xiv. 8). The strength of L. as a fortress is implied in 2 Chron. xxxii. 9, "Sennacherib laid siege against L. and all his power with him." It held out against Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxxiv. 7). Sennacherib's siege of L. is still to be seen at Koyunjik represented on the slabs of his palace walls as successful, with the inscription "Sennacherib, the mighty king of Assyria, sitting on the throne of judgment before the city of L., I give permission for its slaughter." The Assyrian tents appear pitched within the walls, and the foreign worship going on. The town, as in Scripture, is depicted as on hilly ground, one part higher than the other. The background shows a hilly country covered with vines and figtrees; but immediately round the town are palms, indicating its nearness to the maritime plain where the palm best flourishes. His boasted success is doubtful from 2 Chron. xxxii. 1, "Sennacherib encamped against the fenced cities, and thought to win them for himself"; 2 Kings xix. 8, Jer. xxxiv. 7. L. was foremost in adopting some of the northern idolatry. Hence Micah (i. 13) warned the inhabitants of L. to flee on the swift beast (there is a play of like sounds between L. and rechesh), Sennacherib being about to make it his head quarters, for "she is the beginning of the sin to the daughter of Zion, for the transgressions of Israel were found in thee." The Jews returning from Babylon re-occupied L. (Neh. xi. 30.) Now Una Lakis, on a low round swell, with a few columns and fragments; in the middle of the plain, on Sennacherib's road to Egypt, whither he was marching, according to Robinson. Rather it answers to the great mound of Tel el Hesi ("hillock of the water-pit"), ten miles from Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin), and not far from Ajlon (Eglon). Hesi is a corruption of L., the Heb. caph being changed into the guttural. Tel el Hesi commands the approach to the hills (Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., Jan. 1878, p. 19, 20).

Lael. Num. iii. 24.

Lahad. 1 Chron. iv. 2.

Lahmam. A town in the shephelah or rolling hills of Judah (Josh. xv. 40). From the same root as Bethlehem, "the house of bread." Now El Hamam, six miles S.E. of Ajlon or Eglon, in a wheat producing region.

Lahmi. 1 Chron. xx. 5. [See EL-HANAN and JAAKE OREGIM.] 2 Sam. xxi. 19.

Laish=lion, L. being near its haunt, the wooded slopes of Bashan, Hermon, and Lebanon, and the jungles of lake Merom (see Dent. xxxiii. 22, "Dan . . . a lion's whelp . . . shall leap from Bashan"; also S. of Sol. iv. 8). DAN [see] called also Leshem (Jud. xviii. 7, 14, 27, 29; Josh. xix. 47). In Isa. x. 30, "cause it to be heard unto L." (i.e. shriek so as to be heard to the utmost northern boundary of the land) may refer to the L. at the source of the Jordan, four miles W. of Banias or Caesarea Philippi. But probably it refers to another L., a village between Gallim and Anathoth, which are mentioned in the context; near Jerusalem. Then transl. "hearken, O Laishah"; "answer (uniyah, Anathoth, a play on similar sounds and sense) her, O Anathoth" (=responses, i.e. echoing the shriek of Gallim). [See LASHA.]

Laish. Father of PHALTEL (Saul's daughter, Michal's husband) of GALLIM, a coincidence with the conjunction of the same names "L." and "Gallim" (Isa. x. 30, 1 Sam. xxv. 44, 2 Sam. iii. 15).

Lakum, Lakkum=stopping the way. On Naphtali's boundary, between Jabneel and Jordan (Josh. xix. 33). E. Wilton makes L. to be E. of Jordan; for Dent. xxxiii. 23, "possess thou the sea (yam) and the many district" (Speaker's Comm. Daron, E. Wilton "the circuit"), may imply, Naphtali possessed the entire basin, shut in by mountains, which contained the upper Jordan and lakes Merom and Tiberias. Josephus says Naphtali included the eastern parts. Tabariyeh (Tiberias) includes the E. as well as W. of the lake. E. Wilton identifies L. with Arkub E. of the lake. The meaning of L. accords, rugged rocks stopping the way along the S.E. shore. Lieut. Conder however identifies L. with Kefr Kama (Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., Jan. 1878, p. 19).

Lamb. The sacrificial type of the Lamb of God, therefore the most frequent victim (Isa. liii. 7, John i. 29; taleh, Isa. lxx. 25, "a sucking lamb," 1 Sam. vii. 9, whence comes the Aramaic talittha, "maid," Mark v. 41). Kebe, keseb, a lamb from the first to the third year; offered in the daily morning and evening sacrifice (Exod. xxix. 38-41), on the sabbath (Num. xxviii. 9), at the new moon feasts (ver. 11), that of trumpets (xxix. 2), of tabernacles (ver. 13-40), pentecost (Lev. xxiii. 18-20), pass-over (Exod. xii. 5), at the dedication of the tabernacle (Num. vii.), Aaron's consecration (Lev. ix. 3), Solomon's coronation (1 Chron. xxix. 21), Hezekiah's purification of the temple (2 Chron. xxix. 21), Josiah's passover (xxxv. 7), women's purification after childbirth (Lev. xii. 6), at a leper's cleansing (xiv. 10-25), the passover presentation of firstfruits (xxiii. 12), for sins of ignorance (iv. 32), in beginning and closing the Nazarite's separation (Num. vi. 12, 14). Agnos is used in the Gospel of John, which describes the life and death of Jesus as the paschal, sacrificial Lamb. In John xxi. 15 alone arnia is used, so in Revelation also arnion. This arnion being a diminutive expresses endearment, viz. the endearing relation in which Jesus, now glorified, stands to us as the consequence of His previous relation as the sacrificed agnos on earth; so also our relation to Him, He the "precious Lamb." we one with Him and His dear lambs (Isa. xl. 11). Kar, "the wether"; Mesia of Moab paid 100,000 as tribute to Israel (Isa. xvi. 1; 2 Kings iii. 4). Tzan, strictly "a flock" (Exod. xii. 21). Sch, each individual of a flock.

Lamech. 1. Son of Methusael, of Cain's line; the first polygamist; by Adah begat JABAL [see] and JUBAL, by Zillah Tubalcain and Naamah. The three, Adah, Zillah, and Naamah, are the only antediluvian women named. Transl. Gen. iv. 23, 24, "a man I slay (I am determined to slay) for my wound, a young man for my hurt; for (if) Cain shall be avenged sevenfold, I (will be avenged) seventy and seven fold"; whoever inflicts wound or blow (stripe) on me, man or youth, I will surely slay; if God will avenge Cain's cause, when assailed, sevenfold, I have power in my hands (by the bronze and steel of Tubalcain's discorery) to avenge myself ten times more. (Speaker's Comm., Keil, and Delitzsch.) In the common version L. calculates on impunity after homicide, because of his ancestor Cain's impunity; but it gives no explanation of why he should be avenged on any assailant ten times more than Cain. Possibly his reasoning is: I slew a youth for a wound and bruise he inflicted on me; as I did it under provocation, not as Cain without provocation and in cold blood, since Cain was protected by God's threat of sevenfold vengeance, I am sure of seventy and sevenfold vengeance on any assailant.

This is the earliest example of Hebrew poetry, the principle of versification being parallelism, with rhythm, assonance, strophe, and poetic diction. Its enigmatical character shows its remote antiquity. Enoch's prophecy in Jude 14 was about the same age, and is also in parallelism. Delitzsch notices "that titanic arrogance which makes its own power its god (Hab. i. 11), and carries its god, i.e. its sword, in its hand," transl. Job xii. 6 "who make a god of their own hand." L. boasts thus, to assure his wives of security amidst the violence of the times, especially among the Cainites, which precipitated God's judgment of the flood (Gen. vi. 4, 11, 13). Poetry, God's gift to man, has been awfully desecrated, so that its earliest extant fragment comes not from paradise but the house of L., a man of violence and lust.

2. Noah's father; son of Methuselah, in Seth's line (Gen. v. 28, 29). A contrast to the Cainite L. and his profane and presumptuous boasting. In pious, believing hope, resting on the promise to Eve of a Redeemer, he by the Spirit foresaw in Noah (=rest or comfort) the second founder of the race, the head of a regenerated world; "this same shall comfort us concerning our work and toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed." Feeling the weary toil of cultivating a ground yielding weeds sooner than fruits, L. looked for the ground's redemption from the curse in connection with Noah. It shall be so at the glorious coming of Noah's Antitype (Rom. viii. 19-23, Matt. xix. 28, Rev. xxi. 1; 2 Pet. iii. 13).

Lamentations. Heb. eekah, called from the first word "How," etc., the formula in beginning a lamentation (2 Sam. i. 19). These "Lamentations" (we get the title from LXX., Gr. threnoi, Heb. kinoth) or five elegies in the Heb. Bible stand between Ruth and Ecclesiastes, among the Chetubim, or Hagiographa (holy writings), designated from the principal one, "the Psalms," by our Lord (Luke xxiv. 44). No "word of Jehovah" or Divine message to the sinful and suffering people occurs in Lamentations. Jeremiah is in it the sufferer, not the prophet and teacher, but a sufferer speaking under the Holy Spirit. Josephus (c. Apion) enumerated the prophetic books as thirteen, reckoning Jeremiah and Lamentations as one book, as Judges and Ruth, Ezra and Nehemiah. Jeremiah wrote "lamentations" on the death of Josiah, and it was made "an ordinance in Israel" that "singing women" should "speak" of that king in lamentation. So here he writes "lamentations" on the overthrow of the Jewish city and people, as LXX. expressly state in a prefatory verse, embodying probably much of the language of his original elegy on Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv. 25), and passing now to the more universal calamity, of which Josiah's sad death was the presage and forerunner. Thus the words originally applied to Josiah (Lam. iv. 20) Jeremiah now applies to the throne of Judah in general, the last representative of which, Zedekiah, had just been blinded and carried to Babylon (comp. Jer. xxxix. 5-7): "the breath of our nostrils, the anointed of Jehovah, was taken in their pits, of whom we said, Under his shadow we shall live among the (live securely in spite of the surrounding) heathen." The language, true of good Josiah, is too favourable to apply to Zedekiah personally; it is as royal David's representative, and type of Messiah, and Judah's head, that he is viewed. The young children fainting for hunger (Lam. ii. 6, 11, 12, 20, 21; iv. 4, 9; 2 Kings xxv. 3), the city stormed (Lam. ii. 7, iv. 12; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 17, 19), the priests slain in the sanctuary, the citizens carried captive (Lam. i. 5, ii. 9; 2 Kings xxv. 11) with the king and princes, the feasts, sabbaths, and the law no more (Lam. i. 4, ii. 6), all point to Jerusalem's capture by Nebuchadnezzar.

The subject is the Jerusalem citizens' sufferings throughout the siege, the penalty of national sin. The events probably are included under Manasseh and Josiah (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11, xxxv. 20-25), Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah (xxxvi. 3, etc.). "Every letter is written with a tear, every word is the sound of a broken heart" (Lowth). Terse conciseness marks the style which Jeremiah suits to his theme, whereas he is diffuse in his prophecies. The elegies are grouped in stanzas, but without artificial arrangement of the thoughts. The five are acrostic, and each elegy divided into 22 stanzas. The first three elegies have stanzas with triplets of lines, excepting elegy i. 7 and ii. 9, containing four lines each. The 22 stanzas begin severally with the 22 Heb. letters in alphabetical order. In three instances two letters are transposed: elegy ii. 16, 17; iii. 46-51; iv. 16, 17. In the third elegy each line of the three forming every stanza begins with the same letter. The fourth and fifth elegies have their stanzas of two lines each. The fifth elegy has 22 stanzas, but not beginning alphabetically, the earnestness of prayer with which the whole closes breaking through the trammels of form. Its lines are shorter than the rest, which are longer than is usual in Heb. poems, and contain 12 syllables marked by a caesura about the middle, dividing each line into two not always equal parts. The alphabetical arrangement suited didactic poems, to be recited or sung by great numbers; Ps. xxv., xxiv., xxxvii., cxi., cxii., cxlv., especially cxix., Prov. xxxii. 10-31, are examples. It was adopted to help the memory, and is used to string together recollections not closely bound in unity, save by the general reference to a common subject.

David's lament over Jonathan and Saul, also that over Abner, are the earliest specimens of sacred elegy (2 Sam. i. 17-27, iii. 33, 34). Jeremiah in his prophecies (ix. 9, 16, 19; vii. 29) has much of an elegiac character. The author of Lamentations was evidently an eye witness who vividly and intensely realizes the sufferings which he mourns over. This strong feeling, combined with almost entirely uncomplaining (Lam. in. 26, 27, 33-42) resignation under God's stroke, and with turning to Him that smote Jerusalem, is just what characterizes Jeremiah's acknowledged writings. The writer's distress for "the virgin daughter of his people" is common to Jeremiah (xiv. 17, viii. 21, ix. 1) and Lamentations (i. 15, ii. 13). The same pathos, his "eyes running down with water" (Lam. i. 16, ii. 11, iii. 48, 49) for Zion, appears in both (Jer. xiii. 17), and the same feeling of terror on every side (Lam. ii. 22; Jer. vi. 25, xvi. 5). What most affects the author of each is the iniquity of her prophets and priests (Lam. ii. 14, iv. 13; Jer. v. 30, 31, xiv. 13, 14). His appeal in both is to Jehovah for judgment (Lam. iii. 64-66, Jer. xi. 20); Edom, exulting in Zion's fall, is warned that God's winecup of wrath shall pass away from Zion and be drunk by Edom (Lam. iv. 21; Jer. xxv. 15-21, xlix. 12).

As a prophet Jeremiah had foretold Zion's coming doom, and had urged submission to Babylon which was God's instrument, as the only means of mitigating judgment. But now that the stroke has fallen, so far from exulting at the fulfilment of his predictions on the Jewish rulers who had persecuted him, all other feelings are swallowed up in intense sorrow. To express this in a form suitable for use by his fellow countrymen was a relief by affording vent to his own deep sorrow; at the same time it was edifying to them to have an inspired form for giving legitimate expression to theirs.

The first elegy (i.) strikes the keynote, the solitude of the city once so full! Her grievous sin is the cause. At one time he speaks of her, then introduces her personified, and uttering the pathetic appeal (antitypically descriptive of her Antitype Messiah), "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? Behold . . . if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow," etc. (Lam. i. 12). Justifying the Lord as "righteous," she condemns herself, and looks forward to His one day making her foe like unto her. The second elegy (ii.) dwells on the city's destruction, her breach through which like a sea the foe poured in, the famine, the women eating their little children (fulfilling Deut. xxviii. 53), the priest and prophet slain in the sanctuary, the king and princes among the Gentiles, the law no more, the past vanity of the prophets forbearing to discover Zion's iniquity, retributively punished by the present absence of vision from Jehovah (Lam. ii. 9, 14). The third elegy dwells on his own affliction (iii. 1, etc.), his past derision on the part of all the people; the mercies of the Lord new every morning, his hope; his sanctified conviction that it was good for him to have borne the yoke in youth, and now to wait for Jehovah's salvation. Here he uses language typical of Messiah (iii. 8, 14, 30, 54; Ps. lxxix., xxii.; Isa. i. 6). He also indirectly teaches his fellow countrymen that "searching our ways and turning again to the Lord," instead of complaining against what is the punishment due for sin, is the true way of obtaining deliverance from Him who "doth not afflict willingly the children of men." The fourth elegy recapitulates the woes of Zion, contrasting the past preciousness of Zion's sons, and her pure Nazarites, with the worthlessness of their present estimation. It is "the Lord who hath accomplished His fury" in all this; for the kings of the earth regarded Zion as impregnable, but now recognise that it is because of "uncleanness" the Jews are wanderers. But Edom, now exulting in her fall, shall soon be visited in wrath, whilst Zion's captivity shall cease. The fifth elegy (Lam. v.) is prayer to Jehovah to consider "our reproach," slaves ruling His people, women ravished, young men grinning, children sinking under burdens of wood, "the crown of the kingdom and priesthood" fallen, and Zion desolate. But one grand source of consolation is Jehovah's eternal rule (ver. 19), which, though suffering His people's affliction for a time, has endless years in store wherein to restore them, the same ground of hope as in Ps. cii. 12, 26, 27. So they pray, "turn Thou us unto Thee, O Lord, and we shall be turned," "for wouldest Thou utterly reject us?" Impossible.

On the 9th of the month Ab (July) the returning Jews yearly read Lamentations with fasting and weeping in commemoration of the past miseries. The Jews still use it at "the place of wailing" at Jerusalem. In our English Bible Lamentations fitly comes after the last chapters of Jeremiah describing the calamity which is the theme of sorrow in Lamentations. The gleams of believing and assured hope break forth at the close, so that there is a clear progress from the almost unrelieved gloom of the beginning (i. 2, 9, 17, 21); it recognises Jehovah's (Lord in capitals) sovereignty in punishing, by repeating seven times the name Adonai (Lord in small letters): ii. 22, 31, 33, iv. 21, 22, v. 19, 22.

Lamentations corresponds in tone to Job and Isa. xl. 1—lxxi. "Comfort ye My people" is God's answer to Lam. i. 21, "there is none to comfort me." Comp. Lam. iii. 35, 36, with Job viii. 3, xxiv. 12; Lam. iii. 7, 14, with Job iii. 23, xix. 8, xxx. 9; Lam. iii. 10—12, 30, with Job vii. 20, x. 16.

Lamp. [See CANDLE, CANDLESTICK.] The ordinary means of lighting apartments. In Jud. vii. 16, 20, lamps mean torches; so John xviii. 3, Matt. xxv. 1. The terra cotta and bronze handlamps from Nimrud and Kouynjik perhaps give a good idea of the Bible lamp. The Egyptian handbell or common lamp is a small glass vessel with a tube in the bottom in which is stuck a wick of cotton twisted round straw. Water is poured in first, then the oil. The usual symbols of the early Christian lamps found at Jerusalem are the cross, the seven-branched candlestick, the palm (John xii. 13, Rev. vii. 9). The radeness of the lamps indicates the poverty of the early saints at Jerusalem. The inscriptions that occur are "the light of Christ shined to all," and the initials I X O, "Jesus Christ God."

Landmark. A stone or post usually, easily removable, whence the charges against its removal were needed (Deut. xix. 14, xxvii. 16).

Laodicea. A city of Phrygia. Originally Diospolis, then Rhoss, then L. Site of one of the seven churches addressed by Christ through John (Rev. i. 11, iii. 14). In Paul's epistle to the Colossians (iv. 13—16) L. is associated with Colossæ and Hierapolis, which exactly accords with its geographical position, 18 miles W. of Colossæ, six miles S. of Hierapolis. It lay in the Roman province "Asia," a mile S. of the river Lycus, in the Mæander valley, between Colossæ and Philadelphia. A Seleucid king, Antiochus II., Theos, named it from Laodice his wife. Overthrown often by earthquakes. It was rebuilt by its wealthy citizens, without state help, when destroyed in A.D. 62 (Tacitus, Ann. xiv. 27). This wealth (arising from its excellent wools) led to a self-satisfied "lukewarm" state in spiritual things, which the Lord condemns as more dangerous than positive icy coldness (Rev. iii. 14—21). The two churches most comfortable temporarily are those most approved, Sardis and L.; those most afflicted of the seven are the most commended, Smyrna and Philadelphia. Subsequently the church was flourishing, for it was at a council at L., A.D. 361, that the Scripture canon was defined.

"The epistle from L." (Col. iv. 16) is Paul's epistle to the Laodiceans which the Colossians were to apply to them for. Not the epistle to the Ephesians, for Paul was unlikely to know that his letter to the Ephesians would have reached L. at or near the time of the arrival of his letter to the Colossians. In 1 Cor. v. 9 similarly an epistle is alluded to, no longer extant, the Holy Spirit not designing it for further use than the local and temporary wants of a particular church. The apostle's epistles were publicly read in the church assemblies, being thus put on a level with the O.T. and Gospels, which were similarly read.

The angel of the Laodicean church is supposed to be Archippus whom Paul 30 years before had warned to be diligent in fulfilling his ministry (Col. iv. 17). The "lukewarm" state, if the transitional stage to a warmer, is desirable (for a little religion, if real, is better than none), but fatal when an abiding state, for it is mistaken for a safe state (Rev. iii. 17). The danger is of disregarded principle; religion enough to lull the conscience, not to save the soul; halting between two opinions (1 Kings xviii. 21, 2 Kings xvii. 41, Ezek. xx. 39, Matt. vi. 24). The hot (at Hierapolis) and cold springs near L. suggested the simile. As worldly poverty favours poverty of spirit (Matt. v. 3, comp. Luke vi. 20), so worldly riches tend to spiritual self-sufficiency (Hos. xii. 8). Paul's epistle to the neighbouring Colossæ was designed for L. also, though Paul had not seen the Christians there at the time (Col. ii. 1, 3; iv. 6); it tells L. "in whom" to find "hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," whereas she thought she had all sufficiency in herself, "because thou sayest I am rich," etc. He endured a sore conflict, striving in anxious prayer in behalf of the churches of Ephesus and L. that they might be delivered from Judaizing teachers, who blended Eastern theosophy and angel worship with Jewish asceticism and observance of new moons and sabbaths, professing a deeper insight into the world of spirits and a nearer approach to heavenly purity and intelligence than the simple gospel afforded (Col. ii. 8, 9, 16—23). A few arches and part of an amphitheatre are all the remains left of L. Now Denishu.

Lapidoth = torches. Deborah's husband (Jud. iv. 5).

Lapwing: dukiphath, akin to the Coptic kukusha. Rather the hoopoe (Lev. xi. 19, Dent. xiv. 18).

THE HOOPOE.

Its cry or whoop gives its name. The Arabs superstitiously reverence it, and call it "the doctor" as if possessing therapeutic qualities. Its head is used in magical spells. The Bedouins believe it to be inhabited by departed spirits. The Heb. perhaps means double crested; the hoopoe has two parallel rows of elevated feathers arranged laterally. Its imposing crest and beak, and its curious way of bending till the beak touches the ground, whilst it raises and depresses the crest, led to the Arab supposition of its power to point out hidden wells beneath; whence arose its Gr. name epops, "the inspector." Its unclean habits, searching for worms and insects in daughills, and the superstition with which the heathen regarded it, led to the Moslem ranking of it among unclean birds.

Lasæa. A city in Crete, a few miles E. of Fair Havens (Acts xxvii. 8). See Smith's Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 2nd ed., app. iii., 262, 263.

Lasha. Gen. x. 19; the S.E. limit of Canaan = Callirhoe, famed for warm springs. E. of the Dead Sea. L. means "fissure," appropriate to the chasm Zerka Main, through which the Callirhoe waters find an outlet to the sea. E. Wilton (Imp. Dict.) suggests that LAISH [see] at the Jordan's sources is L., for the Canaanites probably had no settlement E. of the Dead Sea. The N.W. bound (Sidon), the S.W. (Gaza), and the S.E. (Sodom) being given, we naturally expect the N.E., which Laish is (Gen. x. 19); the spies found the Canaanites dwelling "by the side of the Jordan" (Num. xiii. 29), probably therefore at its sources at Laish. Laish moreover was connected with Canaanite Sidon, though far from it (Jud. xvii. 7, 28). The gorge of wady el Asal, descending from mount Hermon over against Laish, between two high bulwarks, fulfils the requirements of the derivation. Asal also is the inversion of L. Lasharon. A Canaanite town, the king of which Joshua slew (xii. 18), probably now Saruneh, S.W. of Tiberias. The la prefixed marks the district, its absence the town (Gesenius). In the Egyptian traveller's account (Liberic papyrus, Brit. Mus. 1812) Saruna answers to Saruneh; now Sirin in the region called Sarona, between mount Tabor and lake Tiberias.

Latchet. The thong fastening the sandal to the foot; from Anglo-Saxon laccan, to fasten; whence latch. To unlatch is to be a slave's office for a great man (Luke iii. 16).

Lattice: eshuah, sebitukah, charak-kini (Jud. v. 28, 2 Kings i. 2, Prov. vi. 6, "casement"; S. of Sol. ii. 9). A latticed window with reticulated network through which the cool air entered, whilst the sun's rays were averted. Glass was not yet used for windows, though it was well known.

LATTICE.

Laver. It and the altar stood in the court of the tabernacle. Consisting of the laver itself and a base, both of brass. In it the priests were bound to wash their hands and feet in approaching the altar and entering the tabernacle, on pain of death. Constructed of the polished metallic looking glasses which the devout women (assembling at the door of the tabernacle of God's meeting His people) offered, renouncing the instrument of personal vanity for the sake of the higher beauties of holiness. The word of God is at once a mirror wherein to see ourselves and God's image reflected, and the means of sanctifying or cleansing (2 Cor. iii. 18; Jas. i. 23-25; Eph. v. 26; Exod. xxx. 18, 19, xxxviii. 8). The women made a like sacrifice of ornaments ("tablets," rather armlets) for the Lord's honour (xxv. 22). On solemn occasions the priest had to bathe his whole person (xxix. 4, Lev. xvi. 4). The kyior, "laver," was probably the reservoir; the base received and held water from it, and was the place for washing. Thus the water was kept pure till drawn off for use.

In Solomon's temple there was one great brazen "sea" for the priests to wash in, and ten lavers on bases which could be wheeled about, for washing the animal victims for burnt offering, five on the N., five on the S., sides of the priests' courts; each contained 40 "baths" (1 Kings vii. 27, 39; 2 Chron. iv. 5, 6). Almaz mutilated the bases; and Nebuzardan carried away the remainder (2 Kings xvi. 17, xxv. 13). No lavers are mentioned in the second or Herod's temple. Solomon's "molten sea" was made of the copper captured from Tibbath and Chun, cities of Hadazer king of Zobah (1 Chron. xviii. 8), five cubits high, ten diameter, 30 circumference; one handbreadth thick; containing 3000 baths according to Chronicles, but 2000 in Kings; 2000 is probably correct, Chronicles reading is a transcriber's error. It is thought that it bulged out below, but contracted at the mouth to the dimensions in 1 Kings vii. 23-26. A double row of gourds ("knops"), 5+5 or 10 in each cubit, ran below the brim. The brim or lip was wrought curving outward like a lily or lotus flower. Layard describes similar vessels at Nineveh, of smaller size. The 12 oxen represent the 12 tribes of Israel the priestly nation, which cleansed itself here in the person of its priests to appear holy before the Lord. The sacrificial animals, the oxen, represent the priestly service. The "oxen" in 2 Chron. iv. 3 instead of "gourds" or "knops" in Kings is a transcriber's error.

The "holy water" in the trial of jealousy (Num. v. 17), and in consecrating the Levites by purifying and sprinkling, was probably from the laver (viii. 7); type of the true and efficacious sprinkling of Christ's blood on the conscience (Heb. ix. 9, 10, x. 22; Tit. iii. 5; Eph. v. 26); not to be so washed entails eternal death. The hands and feet need daily cleansing, expressing those members in general most exposed to soils; but the whole body needs but once for all bathe (Gr. louo), just as once for all regeneration needs not repetition, but only the removal of partial daily stains (Gr. nipto). John xiii. 1-10, "he that is bathed has no need save to wash (the parts soiled, viz.) his feet."

Law. The whole history of the Jews is a riddle if Moses' narrative be not authentic. If authentic he was inspired to give the law; for he asserts God's immediate commission. Its recognised inspiration alone can account for the Israelites' acquiescence in a burdensome ritual, and for their intense attachment to the Scriptures which condemn them as a stiff-necked people. A small isolated people, no way distinguished for science or art, possessed the most spiritual religion the world has ever seen: this cannot have been of themselves, it must be of God. No Israelite writer hints at the possibility of fraud. The consentient belief of the rival kingdoms northern Israel and Judah, the agreement in all essential parts between the Samaritan pentateuch and the pentateuch of the Jews who excommunicated the Samaritans as schismatics, accords with the Divine origination of the Mosaic law. Even Israel's frequent apostasies magnify the Divine power and wisdom which by such seemingly inadequate instruments effected His purpose of preserving true religion and morality, when all the philosophic and celebrated nations sank deeper and deeper into idolatry and profligacy. Had Egypt with its learning and wisdom, Greece with its philosophy and refinement, or Rome with its political sagacity, been the medium of revelation, its origination would be attributed to man's intellect. As it is, the Mosaic law derived little of its influence from men of mere human genius, and it was actually opposed to the sensual and idolatrous inclinations of the mass of the people. Nothing short of its origin being Divine, and its continuance effected by Divine interposition, can account for the fact that it was only in their prosperity the law was neglected; when adversity awakened them to reflection they always cried unto God and returned to His law, and invariably found deliverance (Graves, Pent. ii. 3, § 2). Unlike the surrounding nations, the Jews have their history almost solely in the written word. No museum possesses sculptured figures of Jewish antiquities, such as are brought from Egypt, Nineveh, Babylon, Persepolis, Greece, and Rome. The basis of Israel's polity was the decalogue, the compendium of the moral law which therefore was proclaimed first, then the other religious and civil ordinances. The end of Israel's call by the holy God was that they should be "a holy nation" (Lev. xix. 2), a mediatorial kingdom between God and the nations, witnessing for Him to them (Isa. xliii. 10-12), and between them and Him, performing those sacrificial ordinances through the divinely constituted Aaronic priests, which were to prefigure the one coming Sacrifice, through whom all the Gentile nations were to be blessed. Thus Israel was to be "a kingdom of priests," each subject a priest (though their exercise of the sacrificial functions was delegated to one family as their representative), and God was at once civil and spiritual king; therefore all the theocratic ordinances of the Sinaitic legislation were designed to minister toward holiness, which is His supreme law. Hence the religious ordinances had a civil and judicial sanction annexed, and the civil enactments had a religious bearing. Both had a typical and spiritual aspect also, in relation to the kingdom of God yet to come. Whilst minute details are of temporary and local application their fundamental principle is eternal, the promotion of God's glory and man's good. It is because of this principle pervading more or less all the ordinances, civil and ceremonial alike, that it is not always easy to draw a line between them. Even the moral law is not severed from but intimately bound up with both. The moral precepts are eternally obligatory, because based on God's own unchangeable character, which is reflected in the enlightened conscience; their positive enactment is only to clear away the mist which sin has spread over even the conscience. The positive precepts are obligatory only because of enactment, and so long as the Divine legislator appointed them to remain in force. This is illustrated in Hos. vi. 6, "I desired mercy and not sacrifice, and the knowledge of God more than burnt offerings." God did desire "sacrifices" (for He instituted them), but moral obedience more; for this is the end for which positive ordinances, as sacrifices, were instituted; i.e., sacrifices and positive ordinances, as the sabbath, were to be observed, but not made the plea for setting aside the moral duties, justice, love, truth, obedience, which are eternally obligatory. Comp. 1 Sam. xv. 22; Ps. i. 8, 9, li. 16, 17; Isa. i. 11, 12; Mic. vi. 8; Matt. xxiii. 23, ix. 13, xii. 7.

Torah, "law," means strictly a directory. Authoritative enactment is implied. The elements of the law already existed, but scattered and much obscured amidst incongruous usages which men's passions had created. The law "was added because of the transgressions" of it, i.e., not to remove all transgressions, for the law rather stimulates the corrupt heart to disobedience (Rom. vii. 13), but to bring them into a clearer view (Gal. iii. 19; Rom. iii. 20 end, iv. 15, v. 13, vii. 7, 9), to make men more conscious of their sins as being transgressions of the law, so to make them feel need and longing for the promised Saviour (Gal. iii. 17-24), "the law was our schoolmaster (paidagogos, rather guardian servant leading us to school), to bring us to Christ." The law is closely connected with the promise to Abraham, "in thy seed shall all families of the earth be blessed" (Gen. xii. 3). It witnessed to the evil in all men, from which the promised Seed should deliver men, and its provisions on the other hand were the chief fence by which Israel was kept separate from surrounding heathendom, the repository of Divine revelation for the future good of the world, when the fullness of the time should come.

The giving of the law marked the transition of Israel from nomage to full national life. The law formally sanctioned, and grouped together, many of the fragmentary ordinances of God which existed before. The sabbath, marriage, sacrifices (Gen. ii. iv.; Exod. xvi. 23-29), distinction of clean and unclean (Gen. vii. 2), the shedding of blood for blood (ix. 6), circumcision (xvii.), the penalty for fornication, and the Levirate usage (a brother being bound to marry and raise up seed by a deceased brother's widow, xxxviii. 8, 24) were some of the patriarchal customs which were adopted with modifications by the Mosaic code. In some cases, as divorce, it corrected rather than sanctioned objectionable existing usages, suffering their existence at all only because of the hardness of their hearts (Matt. xix. 7, 8). So in the case of a disobedient son (Deut. xxi. 18-21), severe as is the penalty, it is an improvement upon existing custom, substituting a judicial appeal to the community for arbitrary parental power of life and death. The Levirate law limited rather than approved of existing custom. The law of the avenger of involuntarily-shed blood (Deut. xix. 1-13, Num. xxxv.) mercifully restrained the usage which was too universally recognised to admit of any but gradual abolition. It withdrew the involuntary homicide from before the eyes of the incensed relatives of the deceased. No satisfaction was allowed for murder; the murderer had no asylum, but could be dragged from the altar (Exod. xxi. 14, 1 Kings ii. 28-31). The comparatively smallness of that portion of the Sinaitic law which concerns the political constitution harmonizes with the alleged time of its promulgation, when as yet the form of government was not permanently settled. The existing patriarchal authorities in the family and tribe are recognised, whilst the priests and Levites are appointed to take wholly the sacred functions and in part also the judicial ones. The contingency of a kingly government is provided for in general directions (Deut. xvii. 14-20). The outline of the law is given Exod. xx.-xxiii.; the outline of the ceremonial xxv.—xxxi.

The decalogue (a term first found in Clemens Alexandr. Pedag. iii. 12) is the heart of the whole, and therefore was laid up in the ark of the covenant beneath the mercy seat or propitiatory (hilasterion), intimating that it is only as covered over by Divine atoning mercy that the law could be the centre of the (Rom. iii. 25, 26) covenant of God with us. The law is the reflection of the holy character of the God of the covenant, the embodiment of the inner spirit of the Mosaic code. "The ten commandments" (Heb. words, Exod. xxxiv. 28) are frequently called "the testimony," viz. of Jehovah against all who should transgress (Deut. xxxi. 26, 27). By the law came "the knowledge of sin" (Rom. iii. 20, vii. 7). Conscience, without the law, caused only a vague discomfort to the sinner. But the law of the decalogue, when expressed definitely, convicted of sin, and was therefore "a ministration of condemnation" and "of death, written and engraven on stones" (2 Cor. iii. 7, 9). Its preeminence is marked by its being the first part revealed; not like the rest of the code through Moses, but by Jehovah Himself, with attendant angels (Deut. xxxiii. 2, Acts vii. 53, Gal. iii. 19, Heb. ii. 2); written by God's finger, and on stone tables to mark its permanence. The number ten expresses completeness, perfection (Ps. xix. 7, Exod. xxvii. 12, 1 Kings vii. 27, Matt. xxv. 1). They were "the tables of the covenant," and the ark, because containing them, was called "the ark of the covenant" (Deut. ix. 13, Josh. iii. 11). The record in Deut. v. 6-21 is a slight variation of Exod. xx. 2-17. The fourth commandment begins with "keep" instead of "remember," the reason for its observance in Deuteronomy is Israel's deliverance from Egypt instead of God's resting from creation. Deuteronomy is an inspired free repetition of the original in Exodus, suited to Moses' purpose of exhortation; hence he refers to the original, in the fifth commandment adding "as the Lord thy God commanded thee." "And" is inserted as suited to the narrative style which Deuteronomy combines with the legislative. "Desire" is substituted for "covet" in the tenth. None but Moses himself would have ventured to alter an iota of what Moses had ascribed to God in Exodus. The special reason for the fourth, applying to the Israelites, does not interfere with the earlier and more universal reason in Exodus, but is an additional motive for their observing the ordinance already resting on the worldwide basis. Coveting the house in Exodus precedes, but in Deuteronomy succeeds, coveting the wife; evidently all kinds of coveting are comprised in the one tenth commandment. As the seventh and eighth forbid acts of adultery and theft, so the tenth forbids the desire and so seals the inner spirituality of all the commandments of the second table. The claims of God stand first. The love of God is the true spring of the love of our fellow men. Josephus (c. Apion ii. 17) says: "Moses did not (as other legislators) make religion part of virtue, but all other virtues parts of religion." The order of the ten indicates the Divine hand; God's being, unity, exclusive deity, "have no other gods before My face" (Ileb. iv. 13); His worship as a Spirit without idol symbol; His name; His day; His earthly representatives, parents, to be honoured; then regard for one's neighbour's life; for his second self, his wife; his property; character; bridling the desires, the fence of duty to one's neighbour and one's self. As deed is fenced by the sixth, seventh, and eighth, so speech by the ninth, and the heart by the tenth. It begins with God, ends with the heart. The fourth and fifth have a positive form, the rest negative. It is a witness against man's sin, rather than a giver of holiness. Philo and Josephus (Ant. iii. 6, §5) comprise the first five in the first table, the last five in the second. Augustine, to bring out the Trinity, made our first and second one, and divided our tenth into coveting the wife and coveting the rest; thus three in the first table, seven in the second. But the command to have only one God is quite distinct from the prohibition to worship Him by an image, and coveting the wife and the other objects falls under one category of unlawful desire. Love to God is expressly taught in the second commandment, "mercy to thousands in them that love Me and keep My commandments." The five and five division is the best. Five implies imperfection; our duty to God being imperfect if divorced from duty to our neighbour. Five and ten predominate in the proportions of the tabernacle. Piety towards the earthly father is closely joined to piety towards the heavenly (Heb. xii. 9, 1 Tim. v. 4, Mark vii. 11). Special sanctions are attached to the second, third, fourth, and fifth commandments. Paul (Rom. xiii. 8, 9) makes the second table, or duty to our neighbour, comprise the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth, but not the fifth commandment.

Spiritual Jews penetrated beneath the surface, and so found in the law peace and purity viewed in connection with the promised Redeemer (Ps. i. 2, xix., cxix., xv., xxiv.; Isa. i. 10-18; Rom. ii. 28, 29). As (1) the decalogue gave the moral tone to all the rest of the law, so (2) the ceremonial part taught symbolically purity, as required by all true subjects of the kingdom of God. It declared the touch of the dead defiling, to remind men that sin's wages is death. It distinguished clean from unclean foods, to teach men to choose moral good and reject evil. The sacrificial part (3) taught the hope of propitiation, and thus represented the original covenant of promise, and pointed on to Messiah, through whom the sense of guilt, awakened by the moral law which only condemns men through their own inability to keep it, is taken away, and peace with God is realized. Two particulars are noticeable: (1) Moses does not inculcate as sanctions of his laws the rewards and punishments of a future life; (2) he does use as a sanction God's declaration that He "visits the iniquity of the fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generation of them that fear Him, and shows mercy unto thousands (to the thousandth generation) of them that love Him and keep His commandments" (Exod. xx. 5, 6). The only way we can account for the omission of a future sanction, which all other ancient lawgivers deemed indispensable (Warburton, Div. Legation), is the fact established on independent proofs, viz. that Israel's government was administered by an extraordinary providence, distributing reward and punishment according to obedience or disobedience severally. But whilst not sanctioning his law by future rewards or punishments, Moses shows both that he believed in them himself, and sets forth such proofs of them as would suggest themselves to every thoughtful and devout Israelite, though less clearly than they were revealed subsequently under David, Solomon, and the prophets, when they became matter of general belief. Christ shows that in the very title, "the God of Abraham," etc., in the pentateuch the promise of the resurrection is by implication contained (Matt. xxii. 31, 32). [See RESURRECTION.] Scripture (Heb. iv. 2, Gal. iii. 8) affirms the gospel was preached unto Abraham and to Israel in the wilderness, as well as unto us. The Sinai law in its sacrifices was the bud, the gospel the flower and ripened fruit. The law was the gospel in miniature, which Jesus the Sun of righteousness expanded. So David (Ps. xxxii., Rom. iv. 6). On the hope of a future life being held by those under the law see Num. xxiii. 10; Ps. xvi. 8-11, xvii. 15, xxi. 4, lxxiii. 24, xlix. 14, 15; Isa. xxvi. 19, xxv. 8, lvii. 1, 2; Dan. vii. 2, 10, 13, 14, xii. 2. The sense of Ps. cxxxix. 24 is "see if there be any way of idolatry (otzeh, as in Isa. xlviii. 5; the Heb. also means pain which is the sure issue of idolatry) in me, and lead me in the way everlasting" promised to David and his seed in Messiah (comp. 1 John v. 21; Prov. viii. 35, xii. 28, xiv. 32, xxi. 16, xxiv. 11; Eccles. viii. 11, 12, xi. 9, xii. 7, 13, 14; 2 Kings ii. 11, 12, xiii. 21; Ezek. xxxvii.; Hos. xiii. 14, vi. 2; Joel ii. 32; Job xix. 23-27). Life in man is in Gen. i. 26, 27, ii. 7, distinguished from life in brutes: "Jehovah Elohim breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul"; "God created man in His own image." It is not immateriality which distinguishes man's life from the brutes' life, for the vital principle is immaterial in the brute as in man; it can only be the continuance of life after death of the body, conscience, spirit, and sense of moral responsibility, as well as power of abstract reasoning. Acts xxiv. 14, 15, 25 shows the prevalent belief in St. Paul's day as to the resurrection and judgment to come. Christ asserts that by searching the O. T. scriptures eternal life and the promise of Messiah was to be found (John v. 39). The barrenness of Judæa has been made an objection by Voltaire against Scripture truth, which represents it as "flowing with milk and honey." But the very barrenness is the accomplishment of Scripture prophecies, and powerfully confirms the O. T. The structure of the Mosaic history confirms the reality of the miracles on which the truth of the extraordinary providence rests. Common events are joined with the miraculous so closely that the acknowledged history of this singular people would become unaccountable, unless the MIRACLES [see] with which it is inseparably joined be admitted. The miracles could not have been credited by the contemporary generation, nor introduced subsequently into the national records and the national religion, if they had not been real and Divine. The Jewish ritual and the singular constitution of the tribe of Levi commemorated them perpetually, and rested on their truth. The political constitution and civil laws presuppose an extraordinary providence limiting the legislative and executive authorities. So also the distribution and tenure of land, the sabbatic and jubilee years, the three great feasts requiring all males to meet at the central sanctuary thrice each year. Present, rather than invisible and future, sanctions were best fitted at that time to establish the superiority of the true God before Israel and heathendom. The low intellectual and moral state of most Israelites incapacitated them from rising above the desires of the present world to look forward to future retributions, which their spiritual dullness would make them feel doubtful of, until first a present special providence visibly proved His claim on their faith and obedience, and prepared them to believe that the same Divine justice which had heretofore visibly governed the youth of Israel's existence would in a future state reward or punish according to men's deserts, when the present extraordinary providence should be withdrawn. Moreover, national obedience or transgression could as such be recompensed only by temporal prosperity or adversity (for nations have their existence only in the present time). These therefore the Divine King of the theocracy dispensed with an immediate and visible execution, which only partially appears in His present more invisible, though not less real, government of all nations. Offences against the state and individuals were punished, as also offences against God its head. In Israel's history a visible specimen was given of what is true in all ages and nations, though less immediately seen now when our calling is to believe and wait, that "righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people" (1 Prov. xiv. 34). The distinction of clean and unclean animals relates to sacrifices. Some animals by filthy, wild, and noxious natures suggest the presence of evil in nature, and therefore give the feeling of unfitness for being offered as symbols of atonement or thanksgiving before the holy God. Others, tame, docile, useful to man, of the flock and herd, seem suitable for offering, as sheep, goats, cows, doves, and the like. Those that both chew the cud and divide the hoof men generally have taken for food by a common instinct. So fishes with fins and scales, but not shellfish as less digestible; insects leaping upon the earth, raised above the crawling slimy brood. Other animals, etc., as swine, dogs, etc., offered by idolaters, are called "abominations." The aim of the distinction was ethical, to symbolise separation from moral defilement, and to teach to the true Israel self cleansing from all pollutions of flesh and spirit (2 Cor. vii. 1). The lesson in Acts x. is that whereas God granted sanctification of spirit to the Gentiles, as He had to Cornelius, the outward symbol of separation between them and the Jews, viz. the distinction of clean and unclean meats, was needless (Matt. xv. 11, 1 Tim. iv. 4, Rom. xiv. 17). So the impurity contracted by childbirth (Lev. xii., xv.), requiring the mother's purification, points to the taint of birth sin (Ps. li. 5). The uncleanness after a female birth lasted 66 days, after a male 33, to mark the fall as coming through the woman first (1 Tim. ii. 14, 15). In the penal code idolatry is the capital crime, treason against the Head of the state and its fundamental constitution. One was bound not to spare the dearest relative, if guilty of tempting to it; any city apostatizing to it was to be destroyed with its spoil and inhabitants (Deut. xiii. 6). Human sacrifices burnt to Moloch were especially marked for judgment on all who took part in them (Lev. xx. 1-5). The wizard, witch, and their consulters violated the allegiance due to Jehovah, who alone reveals His will to His people (Num. ix. 7, 8, xxvii. 21; Josh. ix. 14; Jud. i. 1; 2 Sam. v. 23) and controls future events, and were therefore to die (1 Chron. x. 13, Lev. xx. 27). So the blasphemous, presumptuous sabbath breaker, and false prophet (Lev. xxiv. 11-16; Num. xv. 20-36; Deut. xvii. 12, xviii. 20). So the violator of the command to rest from work on the day of atonement (Lev. xxiii. 29, 30), of the passover (Exod. xii. 15, 19); the wilful defiler of the sanctuary (Num. xix. 13, Lev. xxii. 3); the perpetrator of unnatural crimes (xviii., xx.). The prohibitions of rounding the hair and beard, of wearing a garment of wool and linen mixed, of sowing a field with divers seeds, of women using men's garments (besides tending to preserve feminine modesty and purity), were directed against existing idolrous usages in the worship of Baal and Asherah (xiv. 19, 27; Deut. xxii. 5). The ordeal by the water of jealousy depended on an extraordinary providence (Num. v. 11). It could injure the guilty only by miracle, the innocent not at all; whereas in the ordeals of the Middle Ages the innocent could scarcely escape but by miracle. Prohibitions such as human tribunals could hardly take cognisance of were sanctioned by penalties which God undertook to execute. He as Sovereign reserved exclusively to Himself the right of legislation. Sins of impurity, next to idolatry, were punished with peculiar severity (Lev. xviii.; the adulterer and adulteress, xix. 10; Deut. xxii. 22-30, xxvii. 20-26).

Mildness and exact equity pervaded the code so far as was compatible with the state of the people and the age. Interest or "usury" was not to be taken from an Israelite, and only in strict equity from the foreigner. The poor should be relieved liberally (Deut. xv. 7-11). The hired labourer's wages were to be paid at once (xxiv. 14, 15). Intrusion into a neighbour's house to recover a loan was forbidden, not to hurt his feelings. The pledged raiment was to be restored, so as not to leave him without a coverlet at night (ver. 10, 13). Other characteristic precepts of the law are: reverence to the old; tenderness toward those having bodily infirmity (ver. 19, 21); gleanings to be left for the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow (Lev. xix. 14-32); faithfulness in rebuking a neighbour's sin; the dispersion of the Levites, the ministers of religion, forming a sacred tie among all the tribes; studied opposition to all the usages of idolaters, as the heathen historian Tacitus notices: "all we hold sacred are with them profane; they offer the ram in contempt of Ammon . . . and an ox, which the Egyptians worship as Apis (Hist. v. 4); the Jews deem those profane who form any images of the gods . . . the Divinity they conceive as one, and only to be understood by the mind: with images they would not honour Cæsars or flatter kings." Personal violence was punished retributively in kind, "life for life, eye for eye, tooth for a tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot." The false witness had to suffer what he thought to inflict on another (Deut. xix. 16-21; Exod. xxi. 24; Lev. xxiv. 18-21). This did not sanction individual retaliation, but it was to regulate the magistrate's award of damages, viz. the worth in money of the bodily power lost by the injured person. It was to protect the community, not to regulate the believer, who when he penetrated beneath the letter into the spirit of the law, which the gospel afterwards brought to light, felt constrained to love his enemy and not do to him the injury the latter had done or intended to do. Our Lord quoted the form of the law (Matt. v. 38) in order to contrast the pharisaic view, which looked only to the letter, with the true view which looks to the spirit.

A striking feature of the penal code, in which it was superior to most codes, was that no crime against mere property incurred death. Bond service till the sabbatic year was the extreme penalty; restitution and fine were the ordinary penalty. The slave's life was guarded as carefully as the master's. If the master caused even the loss of a tooth the servant was to be set free. The chastity of female slaves was strictly protected. No Jew could be kept in bondage more than seven years, and then was to be sent away with liberal gifts (Exod. xxi. 7-26, Deut. xv. 13-15). In fact Israelite bond service was only a going into service for a term of years, that the creditor might reap the benefit. The creditor could not imprison nor sequestrate so as to injure the bond debtor, but in Rome the creditor could imprison and even kill him according to the old law. Men stealers were to be put to death. What a contrast to the cruel oppression of slaves in other nations, the Spartans butchering the helots, the Romans torturing their slaves for trifles and goading them to servile rebellions which cost some of Rome's bravest blood, and enacting that where a master was murdered all the slaves in the house, or within hearing of it, should be killed! In Israel the public peace was never threatened by such a cause.

Trial was public, in the city gates. The judges, the elders, and Levitical ministers and officers, as our jurors, were taken from the people. No torture before conviction, no cruelty after it, was permitted. Forty stripes were the extreme limit of bodily punishment (Deut. xxv. 3). Capital convictions could only be by the agreeing testimony of two witnesses (xvii. 6). The even distribution of lands, the non-alienation of them from the family and tribe (Num. xxvii., xxxvi.), admirably guarded against those agrarian disturbances and intestine discords which in other states and in all ages have flowed from an uneven distribution and an uncertain tenure of property.

Love to God, love to one's neighbour and even to enemies, benevolence to strangers, the poor, the fatherless and widows, repentance and restitution for injuries, sincere worship of the heart and obedience of the life required to accompany outward ceremonial worship, all these are characteristics of the law, such as never originated from the nation itself, long enslaved, and not remarkable for high intellectual and moral capacity, and such as did not then exist in the code of any other nation. The Originator can have only been, as Scripture says, God Himself. Besides, whatever doubts may be raised respecting the inspiration or authorship, the fact remains and is indisputable, that it was given and was in force ages before Lycurgus or Minos or other noted legislators lived, and that it has retained its influence upon legislation from the time of its promulgation until now, the British and all other codes of civilized nations being based upon it. This is one of those facts which neither evolution, nor revolution, can overthrow.

The letter and outward ordinances were the casket, the spirit as brought out by the gospel was the jewel. The sacrifices gave present relief to awakened consciences by the hope of forgiveness through God's mercy, resting on the promise of the Redeemer. The law could not give life, that was reserved for the gospel (Gal. iii. 21, 22; iv. 6). Spiritual Jews, as David, when convicted by the law of failure in obedience, fell back on the earlier covenant of promise, the covenant of grace, as distinguished from the law the covenant of works (which required perfect obedience as the condition of life, and cursed all who disobeyed in the least point: iii. 6-18; Lev. xviii. 5), and by the Spirit cried for a clean heart (Ps. li. 10, 11). So they could love the law, not as an outward yoke, but as the law of God's will cherished in the heart (xxxvii. 31), such as it was in Him who should come (xl. 8). In most Jews, because of the nonconformity between their inward state and the law's requirements as a rule from without, its tendency was "to gender to bondage" (Gal. ii. 4; iv. 3, 9, 24, 25; v. 1). Inclination rebelled against it. They either burst its bond for open heathenism; or, as in post-captivity times, scrupulously held the letter, but had none of its spirit, "have, the fulfilling of the law" (Rom. xiii. 8-10; Lev. xix. 18; 1 Tim. i. 5; Gal. v. 14; Matt. vii. 12, xxii. 37-40; Jas. ii. 8). Hence the prophets looked on to gospel times when God would write the law by His Spirit in the heart (Jer. xxxi. 31-33, 39; Ezek. xxxvi. 26, 27, xl. 19, 20).

In one respect the law continues, in another it is superseded (Matt. v. 17, 18). In its antitypical realization in Jesus, it is all being fulfilled or has been so. In its spirit, "holy, just and good," it is of everlasting obligation as it reflects the mind of God. In its O. T. form it gives place to its fully developed perfection in the N. T. The temporary and successional Aaronic priesthood gives place to the abiding and intransmissible Melchizedek priesthood of Jesus, the sacrificial types, to the one antitypical sacrifice, never to be repeated (Heb. v., vii., viii., ix., x.). So believers, in so far as they are under the gospel law of Christ (Gal. vi. 2), which is the law of love in the heart, are no longer under the law, as an outward letter ordinance. Through Christ's death they are dead to the law, as a law of condemnation, and have the Spirit enabling them to "serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter" (Rom. ii. 29; vii. 1-6; 2 Cor. iii. 6). "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness (both justification and sanctification) to every one that believeth" (Rom. x. 4, viii. 1-3). He gave not so much new laws of morality as new motives for observing the old law. As a covenant of works, and a provisional mode of discipline, and a typical representation of atonement, the law is no more. As the revelation of God's righteousness it is everlasting. Free from the letter, the believer fulfils the spirit and end of the law, conformity to God's will. Moses, in foretelling the rise of the "Prophet like unto himself" and God's rejection of all who should reject Him (Deut. xviii. 15, etc.), by the Spirit intimates that the law was to give place to the gospel of Jesus. Moses anticipates also by the Spirit the evils which actually befell them, their being besieged, their captivity, dispersion, and restoration (Lev. xxvii. Deut. xxxii.). The words in xxiv. 10-12 (comp. Num. xii. 1-8) prove that no other prophet or succession of prophets can exhaustively fulfil the prophecy. Both Peter and Stephen authoritatively decide that Messiah is "the Prophet" (Acts iii. 22, vii. 37). The gospel attracted and detached from the Jewish nation almost every pure and pious soul, sifting the chaff from the wheat. The destruction of the temple with which Judaism and the ceremonial law were inseparably connected was God's explicit setting of them aside. The danger to the church from Judaizing Christians, which was among its first trials (Acts xi. xv., Gal. iii. 5), was thereby diminished, and "the fall of the Jews is the riches of the world" in this as in other respects (Rom. xi. 12).

Lawyer. One learned in the law. "Scribe" was the official and legal designation. He who is called a lawyer in Matt. xxii. 35 is called a "scribe" in Mark xii. 28, what we should call a "divine." A "doctor of the law" is the highest title (Acts v. 34).

Laying on of hands. See BAPTISM.

Lazarus = Eleazar = God helps. 1. Of BETHANY [see]; brother of Mary and Martha (John xi. 1). The sisters were the better known, whence they are put prominently forward here, and in Luke x. 38, etc., are alone named. L. was "of apud," belonging to at that time" Bethany, from (ek, implying his original settlement) the village of Mary and Martha" (still it is likely the same village is meant in both Luke x. and John xi., viz. Bethany). Curiously Ganneau found close to Bethany a tomb, probably of the first century, containing the names all together of Simon, Martha, and L. L.'s subordinate position at their feast in Christ's honour (John xii. 2) makes it likely he was the youngest. Moreover, the house called that of Simon the leper (Matt. xxvi. 6, Mark xiv. 3); who was probably therefore their father, but either by death or leprosy no longer with them, though possibly he too, as a leper healed by Jesus, was then one of that happy family. Their friends from Jerusalem (John xi. 19), according to John's use of "the Jews," were of the ruling elders and Pharisees. The feast, the costly ointment, the family funeral cave (comp. Isa. xxii. 16, 2 Kings xxiii. 6, Jer. xxvi. 23), all bespeak good social position. The sisters' warm attachment to L. was strengthened by their common love to Jesus who loved all three (John xi. 5). L. had won the disciples' love too, for Jesus calls him "our friend" (ver. 11). At the time of L.'s sickness and the sisters' call, Jesus was in PERAZA beyond Jordan, on His way to Jerusalem, two days' journey from Bethany. He delayed two days to give time for that death which He foresaw, and from which He was about to raise L. On proposing to go to Judaea, His disciples remonstrated on the ground that He would be going into the very danger from which He had just escaped (x. 39, 40; xi. 8-10). He replied that whilst His appointed day yet lasted He was safe, and that He was going to awaken L. out of sleep. He was "glad" that He had not been on the spot before, that L.'s death and rising might awaken the disciples out of the deadness of unbelief. The sisters grieved at His seeming neglect. God sees cause for joy where even His people see only cause for grief. Four days had elapsed after the call when He arrived. Martha went and met Him, whilst Mary sat in the house, in beautiful harmony with the character of each respectively, described in Luke x. 40-42. Martha's faith had now become stronger; so she says, "Lord, I know that even now whatsoever Thou wilt ask of God, God will give it Thee (more buoyant in spirit than Mary, and cherishing even now a vague hope of her brother's restoration) . . . Yea, Lord, I believe that Thou art the Christ the Son of God . . . the Resurrection and the Life." On Martha telling Mary of Jesus' arrival and "call" for her, either expressed or implied ("secretly," through fear of Jewish informers, see ver. 28, 46), the latter too came "quickly" to Him. The Jews her friends, not having heard Martha's commendation, supposed Mary was gone to the tomb to weep, but found her as of old "at Jesus' feet." Her words were fewer, but her action more impassioned, than those of her sister. So the whole company, Jesus, His disciples, the sisters, and their sympathisers, were met at the grave. At the sight of their weeping, Jesus "groaned in spirit," and troubled Himself, but checked His emotion which would otherwise have choked utterance. "Where have ye laid him?" Sympathy with their sorrow, which He was instantly to relieve, at last found vent in tears: "Jesus wept." (comp. Luke xix. 41, Heb. iv. 15). "Behold, how He loved him," the Jews, His adversaries, were constrained to exclaim. Their unbelief, "could not this man which opened the eyes of the blind (John ix.: they allude not to the raising of Jairus' daughter and the widow of Nair's son, which took place in Galilee, but to the miracle which made such a stir in Jerusalem; they never thought of His raising the dead) have caused that even this man should not have died?" made Him "groan again." "Take away the stone," Martha, retaining still remainders of unbelief (she believed in L.'s future resurrection, but she hardly dared to believe what she herself had hinted at in ver. 22, that Christ will raise him now), objected on the ground of the body's presumed decomposition by this time. He tells her to "believe, so she shall see the glory of God." With a preparatory thanksgiving to the Father for the already felt answer to His prayer, He said, "L., come forth," and he came forth bound hand and foot, the graveclothes and napkin about his face. "Loose him, and let him go": contrast Jesus' resurrection, the graveclothes and the napkin folded separately, because, unlike L., He was to die no more (John xx. 6, 7). The same miracle which converted some Jews to belief furnished others only with materials for informing the Pharisees against Him. It brought the plots of the rulers and Caiaphas to a crisis (xi. 45-53). The very sign which the Pharisees desired in the parable of Lazarus (Luke xvi. 27-30) is now granted in the person of one of the same name, but only stimulates them to their crowning sin, to kill Jesus, nay even to kill L. too (John xii. 10). The same sun that develops the fragrant violet strengthens the poison of the deadly nightshade.

This is the eternal miracle of the truth of the Gospels. Spinoza said if this were true he would fear his system in pieces and embrace Christianity. As the Lord's Judaea ministry was not the subject of the first three evangelists, but the Galilee, they omit the raising of L. The Jews' consultation to kill L., and his own probable shrinking from publicity after such a mysterious experience, perhaps further influenced them in their omission of the miracle. By John's time of writing the brother and sisters were dead, and no reason for reserve any longer existed. Tradition says that L.'s first question on coming back was whether he should die again; on learning he must, he never smiled again.

Such an impression was made by this miracle that many Jews flocked to Bethany to see both Jesus and L. The eye witnesses have record, and the people who heard of it from them met Him on His way to Jerusalem, and formed part of His retinue in His triumphal entry with the palm-bearing multitude (John xii. 12, 17, 18).

E. H. Plumptre (Smith's Diet.) identifies Simon the leper with Simon the Pharisee (Luke vii. 36-40); Martha had the Pharisees' belief in the resurrection (John xi. 24); Mary's gift of the ointment was after the example of the sinful woman in Simon's house; the leprosy came on subsequently. Also he identifies L. with the rich young ruler (Matt. xix., Mark x., Luke xviii.); Jesus' words to him, "one thing thou lackest," answer to His words to Martha, "one thing is needful"; "Jesus beholding loved him" (Mark) is said also of L. (John xi. 5); Jesus' love at last wrought out his conversion, possible to God though not to man; a sharp Palestine fever is sent to discipline him; his death and rising through Jesus' power is accompanied by his spiritual resurrection (John v. 24, 25). Judas and the eleven expected that the feast in John xi. 2 was the farewell feast of L., renouncing his former life and obeying Christ's command, "sell that thou hast, and give to the poor"; hence Judas' bitter objection, "why was not this ointment sold for 300 pence and given to the poor?" On the night of Christ's betrayal L., whose Bethany home was near and was Christ's lodging on the previous night, in the hasty night alarm rushed eagerly with "the linen cloth (the term applied to graveclothes always, the same which he had on when the Lord raised him from the grave (xi. 44), sindon) cast about his naked body" (Mark xiv. 51, 52; xv. 46), and was seized by the highpriest's servants as a second victim (John xii. 10), whereas they let the other disciples escape.

2. L. in the parable, Luke xvi. 19-31. The one unknown on earth has a name with God; the rich man, well known as a great man among men, has no name with God (Rev. iii. 1). The historic Lazarus (John xi. xii.) belonged to the richer classes. Yet it is not a rich L., but L. the beggar whom the rich scarcely noticed, that is carried by angels to Abraham's bosom. The historic Lazarus raised from the dead, yet not convincing the Jews, proves the truth stated in the parable of L. that "if they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither would they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." The rich man was not so much a glutton as a self-pleaser. It is not said he did not relieve L., may L. lying at his gate implies he did, but with ostentation, "justifying himself before men" (ver. 15), having no true "repentance" (30). Servants attended him, "dogs" L.; these showed more pity and sympathy than his fellow men. The rich man's "burial" is mentioned, implying a grand funeral and flattering epitaph, whilst his soul was in hell. Christ takes care of the dust of L. against the day of His appearing, and receives his soul to Himself "in Abraham's bosom" (image from a feast; comp. John xiii. 25), whose faith L. followed. Once he had shared "crumbs" with the dogs (Matt. xv. 27), now he shares the heavenly banquet with the first father of the people of God. Not L.'s sufferings but his faith brought him there. Not the rich man's wealth but his practical unbelief (Luke xvi. 27-31) shut him out "in torments"; he was one of those "covetous" whom Jesus just before reproved, "justifying himself before men," "highly esteemed among men," but one whose practice was "abomination in the sight of God." He now begs a drop of water taken up by L. with "the tip of the finger," but in vain. Once he scarcely and only for show, not from love which alone God recognises, allowed L. to gather the "crumbs," the portion of the dogs. Abraham himself ventured all on God's promise of an after inheritance, having here "not so much as to set his foot on" (Acts vii. 5, Heb. xi. 13); appropriately then he told the rich man, "son (by privileges on which the Jews prided themselves, Luke iii. 8), remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things" (Matt. vi. 19-21) and likewise L. evil things, but now he is comforted and thou art tormented." The rich man's desire for his brethren's conversion to belief, by L. being sent from the dead, is a covert expression of the fact that he was an unbeliever, and that unbelievers lay the blame of their unbelief on God as not giving them proof enough; whereas neither the raising of another L., nor that of Jesus who dieth no more, could win the wilful rejecters to belief (John xii. 10, 11, xvi. 29; Acts xxvi. 8). The five brethren coming to the same hell, so far from relieving by their company, (as many virtually think by walking with the many on the broad way rather than with the few on the narrow way,) would only aggravate his anguish by reproaches, because he had countenanced their unbelief. The dialogue is not between L. and the rich man, for they are utterly apart, but Abraham (God's mouthpiece in O. T. as father of the faithful, who sit down with Him, Matt. viii. 11, 12) and the rich man.

Lead. Exod. xv. 10, "they sank as lead," heavily falling down in their panoply, helpless and motionless, the waters closing over them. Used for the plumb line (Amos vii. 7). Zecl. v. 7, 8, "the weight of lead" upon the ephah's mouth, covering personified wickedness, implies the impossibility of her escape from beneath the ponderous lead weighing her down. Job xix. 24, "oh that my words were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock for ever." The lead was poured into the graven characters to make them better seen and (which is Job's thought) more durable; not beaten plates, for it was "in the rock" they were to be engraved. May my pen be of iron, and the ink lead poured into the writing on the everlasting rock! Perhaps the hammer was of "lead," as sculptors find more delicate incisions are made by it. Jer. vi. 28-30 accords exactly with scientific fact; lead applied to purify in the furnace—silver alloyed with "iron" and "copper" ("brass") fails to do so, in the absence of the purifying blast blowing upon the silver. So Jehovah's casting of the Jews into fiery affliction avails not to purify them without the breath of God's Holy Spirit (comp. Ezek. xxii. 18-22). Remains of ancient lead mines have been found in the mountains E. of the Nile toward the Red Sea. It was among the spoil taken from Midian (Num. xxxi. 22). Tyre got it from Tarshish (Ezek. xxvii. 12).

Leah. [See JACOB and LABAN.] She was buried in the cave of Machpelah (Gen. xlix. 31).

Leasing. Old English, lying. Ps. iv. 2, v. 6.

Leaven; seor. A lump of old dough in high fermentation. As making it and leavening bread with it took time, unleavened bread was used in sudden emergencies (Gen. xviii. 6, xix. 3). It was forbidden in all offerings to the Lord by fire (Lev. ii. 11, vii. 12). The Israelites on pain of death were to have none in their houses or in the land during passover for seven days, from 14th Nisan (Exod. xii. 15, 19, 32, xiii. 7, xxii. 18; Dent. xvi. 3, 4). Salt was its opposite, and was never to be absent from the altar burnt offering, representing the incorruptible imperishableness of Jehovah's covenant. Honey as liable to ferment also was excluded from the altar burnt offerings. Leaven reminded Israel of the haste with which they fled from Egypt, and of their sufferings, which answer to the insipidity of unleavened bread, "the bread of affliction." Its prominent symbolical meaning was, it is bred of corruption and corrupts the mass with which it is mixed. Hence it represents "malice" (the evil habit) and "wickedness" (evil coming out in word and deed) as opposed to "sincerity" and "truth" (1 Cor. v. 7). The Jews searched with extreme care their houses, to purge out every particle of leaven. So Christians ought to search their hearts and purge out every corruption (Ps. cxxxix. 23, 24). It also symbolises corrupt doctrine (Matt. xvi. 6). Another quality is its secretly penetrating and diffusive influence: 1 Cor. v. 6, "a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump," the influence of one sinner corrupts many (Eccles. ix. 18); but in Gal. v. 9 a little legalism mixed with the gospel corrupts its purity. Though elsewhere used in a bad sense, leaven in Matt. xiii. 33 represents the gospel principle working silently "without observation" from within, fill the whole is leavened, just as the mustard tree represents its diffusion externally; so "flesh," though usually in a bad sense, in Ezek. xi. 19 is in a good sense. The decomposition of social elements, accompanying and providentially preparing the way for the gospel, makes the image appropriate. Leaven was allowed to be offered in the first-fruits and tithes (Dent. xvi. 2, 12; 2 Chron. xxxi. 5), the pentecostal loaves (Lev. xxi. 15, 17), and the peace offering (vii. 13). Transl. Lev. ii. 11 "as an oblation of firstfruits ye shall offer them (leaven and honey) unto the Lord, but they shall not be burnt on the altar for a sweet savour." In Amos iv. 5 the leavened bread was "with the sacrifice of thanksgiving of the peace offerings," not with burnt offerings of animals on the altar. Perhaps however the command is ironical, "offer by burning (marg.) a sacrifice . . . with leaven" (which was forbidden), your very offerings being open insults to God.

Leaves: of a roll (Jer. xxxv. 23). Not distinct as in a book, but consecutive columns or spaces on the long roll, which is often rolled round a stick; delathoth, "doors."

Lebana. Neh. vii. 48. LEBANAH, Ezra ii. 45.

Lebanon = exceeding white, viz. with snow, as Mont Blanc. In Heb. Lebānōn, akin to alp. The double mountain range N. of Palestine, running in parallel lines from S.W. to N.E., having between the fertile valleys anciently called Colossyria, now El Bek'a (where are the grand ruins of the temple of the sun), about six or seven miles wide, "the valley of L." (Josh. xi. 17.) The range is about 80 miles long, 15 broad. It forms the northern head of the Jordan valley and the southern head of the Orontes valley [see HAMATH]. The western range is the region of the Hivites and GIBLITES [see] (xiii. 5, Jud. iii. 3). The eastern range was Antilibanus, or "L. toward the sunrise." The wady el Tem separates the southern part of Antilibanus from L. and also from the Gahlee hills. The river Leontes (Litany) sweeps round its southern end, and drains Coëlosyria, falling into the Mediterranean five miles N. of Tyre. L. runs parallel to the coast in the plain of Emesa opening from the Mediterranean, in Scripture "the entering in (i.e. entrance) of Hamath" (1 Kings viii. 75). The river Eleutherus (nahr el Kebir) here sweeps round its northern end. The average height is 7000 ft. But one peak, Dhor el Khodib, N. of the cedars, is 10,051; and Hermon in Antilebanon is 10,125. L. is of grey limestone, with belts of recent sandstone along the western slopes. Eastward in the glens of Antilibanus flow toward Damascus Abana (Dar-ada) and Pharpar (nahr el Awaj). All that now represents Hiram's cedar forests is the cluster called "the cedars," 6172 ft. above the sea, in the centre of the vast recess or semicircle formed by the highest summits of L. above the deep valley of the sacred river Kadisha. [See CEDARS.]

Odorous flowers and aromatic shrubs and vines still yield "the smell of L." wafted by the mountain breeze (S. of Sol. iv. 11). The line of cultivation runs at the height of 6000 ft. Every available space is utilized for figtrees, vines, mulberry trees, and olives. Numerous villages nestle amidst the rocks. The trees striking their roots into the fissures of rocks illustrate Hos. xiv. 5, "Israel shall strike forth his roots as L." L. is a delightful retreat from the sultry heat of the plains and of Palestine, cooled as it is by the snows which crown its peaks. Jeremiah (xviii. 14) asks, "will a man leave the snow of L. which cometh from the rock of the field (a poetical name for L. towering above the surrounding plain)? Or shall the cold flowing waters that come from another place (from the distant rocks) be forsaken?" None. Yet Israel forsakes Jehovah the living fountain, ever near, for broken cisterns. Hyenas, panthers, jackals, wolves, and bears still haunt its glens and peaks (comp. S. of Sol. iv. 8, 2 Kings xiv. 9). The river Adonis (nahr Ibrahim) springs from a cave beneath the high peak Sannin. The plain of Phœnicia, two miles wide, runs at the base of L. between it and the sea. The eastern slopes are less abrupt and fertile than the western. Maronite Christians people the northern part of the range; Druses abound more in the southern.

L. was assigned to Israel, but never conquered (Josh. xiii. 2-6, Jud. iii. 1-3). It was under the Phœnicians in Solomon's time and subsequently

(1 Kings v. 2-6, Ezra iii. 7). Antilibanus is less peopled than L., and has more wild beasts: S. of Sol. iv. 8, "look from the top of Amara, from . . . Shenir and Hermon . . . the lions' den . . . the mountains of the leopards," referring to the two higher peaks, Hermon, and that near the fountain of Abana, where panthers still are found. "The tower of L. which looketh toward Damascus" is Hermon (vii. 4).

Lebath=lionesses (implying their presence formerly). A city in the extreme S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 32), afterwards transferred to Simeon (xix. 6), whose portion, like Levi's, was "scattered" in Israel (Gen. xlix. 5-7) on account of the cruelty in xxxiv. 25, 26. Now el Beyudh.

Lebbæus. Matt. x. 3, Sin. and Vat. MSS. omit. Thaddæus or Judas, the brother of James (Mark iii. 18). [See JUDE.]

Lebonah. N. of Shiloh. (Jud. xxi. 19). Now el Lubban.

Lecah. Son of Er (1 Chron. iv. 21). Perhaps "Er father of L." means founder of L., a town.

Leeks: chazir, lit. grass. The leek is green, and grasslike in its form of leaf. The allium porrum, the Welshman's national emblem, worn on St. David's day. The poor in Egypt eat them raw with bread, and as sauce to roast meat. So Num. xi. 5, "we remember the leek," etc. Hengstenberg suggests that clover-like grass is meant, which the poor much relish, under the name halbeh, scientifically Trigonella fœnum Græcum. But LXX. and the Egyptian usage favour A.V.

Lees. Wine was allowed to settle on them, to keep the body and colour; especially the choicest wine (Isa. xxv. 6). Hence such phrases expressing ease and self-indulgent prosperity as "Moab . . . hath settled on his lees," i.e. has been like wine undisturbed, and not "emptied from vessel to vessel," never having been dislodged from his original settlement, "his scent (i.e. the bouquet of the wine) is not changed," "therefore I will send unto him wanderers that shall empty his vessels (i.e. cities) and break their bottles" (i.e. the men of his cities) (Jer. xlviii. 11, 12). The effect of undisturbed prosperity on the ungodly is to harden in undisturbed security (Zeph. i. 12). Ps. lxxv. 8, "the dregs (lees) of the Lord's cup . . . all the wicked shall wring out and drink," i.e. they must drain out the whole cup to the dregs.

Legion. The largest division of the Roman army, of which it was, in order and armament, the miniature; 6000 foot, with a body of horse. Matt. xxvi. 53, "thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to My Father, and He shall presently give Me more than twelve legions of angels," against this band from the Roman "legion"; not merely My twelve apostles, but twelve "legions," and these "angels"? (comp. 2 Kings vi. 17, Dan. vii. 10.) In Mark v. 9 the demon-possessed says, "my name is legion, for we are many," "because many demons (Gr.) were entered into him."

Lehabim=the Libim, western neighbours to the Egyptians (Gen. x. 13); the Rebu or Lebu of the monuments; the Libyans in Roman phrase. They served in the Egyptian armies (2 Chron. xii. 3, xvi. 8; Nah. iii. 9; Dan. xi. 43). The modern Tuatiks and Berbers, aborigines of N. Africa, dwelling in the desert and sides of Atlas.

Lehi. Jud. xv. 9, 14, 19 (where transl. "in Lehi"), Heb. "the Lehi." [See EN HAKKORE, the spring; Ramath Lehi was the eminence.] L'hi strictly is the Heb. for jawbone; LEHI the name of the place. God did not make water to flow out of the tooth socket of the jawbone which Samson threw away, to slake his thirst, but "cleft an hollow place (maktesh, Zeph. i. 11) in Lehi," whence "water" miraculously "came out." In Judah, between Philistia and the cliff Etam, now Bet Likiyeh, a village on the northern side of the wady Suleiman; at the entrance of the hill country of Judah, the outermost stronghold toward the S.

Lemuel=devoted to God, or created by God (the long form of Lael, Num. iii. 24). Instead of "L. . . the prophecy," some less probably transl. "L. king of Massa" (Prov. xxxi. 1-9). An ideal model king. Not, as Hitzig guessed, elder brother to Agur, king of an Arab tribe in Massa, on the borders of Palestine, and both sprung from the Simeonites who drove out the Amalekites from mount Seir under Hezekiah, as if Lemuel were an older form of Nemuel, or Jemuel, Simeon's eldest son. Taught by his mother, as Timothy by Lois and Eunice (2 Tim. i. 5, iii. 15, 16). Her character was perhaps the model of the portrait of the "virtuous woman" (Prov. xxxi. 10-31). Abstemious; a pleader for and patron of those who cannot defend themselves, the widow and orphan.

Lentiles. Gen. xxv. 34. Small beans, common in Syria and Egypt, called

'adas, very palatable; the ingredient of the red pottage (adami), for which Esau sold his birthright. Dried and cooked they are still used as portable provisions for a journey; so Barzillai brought them to David's hungry followers (2 Sam. xvi. 28). In time of scarcity used with wheat, barley, beans, millet, and fitches, as a substitute for pure flour (Ezek. iv. 9). The Arabs make Hebron the scene of Esau's selling his birthright, and therefore daily supply the needy with lentile soup from the kitchen of a mosque there. Some derive "Lent" from the use of lentiles at that season in Roman Catholic countries.

Leopard. Famed for swiftness and agility (Hab. i. 8); "you would fancy it was flying" (Oppian Cynege., iii. 76); it climbs trees, and can crawl along the ground. Hence the symbol for Greece and Alexander's rapid victories (Dan. vii. 6; Rev. xiii. 2). The prevalence of leopards anciently in Palestine is marked by the many places named from them (nameh, Heb.): Nimrah, Nimrim, Beth Nimrah. "The mountains of the leopard" (S. of Sol. iv. 8), viz. Lebanon and Hermon, where still they are found; "the mountains of prey" (Ps. lxxvi. 4), symbolising the rapacious world kingdoms. They spring with successive rapid bounds. They cunningly lie in wait in thickets and often near villages for their prey, as distinguished from the lion's bold, open attack (Jer. v. 6. Hos. xiii. 7): "as a leopard by the way, I will observe (he in wait for) them." Its unalterable spots represent man's inability to change himself (Jer. xiii. 23); yet the leopard in the millennium shall "lie down with the kid" (Isa. xi. 6).

Leper, Leprosy. Heat, drought, and toil and dry powdery substances, tend to generate skin disease, especially in absence of nourishing diet and personal cleanliness. These predisposing causes all exist in Syria and Egypt. Elephantiasis especially prevailed in Egypt, "the parent of such taints" (Lam. vi. 1112). Israel's long stay there exposed them to the malady, as is implied in the legend (Diod. Sic. ii, Tacit. Hist. v. 3, 4; Justin xxxvi. 2; Josephus Ant. iii. 2, § 4; Cleomenon and Menetho in Jos. c. Apion i. 26, 32, 34) that the king of Egypt drove out a multitude of impure people and lepers, Jews and Egyptians, the lepers among whom the king's soldiers wrapped in sheets of be eland and drowned in the sea (comp. Exod. xv. 10), and that Moses a sacred scribe was the leader of the rest through the wilderness into Judaea (comp. the "mixed multitude," xii. 38). Leprosy, beginning with little pain, goes on in its sluggish but sure course, until it mutilates the body, deforms the features, turns the voice into a croak, and makes the patient a hopeless wreck. It has left the Israelites for other races in modern times. Nep'tzora'ath means a plague or stroke of leprosy (LXX), rather elephantiasis. An animal poison in the blood ferments there and affects the skin, depositing an albuminous substance, and destroying the sensation of the nerves. The tuberculated form is the common one, inflaming the skin, distorting the face and joints, causing the hair of the head or eyebrows to fall off or else turn white (Lev. xiii. 3-6), and encrusting the person with ulcerous tubercles with livid patches or surface between. The anæsthetic elephantiasis begins in the forehead

(2 Chron. xxvi. 19-21) with shining white patches which burst; bone by bone drops off; the skin is mummy like; the lips hang down exposing the teeth and gums. Tuberculated patients live on the average ten years, anæsthetic 20. The latter is called "white leprosy," but is distinct from the common white leprosy which covers the whole person, or freckles it with white bright spots, and which did not make ceremonially unclean (Lev. xiii. 12, 38, 39). Sometimes one limb alone is affected with a dead pearl-like whiteness (comp. Exod. iv. 6, "Moses' hand was leprous as snow"; Num. xii. 10, 12, "as one dead, of whom the flesh is half consumed when he cometh out of his mother's womb"; 2 Kings v. 27). Job was affected with acute tuberculous elephantiasis, rapidly ulcerating his body (ii. 7, 8). The tuberculated form was in Israelite times medically incurable. Swain's flesh and scaleless and finless fish, used as food, tend to generate the disease; one reason of the prohibition (Lev. xi. 7, 9-12).

Separation of lepers from society has been common in all countries, partly from the dread of contagion, and also among the Israelites from the conviction that it was the special visitation of God. It was generally hereditary (comp. 2 Sam. iii. 29, "let there not fall from the house of Joab . . . a leper"). Lepers associated together without the camp, as they still do (2 Kings vii. 3; Luke xvii. 12). A habitation was provided for them outside Jerusalem, upon the hill Gareb, as the name implies "the hill of scraping" or leprosy (Jer. xxxi. 40, Job ii. 8); it (more recently called Bezetha), Gath (the hill of the dead), and Tophet (the valley of corpses) were the three defiled spots which Jeremiah foretold should be included in the restored city. Segregation wisely checked extension of leprosy, by preventing intermarriage of lepers with the sound. It was less a trial to the leper than intercourse with his fellow men, who loathed his presence, would have been.

Spiritually leprosy typified sin, and its treatment represented the separation which sin makes between sinners and saints. The law is the inspired interpreter of nature's truths. The leper was a "walking tomb," "a parable of death," and of sin "the wages of which is death." Hence he had to wear the badges of mourning, a covering upon his upper lip, and was regarded "as one dead" (Lev. xiii. 45, Num. xii. 12). He was to cry, Unclean, unclean, to warn all not to defile themselves by approaching him. So the ten stood afar off, lifting up their voices (Luke xvii. 13). The malady was often due to inherited taint, as is sin (Exod. xx. 5). The gradual decay of the body, first of the skin, then the bone, then the flesh, life still surviving, vividly represented the sure and deadly process of man's ruin by sin. In Isa. liii. 4, Jerome's Vulg. transl., "we thought Him to be a leper smitten of God," leprosy being God's direct judgment for sin. God alone could heal alike the leper and the sinner. The minister of God was publicly to witness to the leper's cure by performing certain prescribed rites and so admitting him to communion again with his fellows (Lev. xiv. 9-20). Christ proved His Divine mission by healing lepers, and at the same time commanded them to go to the priest to "offer for cleansing those things which Moses commanded for a testimony unto them" (Matt. xi. 5, Mark i. 44).

The leper was excluded from both the sanctuary and the camp. The ceremony of restoration was therefore twofold. That performed outside the camp restored him to intercourse with the people (Lev. xiv. 3-9), that performed in the tabernacle court seven days after the former restored him to all spiritual privileges of Jehovah's worshippers (ver. 10-32). Two birds were taken for him, provided by the priest not the man; one was killed over running water, the other set free; accompanied with cedar wood (Juniper oxycedar, whose smoke was disinfectant), scarlet (representing rosy health and vigour), and hyssop (the eaper plant, medicinally cleansing ulcers and skin diseases). The cedar and hyssop were tied to the living bird by the scarlet band; the whole was dipped in the blood of the killed bird and running water. The seven sprinklings renewed to him the covenant, symbolised by that number. The dead bird represented his past deadness, the freed living bird his restored life and freedom. The two, as in the case of the two goats on the DAY OF ATONEMENT [see], form one joint type. The leper brought two young rams (11ch. Lev. xiv. 10), one as a trespass offering, another as a burnt offering, and a ewe lamb as a sin offering; these bore witness that disease and death and the defilements of both are the wages of man's sin. The similarity to the rites in consecrating a priest marked the priestly character of Israel (Exod. xix. 6). The leper was restored to his standing as member of the royal priest-nation with priestly ceremonial. First he was restored to a right footing with the general congregation. Then only was he in a condition to offer, as member of the priestly nation, the offerings for himself. The oil symbolised the Spirit's grace. Its application to the ear, hand, and foot marked that every organ was now consecrated to God, the ear to hear and obey, the hand to perform God's will, and the foot to run upon God's errands.

Leprosy in the house, a fungous growth on the walls, symbolised the corruption which taints all creation and which is the effect of the fall. Man's body and man's earthly home must be dissolved, that a heavenly body and a new earth untainted with sin may succeed. Jude 23, "hating the garment spotted by the flesh," i.e. avoiding all contact with pollution, answers to Lev. xiii. 52-57, xv. 4-17. Any touching a leprosy-tainted garment was excluded from communion with God's people. Christians, who at baptism received the white garment, must shrink from what would defile it. When the leprosy was spread over the whole person from head to foot (Lev. xiii. 12, 13) with none of the proper symptoms of elephantiasis the man was clean, his disease was the common white leprosy or dry tetter, red pimples with scaly surface spreading till it covers the body, not much affecting the health and disappearing of itself. This was rather a relief to the body than a disease, the whole diseased matter being brought to the surface and so passing off. Sin is least fatal and nearest removal when brought to the surface by hearty confession to God, then our Highpriest Jesus completely cleanses us (1 John i. 8, 9). Leprosy was polluting, spreading as to the patient, transmissible, and then humanly incurable; in all these points typical of sin. The death spots soon after death appearing on a corpse, and spreading till the whole is decomposed, answer to the leprosy spots. Every leper thus was a living sermon that Israel should keep themselves unspotted from the world (Rev. xxi. 27, Eph. v. 5).

Leshem. Josh. xix. 47 = LAISH, DAN [which see], Lasha (Gen. x. 19).

Lettushim. Gen. xxv. 3. An Arab tribe (as the plural ending implies), sprung from Abraham by Keturah.

Leummim. Gen. xxv. 3. A tribe, meaning "the peoples".

Levi. 1. Jacob's third son by Leah, = joined, expressing her trust; "now will my husband be joined unto me, because I have borne him three sons" (Gen. xxix. 31). L. joined Simeon in avenging their own full sister Dinah's wrong by treacherously slaying the Shechemites, and so incurred Jacob's curse. They made circumcision, which God gave as a pledge of His holy covenant, the instrument of hypocrisy and bloody revenge. Jacob's moral weakness, in reproaching his sons not with the treacherous murder but with exposing him to danger ("ye have troubled me to make me to stink among the inhabitants of the land"), is faithfully delineated (xxiv.). On his death bed he took a less selfish and juster view of their deed (xlix. 5-7): "Simeon and L. are brethren" in character as in birth, "instruments of wickedness are their swords" (Heb.). O my soul, come not thou into their secret" (deliberative council), renounce all fellowship with their act; "mine honour" (glory, my spirit, which is man's glory, the centre of his personality framed in God's image); "for in their anger they slew a man and in their wantonness (Heb.) houghed an ox." In chap. xxxiv. 28 it is merely said "they took their oxen." Chap. xlix. brings out the additional fact that in cruel revenge they wantonly severed the hind foot tendons of the Shechemites' oxen. Simeon, as the one detained in Egypt by Joseph, was probably the foremost of L.'s sons in the cruel attack on Rachel's son, and L. probably joined him, though the spite began with the base born sons of Bilhah and Zilpah. The discipline made the sons, once so unfeeling towards Joseph, to become self sacrificing for Benjamin. As the two joined in crime, retributively they should be "divided and scattered" in Israel. L. received no land inheritance but cities scattered through Israel (Josh. xxi. 1-40), and depended on tithes paid by the other tribes.

The curse became subsequently a blessing to the nation by L.'s separation to Divine service. But Jacob does not intimate this, a proof of the genuineness of his blessing as recorded in Genesis. Moses subsequently speaks in very different language of L. (Deut. xxxiii. 8, etc.), as was appropriate after L.'s accession to the priestly honour: "let Thy Right (thummim) and Thy Light (urim) be with Thy holy one (L., representing the whole tribe. The Urim and Thummim worn on the highpriest's breastplate were the pledge that Jehovah would always give His people 'light' to defend His 'right'; they should be given to L. because he had defended Jehovah's right), whom Thou didst prove at Massah (Exod. xvii. 1-7, by the people's murmuring against Moses, L.'s representative, for water at the outset of the 40 years' wanderings) and with whom Thou didst strive at . . . Meribah" (Num. xx. 1-13, at Kadesh, at the 40 years' close, the two comprehending the whole intermediate period). Jehovah "proved" L., and by the people's strivings "strove with" L. (represented by Moses and Aaron). L. proved himself in the main (for Moses' failure, Num. xx., and the Levite Korah's rebellion, xvi., are graciously ignored) to be Jehovah's "holy one." Moses' and Aaron's faithfulness, the Levites' drawing their swords against their Israelite brethren as God's avengers of the idolatry of the golden calf (Exod. xxxii. 26-29), "slaying every man his brother . . . companion . . . neighbour . . . son," where God's honour was at stake (Matt. x. 37, xix. 29; Luke xiv. 26), and Phinehas' zeal against the idolaters and fornicators with the Moabite women (Num. xxv. 11), gained God's approval and the choice of L. as the priestly tribe (Deut. xxxiii. 9-11). "Who said unto his father and to his mother, I have not seen him, neither did he acknowledge his brethren. . . . They shall teach Jacob Thy judgments and Israel Thy law (Lev. x. 11), they shall present incense before Thee (in the holy place) and whole burnt offering upon Thine altar (in the court). Bless, Lord, his substance (rather his power) and accept the work of his hands. Smite through the lions (Ps. lxxix. 23, the strength) of them that rise against Him," etc.: i.e., give him power for discharging duty, accept his service, and make his adversaries powerless. L. died at the age of 137 (Exod. vi. 16). [See LEVITES.]

2. Ancestors of Christ (Luke iii. 24, 29). 3. Son of Alphaeus; the original name of Matthew the publican and afterwards the apostle (Mark ii. 14; Luke v. 27, 29; Matt. ix. 9).

Leviathan. From levi "joined" (referring to its joined, plate armour like scales) and than a monster drawn out, i.e. long; or else Arabic larah "to twist." So Job xli. 15-17. The crocodile. The whale having a smooth skin and no scales cannot be meant. The crocodile's teeth, 30 on each side of each jaw, lock into each other. Lips are wanting, so that the teeth are seen even when the mouth is closed, illustrating Job xli. 14, "who can open the doors of his face? his teeth are terrible round about." As behemoth is the hippopotamus, so leviathan is the crocodile, both found in Egypt along the Nile. The term elsewhere is used for any large monster of the "sea" or water. Ps. civ. 26, lxxiv. 13, 14: "Thou breakest the heads of leviathan in pieces, and gavest him to be meat to the people inhabiting the wilderness." The king of Egypt is symbolised by the "dragons" and "leviathan" (comp. Ezek. xxxii. 2, xxxix. 3); he and his host at their overthrow in the Red Sea became a spoil to Israel (comp. "bread for us," Num. xiv. 9) "in the wilderness." The context shows that it is the benefits of God to Israel that are here recounted. In Job iii. 8 transl. "let them curse it (my day of birth) . . . who are ready to raise up a leviathan," i.e. necromancers who rouse and control wild beasts at will (comp. Ps. lviii. 5). In Isa. xxvii. 1, "leviathan the piercing serpent, even leviathan that crooked (wriggling) serpent," "the dragon in the sea," literally refers to the crocodile in the sea or Nile, or else to the great rock snakes. Spiritually every foe of Israel and the church. Antitypically and finally Satan "the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil" (Rev. xx. 2, 10), whom finally "Jehovah with His sore, great, and strong sword shall punish." For "piercing" (bariach) transl. "darting from side to side." Poised on one side he tries to gain on the other side (Job xxxi. 13; 2 Cor. xi. 14, ii. 11). Typhon, the destroyer, was worshipped in Egypt under the form of a crocodile.

Levites. The men of Levi, the sacerdotal tribe, all ministers, out of whom the priests were taken, viz. Aaron's family. Levi's wild zeal against the defiler of Dinah was the forerunner of the Levites' zeal against impure idolaters. The antiquity and genuineness of Genesis are marked by the absence of all notice of Levi's subsequent greatness as the priest tribe. The genealogy (Gen. xlii. 11) goes no further down than Levi's three sons; these too are named in their order of birth, not giving Kohath the prominence which his family had subsequently. He has four clans in Exod. vi. 16-25, Gershon and Merari but two each. Amram, Aaron, and Moses belonged to his stock (iv. 14). The firstborn "young men" of Israel were the priests to offer sacrifices (xxiv. 5) before the law, representing the priestly nation (xix. 6, 22, 24). [See LEVI on the Levites'] promotion to be the priestly tribe for their zeal in the Lord's cause.] Levi became "as Israel within an Israel," the witness and guard of the truth. Substituted for the firstborn males of all Israel whom Jehovah claimed as His when He saved Israel from the stroke on Egypt's firstborn; the Levites, 22,000; the firstborn males, 22,273; the odd 273 above were to be redeemed at five shekels each (Num. iii. 45-51), the fixed price for redeeming a victim vowed in sacrifice (xviii. 16, Lev. xxvii. 6). The Levites' cattle were taken for the firstlings of Israel's cattle (comp. Exod. xii. 12, 13). The Levites marching from Sinai round the tabernacle were the heavenly King's royal guard; none else was to approach it on pain of death (Num. i. 51, xviii. 22, iv. 3-30). The priests occupied the eastern side of the tabernacle, inside Judah the healing camp; the Kohathites the southern side, inside Reuben; the Gershonites the western side, inside Ephraim; the Merarites the northern, inside Dan. The aggregate of Gershonites (iii. 22), Kohathites (ver. 28), and Merarites (ver. 34), is 22,300; but in the redemption 300 are deducted (probably the firstborn in Levi within the year that had elapsed since the command was issued, iii. 40-43), and 22,000 taken as substituted for Israel's male firstborn. Levi in this census was the fewest tribe in numbers, but in the other tribes servants not pure Israelites were enumerated, whereas in Levi only pure Israelites. The number of Israel's firstborn males (22,273) compared with the male adults (603,550) is disproportionately small, the proportion being usually one in four. But the law of Exod. xiii. 1, 2, dedicated those alone who should be firstborn thereafter (comp. ver. 2, 11, 12; Num. iii. 13, viii. 17), for the duties of the firstborn referred to a ritual yet to be revealed, and the first born of cattle must mean those thereafter firstborn. Thus the proportion of firstborn sons in one year born of 2,000,000 of men is so large as can be explained only by the Divine blessing, and the sudden development which the exodus gave to the nation.

The Levites stood midway between the people and the priesthood, which culminated in the highpriest. They could not sacrifice, burn incense, or see the "holy things" till covered (Num. iv. 15). Yet they came nearer than the people, and they alone struck the tent in marching, carried its parts, and pitched it again. Their work needed matured strength; so their service began not till 30 years old (with a previous probationary period of five years: viii. 24), whereas military service began at 20. At 50 their service ceased (viii. 25, 26). So of 8000 Kohathites 2750 were on duty, of 7500 Gershonites 2630, of 6200 Merarites 3200 (Num. iv.). The Kohathites held the highest office and bare the ark (except on solemn occasions when the priests bare it: Josh. iii. 3, 15) and vessels, after the priest had covered them (Num. iv. 15). The Gershonites bare the tent hangings and curtains; the Merarites the tabernacle boards, bars, and pillars; the Kohathites under Eleazar bare the vessels on their shoulders (vii. 9); the Gershonites and Merarites under Ithamar (iv. 28, 33), because of their weighty charge, were allowed oxen and wagons.

The Levites were Jehovah's and Israel's gift to Aaron, "wholly given" (nethunim, akin to Nethinim literally, 1 Chron. ix. 2; the Levites' subordinates) and "joined" (as Levi means) to the priests (Num. iii. 9, viii. 19, xviii. 2, 4, 6). The Levites were purified for service with bathing, shaving, washing clothes, imposition of Israel's hands, waving them as a wave offering to Jehovah (comp. our gospel "living sacrifice," Rom. xii. 1) toward the four points of the compass, in token of entire consecration of all their powers; the Levite then laid hands on one bullock offered for a sin offering and another for a burnt offering. Korah's rebellion through seeking the priesthood was followed by a fresh defining of the Levites' office (Num. xvi., xviii. 1-7).

The Levites received a tithe or tenth of all produce, animal and vegetable, of which they had to pay the priests a tithe (xviii. 20-32). A second tithe the Israelites used for the tabernacle feasts and freewill offerings, and of this second tithe the Levites should receive a share (Deut. xiv. 23, 27), especially when ministering (xviii. 7, 8). Forty-eight cities were appointed them (four on the average from each tribe), including the six cities of refuge and (of suburbs, meadow for their cattle) 1000 cubits out from the city walls, each of the four sides being 2000 cubits long. [See GEZER.] The phrase "the Levite that is within thy gates" is appropriate (xiv. 27), for the Levites' cities did not cease to belong to the tribes within which they lay. Thus Levites are occasionally spoken of as belonging to other tribes, viz. those within whose territory they resided (xviii. 6, Jud. xvii. 7, 1 Sam. i. 1). Elkanah a Levite is called an "Ephrathite," "Heman the Ezrahite," i.e. from Zerah of Judah (title Ps. lxxviii., lxxxix.).

"The priests the Levites" [see DEUTERONOMY on the peculiar use of Levites without distinction from the priests] were to determine controversies and to preserve the law in the side of the ark, and in the seventh year at the feast of tabernacles read it before Israel, and pronounce the curses from Ebal (Deut. xvii. 9-12, xxxi. 9-13, 26, xxvii. 14). The Ilvite Gibeonites (Josh. ix. 27) and the NETHUNIM [see] relieved the Levites of their more burdensome duties subsequently. Micah's consecration of the homeless Levite as his household priest implies a relapse in dark times to the original household priesthood. It was a Korah-like usurpation on the part of the Levite (Jud. xvii.). Samuel the Levite, adopted into the priesthood, revived the Divine order. The Levites were among his schools of the prophets, whose training consisted in praise, prayer, and study of the law. Hence enlarged views of acceptable worship appear in the Levite Asaph's Ps. l.

The ark after its restoration from the Philistines was in charge of Abinadab in the hill, or Gibeah, or Kirjath Jearim (1 Sam. vii. 1, 2 Sam. vi. 3), probably an old Canaanite highplace sanctuary. David's words (1 Chron. xv. 2) imply that heretofore Levites had not been in charge of the ark, therefore that Abinadab was not a Levite possibly (?). "None ought to carry the ark of God but the Levites, for them hath Jehovah chosen." Saul's assumption of sacrificing, his slaughter of the priests at Nob and of the serving Gibeonites, imply his self-willed impatience of the prominence of the priest tribe. At Hebron accordingly 4000 Levites joined David, besides 3700 priests (1 Chron. xii. 26, 27). He honoured them at his succession, and once even wore their robe (2 Sam. vi. 14). The duties of the Levites are defined by him (1 Chron. xxiii. 24-32), "to wait on the sons of Aaron for the service of the house of Jehovah," etc., "and to stand every morning to thank and praise Jehovah, and likewise at even, and to offer (i.e. assist the priests in offering) all burnt sacrifices," etc. The Levites supplied "officers and judges" (1 Chron. xxvi. 20), "in all the business of the Lord and the service of the king." Korah's sons of the Levites, headed by Illeam, played upon psalteries and harps (1 Chron. ix. 19, 32); the Kohathites prepared the shewbread every sabbath; the Gershonites were headed by Asaph's son in the temple choir (vi. 39, 44; xv. 17), the Merarites by Ethan or Jeduthun. The heavier work being no longer needed of transporting the tabernacle, and psalmody being their chief duty, they entered service as early as 20 (xxiii. 24-27). The Levites numbered under David 38,000 (xxiii. 3), of whom 4000 formed the full choir; 288 in 24 divisions of 12 each were the skilled musicians (xxv. 1-8). At the severance of Israel and Judah the Levites flocked from the apostate northern kingdom to Judah and Jerusalem, and strengthened the southern kingdom (2 Chron. xi. 13, 14; xiii. 10-12).

The Levites proclaimed and taught the law, and judged controversies, with the priests and chiefs of Israel, in Jehoshaphat's reformation (2 Chron. xix. 8-11). They praised the Lord as singers before his army, and their beginning to sing was the signal of victory from the Lord over the Moabite and Ammonite invaders (xx. 19-22). They took an active part under Jehoiahi in restoring Joash (xxiii.); and in Hezekiah's reformation were "more upright" or earnest than the priests (xxix. 5, 34, xxx. 15-22, 27). So under Josiah the Levites had as their characteristic designation that they "taught all Israel" (xxv. 3-15). They served the Lord and Israel, standing in the holy place. The Levites acted as teachers and scribes of the law, and chroniclers of their times.

Even the Levites fell into apostasy in the closing reigns of Judah (Ezek. xlv. 10-14, xlviii. 11). Their number at the return from Babylon was small (Ezra ii. 36-42). They sang by course, praising Jehovah, at the founding and subsequent dedicating of the temple (iii. 10, 11; vi. 18). None of the Levites joined Ezra at his gathering at the river Ahava (viii. 15, 18-20). He induced 35 to join him, with 220 Nethinim. At the feast of tabernacles (Neh. viii. 7, 8) they read and explained the law; their tithes were again secured to them (x. 37-39), and they dwelt in villages round Jerusalem, and took their place at the dedication of the wall (xii. 27-30), and kept the gates to ensure the sanctification of the sabbath (xii. 22).

They appear as unloving formalists in Luke x. 32, and formed part of the deputation sent from Jerusalem to test John's credentials (John i. 19). Barnabas was a Levite (Acts iv. 36). They are among the sealed tribes (Rev. vii.). Their name is still preserved in the Jewish Levy, as Cohen is "priest." Their firstborn are exempted from certain payments among the Jews, as in the redemption of the firstborn.

A false Judaizing analogy makes the Christian deacons answer to the Levites, the presbyters to the priests, and the bishops to the highpriests.

Their temple psalmody was the forerunner of our church music; and to them we probably owe the preservation of some of the Scriptures.

It is the peculiarity of the Mosaic system, as distinguished from heathen systems, that the Levites, the ministers of religion, not merely performed religious rites, but without vows of celibacy, freely intermarrying with the other tribes, were dispersed among the nation to teach moral and religious truths to all, of whom they formed the twelfth part (Deut. xxxi. 9-13). Drawing their livelihood from the tithes and offerings, which would fail if God's law were slighted, they had every motive to maintain it. Thus they consolidated the union of the tribes by the strongest tie, religion. The wisdom of their appointment accords with the Divine origin of the Jewish law.

Jehovah praises Levites as to the past: "My covenant was with him of life and peace; and I gave them to him for the fear wherewith he feared Me and was afraid before My name . . . The law of truth was in his mouth and iniquity was not found in his lips; he walked with Me in peace and equity, and did turn many away from iniquity." The Lord at His coming is to "purify the sons of Levi, so that they may again offer an offering of righteousness" (Mal. ii. 5, 6, iii. 3; comp. Isa. lvi. 21).

Leviticus. Wayyikra is the Heb. name, from the initial word; the middle book of the pentateuch. The laws "which the Lord commanded Moses in mount Sinai, in the day that he commanded the children of Israel to offer their oblations unto the Lord in the wilderness of Sinai" (vii. 38). Given between the setting up of the tabernacle and its departure from Sinai, i.e. between the first day of the first month and the 20th day of the second month of the second year of the exodus (Exod. xl. 2, 17; Num. x. 11).

Two chief subjects are banded: (1) chap. i.—xvi., the fundamental ordinances of Israel's fellowship with Jehovah; (2) chap. xvii.—xxvii., the laws for hallowing Israel in this covenant fellowship. Privilege and duty, grace conferred and grace wrought, go hand in hand. FIRST: (1) The law of offerings, chap. i.—vii. (2) Investiture of Aaron and consecration of priests, chap. viii.—x. (3) Rules as to clean and unclean, chap. xi.—xv. (4) The day of atonement, the summing up of all means of grace for the nation and the church, annually. SECOND: (1) Israel's life as holy and separate from heathendom, in food, marriage, and towards fellow men, chap. xvii.—xx.; the mutual connection of xviii., xix., xx., is marked by recurring phrases, "I am the Lord," "ye shall be holy, for I . . . am holy." (2) Holiness of priests and of offerings, chap. xxi., xxii. (3) Holiness shown in the holy convocations, sabbaths, perpetual light in the tabernacle, shewbread, chap. xxiii., xxiv. (4) Perpetuation of the theocracy by the sabbatical and jubilee years, the perpetual tenure of land, the redemption of it and bond servants (xxv.); and by fatherly chastisement of the people and restoration on repentance, chap. xxvi. (5) Appendix on vows, which are not encouraged specially, yet permitted with some restrictions (xxvii.).

The only history in Leviticus is that of Aaron's consecration, Nadab and Abihu's death, and the doom of the blasphemer (viii.—x.; xxiv. 10-23), a solemn exhibition of Jehovah's laws in their execution. Aaron's "holding his peace" under the stroke is a marvellous exhibition of grace; yet his not eating the sin offering in the holy place shows his keen paternal anguish which excused his violation of the letter of the law in Moses' judgment. As Jehovah drew nigh Israel in the tabernacle, so Israel drew nigh Jehovah in the offering. The sacrificial ordinances fall into three divisions, each division consisting of a decalogue of directions, a method frequent in the Mosaic law. Many of the divisions are marked by the opening, "and the Lord spake unto Moses" or such like, or by closing formulas as "this is the law," etc. (vii. 37, 38; xi. 46, 47; xiii. 59; xiv. 54-57; xv. 32, 33). The direction as to the people's offerings is distinguished from that as to the priests' by a repetition of the same formula (i. 2; v. 9, 19, 20, 24, 25; xxi., xxii.). In v. 6 transl. not "trespass offering" which is the term for one kind of sin offering (ver. 14), viz. for an injury done to some one, "a fine offering" (Num. v. 5-8), but "he shall bring as his forget," etc., asham. Also in Lev. xxiii. 2 for "feasts" transl. "the appointed times."

The Epistle to the Hebrews is the N. T. commentary on Leviticus, showing the correspondence yet superiority of the Antitype to the typical sacrifices. Peter (1 Pet. i. 16) quotes Lev. xi. 44, "be ye holy, for I am holy"; but N. T. holiness rises above the restrictions as to meats, seasons, and places (John iv. 20-24; Acts x., xvi.). Ps. lxxxix. 15: "blessed is the people that know the joyful sound, they shall walk, O Lord, in the light of Thy countenance," alludes to the jubilee year enjoined in Leviticus; Isa. lxi. 1-3, and our Lord's application of the prophecy to Himself, show that the gospel dispensation is the antitype. The exhaustive consummation and final realization of the type shall be in the "times of restitution of all things," "the regeneration" of the heaven and earth, "the creature's deliverance from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God," "the adoption, to wit the redemption of the body" (Acts iii. 19-21; Rom. viii. 19-23; Matt. xix. 28, 29).

Chap. xvi. is the grand centre of the book. Previously it was shown that God can only be approached by sacrifice, next that man is full of "uncleanness" which needs cleansing. The annual atonement now teaches that not by several cleansings for several sins and uncleanness can guilt be removed. One great covering of all transgressions must take place to meet God's just wrath, and then Israel stands accepted and justified typically (xvi. 16, 20). Heb. ix., x., explains antitypically how Christ by one offering once for all and for ever perfected them that are being sanctified. In Lev. xviii. 18 the prohibition against marriage with a wife's sister is during the wife's lifetime. In xvii. 11 transl. "the soul (nephesh) of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you upon the altar to make atonement for your souls; for it is the blood which makes atonement by means of the soul." The two reasons of prohibiting blood as food are: 1. It is the vital fluid. 2. It was the appointed typical mean of atonement. It is not blood as blood, but as containing in it the principle of life, that God accepted.

The division into decalogues is frequent throughout the Mosaic code, based no doubt upon the model of the ten commandments, each subject being set forth in ten ordinances, as Bertheau has observed (for details see his Commentary). Chaps. i.—iii. contain the first decalogue, viz. the burnt offering in three sections, the meat offering in four, and the peace offering in three. The second decalogue is in iv., v.: the sin offering in four cases; three kinds of transgression needing atonement; the trespass offering in three cases. Then vi., vii., five decalogues. Thus there are seven decalogues in all as to putting away guilt. The next seven are as to putting away impurity, xi.—xvi. Then xvii.—xx. contain seven decalogues as to Israel's holiness. Lastly chaps. xxi.—xxv. 2 contain the concluding seven decalogues. This arrangement leaves unnoticed xxiii. 39-44 and xxiv.; for ver. 37, 38, "these are the feasts," etc., evidently close chap. xxiii.; ver. 39-44 are appended as a fuller description of the feast already noticed in ver. 34. And chap. xxiv. sets forth the duty of the people in maintaining public worship, and narrates the stoning of the blasphemer.

The decalogues are closed with promises of rich blessing upon obedience, awful threats upon disobedience; the latter predominate, for already Israel had shown its tendency to disobey. The first division of the law, the covenant (Exod. xxiii. 20-33), ended with blessings only; for there Israel had not yet betrayed its unfaithfulness. But now (Exod. xxvii., xxxiii.) when Israel had shown its backsliding tendency, the second division of the law ends here with threats as well as promises.

Chap. xxvii. is an appendix, xxvi. having already closed the subject of the book with the words "these are the statutes," etc. The appendix however is an integral part of the whole, as is marked by its ending with the same formula, "these are the commandments," etc.

Libertines. Acts vi. 9. Descendants of Jews who, having been taken prisoners by Pompey and other Roman generals in the Syrian wars, were enslaved and afterwards emancipated, and who returned to their native land. Many Jews at Rome were freedmen allowed by Augustus to settle beyond the Tiber. Four thousand freedmen were expelled to Sardinia, others were to leave Italy unless they gave up Judaism (A.D. 19) under Tiberius (Tacitus, Ann. ii. 85; Josephus, Ant. xviii. 3, §5; Philo, Legat. ad Caium). Humphrey conjectures that, having made their way to Jerusalem, they naturally were Stephen's bitterest opponents as having suffered so much for that religion which Christianity was supplanting. They had a synagogue at Jerusalem.

Libnah=whiteness. 1. The Blanche Garde of the crusaders (Stanley). A city in the shephelah or low hills S.W. of Palestine, taken by Joshua, though not one of the league cities, because he would not leave so strong a city unsubdued in his rear, after destroying Makkedah on his way to Lachish. A priests' city with its "suburbs" (Josh. x. 29, 30, 32, 33; xii. 15; xv. 42; xxi. 13). It revolted from Judah at the same time as Elom, in the reign of Jehoram, Jehoshaphat's son, "because he had forsaken the Lord God of his fathers" (2 Kings viii. 22, 2 Chron. xxi. 10, 11). Its remoteness from the capital, which Jehoram had corrupted into idolatry, and the presence of the sacred ministers in it, made its people desire separation from the idolaters; hence its revolt, as the scripture quoted implies. The explanation of the revolt, though satisfactory, is one inferred from comparing independent scriptures (2 Chron. xxi. 10; 2 Kings viii. 18; Josh. xv. 42, xvi. 13), an undesigned propriety confirming the truth. After Lachish Sennacherib besieged L., and there heard of what alarmed him, Tirhakah's advance (2 Kings xix. 8, Isa. xxxvii. 8). Rabshakeh joined him there, and probably brought with him the portion of the Assyrian army which had been before Jerusalem. At L. near Egypt G. Rawlinson thinks the miraculous destruction of the Assyrian army took place, not at Jerusalem; so Jehovah's promise (Isa. xxxviii. 33), "Sennacherib shall not come into this city, nor shoot an arrow there, nor come before it with shields"; then ver. 36 will mean, "when they (Sennacherib and the surviving Assyrians) arose early in the morning, behold they (the smitten Assyrians) were all dead corpses." Herodotus (ii. 141) gives the Egyptian story, that Sennacherib retreated from Pelusium, the Egyptian gods having sent field mice which gnawed their bowstrings and shield straps, a corruption of Jehovah's promise above.

Hamutal, Josiah's queen, mother of Jehozabab and Zedekiah, was of L. (2 Kings xxiii. 31, xxiv. 18.) E. Wilton identifies L. with Lebben, five miles S. of Gaza, near the northern bank of wady Sheriah, a good point from which Sennacherib could watch Tirhakah's advance from the Egyptian quarter. The smallness of the remains is due to the buildings having been of large sun-dried bricks, soon disintegrating, not stone. Conder (Pal. Expl., July 1875) identifies it with Beit Jibrin. Warren (Pal. Expl., July 1875) identifies L. with Ibbn, a ruin on a hill at the sea coast, and identical with Jabneel or Jabnab. As L. was a priests' town, so Jamnia became latterly the seat of the sanhedrim and head quarters of Hebrew learning. L. (whiteness) perhaps is named from some natural feature, as white poplars; as Rithmah is from reten "the juniper." El Benawy is mentioned for it in Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., Jan. 1878, p. 19.

2. A station of Israel between Sinai and Kadesh, the fifth after Sinai. The Liban of Deut. i. 1, near the Arabian and Elanitic gulf. Now el Beyanek ("the distinct," Arabic), part of the mountain plateau and valley W. of the Arabian.

Libni. 1. Whence sprang LIBNYES (Exod. vi. 17. Num. iii. 18, 1 Chron. vi. 17, 20). 2. 1 Chron. vi. 29.

Libya. Acts ii. 10, "the parts of L. about Cyrene"; not here the whole of Africa, but the province W. of Egypt, opposite Crete, including Cyrene, the Cyrenaica pentepolitana, containing the five cities Berenice, Arsinoe, Ptolemais, Apollonia, and Cyrene.

Lice=kinnim. [See EXODUS and EGYPT.] Mosquitoes, troublesome in Egypt towards October, soon after the plague of frogs, not only giving pain, but entering the body through the nostrils and ears; so LXX., Philo, and Origen. But mosquitoes' larvae are deposited in stagnant waters, whereas Exodus (viii. 17) states "all the dust became lice throughout all the land of Egypt." Sir S. Baker writes similarly from experience, "it is as though the very dust were turned into lice"; a tick no larger than a grain of sand becomes swollen with blood to the size of a hazel nut. The Egyptian che-nem (akin to kinnim), "mosquito," retained in the Coptic, favours the former. The Egyptian ken, "force," "plague," may apply to either view.

Lieutenants=achashdrapan, the official title of satraps or viceroys over the provinces of the Persian empire (Esth. iii. 12, viii. 9, ix. 3; Ezra viii. 36). "Prince": Dan. iii. 2, vi. 1.

Ligure=leshem Heb., the first in the third row of jewels on the high-priest's breastplate (Exod. xxviii. 19). LXX. and Vulg. transl. ligure, and as Theophrastus (de Lap. 29) and Pliny (H. N. xxxvii. 11) say amber came from Liguria, probably LXX. and Vulg. understood by "ligure" amber. But Theophrastus distinguishes the lyncurium of Liguria from electron, "amber." Amber is too soft for engraving; but lyncurium was hard, and at the same time attracted light particles of wood, iron and brass. The red variety of tourmaline, the rubellite, which is electrically polar when heated, may be meant. The jacinth also is electric.

Likhi. 1 Chron. vii. 19.
Lily=shushan. Matt. vii. 28, 29. The white lily plant is used as fuel when withered; but it does not grow wild in Syria. Rather the scarlet martagon (Lilium chalcedonicum). "The lily at Huleh is large, the three inner petals meet above, forming a gorgeous canopy such as art never approached, and king never sat under even in his utmost glory. Our flower delights in the valleys, grows among thorns, and I have sadly lacerated my hands in extricating it. Nothing can be in higher contrast than the velvety softness of this lily and the tangled hedge of thorns about it. Gazelles still feed among these flowers, and you can scarcely ride through the woods N. of Tabor without frightening gazelles from their flowery pasture" (Thomson, Land and Book, ii. 18). Comp. S. of Sol. ii. 1, "lily of the valleys" (ver. 2) "among thorns" (ver. 16) "he feedeth (in iv. 5 'roes') among the lilies." The words of Solomon's Song (v. 13), "his lips like lilies," require a ruby or scarlet colour, not white. But as "lily" was used also in a general sense for a lovely, bell shaped flower, the Egyptian lotus of the Nile is probably meant in the "lily work" ornamentation of the capitals ("chapters") of Solomon's temple pillars, and the rim of the brazen sea (1 Kings vii. 22, 23). So Egyptian architecture delights in lotus headed capitals. "He shall grow as the lily" (IIos. xiv. 5), i.e. rapidly self propagating, one root often producing 50 bulbs (Pliny, Nat. Hist. xxi. 5). Stanley thinks "lily" includes numerous flowers of the tulip or amaryllis kind blooming in the early summer or the autumn of Palestine. J. Hamilton (Imp. Dict.) remarks on "consider the lilies," "wondrous is God's chemistry who out of black mould and invisible vapour builds up that column of chrysolite, and crowns it with its flaming capital. How strange is God's husbandry! Instead of taking the lily into a conservatory, He leaves it out among the thorns. The same soil from which one nature can only extract the harsh astringent sicc with its cruel spines yields to another flexible leaves and balmy blossoms. So the life of faith is not lived in the convent or in the sanctuary [alone], but out of doors in the unsympathising world, in the midst of secular men. From the same soil and the same atmosphere from which others derive repulsive attributes, the believer can absorb grace and give forth excellence. The same bounties of providence which make Nabal more churlish make Joseph more generous, tender, and forgiving; the same sunshine which elicits the balm of the lily matures in the blackthorn its verjuice; the same shower which makes thistles rank fills the lily cup with nectar, and clothes it in raiment eclipsing Solomon."

Linens. Fine linen. Shes, an Egyptian word. The peculiar dress of the Egyptian priests (Gen. xli. 42). Pharaoh arrayed Joseph in it as a dress of state; not cotton nor silk (as marg.). So Ezek. xxvii. 7, sheesh; ver. 16, butz (bussos, Gr.), the fine linen of Syria used for the hangings of Solomon's temple and David's "robe of fine linen" (1 Chron. xv. 27, 2 Chron. ii. 14). The Egyptian fine linen was equal to the best now made in general texture, and superior in evenness of threads without knot or break. In Esth. i. 6, for "green," transl. rather "(Persian) linen cloth," carpus, carbasus. The unstudied propriety of designation by the native names respectively of linen of Egypt, Syria, and Persia, is a strong mark of genuineness. In Ezek. xvi. 10 alone is "silk" probably meant (meshi, perhaps a Chinese word). The flax for the tabernacle was spun by the women, and as thread given to Aholiab and his helpers to weave (Exod. xxv. 4, xxxv. 25, 35); he directed the work of the skilled weaver

EGYPTIAN WEAVER.

("the cunning workman"), the embroiderer and the ordinary weaver. Bad (from a root meaning separate, referring to the distinctness of the threads in the texture) is the Heb. for the linen breeches of Aaron and his sons in ministering: Exod. xxviii. 40-42, which compared with xxxix. 28, "linen (bad) of fine turned linen" (sheesh), identifies bad with sheesh, sheesh being perhaps the spun threads, bad the linen woven from them. Bad is exclusively applied to the holy linen garments, ephod, etc., of priests, etc. (1 Chron. xv. 27), and angels (Ezek. ix. 2, 3, 11, x. 2, 6; Dan. x. 5, xii. 6, 7). Butz, bussos, was the Levite choir's dress (2 Chron. v. 12); kings wore it loosely over the close fitting tunic (1 Chron. xv. 27). The temple veil was of it, naturally as wrought by Tyrians (2 Chron. iii. 14, ii. 14). Mordecai was arrayed in it (Esth. viii. 15). The house of Ashbea, sprung from Shelah Judah's son, wrought in it (butz) (1 Chron. iv. 21); tradition says they wrought priests' and kings' robes and the sanctuary hangings. The bride's "fine linen, the righteousness of saints," contrasts with the harlot Babylon's merchandise in "fine linen" (Rev. xix. 8, 14; xviii. 12). So also the fine linen (sheesh) which God put upon Israel (Ezek. xvi. 19); contrast the rich man's fine linen (bussos) (Luke xvi. 19).

Prov. vii. 16, "I have decked my bed with fine linen (etun, akin to Gr. othone) of Egypt," i.e. ornamented the bed covering with threads of fine Egyptian flax. In Jud. xiv. 12, 13, sadin (Gr. sindon) is Heb. for the 30 linen garments which Samson promised. Made by women (Prov. xxxi. 24); the good housewife "made fine linen and girdles"; her own clothing is "fine linen" (sheesh, not "silk," ver. 22). Used for winding sheets and head napkins (John xi. 44, xx. 5), and towels (xii. 4, 5). Pishte is the general term (Josh. ii. 6), "flax" (Jud. xv. 14). Bussos is the finer linen, lilan the general term. The mummies' cloth is found by microscopic examination to be linen: linen fibre is cylindrical, transparent, and jointed as a cane; cotton fibre appears as a flat riband with a hem at each edge. Solomon's merchants brought linen yarn (nuqursh) out of Egypt (1 Kings x. 28, 2 Chron. i. 16). But Gesenius, Keil, etc., transl. "and (as for) the going out of horses from Egypt for Solomon, a company of king's merchants fetched (horses) at a definite price." This is against the accents; LXX. and Vulg. transl. "from Koa," a place for collecting customs on the Egyptian frontier.

Lines. Ps. xvi. 6, "the lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places," viz. the measuring cords or lines, hence my allotment (Amos vii. 17). Mic. ii. 5, "none that shall cast a cord by lot (i.e. none that shall have any possession measured out) in the congregation of the Lord" (see marg. 1 Chron. xvi. 18, Ps. cv. 11). Argon [see] is always designated by chebel or cord, i.e. well defined region.

Lintel: mashkoph, the upper cross-beam of a door. "The upper doorpost" (Exod. xii. 7, 23). The word meant also to "look out," because there were grates or lattices above the door whence the inmates could see who was outside. In 1 Kings vi. 31 for "lintel" transl. ayil "the projection of the doorposts," occupying the fifth of the breadth of the wall (Keil). The entrance was four cubits broad, including the projecting doorposts, and each of the two wings of the folding doors about a cubit and a half broad, reckoning the projecting framework on either side at half a cubit in breadth. In Ezek. xl. 9, 21, 24, 26, "posts" (the same word ayil) mean projecting column faced fronts of the sides of the doorway, opposite one another. In Amos ix. 1 for "lintel" transl. the spherelike capital of the column: kaphoreyah. Zeph. ii. 14, "the capitals of her columns," marg. "the knobs" ("pomegranate like at the tops of the houses," Grotius) or chapters (capitals).

Linus. 2 Tim. iv. 21 put third, "Enbulus greeteth thee, and Pudens, and Linus"; therefore not yet bishop, but a Christian then at Rome; afterwards its bishop (Irenaeus, iii. 3, § 3; Eusebius H. E. iii. 2). Irenaeus implies that L. was made bishop by Paul and Peter before Peter's death; but the Scripture evidence is against Peter's having been at Rome at all, and certainly before Paul's death. Pearson fixes on A.D. 55-67 as the period of L.'s episcopate. Tertullian (Præscr. Har. 32) asserts that Clement (third bishop) also was consecrated by Peter. The statements of the fathers are mutually conflicting and unsatisfactory.

Lion: ari, arich ("the tender," Umbreit); gur, "the whelp" (Gen. xlix. 9); lephir, "the young lion" in adolescent vigour, his "great teeth" grown (Ps. lxxii. 6), having his own covert (Jer. xxv. 38); lubi, in adult maturity (Gen. xlix. 9); l'yah, "lioness"; laish, "an old (rather strong, from an Arabic root) lion": Job iv. 11, where the five different terms occur; shachal is the roaring lion; lubi appears in the German löwe. The variety of names shows the abundance of lions in the regions of Scripture at that time. Now there are none in Palestine. But the names Lebnoth (Josh. xv. 32), Arieh (2 Kings xv. 25), Ariel for Jerusalem (Isa. xxix. 1, 2, 7), Laish (Jud. xviii. 7), incidentally, and so undesignedly, confirm the Scripture assertions as to their former existence. The forests and tangled thickets have been almost swept away which were their former lair. Jordan's wooded banks, its "pride" (as some transl., but others "swelling"), gave cover to lions (Jer. xlix. 19), "a lion from the swelling (so Calvin, the overflow forcing the lion from the woody banks) of Jordan." The Asiatic lion has a short curly mane, and is shorter and rounder than the African. It laid waste villages (2 Kings xvii. 25, 26; Prov. xxii. 13) and slew men (1 Kings xiii. 24, xx. 35, 36).

Shepherds, as David, sometimes singly encountered it, and prevailed (1 Sam. xvii. 34, 35; Amos iii. 12); oftener in bands, frightening him with shouts into a pit covered over with reed or branches lightly, to entrap it (Ezek. xix. 4, 8, 9). Benaiab slew one in a pit or cistern, in which it had taken refuge in a snowstorm (2 Sam. xxiii. 20). Samson slew one at Timnath (Jud. xiv. 5, 6). Lion hunting is depicted as the amusement of the Nuervite kings, who followed the great hunter Nimrod's example. Captured lions were caged, which illustrates the image in Ezek. xix. 9. The lion symbolises bravery, so the faces of the warriors of Gad who joined

David are designated "the faces of lions" (1 Chron. xii. 8); also might and royalty, as in the winged lion figures with human heads in the Assyrian palace remains, and in Solomon's steps to his throne (1 Kings x. 19, 20); so the royal tribe Judah had the lion as its standard. Messiah is "the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the root of David," yet also the Lamb, combining opposites. The first of the four living creatures was like a lion (Rev. iv. 7, comp. Ezek. i. 10), the kingly aspect of Messiah in St. Matthew. Nineveh is compared to a lion's den, full of remains of its prey, appropriately, as lion figures abounded in the Assyrian palaces. Nah. ii. 11, 12, "where is," etc.; i.e. God will so destroy it that its site will be hard to find; fulfilled to the letter (i. 8). Lions haunted dens in Lebanon and Hermon (S. of Sol. iv. 8). Balaam compares Israel to "a great lion (labi) and a young lion" (arich): Num. xxiii. 24, xxiv. 9.

Amos iii. 4, "will a lion roar in the forest when he hath no prey?" i.e., God would not threaten wrath if there were not a guilty nation, its object (Matt. xxiv. 28); "will a young lion cry out of his den if he (the old lion) have taken nothing?" The young lion lies silent till the parent lion brings the prey near, then the scent rouses him; so the prophet would not speak against Israel if God did not reveal to him Israel's sin requiring Israel's punishment. Satan is the "roaring lion" as well as the subtle serpent (1 Pet. v. 8).

Shay is the lion's roar in seeking prey (Ps. civ. 21); naham his cry when seizing it (Isa. v. 29, comp. Prov. xix. 12); hagah his growl defying any effort to snatch from him his prey (Isa. xxxi. 4); na'ar the cry of the young lion (Jer. li. 38); rabatz is his crouching in his lair (Gen. xlix. 10); sharab and gashab (Job xxxviii. 40) his lying in wait; acab his secretly doing so (Ps. x. 9); ramas his stealthily creeping after prey (Ps. civ. 20); zinnah his leap, flinging himself on it (Deut. xxxiii. 22). (Smith's Bible Dict.)

Lizard. latah. Lev. xi. 30. One of the monitors, the Lacerta Nilotica [see CHAMPELTON]. Speaker's Comm. Smith's Bible Dict. makes it the fau-fau lizard, gecko.

Lo-ammi not My people. Jezreel, Lo-ruhamah (not bereft), and Lo-ammi are the three children of the prophet Hosea's wife, Gomer, taken by God's command. "Jezreel" symbolised the coming destruction of Jehu's line, as Jehu had destroyed that of Ahab of Jezreel; also that as Jezreel means both God sows and God scatters, so God will yet sow Israel whom He now scatters (Hos. i. 4, 6, 9, 10, 11), "great shall be the day of Jezreel," i.e. great shall be the day when they shall be God's seed planted in their own land by God (Jer. xxiv. 6, xxxi. 28, xxxii. 41; Amos ix. 15; Hos. ii. 23). "I will sow her (Jezreel, the sown one, ver. 22) unto . . . Me in the earth." Not only Judah, but the whole earth shall be the seed plot wherein Gentile nations shall be the spiritual growth of the Jewish seed sown everywhere (Mic. v. 7; Rom. xi. 12, 15; Zech. x. 9). Lo-ruhamah, changed into Rahamah, means that He will first withdraw His "loving mercy" and at last restore it. And Lo-ammi, changed into Ammi, that He will make Israel, now "not His people" owing to apostasy, to become again "His people." The three children symbolise successive generations: Jezreel (1) represents the dynasty of Jeroboam I., ending with Jehu's shedding the blood of the last of the line at Jezreel; Lo-ruhamah (2), a daughter, represents the effeminate period which followed; Lo-ammi, a son, represents Jeroboam II.'s vigorous dynasty, which however brought no revival of religion; still Israel was not God's people really, and so should be no longer so in name but cast away.

Loan. [See USURY.] The merciful character of Moses' law appears in the command not to keep the poor man's outer garment, his covering by night as well as day, after sunset (Exod. xxii. 26, 27; Deut. xxiv. 6, 10-13, 17; comp. however Prov. xxii. 27). The millstone, including all instruments necessary to life, and a widow's garment, were forbidden to be taken. The creditor must not enter the debtor's house to seize the pledge, but wait for the debtor to bring out an adequate security for payment. The debtor could be held as a bondman only till the seventh year, i.e. for six years, and not beyond the jubilee year, whatever his period of service might be (Exod. xxi. 2). Then he must be sent away with a liberal supply of provisions, the prospect of such a gift doubtless stimulating zeal in service (Deut. xv. 12-18; Lev. xxv. 39-55); his land was to be restored. But foreign slaves might be held in continual servitude (2 Kings iv. 1; Isa. l. i, lii. 3). The Roman or else the oriental law detaining the debtor in prison till he paid the uttermost farthing, and even giving him over to torturers, is alluded to in Matt. v. 26, xviii. 34.

Loaves. Cakes flat and round. [See BREAD.]

Lock. [See KEY.] Usually a hollow wooden bolt passing through a groove into the socket in the doorpost. In the groove are small sliding pins which drop into holes in the bolt, so securing it. The key with its pins raises the sliding pins of the lock so that the bolt can be drawn back (Jud. iii. 23, 25; S. of Sol. v. 5; Neh. iii. 3).

Locust. [See JOEL.] The arbeh is the migratory devastating locust. The gob, "grasshopper," is a species of gryllus, with voracity like the migratory locust, but small in size (Smith's Bible Dict. makes gob the nymphal state of the locust): Amos vii. 1. Nah. iii. 17: "the great grasshoppers (Heb. the locust of locusts) which camp in the hedges in the cold day, but when the sun ariseth flee away," etc. The locust lays its eggs under shelter of hedges; they are hatched by the sun's heat in spring; by June the young are so matured as to be able to flee away. So Assyria shall disappear.

The chagab is another of the Gryllidae (Num. xiii. 33, Eccles. xii. 5); Isa. xl. 22, "grasshopper," thus gob=chagab. They all are Orthoptera with four wings; jaws strong and formed for biting. The hind limbs of the saltatoria are largely developed, the thighs long and thick, the shanks still longer; thus "they have legs [the tibiae, so placed] above their feet to leap withal upon the earth" (Lev. xi. 21). The migratory locust is two inches and a half long, the forewings brown and black, and the thorax crested. Their devastations are vividly depicted (Exod. x. 15, Joel ii. 3, 5, 10). The arbeh and the so'lam ("the bald, smooth headed, locust," nowhere else mentioned; some of the winged orthopterous saltatoria; the Heb. is akin to the Egyptian for "locust") and the grasshopper (chagab) might be eaten (Lev. xi.). They are generally thrown alive into boiling water with salt, the wings, legs, and heads being pulled off; the bodies taste like shrimps, and are roasted, baked, fried in butter, ground, pounded, and mixed with flour for cakes, or smoked for after use.

For "beetle" (Lev. xi. 22) translate "chargol," some kind of the locust or grasshopper "saltatoria," from the Arabic hardjal "to leap." The tzaltal occurs only Deut. xxviii. 42, the locust that makes a shrill noise, from a root "to sound" (Gesenius), very destructive: one of the Ciénada. The "palmerworm" (gazam) is probably the larva state of the locust (Gesenius): Amos iv. 9; Joel i. 4, ii. 25. LXX. transl. "caterpillar" by which A. V. transl. chasil, which is rather one of the winged Gryllidae=the consuming locust. Gazam is the gnawing locust, arbeh the swarming locust, geleyn the licking locust (in Jer. li. 27 "the rough caterpillars" refer to the spinous nature of the tibiae) which is transl. "caterpillar" also in Ps. cv. 34, elsewhere "cankerworm." Locusts appear in swarms extending many miles and darkening the sunlight (Joel ii. 10); like horses, so that the Italians call them "cavaletta," little horse (ver. 4, 5; Rev. ix. 7, 9); with a fearful noise; having no king (Prov. xxx. 27); impossible to withstand in their progress; entering dwellings (Exod. x. 6, Joel ii. 8-10); not flying by night (Nah. iii. 17, Exod. x. 13 "morning"). Birds, as the locust bird, which is thought to be the rose-coloured starling, devour them; the sea destroys more (ver. 19). Their decaying bodies taint the air (Joel ii. 20). Barrow (Travels, 257) says the stench of the bodies on the shore was smelt 150 miles off. Joel's phrase "the northern army" implies that he means human invaders from the N.

the point of entrance to the Assyrians and Babylonians.

Reichardt (Jewish Intelligence, Feb., 1867) notices the Heb. letters of gagam=50, exactly the number of years that the Chaldees ruled the Jews from the temple's destruction by Nebuchadnezzar, 588 B.C., to Babylon's overthrow by Cyrus, 538 B.C. Arbeh=203, the period of Persia's dominion over the Jews from 538 to 330 B.C., when Alexander overthrew Persia. Yelequ=140, the period of Greek rule over the Jews from 330 to 190 B.C., when Antiochus Epiphanes, Israel's persecutor, was overcome by the Roman L. Scipio. Chasil=108, the exact number of years between 38 B.C., when Rome placed the Idumean Herod on the throne, and A.D. 70, when the Romans destroyed Jerusalem and the Jewish nationality. Thus the four successive world empires and the calamities which they inflicted on Israel are the truths shadowed forth by the four kinds of locusts in Joel.

Lod. A town of Benjamin, founded by Shamed or Shumer (1 Chron. viii. 12). LYDDA in Acts ix. 32, 33; in the vale of Sharon between the hills and the Mediterranean. Here Peter healed Eneas of palsy. Now Ludd.

Lodebar. E. of Jordan (2 Sam. xvii. 27). Here at the house of Machir, son of Ammiel, Mephibosheth found a home after Saul's death (ix. 4, 5). Perhaps the Debir of Josh. xiii. 26, where Ludebir is the Heb. (the "l" is part of the word, not as A. V.=of). Machir remembered David's kindness to Mephibosheth in the distress of the latter, therefore sent provisions to David in his distress at Mahanaim (W. of L.). The name means the driving out of flocks (Gesenius), else without pasture.

Lodge. To pass the night (Heb. laila). Isa. x. 29, the Assyrian invaders "have taken their lodging (their bivouac) at Geba." S. of Sil. vii. 11, Neh. iv. 22. The "lodge" (Isa. i. 8), and "cottage" (xxiv. 20), the "earth shall reel to and fro . . . and be removed as a cottage," refer to a temporary hut, or in the latter passage a hammock suspended from trees, to secure from wild beasts the watcher of gardens or lands in the night.

HUT ON POSTS IN GARDEN

Log. Twelfth of an hin measure. According to Josephus 1294 of a gallon; according to the rabbinites, 9615.

Lois. Mother of Eunice, Timothy's mother (2 Tim. i. 5). The Gr. names mark Greek origin, though she was a Jewess in religion and the father a Greek, i.e. heathen; Lystra was her home. The family pedigree of "indwelling faith" began first with L., the farthest back of Timothy's progenitors whom Paul knew. She and Eunice were probably converted at Paul's first visit to Lystra (Acts xiv. 6, 7). The belief of the mother and grandmother alone is implied in 2 Tim. i., in undesigned harmony with Acts xvi., not of the father; a mark of genuineness. One godly parent may counteract the bad influence of the goddily, and win the child to Christ (1 Cor. vii. 14, 2 Tim. iii. 15).

Lord. [See JEHOVAH.] In small letters and with initial capital "Lord" represents Adonai in A. V. of O.T. In capitals Lord represents Jehovah, except Exod. xxiii. 17 The Lord God, Adonai Jehovah, where it ought to be "the Lord Jehovah," and xxiv. 23. "God" in capitals also represents Jehovah (Gen. xv. 2, Adonai Jehovah). "God" in small letters, with initial capital, represents Elohim. [See God.]

Lord's Day. The Christian sabbath, called so in Rev. i. 10, the earliest mention of the term. But the consecration of the day to worship, to almsgiving (but not to earning), and to the Lord's supper, is implied in Acts xx. 7, 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2. The Lord singled it out as the day of His repeated appearances after His resurrection (John xx. 19, 26), and the evangelists' special mention of this day as the day of those reappearances implies their recognition of its sanctity. The designation corresponds to "the Lord's supper" (1 Cor. xi. 20); Ignatius (ad Magnes., 9) and Irenaeus (Quaest. ad Orthod. 115, in Just. Martyr); and Justin Martyr, A.D. 140 (Apol. ii. 98), writes: "on Sunday we hold our joint meeting, for the first day is that on which God, having removed darkness, made the world, and Jesus Christ our Saviour rose from the dead. On the day before Saturday they crucified Him; on the day after Saturday, Sunday, having appeared to His apostles He taught." Pliny writes in his famous letter to Trajan (x. 97), "the Christians [in Bithynia] on a fixed day before dawn meet and sing a hymn to Christ as God." Tertullian (de Coron. iii.), "on the Lord's day we deem it wrong to fast." Melito, bishop of Sardis (second century), wrote a book on the Lord's day (Euseb. iv. 26). The reference in Rom. xiv. 5, 6 is to days of Jewish observance. The words "he that regardeth not the day to the Lord he doth not regard it" are not in Sin., Alex., and Vat. MSS., and Vulg.

"The day of the Lord" (viz. of His second advent: 1 Cor. i. 8, v. 5; 2 Cor. i. 14; 1 Thess. v. 2; 2 Pet. iii. 10) is distinct from "the Lord's (an adjective, he kuriake) day," which in the ancient church designated Sunday. The visions of the seven seals, seven trumpets, and seven vials, naturally begin on the first day of the seven, the birthday of the church whose future they set forth (Wordsworth). In A.D. 321 Constantine expressed the feeling of all his Christian subjects by enjoining that "all judges, and the civic population, and workshops of artisans should rest on the venerable day of the Sun." The council of Nice (A.D. 325) assume the universal acceptance of the obligation of the Lord's day, and only direct as to the posture of worshippers on it. Christ's rising from the dead on the first day, to bring in the new creation, is the ground of transference of the sabbath from the seventh day. If the former creation out of chaos was rightly marked by the seventh day, much more the more momentous (Isa. lxi. 17) new creation, out of moral chaos (Jer. iv. 22, 23), by the first day. The seventh day sabbath was the gloomy, silent one of Jesus' resting in the grave; the first day sabbath is the joyful one of the once "rejected stone becoming head of the corner." "This is the day which the Lord hath made, we will be glad and rejoice in it" (Ps. cxviii. 22-24). If a seventh day sabbath marked Israel's emancipation from Egypt (Deut. v. 15), much more (comp. Jer. xvi. 14, 15) should the first day sabbath mark ushering in of the world's redemption from Satan by Jesus. [See SABBATH.]

Lord's Supper. The designation occurs only in 1 Cor. xi. 20. The institution by our Lord in connection with the passover is recorded in Matt. xxvi. 19-30, Mark xiv. 16-26, Luke xxii. 13-20. The head of the passover company who were reclining on couches began by a blessing "for the day and for the wine," over a cup of which he and the others drank. The wine was mixed with water simply because so the Jews drank wine ordinarily. The table was set out with the passover lamb, unleavened bread, bitter herbs, and a sauce of dates, figs, raisins, and vinegar (charoseth), symbolising their service in mortar in Egypt. The head, and then the rest, dipped a portion of the herbs into the charoseth and ate. The dishes were removed and a cup of wine brought. Children then were allowed to ask the meaning of the service, and the cup was passed round and drunk. The head repeated the commemorative words of the passover and gave thanks (saying, "this is the passover which we eat because the Lord passed over the houses of our fathers in Egypt"). Then followed Ps. cxiii., cxiv. Then the head brake one of the two cakes of unleavened bread and gave thanks over it. All then took portions of the bread and dipped them in the charoseth and ate them. Then they ate of the lamb, and a third cup, "the cup of blessing," was handed round. A fourth cup succeeded, called "the cup of the Hallel" (song), as Ps. cxv.—cxviii. were recited. A fifth cup with "the great Hallel" (Ps. cxiii.—cxviii.) might follow. These usages explain Luke xxii. 17, 18. "He took the cup and gave thanks and said, Take this, and divide it among yourselves; for I say unto you, I will not drink of the fruit of the vine, until the kingdom of God shall come." Also the dipping of the sop or bread morsel (John xiii. 26). Also Christ's thanksgiving consecration of the bread (Luke xxii. 19). Also the distribution of the cup "after supper" (ver. 20). He partook of the former cup, the passover cup, as well as "ate" of the passover, but declares He will partake of it no more, thus abrogating the passover as fulfilled in Himself the true Passover Lamb (ver. 17, 18). He does not partake of the subsequent cup and bread, which He gives to His disciples as the new Supper to supersede the old Passover. The new feast was not to be merely annual but frequent: 1 Cor. xi. 25, "do this as oft as ye drink it in remembrance of Me." "This is My body" is illustrated by "this is the passover." It was not literally it, but it realized it to the believer spiritually and representatively. The passover deliverance was once for all wrought at the exodus; the passover feast yearly revived it to the believing Israelite's soul. Christ was once for all sacrificed for our redemption, never to be offered again; the Lord's supper continually realizes Him and His finished work to the soul, so that we feed on Him by faith (Heb. ix. 25-27, x. 1-18). As to the "breaking of bread" (Luke xxiv. 30-35, Acts ii. 42), neither of the two disciples at Emmaus were present at the institution of the Lord's supper, so that the meal there cannot refer to it, which disposes of Rume's argument for administration with bread only; He as master took the lead in the blessing over the bread. Similarly the "breaking of bread at (their) house" of meeting (as distinguished from "in the temple," not "from house to house": Acts ii. 42, 46, xx. 7, 11) refers primarily to the Christian meals of loving fellowship (called agape 2 Pet. ii. 13, where Sin. MS. reads as A. V. "with their own deceivings," but Vat. MS., Vulg. and Syriac versions, "in their own lovefeasts"; Jude 12, "in your feasts of charity," agapay). The holy communion was at first regularly connected with these lovefeasts; "the breaking of bread," with the customary thanksgiving blessing of the master of the feast, referred not to the eucharist consecration but to the lovefeast, as Acts xxvii. 35 proves, where the eucharist is out of the question, and where simply as a devout Jew Paul gave thanks before "breaking bread" and eating. The agape is mentioned in the earliest writers (Ignatius, Ep. Smyrn. 4, 8; Tertullian Apol. 33, ad Marc. 2). In 1 Cor. xi. the agape was before the eucharist. Psalms and hymns accompanied the latter as at its institution and at the previous passover, expressing their joyful thanksgivings (Jas. v. 13). The agape was a club feast where each brought his portion and the rich extra portions for the poor. From it the bread and wine for the eucharist were taken. At it the excesses occurred which made a true celebration of the Lord's supper during or after it, with due discernment of its spiritual meaning, impossible (1 Cor. xi. 20-22). "Not discerning the Lord's body" (1 Cor. xi. 29) means not with spiritual discrimination distinguishing the elements of the Lord's body from common food. The presence is in the soul, not in the elements. Sin., Alex., and Vat. MSS. omit "Lord's," "not discerning the body" (comp. Heb. x. 20). The two separate elements, His body and His blood, were covered in His death; so the bread and the wine are separate in the Lord's supper. "The Lord's body" is here is the once for all sacrificed body, which faith, overleaping the more than 18 centuries' interval, still appropriates, not His present living body. Christ does not say "My body" simply, but "this is My body which is given for you" (Luke xxii. 19), i.e. the body sacrificed, and "this is My blood shed," etc., not the blood in His living body, but the blood separated from the body, the blood of a dead body. He gave His body broken (in the way of representation), when as yet it was not broken in fact; He gave His blood shed (in the way of representation), when it was not shed in fact. In the same sense His words are still true, though He is no longer in His sacrificed state but in His never dying state of life. Faith can make present in actual saving reality things past and things future, namely Christ's body sacrificed and His blood shed, and so have present communion with the once crucified but now glorified Lord. "As often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till He come"; ye announce it publicly, "katakallelte" (not dramatically represent, much less really exhibit), publicly professing severally the Lord died for me. "In remembrance of Me" implies commemoration of one bodily absent. Rome teaches we eat Christ corporally "till He come" corporally, a contradiction in terms. The haggadah, or "annunciation," was that part of the passover wherein they narrated to one another the event which the feast commemorated. The body and blood of Christ are given by God not by the priest, taken by faith not by the hand, eaten with the soul not the mouth. No sacrifice was offered by Christ at the institution: for (1) it was no place of sacrifice, (2) there was no altar of sacrifice, (3) it was not the hour of sacrifice, (4) the posture of the recipients, reclining, was not that of sacrifice, (5) Christ uttered no words of sacrifice except that of thanksgiving. Epistle to Hebrews (ix., x.) proves that the sacrifice on Calvary next day has never since been repeated, and therefore the Lord's supper is not a repetition of it.

"If we would judge ourselves we should not be judged" (1 Cor. xi. 31), Gr. "if we discerned (same Gr. as 29, discriminatingly judged) ourselves we should not have been judged," we should have escaped our present judgments, the sickness and death inflicted by God on some (31). In order to "discern the Lord's body" we need to "discern ourselves." When we fail to do so God sends krisis that we may escape katakrisis, judgment temporal that we may escape judgment eternal, "condemnation." The needed preliminary to the Lord's supper is not annular confession and priestly absolution, but to discern or discriminatingly judge ourselves.

In 1 Cor. x. 15, 16, "the cup," or wine in it, is not said to be the blood but "the communion of the blood of Christ"; "the bread is the communion (joint participation) of the body," etc. The consecration is not by priestly authority but is the corporate act of the church represented by the minister, "the cup which we (I and you, the whole congregation) bless." The joint blessing and the consequent drinking together constitute the "communion" of believers with their Lord and with one another. If the bread were changed into the body, where is the sign of the sacrament? Romanists eat Christ in remembrance of Himself. To drink blood would have been an abomination (Lev. xvii. 11, 12; Acts xv. 29). Breaking the bread cannot be breaking His body, for Scripture saith "not a bone of Him shall be broken." Christ Himself calls the elements still "bread" and "wine" even after consecration (1 Cor. xi. 26). The Lord's supper is the seal of the new covenant in His blood, the sign that "we were all made to drink into one Spirit" (1 Cor. xii. 13), the pledge that He who once loved us so dearly as to give Himself for us still loves us as intensely as ever.

Lo-ruhamá = not compassionate.

Hosea's daughter, representing Israel, from whom Jehovah withdrew His loving compassion. [See LO-AMMI.] Hos. i. 6.

Lot, Haran's son, Abraham's nephew (Gen. xi. 27-31). Born in Ur of the Chaldees, before Terah's emigration. Accompanied Abram to Charan, then to Canaan (xi. 4, 5), then, in the famine, to Egypt. On their return a quarrel arose between Abram's and L.'s herdsmen. In the spirit of a child of God Abram goes to L. himself, instead of listening to subordinates' reports, and begs as they are brethren there should be no strife between them (contrast Acts xv. 39), and offers L. precedence, though as his senior Abram might have claimed it; "if thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right," etc. L. chose by sight, not faith, the richly watered circle of the Jordan, fertile, but the region of wicked Sodom (Josh. vii. 24, viii. 15). At first L. only "pitched his tent toward Sodom," but he was venturing too near temptation not to be caught (Ps. i. 1; 1 Cor. xv. 33). He soon was dwelling in a "house" in Sodom, and paid the penalty in being carried off with his much-loved "goods" by Chedorlaomer; he was rescued only by the disinterested bravery and magnanimity of Abram, who, forgetting L.'s unamiable conduct, thought only of how to rescue him at all hazards in his distress. This warning ought to have been enough to drive L. from Sodom, but no, he still lives there.

Next L. appears exercising that goodly hospitality by which he "entertained angels unawares," and for which the Epistle to Hebrews (xiii. 2) commends him. Evidently the luxury of worldly Sodom had not wholly corrupted the simplicity of his character. The Spirit of God, who knows hearts, designates him (2 Pet. ii. 7-9) "just L., vexed with the filthy conversation (the licentious behaviour) of the wicked" (the lawless, who set at defiance the laws of nature and God). The Sodomites' words, "this one fellow came in to sojourn, and he will needs be a judge" refer evidently to L.'s remonstrances with them which Peter presupposes. The gracious Lord reminds us of his faithfulness, not of his subsequent inconstancy. If there had been "ten" such "fellows" in Sodom Jehovah would have spared it (Gen. xviii. 32). Again God records, "that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed (tormented) his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds." L. had gone into temptation, and must have perished but for God's grace; to all appearances his position was hopeless, but "the Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations." He is at no loss for means. The angels' visit was meant to test L. as well as the Sodomites. The angels' declining his invitation at first, "we will abide in the street (the broad open space) all night," answers to Jesus' mode of eliciting the faith of the two Emmaus disciples (Luke xxiv. 28).

His sin is faithfully recorded, his offering to sacrifice his daughters' honour to save his guests. He was retributively punished by those daughters sacrificing their father's honour and their own. They seem to have been only betrothed, not yet married, to L.'s so-called "sons in law." When he warned them to flee from the coming destruction "he seemed as one that mocked unto his sons in law" (comp. Luke xxiv. 11). His imperfection of faith appears in that "he lingered" even on the morning of Sodom's doom. But the angels "laid hold upon his hand . . . the Lord being merciful to him (Rom. ix. 15, 16) . . . and set him without the city." They further warned him, "escape for thy life, look not behind thee (comp. the Christian's motto, Phil. iii. 15, Luke ix. 62), neither stay thou in all the plain," the (ciccar) circuit of Jordan which he had so coveted. Defective faith made him plead for leave to stay at Zoar, which, as "a little one," he urges could have but few sinning in it so as to incur a share in Sodom's doom. God grants even this, and adds "I cannot do anything till thou be come thither"; God's love controls His omnipotence (Matt. xxvii. 42).

L.'s wife "looked back" with regrets on Sodom's sinful pleasures, then stayed behind, and "became a pillar of salt"; possibly overtaken by the fire and brimstone and incrustated with salt. The Americans found E. of Usdum a pillar of salt 40 ft. high, which may be the traditional one identified with Sodom's wife (Josephus Ant. i. 11). Vacillation in faith led him to doubt even Zoar's safety, notwithstanding God's promise. From "lingering" about Sodom L. passes to the opposite extreme, depending of safety even in its extreme skirt. His unbelief issued in the sin in the cave, and the offspring were "the children of L." Moab and Ammon (Deut. ii. 9, 19; Ps. lxxiii. 8). See our Lord's spiritual lesson from Sodom and L.'s wife (Luke xvii. 28-32).

Lot. Early used to decide an issue; so in choosing each of the two goats on the day of atonement (two inscribed tablets of boxwood were the lots used according to Joma iii. 9), Lev. xvi. 8, and in assigning the inheritances in Canaan (Num. xvi. 55, xxxiv. 13), in selecting men for an expedition (Jud. i. 1, xx. 10), in electing a king (1 Sam. x. 20), in detecting the guilty (xiv. 41, 42), in selecting an apostle (Acts i. 26), as formerly priests' offices among the 16 of Eleazar's family and the eight of Ithamar (1 Chron. xxiv. 3, 5, 19; Luke i. 9), in apportioning spoil (Obad. 11, Joel iii. 3), in dividing Jesus' garments (Matt. xxvii. 35, Ps. xxii. 18). In Prov. xvi. 33, "the lot is cast into the lap," i.e. into an urn or cap in the judge's lap; "but the whole disposing (Heb. judgment) thereof is of the Lord." Only in weighty cases resort was had to judgment by lot; it was entered on with solemnity, as God is arbiter. Sanctification of the people preceded in Josh. vii. 13-18.

Lotan. Gen. xxxvi. 20, 22, 29.

Love. "The fulfilling of the law" (Rom. xiii. 8, 10), the prominent perfection of God (1 John iv. 8, 16), manifested to us (1 John iv. 10) when we loved not Him (John iii. 16). Passing our powers of knowledge (Eph. iii. 19), everlasting (Jer. xxxi. 3), free and gratuitous (Hos. xiv. 4), enduring to the end (John xiii. 1). The two Gr. words for "love" are distinct: phileo, the love of impulse, ardent affection and feeling; agapao, the love of esteem, regard. John xxi. 15, "Simon, lovest (agapas, esteemest) thou Me?" Agapas sounds too cold to Peter, now burning with love; so he replies, "Thou knowest that I LOVE (phileo) Thee." "Simon, esteemest thou (agapas) Me?" "Thou knowest that I LOVE Thee." At the third time Peter gained his point. "Simon, LOVEST (phileis) thou Me?" Love to one another is the proof to the world of discipleship (xiii. 35).

Low country (OR PLAIN); the shephelah. The low hills between the mountain and shore of JUDAH [see] (Josh. xi. 16).

Lubim. From lub "to thirst," the thirsty land. Probably = the Lehabim (Gen. x. 13). W. of the Nile delta. THE LIBYANS [see]. Allies or tributaries of Egypt (2 Chron. xii. 3, xvi. 8; Nah. iii. 9; Dan. xi. 23). The Rebu or Lebu of the monumental temple at Thebes (the Medinet Habou) of Ramesses III., who conquered them. Fair and Semitic like in the representations.

Lucifer = light bringer, "the morning star": Isa. xiv. 12 (helel, "spreading brightness"). Symbol of the once bright but now fallen king of Babylon. The title belongs of right to Christ (Rev. xxii. 16), therefore about to be assumed by antichrist, of whom Babylon is type and mystical Babylon the forerunner (Rev. xvii. 4, 5). The language is primarily drawn from that of Satan himself, the spirit that energized the heathen world power Babylon, that now energizes the apostate church, and shall at last energize the last secular antichrist

(the fourth kingdom little horn) and his champion, the false prophet (the third kingdom little horn), the harlot saceessor, who shall oppress Israel, as the fourth kingdom little horn oppresses the Gentile world: Dan. vii. 8-26 (Chaldee), viii. 9-11 (Hebrew); Rev. xiii. 4, xvi. 13, 14; 2 Thess. ii. 9. "Lucifer" is thus naturally applied to Satan (Luke x. 18; Rev. xii. 8, 9; Jude 6). Jesus saith, "I will give him that overcometh the morning star," i.e. Myself (Rev. ii. 28, xxii. 16); reflecting My brightness, he shall shine like Me "the morning star," sharing My kingly glory of which a star is the symbol (Num. xxiv. 17, Matt. ii. 2).

Lucius. Paul's kinsman or fellow tribesman (Rom. xvi. 21). Tradition makes him consecrated bishop of Cenchreae by Paul (Apost. Const. vii. 46).

Lucius of Cyrene. Mentioned with Barnabas, Simeon Niger, Manaen, and Saul, among the prophets and teachers of the church at Antioch (Acts xiii. 1). He probably was one of the "men of Cyrene" who heard the tongues and then Peter's pentecostal sermon (Acts ii. 10), and of the "men of Cyrene" who when "scattered abroad upon the persecution that arose about Stephen" went to Antioch, "preaching the Lord Jesus" (xi. 19, 20). A distinct name from Luke, = Lucas, = Lucanas.

Lud. Fourth of Shem's children (Gen. x. 22). The Lydians of western Asia Minor (say some), whose manners and whose names were Semitic. But the geographic position is against this. Moses would not abruptly pass to the distant W. from the E., and then back to the S.E.; if the Lydians of western Asia were meant, the order would have been Elam, Asshur (Arphaxad), Aram, Lud; not Elam, Asshur (Arphaxad), Lud, Aram. Lud is to be looked for between Assyria and Syria. The Ruten or Luden of the Egyptian monuments, dwelling N. of Palestine, near Mesopotamia and Assyria. They warred with the Pharaohs of the 13th, 14th, and 15th centuries B.C., under one of whom Moses lived (G. Rawlinson). The Luden may have migrated to western Asia at a later period. Thus Lad will be the original stock of the Lydians.

Ludim. Gen. x. 13. From Mizraim; therefore not = LUD [see], who was Semitic (Isa. lxxi. 19), but Hamitic. The Egyptian "Retu," the old inhabitants of central Egypt. They are Africans evidently in Jer. xli. 9. Ezek. xxx. 4, 5; near Phut or Nubia: "the Libyans (Phut) that handle the shield, and the Lydians that handle and bend the bow"; the foot was pressed on the centre, and the hands held the two ends, so "handle and bend" are both said. The Egyptian monuments confirm Scripture accuracy. The Rebu appear with small round shields, and the Ludim being Africans naturally excel in archery, for which Africa was famous.

Luhith, ascent of. The hill leading up to a sanctuary of Moab (Isa. xv. 5).

Luke. [See ACTS.] Contracted from Lucanas, as Sidas from Sivanus. A slave name. As L. was a "physician," a profession often exercised by slaves and freedmen, he may have been a freedman. Eusebius (H. E. iii. 4) states that Antioch was his native city. He was of Gentile parentage before he became a Christian; as appears from Col. iv. 11, 14: "L. the beloved physician" (one of "my fellow workers unto the kingdom of God which have been a comfort unto me") is distinguished from those "of the circumcision." That he was not of "the seventy" disciples, as Epiphanius (Hær. i. 12) reports, is clear from his preface in which he implies he was not an "eye witness"; the tradition arose perhaps from his Gospel alone recording the mission of the seventy. His history in Acts is first joined with that of Paul at Troas (xvi. 10), where the "we" implies that the writer was then Paul's companion. He accompanied the apostle in his journey to Jerusalem and Rome, at Paul's first Roman imprisonment "L. my fellow labourer," Philemon (24) (written from Rome, as also Colossians (iv. 14); also in Paul's last imprisonment there, when others forsook him L. remained faithful (2 Tim. i. 15, iv. 11 "only L. is with me"). His death by martyrdom between A.D. 75 and 100 is generally reported.

Luke, Gospel according to. In the preface to his Gospel Luke refers to "many" who before him had written accounts of what the "eye witnesses" and "ministers of the word" transmitted. This implies the "many" were not themselves eye-witnesses or ministers of the word. St. Matthew's and St. Mark's Gospels therefore are not referred to in the term "many." But as the phrase "they delivered to us" (paredosan) includes both written and oral transmission (2 Thess. ii. 15) Luke's words do not oppose, as Alford thinks, but favour the opinion that those two Gospels were among the sources of Luke's information, especially as Matthew was an "eye witness," and Mark a "minister of the word." Luke himself applies "minister" (Acts xiii. 5, hypereetes) to John Mark. Luke differs from the "many" in that his work is (1) "in order," (2) with a "perfect understanding of all things from the first" (parekolouthes kati anothēn akribōs, "having traced all things accurately from the remote beginning"). Luke begins with earlier facts of the Baptist's and of our Lord's history than Matthew and Mark, he writes methodically and in more chronological order. Ancient testimony assures us that Paul's teaching formed the substratum of Luke's Gospel (the Muratorian Fragment; Irenæus, Hær. iii. 1, 14; Tertullian, Marc. iv. 2; Origen, Ensch. II. E. vi. 25; Jerome, Vir. Illust. 7) Comp. as to the special revelation to Paul 1 Cor. xi. 23, xv. 3; Gal. i. 1, 11, 12. Paul was an "eye witness" (1 Cor. ix. 1; Acts xxii. 14, 15); his expression "according to my gospel" implies the independency of his witness; he quotes words of Christ revealed to him, and not found in the four Gospels (Acts xx. 35). Thus, besides Matthew and Mark, to whose Gospels the "many" as well as Luke had access, Paul is the chief "eye witness" to whom Luke refers in the preface. Luke and Paul alone record Jesus' appearing to Peter first of the apostles (Luke xxiv. 34, 1 Cor. xv. 5). Luke's account of the Lord's supper, making an interval between His giving the bread and the cup to the disciples, accords most with Paul's in 1 Cor. xi. 23, which that apostle says he received directly from the Lord Jesus. Luke (xxii. 43) records the appearance of an angel unto Jesus during His agony; as no one else is mentioned as having seen the vision, (indeed the disciples were sleeping for sorrow,) it must have been specially revealed by the Lord after His resurrection. Who so likely a person to have communicated it to Luke as Paul, who "received the gospel, not of man but by the revelation of Jesus Christ"? The selection of gospel materials in Luke, exhibiting forgiveness for the vilest, grace, and justification, is such as accords with Paul's large views as to the Gentiles and free justification by faith (Luke xviii. 14). The allusion in 2 Cor. viii. 18, "the brother whose praise is in the Gospel throughout all the churches," may be to Luke. The subscription of this epistle is "written from Philippi by Titus and Luke." Possibly during Paul's three months' sojourn there (Acts xx. 3) Luke was sent to Corinth, and it is to his evangelistic labours the reference is. As being chosen of the churches of Macedonia to be their "messenger," travelling with Paul, the "brother" meant must have been one of those mentioned in Acts xv. 4-6 as accompanying Paul into Asia with the alms. Now all the rest sailed away, leaving Paul to follow alone with Luke. Luke either by his written Gospel or by his evangelistic labours was one "whose praise in the Gospel was throughout the churches." Luke must be the "brother" meant. Paul in 1 Tim. v. 18 seems directly to quote and canonize the Gospel according to Luke (x. 7), "the labourer is worthy of his hire" (as both passages ought to be transl., not "reward," the word being the same, misthōn); comp. also xxiv. 26, 27, 46 with 1 Cor. xv. 3. Alford rejects ancient testimony that Paul's teaching constitutes the substance of Luke's Gospel, on the grounds that the evangelist asserts that his Gospel is drawn from those who "from the beginning" were eye witnesses of Christ's ministry, among whom Paul cannot be reckoned. But Luke's drawing information from persons who had been with the Lord from the beginning is quite consistent with Paul's revelations (Eph. iii. 3; 1 Cor. ix. 1, xi. 23) forming a prominent part of the substance of Luke's Gospel. Paul's words correspond with L.'s (x. 7 with 1 Cor. x. 27; Luke xvii. 27, 29, xxi. 34, 35, with 1 Thess. v. 2, 3, 6, 7). Luke's choice of materials accords with the new light in which "the apostle of the Gentiles" was inspired to set gospel facts, e.g. the parable of the prodigal son, the tracing of Christ's genealogy up to Adam the common parent of Jew and Gentile, not only to Abraham, as Matthew. Also Luke ii. 32, "a . . . Light to lighten the Gentiles"; iv. 25, Christ's reference to Elijah's mission to the Gentile widow of Sarepta; ix. 52; x. 30, the good Samaritan; xvii. 18, the only grateful one of the ten cleansed lepers, a Samaritan; the mission of the seventy, a number typical of the nations, as the twelve represent the twelve tribes of Israel. Theophilus, to whom he writes, was a Gentile believer, as appears from the geographical and other explanations given of many things, which would have been needless had he been a Jew (Luke i. 26, Nazareth; iv. 31, Capernaum; xxiii. 51, Arimathea; xxiv. 13, Emmaus; Acts i. 12, Olivet). In the inscription over the cross the Gr. and Latin are put before the Heb., in John the Heb. is first. Matthew refers to O. T. as what "Moses said," Luke as what "is written." The name Theophilus (friend of God) is Gr. Matthew calls Jerusalem "the holy city" and its temple "the temple of God"; but Mark and Luke omit these titles, doubtless because they were writing to Gentiles, after Jerusalem by continual persecutions of the church had sunk in the esteem of Christians, and when the temple made without hands, "the temple of the Holy Ghost," the church, was fully understood to have superseded the temple of stone.

Style. Luke's writing is classical and periodic. The pure Gr. of the preface shows that he could have written similarly throughout, but he tied himself to the Hebraistic language of the written records and perhaps also of the received oral tradition which he embodied. In Acts too his style is purer in the latter parts, where he was an eye witness, than in the earlier where he draws from the testimony of others. The sea of Genesaret is but a "lake" with him, as having seen more of the world than the Galilee fishermen. Peter is often called "Simon," which he never is by Paul, who uses only the apostolic name Peter, a proof that some of Luke's materials were independent of and earlier than Paul. Paul and Luke alone have the expressive word (atenizo) "steadfastly behold" or "look" (Acts i. 10, xiv. 9, iii. 4; 2 Cor. iii. 7, 13). Awkward phrases in Matthew and Mark are evidently corrected in Luke as to leave no doubt he had their Gospels before him. Comp. Gr. Mark xii. 38 with Luke x. 16, where philounton is substituted for thelonton; Luke vii. 8, where the insertion of "set" removes the harshness of Matt. viii. 9, "a man under authority." He substitutes the Gr. phoros ("tribute") in Luke xx. 22 for the Latin census, which Matthew (xxii. 17) as a taxgatherer for, and Mark (xii. 14) writing to Romans, use. He omits Hosanna, Eli Eli lama sabachthani, Rabbi, Golgotha (for which he substitutes the Gr. kranios, "calvary" or "place of a skull"). The phrases (parakolouthes, katecheo, phrophoreo) "having perfect understanding," "instructed" (catechetically and orally), "most surely believed" (Luke

i. 1-14) are all used similarly by Paul (1 Tim. iv. 6, Rom. ii. 18, 2 Tim. iv. 17). "Lawyers" six times stand instead of "scribes"; epistates, "master," instead of rabbi six times, as more plain to Gentiles. "Grace" or "favour" is never used by Matthew and Mark, thrice by John, but frequently in Luke. "To evangelize" or "preach the gospel" is frequent in Luke, once in Matthew, not at all in Mark and John. The style of Acts is less Hebraic than that of Luke's Gospel, because for the latter he used more of Hebraic materials and retained their language.

Canonicity. The oldest reliable testimony to the Gospel according to Luke is Marcion, whose Gospel so called (A.D. 130) is Luke's, abridged and mutilated. Therefore Luke's Gospel was in common use A.D. 120. The appendix to Tertullian (Præser. adv. Her.) says his teacher Cerdon received the Gospel of Luke alone. Justin Martyr often quotes it. Celsus attacks it as a book of the Christians (Origen c. Cels. ii. 32). Tatian includes it in his Harmony.

Specialty of Luke. He gives with especial accuracy not so much the discourses as the observations and occasional sayings of our Lord with the accompanying incidents. Appropriately to his profession Luke "the beloved physician" dwells on the healing power of the great Physician (Luke v. 17 end, Acts x. 38). He describes symptoms in a professional manner (comp. "full of leprosy" Luke v. 12). He alone mentions the subject of Moses and Elias' conversation with our Lord at the transfiguration, "His decease (exodus, Peter's very word, 2 Pet. i. 15, in alluding to his own decease, and in the same context the transfiguration of which he was eye witness) which He should accomplish at Jerusalem." Luke is fullest of the evangelists in describing our Lord's private prayers. There are eight such instances: iii. 21, "Jesus praying, the heaven was opened" at His baptism; v. 16, "in the wilderness"; vi. 12, "continued all night in prayer to God" before ordaining the twelve; ix. 18, "as He was alone praying, His disciples were with Him, and He asked whom say the people that I am?"; ix. 28, 29, at the transfiguration, "He went up into a mountain to pray, and as He prayed the fashion of His countenance was altered"; xi. 1, "as He was praying in a certain place, when He ceased one of His disciples said (struck with the holy earnestness of His tone, words, and gestures), Lord teach us to pray" (xxii. 32, 41, 42, 44-46; xxiii. 46).

Connection with Paul. Luke may have first become connected with Paul in tending him in the sickness which detained him in Phrygia and Galatia (Gal. iv. 13, "because of an infirmity of my flesh I preached," owing to his detention by sickness, contrary to his original intention he preached there). This probably was early in the journey wherein Luke first appears in Paul's company, that apostle's second missionary journey (Acts xvi. 9, 10). Thus Paul's allusion to Luke's being a "physician" is appropriate in writing to the Colossians as they were in Phrygia, the quarter wherein Luke ministered to his sickness. Luke, after being left behind at xvii. 1, where the third person is resumed, went again with Paul to Asia (xx. 6) and to Jerusalem (xxi. 15), and was with him in his captivity at Caesarea (xxiv. 23) and at Rome (xxviii. 16). Tertullian (adv. Marcion, iv. 2) ascribes the conversion of Luke to Paul.

Date of Gospel. The book of Acts which was written before it (i. 1) ends with Paul's two years' modified imprisonment at Rome, "dwelling in his own hired house, and receiving all that came in unto him" (xxviii. 30, 31). Abruptly it closes without informing us of the result of his appeal to Caesar, doubtless because when he wrote no event subsequent to the two years had transpired; this was A.D. 63. "The former treatise," i.e. the Gospel, was probably written at Caesarea during Paul's imprisonment there, A.D. 58-60 (Thiersch).

Object. "That Theophilus might know the certainty of those things wherein he had been instructed" (i. 4). The epithet "most excellent" prefixed shows that Theophilus was not an imaginary but a real person. Luke's describing minutely, in Paul's journey, the places before reaching Sicily and Italy, but omitting such description of Syracuse, Rhegium, Puteoli, Appii Forum, and the Three Taverns, as if familiar to his reader, implies Theophilus was well acquainted with Sicily and Italy.

[On the chronological order of events in Jesus Christ's history according to Luke see JESUS CHRIST.] From Luke ix. 51 to xviii. 15 there are no parallel notices in Matthew and Mark except xi. 17, xiii. 18, probably repeating the same truths on a later occasion (Mark iii. 24, iv. 30). This period begins with His journey in October to the feast of tabernacles, and ends with His arrival in Bethany six days before the passover. From xviii. 15, the blessing of the infants, Luke coincides with Matthew and Mark in the main. Even earlier, Luke xvii. 11 corresponds with Matt. xix. 1, 2, Mark x. 1, John xi. 54. The portion Luke ix. 51-xviii. 15 is vague as to dates, and probably is designed by the Holy Spirit to supplement what the other evangelists had not recorded. The preface (i. 1-4), the account of events preceding Jesus's ministry (i. 5-ii. 52), are peculiar to Luke. From iii. 1 to ix. 50 Luke mainly accords with Matthew and Mark in the order and the events of our Lord's ministry, which was chiefly about Capernaum. His testimony as a physician to the reality of demoniacal possession prevents its being confounded with lunacy (iv. 41). His accuracy appears in his giving exact dates (ii. 1-3 [see CYRENUS, and JESUS CHRIST, on the difficulty here; Cyrenius was twice governor of Syria]; iii. 1, 2); also in his marking the two distinct sights of Jerusalem observed by travellers in coming across Olivet; first at xix. 37, secondly at ver. 41.

Lunatics. Healed by Christ (Matt. iv. 24, xvii. 25). The former epileptics, the second a demon-possessed epileptic patient. [See LUKE, DEVIL.]

Luz. [See BETHEL.] Luz was originally the city, Bethel the pillar and altar of Jacob; in Gen. xii. 8 it is called Bethel by anticipation (xxviii. 19), after Ephraim's conquest the town Bethel arose. The nearness of the two accounts for their being identified in all cases where there was no special reason for distinguishing them. After one of the townsmen of ancient Luz had betrayed it to Israel he went into "the land of the Hittites," and built a city of the same name (Jud. i. 23-26). Answering to Khirbet Lozeh, close to Beitin.

Lycæonia. A province in the S. of Asia Minor, having Galatia on the N., Cappadocia E., Pisidia and Phrygia W., Cilicia S. A bare table land without trees or lakes of fresh water (but many salt lakes), only fit for sheep pasture. "The speech of L." was probably a corrupt mixture of Gr. and Syriac; the people's objects of worship were those of the Greeks and Romans, Mercury and Jupiter, whose visit to this quarter is one of Ovid's fables (Metam. viii. 626). At Lystra in the centre of the region Paul delivered his address, admirably suited to his audience (Acts xiv. 15-17). Iconium was far on the W. towards Antioch in Pisidia; Derbe was on the E. of Lystra, towards the pass from Cilicia up through Taurus to the central table land (ver. 1, 6). Paul on his first journey passed through L. from W. to E., then back the reverse way E. to W. (ver. 21, 2 Tim. iii. 11). At his second journey he passed from E. to W. through L. to Troas (Acts xvi. 1-8); on the third, in the same direction, to Ephesus (xviii. 23, xix. 1).

Lycia. A province in S.W. of Asia Minor opposite Rhodes. Pamphylia is on E., Caria W., Phrygia N., the Mediterranean S. The Taurus range here descends to the sea, with the river Xanthus flowing between its heights Cragus and Antieragus. Its two chief towns Patara and Myra Paul visited, during the period when L. and Pamphylia in Claudius' reign were combined under one proconsul (Acts xxi. 1, xxvii. 5). Previously it was allowed to form an independent state, its golden period. Sir C. Fellows brought to the British Museum interesting specimens of its coins and ancient architecture.

Lydda. [See LOD.] The result of Peter's cure of the paralytic Æneas, one of the "saints which dwell at L." was, "all that dwell in L. and Saron (the adjoining maritime plain, Sharon) saw him and turned to the Lord" (Acts ix. 32-35). Now Lydd, nine miles from Jaffa, the first town on the northernmost of the two roads between Jaffa and Jerusalem. The Benjamites occupied and built, i.e. fortified and enlarged, it originally (1 Chron. viii. 12) and reconquered it after the return from Babylon (Ezra ii. 33, Neh. xi. 35). The Romans named it Diospolis. It became the seat of a bishopric. Here was buried, and probably born, St. George, England's legendary patron saint and martyr;

Lydia. Acts xvi. 13-15. Paul's first European convert. A Jewish proselyte (= "which worshipped God"). In attending the means of grace at Philippi L. received the blessing. Many women, and among them L., resorted to the place by the river Gangites or Gaggitas "where prayer was wont to be made"; possibly a proseucha was there, "the meeting place of Jewish congregations in Greek cities" (Winer), or "a place of prayer as opposed to a synagogue or house of prayer" (Conybeare and Howson, Life of St. Paul). For quietness and freedom from interruption it was "outside of the gate" (so Sin., Vat., and Alex. MSS., read instead of "out of the city"), and "by the river side" for the sake of the ablutions connected with the worship. The sea shore was esteemed by the Jews a place most pure, and therefore suited for prayer; at their great fast they used to leave their synagogues and pray on every shore in Tertullian's (de Jejun. 16) time; see also Josephus Ant. xiv. 10, § 23. Luke describes here with the vividness of an eye witness. Women, as in many of our own congregations, formed the greater part of the worshippers; their employment as dyers brought them together in that vicinity. L. belonged to Thyatira in Asia Minor, where inscriptions relating to a "guild of dyers" there confirm Luke's accuracy. Paul arrived early in the week, for "certain days" elapsed before the sabbath. Paul, Silas, and Luke "sat down" (the usual attitude of teachers) to speak to the assembled women. L. was one of the listeners (eekouen), and "the Lord opened her heart (comp. Luke xxiv. 45; Ps. cxix. 18, 130) that she attended unto the things spoken of Paul" (Luke modestly omits notice of his own preaching). The Gr. (elaloumen) implies conversational speaking rather than sermonizing. Her modesty and simplicity beautifully come out in the narrative. She heartily yields to her convictions and is forthwith baptized, the waters of Europe then first being sacramentally used to seal her faith and God's forgiveness in Christ. She leads her "household" to believe in, and be baptized as disciples of, the same Saviour.

This is the first example of that family religion to which Paul often refers in his epistles (1 Cor. i. 11, 16, xvi. 15; Rom. xvi. 5; Philemon 2). First came her faith, then her leading all around her to Christ, then her and their baptismal confession, then her love evidenced in pressing hospitality (Heb. xiii. 2, 1 Pet. iv. 9, 1 Tim. v. 10), finally her receiving into her house Paul and Silas after their discharge from prison; she was not "ashamed of the Lord's prisoners, but was partaker of the afflictions of the gospel."

Through L. also the gospel probably came into Thyatira, where Paul had been forbidden to preach it at the earlier time, for God has His times for everything (Acts xvi. 6.

Rev. ii. 18). Thyatira being a Macedonian colony had much intercourse with Philippi, the parent city. L. may have been also one of "those women who laboured with Paul in the gospel" at Philippi (Phil. iv. 3).

Lysanias. Tetrarch of Abilene, the district round Abila, in the 15th year of Tiberius' reign. It is not the elder L., who died 34 B.C. (Josephus, B. J. i. 13, § 1; Ant. xiv. 7, § 4; xv. 4, § 1; xviii. 6, § 10; xix. 5, § 1; B. J. ii. 12, § 8), and never ruled Abilene, but his son, who is meant by Luke iii. 1. An inscription found near Baalbek on a memorial tablet to "Zenodorus, son of the tetrarch L., and to L. her children" by the widow of the first and mother of the second L. proves Luke's accuracy, which had been doubted because no proof was found of the existence of a second L.

Lysias Claudius. A Roman chiliarch or captain in charge of the troops of the citadel Antonia at Paul's last visit to Jerusalem. He resented Paul from the fanatical crowd, and subsequently from the plot of more than 40 zealots against his life (Acts xxi. 27-36, xxiii. 12-33). With worldly tact he in writing to Felix makes no mention of having bound Paul for scourging (xxi. 33, xxii. 21-29), for he "feared" the consequences to himself of having so treated a Roman citizen. Still his treatment of the apostle otherwise, after he knew his Roman citizenship, was fair and firm.

Lystra. Acts xiv. xvi. A town of Lycaonia, Timothy's birthplace. He doubtless heard of Paul's miraculous healing of the cripple, followed by the people's and priests' offer of sacrifices to Paul as Mercury and to Barnabas as Jupiter before the city (its tutelary god whose statue stood there), which worship the apostles, rending their clothes in horror, rejected, and told them they were men like themselves, and that they preached the duty of "turning from these vanities unto the living God, who made all things," and who heretofore bore with their ignorance, though even then He "did not leave himself without witness in giving rain, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness." Then, with a mob's characteristic fickleness, from adoration they passed to persecution, stoning Paul at the instigation of Jews from Antioch and Iconium. But though left as dead outside the city, whilst the disciples stood round him he rose up and came into the city, and next day went to Derbe; then back to L. to "confirm the souls of the disciples" gathered in there, "exhorting them to continue in the faith, and that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God."

Paul's holy courage under suffering, when he might have had adoration instead by compromise of principle, doubtless in part influenced Timothy (2 Tim. iii. 10, 11) in embracing Christianity, whether he actually witnessed the apostle's afflictions (as Paul's epistle to Timothy implies), or only heard of them. The incidental allusion to Timothy's knowledge of his sufferings is an undesigned coincidence between the epistle and the history, indicating genuineness. A forger of epistles from Acts would never allude to Timothy's knowledge of persecutions, when that knowledge is not recorded in Acts but is only arrived at by indirect inference. Moreover "Derbe" is omitted in the list of the scenes of Paul's persecutions (2 Tim. iii. 11), though usually joined with L., in minute agreement with the history, which mentions no persecution at Derbe. In Acts xvi. 1 Timothy appears as already a Christian. Paul then circumcised him, to conciliate the Jews there (ver. 2). Hamilton (Res. in Asia Min., ii. 313) identifies L. with the ruins Bin bir Kûlisseh, at the base of the conical volcanic-formed hill Karadagh.

M

Maacah. Abel beth Maacah was not in it, but in Israel; in the direction of M., and somehow connected with it (2 Sam. xx. 14-16). A small kingdom outside Argob (Deut. iii. 14), and Bashan (Josh. xii. 5). Between Bashan and the kingdom of Damascus, on the skirts of mount Hermon, E. of the Lejah. The mention of Maacah with the Geshurites points to a connection between them; probably by affinity, as the Geshurite Talmi's daughter bears the name M. Both were connected with Syria (1 Chron. xix. 6, 7; 2 Sam. x. 6, 8). The king of M. was Ammon's ally against David; his small contingent, 1000 men, shows the pettiness of the region.

Maachah. 1. Gen. xxii. 24. 2. 1 Chron. ii. 48. 3. 1 Chron. vii. 15. 4. 1 Chron. viii. 29. 5. Absalom's mother, taken by David in battle and added to his wives (Jerome): 1 Chron. iii. 2, 2 Sam. iii. 3. Talmi's daughter of Geshur, David's wife. 6. Absalom's granddaughter, wife of Rehoboam and mother of Abijam (1 Kings xv. 1); called Micah = Maacah; daughter of Uriel and Tamar, Absalom's daughter (2 Chron. xiii. 2). Grandmother (= mother) of Asa, son of Abijam. During Asa's minority she acted as queen mother; but Asa when of age set her aside for her idolatry, which she derived from her ancestors of Geshur (1 Kings xv. 13, 14, 16); 2 Chron. xi. 20-22, xv. 16 "idol," lit. horror, the emblem of Priapus.

Several men are named M.: 1. 1 Kings ii. 39. 2. 1 Chron. xi. 43. 3. 1 Chron. xxvii. 16.

Maadai. Ezra x. 34.

Maadiah. Neh. xii. 5; Ezra x. 34.

Maaleh Acrabbim. Josh. xv. 3: the ascent of scorpions; Scorpion pass. [See ACRABBIM.]

Maarath: from a root = openness or barrenness (Gesenius), or (nearath) a cave (Grove). A town of Judah in the hills (Josh. xv. 58, 59); not far from Hebron.

Maaseiah. 1. Ezra x. 18. 2. Ezra x. 21. 3. Ezra x. 22. 4. Ezra x. 30. 5. Neh. iii. 23. 6. Neh. viii. 4. 7. Neh. viii. 7. 8. Neh. x. 25. 9. Neh. xi. 5 = Asaiah, 1 Chron. ix. 5. 10. Neh. xi. 7. 11. Neh. xii. 6, 41, 42. 12. Jer. xxix. 25. 13. Jer. xxix. 21. 14. 1 Chron. xv. 18 20. 15. 2 Chron. xxiii. 1. 16. An upper officer (shoter) or "ruler" under Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi. 11). 17. King Ahaz's son, slain by Zichri the "mighty man" of Ephraim in Pekah's invasion of Judah (2 Chron. xxviii. 7), connected officially with the "governor of the city" (xxviii. 25; 1 Kings xxii. 26). 18. Governor of Jerusalem under Josiah; superintended the restoration of the temple (2 Chron. xxxiv. 8). 19. Jer. xxxv. 4. 20. Jer. xxxii. 12, li. 59.

Maasai. 1 Chron. ix. 12.

Maaz. 1 Chron. ii. 27.

Maaziah. 1. Neh. x. 8. The coincidence of names between David's 24 courses, and the signers of Nehemiah's covenants, and the returners with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii.) implies that these names were applied to the families. 2. 1 Chron. xiv. 18.

Maccabees. From the initials of Judas Maccabeus's motto, Mi Camena Be-Elohim Jehovah, "who is like unto Thee, Jehovah, among the gods?" (Exod. xv. 11.) Books of the Apocrypha: interesting as giving a Jewish history of many events which occurred after the sacred CANON [see and BIBLE] closed with Malachi; especially the heroic and successful struggle of the Maccabees for Judah's independence against the O. T. antichrist and persecutor, Antiochus Epiphanes, of whom DANIEL [see viii., xi. foretells. [See JERUSALEM.]

Macedonia. The first country in Europe where Paul preached the gospel, in obedience to the vision of a man of M., saying "come over and help us." The Haemus (Balkan) range, separating it from Massia, is on its N.; the Pindus, separating it from Epirus, on the W.; the Cambanian hills S. separating M. from Thessaly; Thrace and the Aegean sea E. There are two great plains, one watered by the Axios entering the sea near Thessalonica, the other by the Strymon which passes near Philippi and empties itself below Amphipolis. Between lies mount Athos, across the neck of which Paul often travelled with his companions. Philip (from whom Philippi is named) and Alexander were its most famous kings. When Rome conquered it from Persius, Aemilius Paulus after the battle of Pydna divided it into M. Prima, Secunda, Tertia, and Quarta. M. Prima, the region E. of the Strymon, had Amphipolis as its capital. M. Secunda, the region between the Strymon and Axios, had Thessalonica. M. Tertia, from the Axios to the Peneus, had Pella. M. Quarta, the remainder, had Pella.

gonia. In N. T. times the whole of M., Thessaly, and a district along the Adriatic, was made one province under a praefectus at Thessalonica the capital. The great Ignatian Road joined Philippi and Thessalonica, and led towards Illyricum (Rom. xv. 19). Philippi had supplanted Amphipolis in importance. Mention of M. in this wide sense occurs Acts xvi. 9-12, xviii. 5, xix. 21, 23, 29, xx. 1-3, xxvii. 2; Rom. xv. 26; 1 Cor. xvi. 5; 2 Cor. i. 16, ii. 13, vii. 5, viii. 1, ix. 2, 4, xi. 9; Phil. iv. 15; 1 Thess. i. 7, 8, iv. 10; 1 Tim. i. 3 (which last passage proves Paul accomplished the wish expressed in his first imprisonment, Phil. ii. 24). Achaia S., Illyricum N.W., and M. comprehended the whole region between the Danube and the southernmost point of the Peloponnese. The Macedonian Christians are highly commended; the Bereans for their readiness in receiving the word, and withal diligence in testing the preached word by the written word (Acts xvii. 11); the Thessalonians for their "work of faith, labour of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus," so that they were "examples" to all others (1 Thess. i. 3, 7); the Philippians for their liberal contributions to Paul's sustenance (Phil. iv. 10, 14-19; 2 Cor. ix. 2, xi. 9). Lydia was the first European convert, and women were Paul's first congregation (Acts xvi. 13, 14); so the female element is prominent at Philippi in the epistle to the Philippians as working for Christ (iv. 2, 3). How Christianity, starting from that beginning, has since elevated woman socially throughout Europe!

Maehbanai. 1 Chron. xii. 8, 13.

Machbenah. A town of Judah, colonized by the family of Maachah (1 Chron. ii. 49). "Maachah, Caleb's concubine, bare Sheva the father of M."

Machi. Num. xiii. 15.

Machir. 1. Manasseh's eldest son by a Syrian or Aramite concubine (1 Chron. vii. 14). Joseph had Machir's children upon his knees (Gen. i. 23), i.e. they were adopted by Joseph from their birth. Gilead was his son, and Abiah his daughter. A large part of the country E. of Jordan was subdued by his powerful family (Num. xxxii. 39, Deut. iii. 15). The rest of the family crossed Jordan. So powerful was the family that "Machir" supplants the name of "Manasseh" in Jud. v. 11, 17; Josh. xiii. 31, 29. 2. Son of Ammiel of Gad, a Gileadite chief; sheltered Mephibosheth, Jonathan's lame son; afterwards, influenced probably by David's kindness to the same youth, supplied David with necessities when fleeing from Absalom (2 Sam. ix. 4, xvii. 27-29).

Machnadebai. Ezra x. 40.

Machpelah. The tract containing the field and cave in the end of Ephron's field, which Abraham bought as his burying ground from Ephron and the sons of Heth (Gen. xxiii. 9); his only possession in the land of promise. All ancient versions transl. M. "the double cave," from kaphal, to divide or double. Either there were two entrances or two receptacles for bodies. Gesenius derives it from a root, "portion." A mosque now covers it. The sacred precinct (haram) is enclosed by a wall, the oldest in Palestine. The masonry is more antique than the S.W. wall of the haram at Jerusalem; one stone is 38 ft. long, 3½ deep. The beveling is shallow, and at latest belongs to the age of Solomon; Jewish ancient tradition ascribes it to David. It lay near HEBRON [see]. The sepulchres of Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Rebekah, Jacob, and Leah are shown on the mosque floor; but the real sepulchres are in the cave below the floor; the cave opens to the S., and the bodies were laid with their heads to the N.

Madai. Gen. x. 2, sons, i.e. descendants, of Japheth, an ethnic designation. The Meds, who called themselves Madai, S.W. of the Caspian. Some came with the Scythians to Europe, the mixed race formed the Sarmatians. Modern ethnology has found that in physical type and language the Medes belong to the Indo-Germanic family of mankind, comprising the Celts, Greeks, Romans, etc.

Madian = Midian. Acts vii. 29.

Madmannah = dunghill. A city in S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 31). Identical with BETH MARCABOTH [see] = resting house for chariots. Now probably Minyah, on the route from Egypt to western Palestine, 15 miles S.S.W. from Gaza, the Ethiopian emneb's route, travelling in his chariot from Jerusalem towards Egypt (Acts viii. 26-28).

Madmen. A town of Moab, whose doom Jeremiah (xlviii. 2) foretells. Playing on the similarly sounding Heb. word for silence, daman, "thou city of silence (= Madmen) shalt be brought to silence" (Isa. xv. 1); in xxv. 10, "Moab . . . trodden down for the dunghill" (Madmenah), or as the Heb. text (kethib), "in the waters of Madmenah," evidently alludes to M., with a play on its meaning "dunghill," the lowest stage of degradation.

Madmen, madness. The Easterns regard madmen with a superstitious reverence, as idolatrous worshippers seemed, and true worshippers were really, rapt out of themselves by Divine inspiration (1 Kings xviii. 26, 28; 1 Sam. xix. 21-24). Hence arose the contemptuous sneer as to Jesus (John x. 20), "He hath a devil and is mad"; also the designation "mad fellow" applied to the prophet who anointed Jehu (2 Kings ix. 11), and to Jeremiah (xxix. 26), and to Paul (Acts xxvi. 24, 25). David availed himself of this half-reverential, half-contemptuous forbearance towards madmen, to save himself at Achish's court by feigning madness (1 Sam. xxi. 13-15).

Madmenah. Not the city in Simeon, or southern Judah, MADMANNAH [see], but a Benjamite village N. of Jerusalem, whose people fled ("is removed," Isa. x. 31, rather "flies") before Sennacherib's approach from the N.

Madon. A leading Canaanite city, whose king Jobab was killed at Merom with Jabin's confederates (Josh. xi. 1, xii. 19).

Magbish. Ezra ii. 30. A place seemingly in Benjamin, meaning "freezing." A person "Magpiash" is named as sealing the covenant (Neh. x. 20).

Magdala. In Sin. and Vat. MSS. (Matt. xv. 39) "Magadan" is the reading. A town or region to which our Lord came after feeding the 4000. "Dalmanutha" is in Mark's Gospel (viii. 10). The name Mary "Magdalaene" shows there was a

"M." probably a later form of Migdol, "a tower." El Mejdol on the western border of the lake of Galilee, an hour's journey N. of Tiberias, now represents M., and is about the position where our Lord is thought to have been after the miracle. It is near a beautiful plain and a hill rising about 400 ft., with overhanging limestone rock honeycombed with caves. The Jews used "M." to denote a person with twisted or platted hair; a usage of women of loose character.

Magdiel. Gen. xxxv. 43.

Magi, magicians. Called "wise men" Matt. ii. 1. Heb. chartunnim, "sacred scribes," from two roots "sacred" and "style" or "pen" (cheret); priests skilled in sacred writings, and in divining through signs the will of heaven. A regular order among the Egyptians, devoted to magic and astrology [see DIVINATION]. The word is Persian or Median; it appears in Rab-mag, "chief of the magicians" (Jer. xxxix. 3), brought with Nebuchadnezzar's expedition, that its issue might be foreknown. The Magi were a sacerdotal caste among the Medes, in connection with the Zoroastrian religion. "They waited upon the sacred fire, and performed ablutions, and practised observation of the stars." Müller (Herzog. Cycl.) says that the Median priests were not originally called Magi, but by the names found in the Zendavesta. "Atharva," guardians of the fire, and that the Chaldeans first gave them the name Mazi. Nebuchadnezzar gathered round him the religious teachers and wise men of the nations he conquered (Dan. i. 3, 4, 20). The Magians probably lost some of the original purity of the simpler Median religion by contact with the superstitions of Babylon; still there remained some elements of truth and opposition to idolatry, which formed common ground between them and Daniel (v. 11, vi. 3, 16, 26; Ezra i. 1-4; Isa. xlv. 28).

Antaxerxes. Pseudo Smerdis "the Magian," naturally thwarted the rebuilding of the temple to the one true God, for he had reintroduced a corrupted Chaldaic magianism instead of Cyrus' purer faith in Ormazd. The Zoroastrian religion Darius restored, and destroyed the Magians; as the Behistun inscription states, "the rites which Gomates (Pseudo Smerdis) the Magian introduced I prohibited, I restored the chants and worship," etc. Naturally then the Jews under Darius resumed the suspended work of building the temple (Ezra iv. 24; v. 1, 2; vi. 7, 8). All forms of magic, augury, necromancy, etc., are prohibited in the Zendavesta as evil and emanating from Ahriman the evil one.

The Magi regained power under Xerxes, and were consulted by him. They formed the highest portion of the king's court, the council about the king's person. Gradually the term came to represent divining impostors. Philo however uses it in a good sense:

"men who gave themselves to the study of nature and contemplation of the Divine perfections, worthy of being counsellors of kings." So in Matt. ii. 1 it is used in the better sense of "wise men," at once astronomers and astrologers "from the E.," i.e. the N.E., the region towards the Euphrates whence BALAAM [see] came (Num. xxiii. 7, xxii. 5). Balaam's prophecy seems to have been known to them: "there shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall arise out of Israel." Accordingly the very guide they look to is a star (a meteor probably), and the question they ask is "where is He that is born King of the Jews?" Moreover Daniel, "chief of the Magi," had foretold Messiah's kingdom (ii. 44. ix. 25); naturally the Magi ("wise men") looked for the kingdom and the king among the people of him whose fame as a Magian they had heard of. Zoroaster's predictions led them to look for Zosiosh, the Head of the kingdom who should conquer Ahriman and raise the dead. Their presents, "gold, frankincense, and myrrh," were the usual gifts of subject nations (Ps. lxxii. 15; 1 Kings x. 2, 10; 2 Chron. ix. 24; S. of Sol. iii. 6, iv. 14). They came to the infant Jesus some considerable time after the shepherds in Luke ii., for now He is no longer in an inn but in the "house" (Matt. ii. 11). [For details see JESUS CHRIST, BETHLEHEM, and HEROD.] The star remained stationary whilst they were at Jerusalem, whither they had turned aside; but when they left it the star again guided them till they reached Christ's birthplace. Only so long as we follow the sure word of revelation have we guidance to Jesus and safety in Him (2 Pet. i. 19). Herod discovered the foretold birthplace of Messiah from the scribes' quotation of Micah (v. 2) in answer to his query where He should be born. But the Child had escaped, and the Magi, being warned of God in a dream (they were famed for interpretation of dreams), had returned a different way, before Herod's cruel decree for the slaughter of the infants took effect at Bethlehem.

Matthew, dwelling on Christ's kingly office as the Son of David, gives the history of the Magians' visit, since they first hailed Him as King. Luke, dwelling more on His human sympathy, gives the history of the divinely guided visit of the humble shepherds. Luke records the earlier event, according to his plan stated in his preface, "to write all things from the very first," and omits the already recorded visit of the Magi, which seemed the presage of an earthly kingdom, as unsuited to the aspect of lowliness and identification with the needs of universal mankind in which he represents our Lord. The names given by tradition to the "three kings" so called (presumed to represent Europe, Asia, and Africa; Ps. lxxii. 10 was the plea for their king ship), Melchior, Gaspar, and Balthasar, are of course mythical, as is the story of their bones being in the shrine of Cologne, having been removed first from the East by Helena to Constantinople, then to Milan, then to Cologne.

In the sense "magician" Simon Magus at Samaria is an instance (Acts viii. 9, 10); also Elymas the Jewish sorcerer and false prophet who withstood Paul and Barnabas at Paphos (xiii. 6-12); also the exorcists and those who used "curious arts" and who "brought their books together, and burned them before all men" to the value of "50,000 pieces of silver," at Ephesus (xix. 13-19). Pharaoh's magicians practised the common juggler's trick of making serpents appear "with their enchantments" (from a root, "flame" or else "conceal," implying a trick: Exod. vii. 11, 12); but Aaron's rod swallowed theirs, showing that his power was real, theirs illusory. So they produced frogs after Moses had done so, i.e. they only increased the plague, they could not remove it. At the plague of lice or mosquitoes they could not even increase the plague, and had to say, "This is the finger of God" (viii. 7, 18, 19). At last the plague of boils broke out upon the magicians themselves (ix. 11); they owned themselves defeated, "they could not stand before Moses."

The peculiarity of BALAAM [see] was, he stood partly on heathen magic and soothsaying augury, partly on true revelation. For "enchantments" transl. "auguries" (Num. xxiii. 3, xxiv. 1). The TERAPHIM [see] were consulted for divining purposes (Jud. xviii. 5, 6; Zech. x. 2). There is extant the Egyptian Ritual of amulets and incantations.

Magog. Gen. x. 2; Ezek. xxxviii., xxxix. A race, like Gomer (the Cimmerians), dwelling in the N. country. Its weapon was the bow, its warriors were all horsemen. Probably the European Scythians, dominant in the region between the Caucasus and Mesopotamia for 30 years from 630 to 600 B.C., who were famous for the bow and fought almost wholly on horseback. They invaded Palestine, and besieged Ascalon under the Egyptian Psammetichus. They appear in Ezekiel inhabiting "the sides (the remote recesses) of the N.," adjacent to Togarmah (Armenia) and the "isles," i.e. maritime regions of Europe (xxxix. 2, 3, 6; xxxviii. 6, 15). Connected with Meshech (the Moschi) and Tubal (the Tibarenes). Their own traditions represent them to have lived first in Asia near the Araxes, afterwards to have possessed the whole country to the ocean and like Maotis, and the plain to the Tanais or Don. Mixed with the Medes they became the Sarmatians, whence sprang the Russians. Derived from Sanskrit mah "great" and ghogh "mountain" (Persian). [See for the prophetic sense, etc., GOG.] The Syrians in the middle ages applied M. as a geographical term to Asiatic Turkey; the Arabians applied it to the region between the Caspian and Euxine. Forced by the Massagetae from the N. of Caucasus, they swept down into Asia Minor, took Sardis (622 B.C.), and thence passed into Media and defeated Cyaxares, 624. Their name thus was a terror in the East just before Ezekiel's prophecies, and naturally symbolises rude violence. Their origin is clearly Japhetic, as Gen. x. 2 implies.

Magor Missabib = terror on every side. The name given by Jeremiah (xx. 3) to Pashur when he smote and put him into the stocks for prophesying against Jerusalem. The phrase is frequent in Jeremiah, as vi. 25, xx. 10, xlv. 5, xlv. 29, Lamm. ii. 22; elsewhere only Ps. xxxi. 13. Pashur, whose name means "largeness on every side," was to become "terror on every side."

Magpiash = MAGBISH [see], Ezra ii. 30; Neh. x. 29.

Mahalah. 1 Chron. vii. 18.

Mahalaheel. 1. Fourth from Adam in Seth's line, Cainan's son = the praise of God. 2. Neh. xi. 4.

Mahalath. 1. Daughter of Ishmael, Esau's wife [see BASHMEMATH]. In Gen. xxviii. 9, the narrative, she is called M.; in xxxvi. 3, 4, 10, 13, 17, the Edomite genealogy, she is called Bashmemath. They are two names for the same person, both being described as "daughter of Ishmael, and sister of Nebathoth." But Bashmemath, daughter of Elom, is the same as Adah daughter of Elom. So that there were two Bashmemaths. 2. One of Rehoboam's 18 wives (2 Chron. xi. 18). Her husband's cousin, daughter of David's son Jerimoth.

3. Title of Ps. liii., lxxxviii. A poetical enigmatical description of the subject, "upon sickness," viz. man's spiritual malady (Isa. i. 5, 6). Ps. liii. is an instructive warning (maschil) to the wicked, as Ps. xiv. is for the comfort of the righteous when cast down by the prevailing "corruption." The addition Leanneth, from 'anah "to afflict" (comp. ver. 15), in Ps. lxxxviii. expresses "concerning the sickness of affliction," i.e. Israel's disorganization. Praise songs are the comfort of the afflicted. Ps. lxxxviii. is the most gloomy throughout of all the psalms, therefore the title (shir) praise song must refer to Ps. lxxxix., which forms the latter part of one whole, of which lxxxviii. is the first part. The maschil or instruction is that the afflicted should pour out their griefs to God (Isa. v. 13). David and the sons of Korah after him delight in such poetical enigmas in titles of psalms. Gesenius and Ludolf derive M. less probably from the Ethiopic machlet, a harp. Delitzsch explains it as a direction for singing in slow pensive tone, = marstos.

Mahanaim. Two camps or hosts. A place on the Jabbok so called by Jacob [see] from the two angelic hosts which appeared to him when returning from Padan Aram to Canaan. The two may refer to Jacob's own camp and that of the angels, or rather his division of his party into two, corresponding to which were the two angelic companies, one to guard each. The Speaker's Comm. less probably makes it, the angels were on his right and his left. M. was in Gad; assigned to the Levites (Josh. xxi. 38, 39). Now Mahneh, on a tributary of the Yabis, which Paine identifies with the Jabbok. The correspondence is striking between the human and the Divine, the visible and the invisible agencies in this remarkable history. Jacob's two companies answer to the two heavenly ones, the face of God and the face of Esau; seeing that first prepares Jacob for seeing this; the messengers of God and those of Jacob; and the name Jabbok, i.e. wrestling, marking the scene of the patriarch's wrestling with the Lord. Here Abner fixed the seat of Ishbosheth's kingdom, being unable to wrest the towns of Ephraim or Benjamin from the Philistines (2 Sam. ii. 8, 9). Here Ishbosheth was murdered (iv. 5). Hither David fled from Absalom, for he was then walled and large enough to contain David's "hundreds" and "thousands." It had its gates and watchmen (2 Sam. xvii. 24, xviii. 1-4; 1 Kings ii. 8). One of Solomon's commissariat officers was at M. (iv. 11).

The Shulamite, i.e. Solomon's bride, the church, is compared to "the company of two armies" (margin, "Mahanaim," S. of Sol. vi. 13). Though "one" (ver. 9) she is nevertheless "two," the family of Jesus Christ in heaven and that on earth, that militant and that triumphant. Her strength, like Jacob's at M., is Christ and His hosts enlisted on her side by wrestling prayer.

Mahanah Dan = camp of Dan, named so from the 600 Danites' last encampment here before setting out for Laish (Jud. xviii. 11, 12). They stayed here some time (as the naming implies) assembling and preparing for their expedition. Between Zorah and Eshtaul, the scene of Samson's first movements by the Spirit of God, whilst residing with his parents (xiii. 25, xvi. 31). M. was situated "behind," i.e. W. of Kirjath Jerim (now Kiriet el Enab) in Judah's territory. Some identify Eshtaul with Kustul and M. with Bot Mahanem (Williams, Holy City, i. 12, note).

Maharai. 2 Sam. xxiii. 24, 1 Chron. xi. 39, xxvii. 13.

Mahath. 1. 1 Chron. vi. 35. 2. 2 Chron. xxxi. 13.

Mahavite. 1 Chron. xi. 46. It is plural in Heb., whence Kennicott conjectures the true reading, is "from the Hivites."

Mahazioth. 1 Chron. xxv. 4, 30.

Maher-shalal-hash-baz = hasteth to the spoil, speedeth to the prey. As IMMANUEL [see], Isaiah's (vii. 14, viii. 1-4) first son by the virgin, was the sign of Judah's deliverance, so M. the second son is the sign of destruction to Judah's enemies, Syria and Samaria. Assyria will speedily spoil these. The prophet was to write M. in a great roll with a man's pen, i.e. in ordinary characters, large enough for all to read, that after the event its correspondence to the prediction might be seen. Shearjashub (vii. 3, = a remnant shall return) was another sign that Judah should not be utterly destroyed, notwithstanding its terrible defeat by Pekah of Israel, and notwithstanding Syria's confederacy with Israel against it (17-25, viii. 6-9).

Mahlah. Num. xxvi. 32. Eldest of Zelophehad's five daughters. Married her cousin and received her portion of territory in Manasseh, according to the special law of inheritance as to heiresses, so that "the name of their father was not done away from among his family because he had no son" (xxvii. 1-11). See 1 Chron. vii. 18, MAHALAH.

Mahli. Num. in. 20; Mahali in Exod. vi. 19.

Mahlon. Ruth's (i. 2, 5; iv. 9) first husband. An Ephrathite of Bethlehem Judah, son of Elimelech and Naomi. M. died in Moab childless, a judgment says the Targum for his marrying a Moabitess.

Mahol. Father of Ethan the Ezrabite, Heman, Chalcol, and Darda (1 Kings iv. 31, 1 Chron. ii. 6). Some interpret "sons of song" or rather "dance" (mahol), dancing often accompanying hymns (Exod. xv. 20, 2 Sam. vi. 14).

Makaz. A town under Solomon's commissariat officer, Ben (son of) Dekar (1 Kings iv. 9).

Makheloth = places of meeting; assemblies, congregations. (Num. xxxiii. 25, akin to Khelethab, ver. 22).

Makkedah. The place where Joshua (x. 10, 16-28) executed the five confederate kings in the afternoon of the 24 hours' day on which he won the victory at Bethoron. The cave where they hid was a well known one close to M. (the article, "the cave," in the Heb. shows this.) Joshua first made his captains put their feet upon the five kings' necks (Ps. cxlix. 8, 9; Mal. iv. 3) to assure them by this earnest of their future success under God, then executed them deliberately and judiciously, and left them hanging to five trees till evening in sight of the defenders of M. so as to strike terror into the enemy. Next he took M. and smote its king and all its inhabitants. M. was in the shephelah or low hilly region (not "valley" as A. V.): xv. 33, 47. El Mughar (Arabic the caves) village probably now represents M., at about eight miles' distance from Ramleh. Josh. xv. 41 names Gederoth, Bethdagon, Naameth, and M. together, corresponding respectively to Kutrah, Beit Dagan, Nameth, and Mughar; Kutrah and Mughar near together, Nyaneh six miles N.E., Beit Dejan 12 miles to the N.

Maktesh=the mortar (the article is in the Heb., showing it is not a proper name). The hollow in Jerusalem where the merchants carried on traffic. The deep valley between the temple and upper city, crowded with merchant bazaars (Grove): Zeph. i. 11. Jerome makes it the valley of Siloam; "howl, ye inhabitants of M., for all the merchant people are cut down." The Tyropeon valley below mount Aera (Rosemaüller). Better (Maurer) Jerusalem itself, embosomed amidst hills. Isa. xxii. 1, "the valley of vision"; Jer. xxii. 1, "O inhabitress of the valley and rock of the plain," doomed to be the scene of its people being as it were pounded in "the mortar" (Prov. xxvii. 22). So Jerusalem is compared to a pot in Ezek. xiv. 3, 6: "set on a pot . . . woo to the bloody city, to the pot whose scum is therein."

Malachi = messenger of Jah, or Jehovah; contracted for Malachijah, as Abi for Abijah (2 Kings xviii. 2; comp. 2 Chron. xxiv. 1). The name is that of an office rather than of a person; it occurs in the sense "My (Jehovah's) messenger" (Mal. iii. 1, comp. Hag. i. 13). M. was Jehovah's last inspired messenger of O. T., announcing the advent of the great Messenger of N. T.; the transition link between the two dispensations, "the skirt and boundary of Christianity," to which is due his abrupt earnestness. Not identical with Ezra, as Chaldee paraphrase represents, for M. is never called a scribe, always a prophet, but Ezra always a scribe, never a prophet. The analogy of the headings of the other prophets favours the view that M. is a proper name. He supported or followed up the governor Nehemiah in the restoration of the national polity civil and religious, as Haggai and Zechariah previously had supported Joshua the highpriest and Zerubbabel the civil governor in building the temple. M. (i. 10, iii. 1-10) presupposes the temple already built. Like Nehemiah (xiii. 5, 15-22, 23-30) he censures the profane and mercenary spirit of the priests (Mal. i. 10; ii. 14-16; iii. 8-10, 5); the people's marriages with foreigners; the non-payment of the tithes (Nehemiah states the cause, the highpriest's alliance with Tobiah the Ammonite and Sanballat); and the rich men's want of sympathy towards the poor. Nehemiah (vi. 7) implies that "prophets" supported him, by his desire, in his reformation.

Date. About 420 B.C. or later will be about the date from the above facts. Thus kingly (Zerubbabel and Nehemiah), priestly (Joshua and Ezra), and prophetic men (Haggai and Zechariah and M.) headed God's people at the earlier and the later stage in the restoration of Jerusalem. The former period was that of building the temple, the later that of restoring the polity and rebuilding the city. The rebuilding of the temple was the theocratic people's first care; the political restoration was secondary. A small colony of 50,000 settled with Joshua and Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 64). These became intermingled with the heathen during the 60 years that elapsed before Ezra (ix. 6-15; Neh. i. 5); "the remnant . . . left in the province are in great affliction and reproach, the wall of Jerusalem is broken down, and the gates burned with fire." A second restoration was therefore needed, to mould the national life into Jewish form, by reestablishing the holy law and the city. This was the work of Ezra and Nehemiah with the aid of M. in about 50 years, ending with the death of M. and Nehemiah, at the close of the fifth century B.C. Hence the "seven weeks" (49 or 50 years) stand by themselves at the beginning of the foretold "seventy weeks" (Dan. ix. 25), to mark the fundamental difference between them, as the last period of O. T. revelation, and the 62 weeks of years that follow without revelation, preceding the final week standing out by itself in unrivalled dignity as Messiah's week. The 70 weeks begin with Artaxerxes' seventh year, 457 B.C., when he allowed Ezra (vii. 1, 6) to go to Jerusalem in accordance with the commandment which then went forth from God. Ezra the priest purified the nation from within of heathenish elements and restored the law; Nehemiah did the outer work of rebuilding the city and restoring the national polity (Aubleren). The time following Nehemiah's second return to Jerusalem from Persia (subsequently to the 32nd year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, Neh. xiii. 6) is the probable date of M.'s prophecies, about 420 B.C. Socrates at Athens was at about the same time awakening that corrupt city to self examination. The Jews were now in Jerusalem (Mal. ii. 11); the Persian "governor" (pechah, pasha, i. 8) was there, the altar (i. 7) and temple rebuilt (ii. 13, iii. 1), the sacrifices and feasts celebrated (i. 13, 14; ii. 3). Nehemiah bore this very title (pechah, Neh. v. 14, xii. 26), and its equivalent "tirshatha" (viii. 2, x. 1, vii. 65; Ezra ii. 63), the prefect of a province less extensive than a satrapy. It is curious that M. is not mentioned in Nehemiah nor Nehemiah in M. But the same evils are sought to be remedied by both: see above; also comp. Mal. ii. 8, "ye have corrupted the covenant of Levi, saith the Lord of hosts," with Neh. xiii. 29, "they have defiled the covenant of the priesthood and of the Levites." Thus the closing chapter of O. T. history is the key of the last of O. T. prophecy.

Divisions. 1. The first two chapters are mainly expostulation; 11., the last two mainly prediction. (1) Charge against Israel for insensibility to God's love, which so distinguished Israel above Edom (Mal. i. 1-5). (2) Against the priests for contemptible offerings, profaning instead of honouring their Master and their Father, unlike Levi of old, who walked with God in a covenant of life and peace, turning many from iniquity, whereas they departed out of the way and caused others to stumble; therefore God will send a curse upon them, making them contemptible, even as they contemned and failed to give glory to His name (i. 6—ii. 9). (3) Reproof of the wrong done to Jewish wives by the foreign marriages. Jehovah being the one common Father of all Israel, putting away an Israelite wife for a foreigner is a wrong done to a sister of the same family (ii. 10-16). Explain ver. 15: "did not He [God] make [us Israelites] one? Yet He had the residue of the Spirit (viz. an inexhaustible fulness of the Spirit for the rest of the world, but that was to be given them by God's first choosing, not one godly seed). And wherefore did He make us the one people? That He might seek a seed of God," to be the repository of the covenant, the stock for Messiah, the witness for God against surrounding polytheism. Repudiation of Jewish wives for foreigners set aside this God's design. 11. (4) In answer to their cavil, "where is the God of judgment?" Messiah's forerunner, followed by the sudden coming of Jehovah Himself the Angel of the covenant (which they had despised) to His temple, is foretold (ii. 17—iv. 6). He shall on the one hand refine the sons of Levi, so that Judah's offering shall be pleasant unto Jehovah; on the other hand He shall be a swift witness against wrong doers, wherefore "return unto Me," instead of "robbing Me of tithes," "prove Me now herewith and I will pour you out a blessing," etc. But still they cavil at God's service bringing no "profit," whilst God's people commune together; so "the day of the Lord" cometh, consuming to the proud scorers, but with healing beams of the Sun of righteousness to fearers of God's name; ushered in by the forerunner Elijah, preaching a return to the law of Moses, and to the piety of Israel's forefathers, lest Jehovah come and smite the earth with a curse.

Canonicitv. Established by N.T. quotations (Matt. xi. 10, xvii. 12; Mark i. 2, ix. 11, 12; Luke i. 17; Rom. ix. 13). The "incense and pure offering from the rising to the setting of the sun" points on to the spiritual sacrifices of self devotion, prayer, and praise under the gospel, based on the once for all completed sacrifice of Messiah (Ps. exl. 2; Rev. viii. 3; Heb. xiii. 10, 15, 16; Rom. xii. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 5, 12); in every place (John iv. 21-24, 1 Tim. ii. 8).

Style. Bold and abrupt, yet with the smoothness of a reasoner rather than a poet, at the same time modelled after the old prophets.

Malcham=their king. Another form of Milcom and Moloch, the idol of Moab and Ammon (Zeph. i. 5, Jer. xlix. 1-3, Amos i. 15).

Malchiah. 1. 1 Chron. vi. 40. 2. Ezra x. 25. 3. Ezra x. 31. 4. Neh. viii. 14. 5. Neh. iii. 31. 6. Neh. viii. 4. 7. Neh. xi. 12, Jer. xxxviii. 1. 8. Son of Hammelech, or "of the king" into whose dungeon Jeremiah was cast (xxxviii. 6). Jerahmeel also is called "son of Hammelech" or "the king" (Jer. xxxvi. 26), and Joash (1 Kings xxii. 26), and Maa-seiah (2 Chron. xxviii. 7). Therefore the title is official, one of the royal family, exercising some of the royal prerogative.

Malchiel. Num. xxvi. 43. Father, i.e. founder, of Birzavith (1 Chron. vii. 31).

Malchijah. 1. [See MALCHIAH.] 1 Chron. xxiv. 9. 2. Neh. xii. 42.

Malchiram. Son of king Jeconiah (1 Chron. iii. 18).

Malchishua = my king (gives) assistance. Second or third of Saul's sons (1 Sam. xiv. 49; 1 Chron. viii. 33, ix. 39). Fell at Gilboa (1 Sam. xxxi. 2).

Malchus = Malchiel in O.T. (1 Chron. vi. 44, Neh. x. 4). The assault by Peter on the highpriest's servant (slave), when in the act of arresting Jesus, is given by all the evangelists, but the name of the servant by John only (xviii. 10, 15, 16). Naturally so, for John was "known to the highpriest" and his household, so that he procured admission from her that kept the door, for his close colleague Peter, and was able to state, what the other evangelists omit, that another servant who charged Peter with being Jesus' disciple "was his kinsman whose ear Peter cut off."

Another incidental propriety confirming genuineness is, Jesus says to Pilate, "if My kingdom were of this world then would My servants fight"; yet none charged Him, not even M.'s kinsman who was near, with the violence which Peter had used to M. Why? Because Jesus by a touch had healed him (Luke xxii. 51), and it would have wonderfully tended to elevate Jesus as one more than human in love and in power, in Pilate's estimation, had they charged Him with Peter's act. M. was Caiaphas the highpriest's own servant, not a minister or apparitor of the council. There were but two swords in the disciples' hands (Luke xxii. 38); whilst the holder of one was waiting for Christ's reply to their question, "Lord, shall we smite with the sword?" the holder of the other, Peter, in the same spirit as in Matt. xvi. 22, smote with the weapon of the flesh. What a narrow escape Peter providentially had of a malefactor's and a murderer's end! The sheath is the place for the Christian's sword, except as the judicial minister of God's wrath upon evil doers (Rom. xiii. 4). Seeing the coming stroke M. threw his head to the left, so as to expose the right ear more than the other. Our Lord when His enemies held His hands said to them (not to the disciples), "suffer Me thus far," i.e. leave Me free till I have healed him. Luke (xxii. 51) alone records this. Matthew and Mark mention the previous laying hold of Him; Luke does not, but in undesigned coincidence, marking truthfulness, implies it here. Jesus used His last moment of liberty in touching and healing afflicted man. The healing by a "touch" implies that the ear hung to its place by a small portion of flesh. Luke, the physician, appropriately is the only one who records the healing. This was Jesus' last miracle relieving human suffering. The hands so often put forth to bless and to cure were thenceforth bound and stretched on the cross, that form of His ministry in the flesh ceasing for ever.

Mallothi. 1 Chron. xxv. 4, 26.

Mallows: malluach. From melach, salt. Therefore rather "saltwort," orache, Atriplex halimus, used as a salad; found in "waste and desolate wildernesses" (Job xxx. 4). The lowest, complains the patriarch, deride me; as the rude Bedouins of the desert, "who cut up saltwort among the bushes (or 'hedges'), and the broom roots (vetem) for their meat." It is white, without thorns, growing near the sea, its leaves broader and smoother than the olive; it is used for hedges (Dioscorides). Four or five feet high, with thick branches, small purple flowers, sour tasting leaves; of the natural order Chenopodiaceae.

Malluch. 1. 1 Chron. vi. 44. 2. Ezra x. 29. 3. Ezra x. 32. 4. Neh. x. 4. 5. Neh. x. 27. 6. Neh. xii. 2.

Mammon. Matt. vi. 24, Luke xvi. 9. A Punic (Augustine) or Syriac (Jerome) word for riches. Personified as a heart idol.

Manre. An ancient Amorite. Gen. xiii. 18, "the plain (rather the oaks or terebinths) of M."; xiv. 13, 24, brother of Esheol, friend and ally of Abraham. The chieftain had planted the terebinths, or was associated with them as his tenting place; so "the oak of Deborah" (Jud. iv. 5). M. was less than a mile from Hebron (Josephus, B. J. iv. 9, § 7); but Robinson makes it two Roman miles off, now the hill er Rameh. Constantine, to suppress the superstitious veneration to the terebinths, erected a basilica or church on the spot. That it was on an elevation appears from the record that Machpelah faces it (Gen. xxiii. 17-19, xxv. 9). Abram resided under the oak grove shade in the interval between his stay at Bethel and at Beersheba (xiii. 18, xviii. 1, xx. 1, xxi. 31). If Machpelah be on the N.E. side of the Hebron valley, then M. as "facing it" must have been on the opposite slope, where the governor's house now is. [See HEBRON.]

Man. [See ADAM, CIVILIZATION, CREATION.] Heb. "Adam," from a root "ruddy" or fair, a generic term. "Ish," man noble and brave, "Geber," a mighty man, warlike hero, from gabar to be strong. "Enosh" (from anash, sick, diseased), wretched man: "what is wretched man (enosh) that Thou shouldest be mindful of him?" (Ps. viii. 4, Job xv. 14). "Methum," mortal men; Isa. xli. 14, "fear not . . . ye men (mortal) few and feeble though ye be, (methum) of Israel." In addition to the proofs given in the above articles that man's civilization came from God at the first, is the fact that no creature is so helpless as man in his infancy. The instincts of lower animals are perfect at first, the new born lamb turns at once from the mother's breast to the grass; but by man alone are the wants of the infant, bodily and mental, supplied until he is old enough to provide for himself. Therefore if Adam had come into the world as a child he could not have lived in it. Not by the natural law of evolution, but by the Creator's special interposition, man came into the world, the priest of nature, to interpret her inarticulate language and offer conscious adoration before God. As Adam's incarnation was the crowning miracle of nature, so Christ's incarnation is the crowning miracle of grace; He represents man before God, as man represents nature, not by ordinary descent but by the extraordinary operation of the Holy Ghost. Not a full grown man as Adam; but, in order to identify Himself with our weakness, a helpless infant.

Manaen = Menahem, consoler (2 Kings xv. 17). One of the teachers and prophets at Antioch when Saul and Barnabas were "separated" to missionary work, A.D. 44 (Acts xiii. 1-3). Brought up with Herod Antipas, who beheaded John Baptist. Of the six named, four were to stay at Antioch, two to itinerate. Home work is no excuse for neglecting Christ's missionary command; missionary work is no plea for neglecting home duties. It was common for persons of rank to associate other children with their own, to share their studies and amusements, and thereby to promote emulation. Herod adopted the usage from the Romans, whom he was fond of imitating. Or the Gr. (stutrophos) may mean "foster brother," M.'s mother being thus Herod's nurse. As Archelaus was brought up with Herod Antipas at Rome, and M. is mentioned in this relation with Antipas alone, perhaps "foster brother" is the true sense; he may have been brought up with Antipas also. Herod the Great favoured highly a Manaen an Essene, who in early life foretold Herod's royal greatness (Josephus, Ant. xv. 10, § 5); possibly our M. was son of that Manaen and adopted by Herod the Great, and made a companion to one of his sons. [See CRUZA, another connecting link between Christ and Herod Antipas.] M. probably personally knew and was a secret disciple of the Lord. How naturally Herod turned to his "servants" for information as to Christ (Matt. xiv. 1)!

Manahath. 1. Gen. xxxvi. 23. Ptolemy (v. 17, § 3) mentions Many-chiates W. of Petra. 2. 1 Chron. viii. 6-8: "the heads of the fathers of Geba, they removed them (led them captive, Keil) to M.," "they," viz. Naaman, Ahiah, and Gera, and of these three Gera in particular, "he removed them" (led them captive). M. is connected possibly with the Manahethites (ii. 52, 54) in Judah.

Manasseh = causing to forget. Joseph's firstborn by Asenath, whose birth "made him forget all his toil and all (the sorrow he endured through) his father's house" (Gen. xli. 51). Jacob adopted them as his own, though "born in Egypt" and by an alien to Israel (xlviii. 5, 9); "as Reuben and Simeon they shall be mine," i.e. patriarchal heads of tribes, as Jacob's immediate sons were; M. and Ephraim gave their names to separate tribes. Joseph had the portion of the firstborn by having the double portion, i.e. two tribal divisions assigned to his sons (1 Chron. v. 1, 2; comp. Deut. xxi. 17). When Joseph took Ephraim in his right toward Israel's left hand, and M. in his left toward Israel's right hand, Israel put his right upon Ephraim the younger, and his left upon M. wittingly, notwithstanding Joseph's remonstrance. Their name should be a formula of blessing, "God make thee as Ephraim and M.," and they should "grow as fishes do increase" (a natural image near the fish-abounding Nile): Gen. xlviii. 16, 20. The term "thousands" is especially applied to M. (Deut. xxxiii. 17, Jud. vi. 15 marg.). M.'s son by an Aramitess (Syrian) eucubine, Machir, had children "borne upon Joseph's knees" (Gen. 1. 23), i.e. adopted as his from their birth.

M., Ephraim, and Benjamin, the three sprung from Rachel, marched W. of the tabernacle. Moses in his last blessing (Deut. xxxiii. 13-17) gives Joseph (i.e. Ephraim and M.) the "precious things of the earth" by "the good will of Him that dwelt in the bush," in contrast to Joseph's past "separation from his brethren," his horns like the two of the wild bull (not "unicorn"), viz. "the ten thousands of Ephraim and the thousands of M. shall push," etc. At Sinai M. numbered 32,200 (Num. 1. 10, 35; ii. 20, 21; vii. 54-59), Ephraim 40,500. But 40 years later, at Jordan, M. 52,700, Ephraim 32,500 (Num. xxvi. 34-37). M. here resumes his place as firstborn (his having two portions of Canaan, one on each side of Jordan, being also a kind of privilege of the firstborn), probably as having been foremost in the conquest of Gilead, the most inalienable portion of Palestine, as Lejah (asylum) the modern name of Argob implies; their inheritance was northern Gilead, Argob, and Bashan (Num. xxxii. 39-42; Deut. iii. 4, 13-15; Josh. xvii. 1). Gideon, the greatest of the judges, and one whose son all but established hereditary monarchy in their line, and Jephthah, were samples of their warriors. They advanced from Bashan northwards to the base of mount Hermon (1 Chron. v. 23). When David was crowned at Hebron western M. sent 18,000, eastern M. with Gad and Reuben 120,000 armed men (xii. 31, 37). Moreover, a prince of each of the two sections of M. stands on a level with the princes of entire tribes (xxvii. 20, 21). But because of apostasy from the God of their fathers to the gods of the people whom He destroyed before them, M. was first cut short by the Syrian Hazael (2 Kings x. 32), then God stirred up the spirit of Pul and of Tiglath Pileser of Assyria to carry the eastern half of M., Reuben, and Gad captives to Halah, Habor, Hara, and the river Gozan (1 Chron. v. 25, 26).

M. failed to occupy all the territory assigned to them. "Geshur and Aram (Syria) took the 23 towns of Jair and the 37 of Kenath and her daughters, 60 in all, from them"; so 1 Chron. ii. 23 ought to be transl. In Jud. x. 4 we find Jair the judge in possession of 30 of them, recovered from the enemy. Reuben, Gad, and M. successfully warred with and dispossessed the Hagarites with Jotun, Nephtish, and Nodab (1 Chron. v. 18-22). The western half of M.

failed for long to dispossess completely the Canaanites (Jud. i. 27, Josh. xvii. 11, 12). On their complaining that but one portion had been allotted to them, and that the Canaanite chariots prevented their occupying the Esdraelon and Jordan plains, Joshua advised them to go into the wooded mountain, probably Carmel. Accordingly their towns Taanach, Megiddo, Ibleam, and Endor are in the region of Carmel, within the allotments of other tribes. Bethshean was in the hollow of the Ghôr or Jordan valley, the connecting point between the eastern and the western M.

Kerr shows that the land of M., instead of crossing the country from E. to W., occupied only half that space, and lay along the sea to the W., bounded on the E. by the range of mount Carmel. Josh. xvii. 7 defines its coast. En Tappuah is Atuf. The town was given to Ephraim, the land N. of it was M.'s. Conder thinks that Asher was separated from M. by Zebulun, and that the Asher in Josh. xvii. 10 is Asher-ham-Michmethah (now Es Sirah) at the N.W. corner of Ephraim. Issachar lay to the E. of Ephraim and M., along the entire line of the Jordan, from the sea of Chinneroth to the wady Kelt not far from the Salt Sea: thus it was a triangle, its apex at Jericho, its base N. of the Jezreel plain (Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., Jan. 1877, p. 41-50).

In the declension of the nation Isaiah (ix. 20, 21) foretells that the two sons of Joseph, once so intimately united, should be rent into factions thirsting for one another's blood, "they shall eat every man the flesh of his own arm, M. Ephraim, and Ephraim M., and they together against Judah." After the fall of the ten tribes the 80th Psalm expresses Judah's prayer of sympathy for her sister: "give ear, O Shepherd of Israel, Thou that leadest Joseph like a flock. . . . Before Ephraim and Benjamin and M. (advancing at their head, as formerly in the pillar of cloud in the wilderness) . . . come and save us." The book of Numbers (ii. 17-24) represents these three kindred tribes together marching after the ark; so in the Psalms. Many out of M. were among the penitents coming southwards to Judah, and joining in the spiritual revivals under Asa (2 Chron. xv. 9), Hezekiah (xxx. 1, 10, 11, 18; xxxi. 1), and Josiah (xxxiv. 6-9).

Manasseh. 1. Jud. xviii. 30. Father of Gershom and grandfather of the Levite Jonathan, priest of the Danite graven image taken from Micah. So the Masoretic text but with the n of "Ma-n-asseh" suspended above. The true reading is "Moses." The Talmud (Baba Bathr. f. 109 b.) conjecturing says: "because he did the deeds of M. (2 Kings xxi.), Hezekiah's idolatrous son, who also made the graven image in the temple, Scripture assigns him (Jonathan) to the family of M. though he was a son of Moses." So Rabbabar bar Channa says: "the sacred author avoided calling Gershom son of Moses because it would have been ignominious to Moses to have had an ungodly son; he calls him son of M. raising the n above the line that it might be either inserted or omitted . . . to show that he was son of M. in impiety, of Moses by descent." Jonathan was probably grandson (as "son" often means, or descendant) of Gershom, for the son of Gershom was not a "young man" (Jud. xvii. 7) but old shortly after the death of Joshua, the earliest date of the last five chapters of Judges, which no doubt refer to earlier events than those after which they are placed. [See JUDGES.] 2. Ezra x. 30. 3. Ezra x. 33.

4. The son born to Hezekiah, subsequently to that severe sickness in which the king's bitterest sorrow was that he was likely to die without leaving an heir. His birth was 12 years before Hezekiah's death, 710 B.C. (2 Kings xxi. 1, xx. 3; in ver. 18 Isaiah spoke of Hezekiah's children as yet to be born.) His mother HEPHZIBAH [see] was probably a godly woman (comp. Isa. lxii. 4, 5), daughter of one of the princes at Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. x. 3, § 1). Isaiah made her name (my delight is in her) a type of Jerusalem, as Hezekiah was type of Messiah (Isa. xxxii. 1). The name "Manasseh" embodied Hezekiah's cherished policy to take advantage of Shalmaneser's overthrow of the rival northern kingdom, and gather round him the remnant left and attach them to the one national divinely sanctioned worship at Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxx. 6). His proclamation had the desired effect upon "divers of Asher, Manasseh, and Zebulun" (ver. 18, xxxi. 1); they came to the passover at Jerusalem, and joined in breaking the idols in their own country. The name M. (meaning forgetting) given to the heir of the throne was a pledge of amnesty of past discords between Israel and Judah, and a bond of union between his crown and the northern people, a leading tribe of whom bore the name. M.'s reign was the longest of the reigns of Judah's kings, 55 years (2 Kings xxi. 1-18; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 1-20). Hezekiah had allied himself with Babylon against Assyria, toward the close of his reign, and had displayed his treasures to show his power to the Babylonian ambassadors (2 Kings xx. 12-19; Isa. xxxix.; 2 Chron. xxxii. 31). M. inherited this legacy of ambition and close union with Babylon which Isaiah condemned. Then the idolatry which had been checked, not stifled (Isa. lvi. 3, 4), in Hezekiah's reign broke out again. The abominations of various lands, especially of Babylon, were brought together at Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxxiii.), "altars for Baalim, groves (ashereth), and altars for the host of heaven, in the two courts of the Lord's house." "He caused too his children to pass through the fire in the valley of the son of Hinnom," the old Moloch worship of Ammon; and in imitation of the Babylonians "observed times, enchantments, witchcraft, and dealt with a familiar spirit and wizards." A religion of sensuous intoxication reigned on all sides. He made a graven image of the Asheerah (grove, the obscene symbol of the phallic worship), for which women dedicated to impurity wore hangings in Jehovah's house! (2 Kings xxi. 7.) Sodomites' (que-deeshim, "consecrated men") houses stood high to Jehovah's house, for the vilest purposes in the name of religion (xxiii. 7). Jehovah's altar was east down (2 Chron. xxxiii. 16), the ark was displaced (xxv. 3), the sabbath, the weekly witness for God, was ignored (Isa. lvi. 2, lviii. 13). Then Jehovah spake by the prophets: "Behold, I am bringing such evil upon Jerusalem and Judah that whosoever heareth it both his ears shall tingle, and I will stretch over Jerusalem the line of Samaria and the plummet of the house of Ahab (i.e. I will destroy it as I did Samaria and Ahab), and I will wipe Jerusalem as a man wipeth a dish, turning it upside down," so as not to leave a drop in it: complete destruction. Tradition represents M. as having sawed Isaiah in sunder for his faithful protest (Heb. xi. 37). Josephus (Ant. x. 3, § 1) says M. slew all the righteous and the prophets day by day, so that Jerusalem flowed with blood. Isaiah (lvii. 1-4, etc.) alludes also to the "mockings" of which the godly "had trial" (Heb. xi. 36). The innocent blood thus shed was what the Lord would not pardon the nation, though He accepted M. on repentance and honoured the godly Josiah (2 Kings xxii. 26, xxiv. 4; Jer. xv. 4).

Judgment at last overtook M.; he would not hear the word, he must hear the rod. Babylon, the occasion of his sin, was the scene of his punishment. The captain of the Assyrian king Esarhaddon's (see Ezra iv. 2, 10; 2 Kings xvii. 24) host, having first crushed the revolt of the Babylonian Merodach Baladan, next took his ally M. "among the thorns," chochim, (rather "with hooks"; an image from the ring passed through the noses of wild beasts to subdue and lead them; so 2 Kings xix. 28, Ezek. xxix. 4), and carried him to Babylon. In affliction he besought the Lord his God (comp. Ps. cxix. 67, 71, 75). The monuments mention "Minasi" (Manasseh) the king of Judah among Esarhaddon's tributaries. Other Assyrian kings governed Babylon by viceroys, but he, like his grandfather Sargon, took the title of its "king," and built a palace and held his court there. A Babylonian tablet was discovered dated by the year of his reign. The undesigned coincidence with secular monuments, whereby Scripture records he brought M. to Babylon (where we might have expected Nineveh), confirms its truth. The omission from 2 Kings xxi. of M.'s repentance is due to its having no lasting result so far as the kingdom was concerned. His abolition of outward idolatry did not convert the people, and at his death Amon restored it. Esarhaddon's Babylonian reign was 680-667 B.C.; 676 is fixed on as the date of M.'s captivity, the 22nd year of his reign. M. "humbled himself greatly" (1 Pet. v. 6) before the God of his fathers and prayed unto Him, and He was intreated of him and brought him again to Jerusalem. Then M. knew that the Lord He is God." This illustrates the exceeding riches of God's grace to the vilest (1 Tim. i. 15, 16). The benefit of sanctified affliction, the efficacy of self-abasing suppliant prayer, both these teach experimental knowledge of God (Ps. ix. 16). M. on his restoration built a wall outside the city of David, W. of Gilhon, even to the entering in of "the fish gate" (Zeph. i. 10 alludes to this), compassing about Ophel. He took away the strange gods and idol out of Jehovah's house, and all the altars in the mount of the house of Jehovah and in Jerusalem, and repaired Jehovah's altar, and commanded Judah to serve Jehovah. The people still sacrificed in the high places, but to Jehovah. The book of the law was as yet a hidden book (2 Chron. xxiv. 14). He put captains in Judah's fenced cities to guard against Assyria on one side, Egypt on the other. He was buried in his own house (2 Kings xxi. 18) in the garden of Uzza, as not being counted worthy of sepulture among the kings of David's house. Isaiah and Habakkuk closed their prophesying in his reign; Jeremiah and Zephaniah were but youths in it. Infidelity resulted from the confused polytheism introduced, and from the cutting off of all the faithful (Zeph. i. 12). "His prayer and the words of the seers to him were written in the book of the kings of Israel"; while special accounts of his prayer "and how God was intreated, all his sins . . . before he was humbled . . . were written among the sayings of the seers" (Keil makes it Hozai a prophet: 2 Chron. xxxiii. 18, 19). Amon succeeded M. "The Prayer of M." in the Apocrypha was rejected from the canon even by the Council of Trent. His recording his own shame and repentance and God's grace to him (though not preserved to us) evidences the reality and depth of his change of heart (Is. lxvi. 16, John iv. 29, Mark v. 19).

Manassites. Jud. xii. 4, 5. Transl. for "which were escaped," fugitives, as in ver. 4; "you Gileadites with Jephthah are Ephraimite fugitives in the midst of the noble tribes Ephraim and Manasseh." The Gileadites paid them in their own coin, turning Ephraim's taunt upon themselves, when the Ephraimites as fugitives begged the Gileadites who had taken the Jordan fords to let them go over.

Mandrakes. The Atropi mandragora, of the order Solanaceæ, allied to the deadly nightshade (Atropa belladonna); a stupefying narcotic with broad dark green leaves, flowers purple, and green apples which become pale yellow when ripe, with a tuberous bifid (forked) root. Still found ripe in wheat harvest (May) on the lower parts of Lebanon and Hermon (Gen. xxx. 14). The apples produce dizziness and exaltation. The ancients believed them calculated to produce fecundity. Their Heb. name, dudaim, "love apples," accords with their being used as philtres to conciliate love; Rachel had this superstitious notion (Gen. xxx. 14-17). The colour is too strong to be agreeable to Europeans, but orientals value strongly smelling things; Dioscorides calls the apples "sweet scented." S. of Sol. vii. 13, "the mandrakes give a smell." The root was fancied to resemble man, and to form a potent magical spell, and to emit a human groan on being torn from the ground!

Manger. Phatne only in Luke ii. 7, 12, 16, where the infant Jesus was laid, xiii. 15 "the stall." The open courtyard attached to the inn or khan, with arcades around and terraces over them. However there are limestone caverns in the narrow long grey hill on which stands Bethlehem; and Justin Martyr, born at Sichem, only 40 miles off, A.D. 103, states that "Joseph lodged in a cave near Bethlehem." The "manger" was a crib in a stable or lower enclosure (which was possibly a cave as Justin Martyr says) attached to the inn [see] or khan. The inn had apartments or cells above for travellers, and stalls for the cattle below. The upper platform, reached by steps, was probably occupied by the inn and its occupants; the lower level, from which the steps arose, was usually appropriated to cattle and goats, and on this occasion was used by Joseph and Mary on account of the crowded state of the regular inn or khan. Early Christian artists represent the scene of the nativity as an open courtyard with a crib or long trough.

Manna. There is a connection between the natural manna and the supernatural. The natural is the sweet juice of the tarfa, a kind of tamarisk. It exudes in May for about six weeks from the trunk and branches in hot weather, and forms small round and white grains. It retains its consistency in cool weather, but melts with heat.

TAMARISK

It is gathered from the twigs or from the fallen leaves. The Arabs, after boiling and straining, use it as honey with bread. The colour is a greyish yellow, the taste sweet and aromatic. Ehrenberg says it is produced by an insect's puncture. It abounds in rainy seasons, some years it ceases. About 600 or 700 pounds is the present produce of a year. The region wady Glarandel (Elim) and Sinai, the wady Sheich, and some other parts of the peninsula, are the places where it is found. The name is still its Arabic designation, and is read on the Egyptian monuments (mennu, mennu hut "white manna"). Gesenius derives it from manah "to apportion." The supernatural character of the manna of Exodus at the same time appears.

MANDRAKE

(1) It was found not under the tamarisk, but on the surface of the wilderness, after the morning dew had disappeared. (2) The quantity gathered in a single day exceeded the present produce of a year. (3) It ceased on the sabbath. (4) Its properties were distinct; it could be ground and baked as meal, it was not a mere condiment but nutritious as bread. (5) It was found not merely where it still is, but Israel's whole way to Canaan and not merely for a month or two each year, but all the year round. The miracle has all the conditions and characteristics of Divine interpositions. (1) A necessity, for Israel could not otherwise have been sustained in the wilderness. (2) A Divine purpose, namely to preserve God's peculiar people on which His whole providential government and man's salvation depended. (3) Harmony between the natural and the supernatural; God fed them, not with the food of other regions, but with that of the district. The local colouring is marked. Moses the writer could neither have been deceived as to the fact, nor could have deceived contemporaries and eye witnesses. (Speaker's Comm.)

The Scripture allusions to it are in Exod. xvi. 14-36, Num. xi. 7-9, Deut. vii. 3-16, Josh. v. 12, Ps. lxxviii. 24, 25 ("angels' food"; not as if angels ate food, but food from the habitation of angels, heaven, a directly miraculous gift), Matt. iv. 4, John vi. 31-50, 1 Cor. x. 3. The manna was a "small round thing as the hoar frost on the ground," falling with the dew on the camp at night. They gathered it early every morning before the sun melted it. If laid by for any following day except the sabbath it bred worms and stank. It was like coriander seed and bdellium, white, and its taste as the taste of fresh oil, like waters made with honey (Num. xi. 7-9). Israel subsisted on it for 40 years; it suddenly ceased when they got the first new corn of Canaan. Vulg., LXX., and Josephus (Ant. iii. 1, § 6) derive manna from Israel's question to one another, man hu, "what is this?" for they knew not what it was. God "gave it to His beloved (in) sleep" (Ps. cxxvii. 2), so the sense and context require. Israel each morning, in awaking, found it already provided without toil. Such is the gospel, the gift of grace, not the fruit of works; free to all, and needed by high and low as indispensable for true life. To commemorate Israel's living on omers or tenth deals of manna one omer was put into a golden pot and preserved for many generations beside the ark. Each was to gather according to his eating, an omer apiece for each in his tent, a command testing their obedience, in which some failed, gathering more but gaining nought by it, for however much he gathered, on measuring it in his tent he found he had only as much as he needed for his family; type of Christian charity, which is to make the superfluity of some supply the needs of others, "that there may be equality"

(2 Cor. viii. 14, 15); "our luxuries should yield to our neighbour's comforts, and our comforts to his necessities" (John Howard). The manna typifies Christ. (1) It falls from above (John vi. 32, etc.) as the dew (Ps. ex. 3, Mic. v. 7) round the camp, i.e. the visible church, and nowhere else; the gift of God for which we toil not (John vi. 28, 29); when we were without merit or strength (Rom. v. 6, 8). (2) It was gathered early; so we, before the world's heat of excitement melt away the good of God's gift to us (Ps. lxxiii. 1; Hos. v. 15, vi. 4; Matt. xiii. 6). (3) A double portion must be gathered for the sabbath. (4) It was ground in the mill, as Christ was "bruised" for us to become our "bread of life." (5) Sweet as honey to the taste (Ps. cxxiv. 8, cxix. 103; 1 Pet. i. 3). (6) It must be gathered "day by day," fresh each day; so to-day's grace will not suffice for to-morrow (1 Kings viii. 59 marg., Matt. vi. 11, Luke xi. 3). Hoarded up it putrefied; so gospel doctrine laid up for speculation, not received in love and digested as spiritual food, becomes a savour of death not life (1 Cor. viii. 1). (7) To the carnal it was "dry" food though really like "fresh oil" (Num. xi. 6, 8; xxi. 5); so the gospel to the worldly who long for fleshly pleasures of Egypt, but to the spiritual it is full of the rich savour of the Holy Spirit (2 Cor. ii. 14-16). (8) Its preservation in the golden pot in the holiest typifies Jesus, now in the heavenly holiest place, where He gives of the hidden manna to him that overcometh (Rev. ii. 17); He is the manna hidden from the world but revealed to the believer, who has now a foretaste of His preciousness; like the incorruptible manna in the sanctuary, the spiritual food offered to all who reject the world's dainties for Christ is everlasting, an incorruptible body, and life in Christ at the resurrection. (9) The manna continued with Israel throughout their wilderness journey; so Christ with His people here (Matt. xxviii. 19). (10) It ceases when they gain the promised rest, for faith then gives place to sight and the wilderness manna to the fruit of the tree of life in the midst of the paradise of God (Rev. ii. 7, xxii. 2, 14).

Manoah. A Danite of Zorah, father of Samson (Jud. xiii.). The Angel of Jehovah appeared unto his wife, announcing that a son should be born to her, to be reared as a Nazarite. On her telling M. he entreated Jehovah to send again "the man of God" (as M. supposed him to be) to "teach what they should do unto the child to be born." God graciously granted his wish, and he asked the Angel, "how shall we order the child, and how shall we do unto him?" So parents ought to seek God's direction, how to rear their children for God. The Angel directed him, and all parents: "of all that I said . . . beware, . . . all that I commanded . . . observe" (comp. John ii. 5). M. begged Him to stay till he got ready a kid. The Divine Angel told him (as M. thought He was a man and knew not He was the Angel of Jehovah, and He being jealous for God's honour would not accept it as man; comp. Mark x. 18) he must offer his burnt offering to Jehovah. M. then asked His name. The Angel replied, "it is secret" ("wonderful," marg.; Isa. ix. 6); comp. Gen. xxxii. 29, Exod. xxxiv. 5-7; it is a secret known to God's children (Ps. xxv. 14; Rev. ii. 17, iii. 12). "He did wondrously" according to His name, for He made a flame rise from the rock to consume the offering and (comp. Jud. vi. 21) ascended in the flame; comp. Mark iv. 41, v. 42, vii. 37, Acts i. 9, John iii. 13. M. feared he should die, as having seen God (Exod. xxxiii. 20). His wife with greater spiritual instinct replied: "if Jehovah were pleased to kill us, He would not have received a burnt offering at our hands, neither would He have showed us all these things, nor as at this time have told us such things." M. and his wife remonstrated with Samson on choosing a Philistine as his wife (Jud. xiv. 2, 3); but they accompanied him to the marriage feast at Timnath. M. probably died before his son; since not M. but Samson's brothers brought Samson's body to the tomb between Zorah and Eshtaol.

Manslayer. [See CITIES OF REFUGE, AND BLOOD, AVENGING OF.]

Mantle. (1) Senikah, the thick plaid or rug wherewith Jael covered Sisera (Jud. iv. 18). (2) The meil, the priestly robe which the child Samuel's mother made for him, a miniature of his robe in later life (1 Sam. ii. 19, xv. 27, xxviii. 14). (3) Maatpaph (Isa. iii. 22), a lady's outer full tunic, with sleeves, reaching to the feet. (4) Addereth, Elijah the prophet's sole mantle except the leathern girdle about his loins (1 Kings xix. 13, 19); the LXX. render it "sheepskin." The recognised dress of a prophet (Zech. xiii. 4, "a rough garment" of prophets).

Maach. 1 Sam. xxvii. 2; Maachah 1 Kings ii. 30.

Maon. 1. A city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 55). In the waste pasture ("wilderness") of M. in the plain S. of Jeshimon, at the hill of Hachilah, David narrowly escaped Saul through the Ziphites' treachery (1 Sam. xxiii. 19, 24, 25). Saul was on one side of the mountain, David on the other, when a message announcing a Philistine invasion called Saul away; the rock that separated the pursuer and the pursued was called "Sela-hammahleloth," the rock of divisions. Nabal's flocks fed on the pastures of M. and the adjoining Carmel (1 Sam. xxv. 2). He conducted his sheepshearing at Carmel, because he was there near good water in the plain between Hebron and Carmel, the finest plain in the hill country of Judah, that which Aelsah desired of Caleb her father; for she wanted, besides the arid south land (Negeb), "springs of water," and received this "field" or cultivated plain with "upper and nether springs." Now Main, a conical hill, seven miles S. of Hebron. On the same level as

Tell Zif; the passage 1 Sam. xxiii. 24, 25, refers to the wady el War, "valley of rocks," a rugged place having its head close to Tell Main; the long ridges running E. to the Dead Sea are a fit site for David's escape. (Coudar, Pal. Expl.)

2. In Jud. x. 12, "the Moabites did oppress you," the Mehanim of 2 Chron. xxvi. 7 may be meant, the inhabitants of Maan (transl. for "habitations," 1 Chron. iv. 41, Meunites, who were strangers there), a city near Petra, E. of wady Musa. Else a "M." tribe, of which M. city was a remnant, near Amalek, dispossessed by Caleb, may have oppressed Israel subsequently under the judges. But thus all notice of Israel's great oppressor Midian would be omitted; and LXX. in both the best MSS. read for "the Moabites" in Jud. x. 12 "Midian." No Heb. MS. existing supports this. In 2 Chron. xx. 1, "with them (other) beside the Ammonites," or as others transl. "Others who dwell aside from (i.e. beyond) the Ammonites," viz. tribes in the Syro-Arabian desert bordering upon Ammon on the N. and E.; comp. ver. 2 (Keil). But ver. 10, 22, mentioning inhabitants of mount Seir or Edom among the invaders, favour Hiller's alteration of Meche'amonim into Meche'monim, the Moabites of Maan near the Edomite Petra; E. of wady Musa, in the mountainous region W. of the Arabah. The Moabites are mentioned instead of the Edomites, to imply that not only Edomites but tribes from other parts of mount Seir joined the invasion. The Moabites probably were of non Edomite origin. 3. Descendant of Caleb, son of Shammua, father or founder of Bethzur (1 Chron. ii. 45).

Marah=bitterness. A fountain in the desert of Shur, between the Red Sea and Sinai; Israel reached M. three days after crossing to the Arabian side (Exod. xv. 23, Num. xxxiii. 8). Now Ain Huwarah, 47 miles from Ayun Musa, near the place of crossing the Red Sea. The beneficial effect of the tree cast into the bitter water by God's direction is probably the cause why now this fountain is less bitter than others in the neighbourhood. The fountain rises from a large mound, a whitish petrification, deposited by the water, which seldom flows now; but there are traces of a formerly running stream. The Arabic Huwarah means destruction, analogous to the Heb. bitter. The cross is spiritually the tree which, when cast into life's bitterest waters, sweetens and heals them (Phil. iii. 8; Acts xx. 24, xvi. 23-25, v. 41; Rom. v. 3).

Maralah. A landmark of Zebulun; somewhere on the ridge of Carmel (Keil) (Josh. xix. 11).

Mareshah. 1. A city of the shephelah or low hills of Judah (Josh. xv. 44). Commanding in position; hence fortified by Rehobam after the separation of Israel (2 Chron. xi. 8). Zerah the Ethiopian had reached M. when Asa met and repulsed him (2 Chron. xiv. 9, 10); the ravine (ae) of Zephathah was near. Now Marash; over a Roman mile S.S.W. of Beit Jibrin (Eleuthero-polis), on a gently swelling hill descending from the mountains to the western plain. Eliezer son of Dodavah the prophet was of M. (2 Chron. xx. 37.) Micah plays upon the meaning of M., "I will bring an heir (the Assyrian foe) unto thee, M." (inheritance) (i. 15). Other heirs will supplant us in every inheritance, except heaven. 2. M., father of Hebron (a person, not the city): 1 Chron. ii. 42, where the relative position of the cities M. and Hebron, and their historical relations, forbid our understanding the city as meant. 3. 1 Chron. iv. 21. M. sprung from Shelah, third son of Judah, through Laadah. Probably=M. (1).

Mark, John. Townson conjectures that the young man introduced as fleeing and leaving his linen robe, fear overcoming shame (Mark xvi. 51, 52), was Mark himself, on the ground that otherwise we see no reason for its introduction, being unconnected with the context. If the young man was the writer, awakened out of sleep by the noise near his house of men proceeding to seize the Saviour, then going forth hastily in a linen cloth only, and being an eye witness of Jesus' apprehension and suspected of being His follower, though not so then but afterwards, he would look back on this as the most interesting circumstance of his life; though, like John, in humility he describes without mentioning himself by name. [See LAZARUS.] Mark was son of Mary, residing at Jerusalem, and was cousin (not "sister's son," Col. iv. 10) of Barnabas. The relationship accounts for Barnabas' choice of Mark as his companion; also for the house of Mark's mother being the resort of Christians, Barnabas a leader among them attracting others there. The family belonged to Cyprus (Acts iv. 36, xiii. 4, 13); so Barnabas chose Cyprus as the first station on their journey. Mark readily accompanied him as "minister" (hupoeretes, subordinate) to the country of his kindred; but had not the spiritual strength to overcome his Jewish prejudices which he probably imbibed from his spiritual father Peter (Gal. ii. 11-14), so as to accompany Paul the apostle of the Gentiles farther than Perga of Pamphylia, in his first missionary tour to the heathen. Mark returned to Mary his mother at Jerusalem; he ought to have remembered Jesus' words (Matt. x. 37). Paul therefore (because "he went not with them to the work," for his accompanying them to his native Cyprus was his own pleasure rather than zeal for pure missionary "work") rejected him on his second missionary journey (Acts xv. 37-39). This caused a temporary alienation between Paul and Barnabas. The latter (realizing his name, "son of consolation") took Mark again to Cyprus, like a tender father in Christ bearing with the younger disciple's infirmity, until by grace he should become stronger in faith; also influenced by the tie of relationship. Christian love healed the breach, for in Col. iv. 10 Paul implies his restored confidence in Mark ("touching whom ye received commandments, if he come unto you receive him . . . my fellow workers unto the kingdom of God which have been a comfort unto me"). The Colossians, 110 miles distant from Perga, 20 from Pisidia, knew of Mark's past unfaithfulness, and so needed the recommendation to "receive" him as a true evangelist, ignoring the past. So in Philem. 11, 24, he calls Mark "my fellow labourer." Mark was two years later again in Colossae when Paul tells Timothy, then in Asia Minor (2 Tim. iv. 11),

RUINS OF CHRISTIAN CHURCH AT EPHESUS.

"take Mark and bring him with thee, for he is profitable to me for the ministry." A contrast: Demas, once Paul's "fellow labourer," falls away; Mark returns to the right way, and is no longer unprofitable, but "profitable (even to an apostle) for the ministry." By his Latin knowledge he was especially likely to be "profitable" in preaching at Rome where Paul then was when he desired Timothy to "bring Mark." He was Peter's "son" by conversion (probably converted in meeting the apostle in his mother's house at Jerusalem), and was with his spiritual father when 1 Pet. v. 13 was written; his connection with Peter, by an undesignated coincidence which marks genuineness, appears in Acts xii. 12. After Paul's death Mark joined PETER [see] with whom he had been before associated in the writing of the Gospel. Mark was with Paul intending to go to Asia Minor, A.D. 61-63 (Col. iv. 10). In 2 Tim. iv. 11, A.D. 67, Mark was near Ephesus, whence he was about to be taken by Timothy to Rome. It is not likely Peter would have trenched on Paul's field of labour, the churches of Asia Minor, during Paul's lifetime. At his death Mark joined his old father in the faith, Peter, at Babylon. Silvanus or Silas had been substituted for Mark as Paul's companion because of Mark's temporary unfaithfulness; but Mark, now restored, is associated with Silvanus (ver. 12). Paul's companion, in Peter's esteem, as Mark was already reinstated in Paul's esteem. Naturally Mark salutes the Asiatic churches with whom he had been already under Paul spiritually connected. The tradition (Clemens Alex. in Euseb. H. E. vi. 14, Clem. Alex. Hyp. 6) that Mark was Peter's companion at Rome arose from misunderstanding "Babylon" (1 Pet. v. 13) to be Rome. A friendly salutation is not the place where an enigmatical prophetic title would be used (Rev. xvii. 5). Babylon was the centre from which the Asiatic dispersion whom Peter (1 Pet. i. 1, 2) addresses was derived. Alexandria was the final scene of Mark's labours, bishopric, and martyrdom (Nicephorus, H. E. ii. 43).

Mark, Gospel of. [See ACTS, BARNABAS, and GOSPELS.] "John (his

Heb. name) whose surname was Mark" (his Roman name): xii. 12, 25, xiii. 5, 13, xv. 39; Col. iv. 10; 2 Tim. iv. 11; Philom. 24. The Roman supplanted the Jewish name, as Paul did Saul. The change marks his entrance on a new and worldwide ministry. The fathers unanimously testify that Mark was "interpreter" (hermeneutes, Papias in Euseb. H. E. iii. 39; Irenaeus, Har. iii. 1, 10, § 6) to Peter; meaning one who expresses and clothes in words the testimony of another. Papias, or John Presbyter (in Euseb. H. E. iii. 39), states that Mark wrote "not in order," i.e. he wrote "some" leading facts, not a complete history. He attests Mark's accuracy, saying "he committed no error," but made it his aim "to omit nought of what he heard and to state nothing untrue." Peter's name and presence are mentioned on occasions where apparently there is no reason for it; Mark herein wished to bring the apostle forward as his authority (see i. 36, v. 37, xi. 20-26, xiii. 3). There are indications of the author having been a Galilean, which Peter was. Thus Herod the tetrarch is styled "king"; the "lake" (as Luke viii. 22 calls it, for he knew larger seas) is called "the sea of Galilee" (Mark v. 1). Only in vi. 39 the term of dignity, "apostle," is found; in Luke, as writing later, it frequently occurs. Things to their discredit are ingeniously stated by Matthew and Mark (Peter), as we might expect from apostles writing about themselves; but are sparingly introduced by Luke (Matt. xvi. 9; Mark vii. 18, x. 41, xiv. 31, vi. 52, ix. 10, x. 32, the last three not in Matthew). The account of many things is marked by vivid touches suitable to an eye witness only, which Peter was; e.g. vi. 39, "the green grass" in the feeding of the 5000; "the pillow of the ship" (iv. 38); x. 50, "casting away his garment"; xi. 4, "the cult tied by the door without in a place where two ways met." The details of the demon-possessed Gadarene: "no man could bind him, no not with chains, because he had often been bound, and the chains had been plucked asunder by him, and the fetters broken in pieces; neither could any man tame him. And always, night and day, he was in the mountains, crying, and cutting himself with stones," etc. (v. 2-5); and also the wild cry of another reproduced, "Ea" (Ha! not as A. V., "let us alone"), i. 24, Jesus' looks, iii. 5, "He looked round about on them in anger" (34); viii. 33, x. 21, 23, "Jesus beholding loved him," etc.; viii. 12, "He sighed deeply in spirit . . . why doth this generation seek after a sign?" i. 41, "Jesus moved with compassion put forth His hand" touching the leper. All these minute touches, peculiar to him, show his Gospel is no epitome of the others but an independent witness. Mark tells Peter's humble origin (i. 16-20), his connection with Capernaum (ver. 20), that Levi was son of Alphaeus (ii. 14), that Baranages was the title given by Christ to James and John (iii. 17), that the ruler of the synagogue was named Jairus (v. 22), that Jesus was a "carpenter"

(vi. 3), that the Canaanite woman was a Syrophenician (vii. 26). Mark gives Dalmanutha for Magdala (viii. 10, Matt. xv. 39). He names Bartimaeus (Mark x. 46), states that "Jesus would not suffer any to carry any vessel through the temple" (xi. 16), that Simon of Cyrene was father of Alexander and Rufus (xv. 21). Peter would be the probable source of these particulars of Mark's information. Jesus' rebuke of Peter is recorded, but His preeminent praise of him is omitted (viii. 32, 33; comp. Matt. xvi. 18, 23). The account of the thrice denial is full, but "bitterly" is omitted from his repentance (xiv. 72). This is just what we might expect from an apostle writing about himself. The Roman character preponderates, abounding in facts rather than doctrines, and practical details told with straightforward, energetic, manly simplicity. Of passages peculiar to Mark are iii. 20, 21, Christ's friends' attempt on Him; iv. 26-29, parable of the seed growing secretly; vii. 31-37, healing the deaf mute; viii. 22-26, gradual cure of the blind; xi. 11; xiv. 51, 52, xvi. 7, the special message to Peter after the resurrection, to cheer him in his despondency after the thrice denial. Only twice Mark quotes O. T. himself (Mal. iii. 1, Isa. xl. 3), viz. i. 2, 3; but often introduces Christ and those addressing Him quoting it. Sin., Vat., and Alex. MSS. omit xv. 28, which is an interpolation from Luke xxii. 37. Mark alone has "the sabbath was made for man" (ii. 27), and the scribe's admission that love is better than sacrifices (xii. 33); all suited for Gentile readers, to whom Peter, notwithstanding subsequent vacillation, first opened the door (Acts x.). He notices Jesus being "with the wild beasts" when tempted by Satan in the wilderness; contrast Adam tempted amidst the tame animals in Eden (Gen. ii. and iii.). Adam changed paradise into a wilderness, Jesus changes the wilderness into paradise. Other scenes to Peter's honour omitted are Luke v. 1-11, his walking on the sea (Matt. xiv. 28-31), his commission to get the tribute money from the fish (Matt. xvii. 24-27), Jesus' special intercession for him (Luke xxii. 31, 32), his being one of the two sent to prepare the pass-over (ver. 8).

Mark's explanations of Jewish customs and names (Jordan is called a "river"; the Pharisees' fasting and customs, i. 5, ii. 18, vii. 1-4; the Sadducees' tenets, xii. 18; the pass-over described, xiv. 1, 12) which Jews would not need, and the absence of appeals by himself to O. T. prophecy, also of the genealogy and of the term nomos, the Mosiac "law," show he wrote for Gentiles not for Jews. Accordingly he omits the offensive references to the Gentiles found in Matt. vi. 7, 8; x. 5, 6; comp. Mark vi. 7-11; so Luke writing for Gentiles (ix. 1, 5). Moreover Mark (xi. 17) inserts what is not in Matthew or Luke, "My house shall be called of all nations the house of prayer." He abounds in Latinisms, agreeably to the theory that he wrote for Romans, whose terms his and Peter's intimacy with them would dispose him to use: thus centurion for hecatontarchus elsewhere in N. T., paidiothen = a puero, kodrantes = quadrans, denarius = denarius, hulas analon = sal insulsum, speculorum, censos, fragellus (flagello), zestes (sextarius), megistanes = magnates, legion = legio. The explanation of a Gr. term aule by the Latin praetorium (xv. 16) could only be for Roman readers.

Style. Unusual Gr. expressions occur: erapiao, episuntrechcin, pistike, eneleo, ephe, prochebe murisoi, alalos, enankalizethai. Diminutives abound, thuyatrimon, korasion, otaron, kunaria. He employs as the phrase most characteristic of his Gospel euthus, "straightway," "immediately," 41 times. His use of the present tense for the past gives vivid present reality to his pictures. He details minutely localities, times, and numbers. He introduces persons speaking directly. He is often abrupt as he is graphic, e.g. chap. i., where he hurries on to our Lord's official life, which he sketches with lifelike energy. "While the sequence and connection of the longer discourses was that which the Holy Spirit peculiarly brought to Matthew's mind, the apostle from whom Mark's record is derived seems to have been deeply penetrated by the solemn iterations of cadence and expression, and to have borne away the very words themselves and the tone of the Lord's sayings" (Alford), e.g. the sublime reply ix. 39-50, the thrice repeated "where their worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched," sounding in the ears as a peal of doom. This Gospel especially pictures Jesus' outward gestures, e.g. His actions in curing the deaf (vii. 33, 34). He takes him aside from the multitude, puts His fingers into his ears, spits, touches his tongue, looks up to heaven, sighs, and saith, "Ephphatha." Heb. (Aramaic) words are used, but explained for Gentile readers: iii. 17, 22; v. 41, Talitha cumi; vii. 11, corban; ix. 43, gehenna; x. 46, Bar-timaeus; xiv. 36, Abba; xv. 22, Golgotha. The style, though abounding in Latinisms, is more akin to the Hebraistic style of Matthew than to Luke's pure Greek.

From the Latinisms, and the place where, and the persons to whom it was written, it was thought originally to have been in Latin; so the Syrian version states, and many Gr. MSS., "it was written in Rome, in the Roman language." But Mark's assuming his readers' acquaintance with Jewish localities is opposed to the opinion that he wrote at Rome (after Peter's departure from or decease in that city) which John Presbyter and Irenaeus endorse. In the N. T. record of Paul's labours in and for Rome no allusion occurs to Peter in connection with Christianity there. The internal evidence of Mark's Gospel is in favour of its being early in date; this it could not be if it were written after any supposed date of Peter's having preached at Rome. If Peter ever was at Rome it must have been after Paul's two years spent in Rome, and after the writing of Acts which records it. Paul and Luke, the writer of Acts (xxviii.), evidently knew nothing of Peter having founded a church there. All is clear, if Mark wrote the Gospel in connection with the Roman Cæsarea. Here Peter first preached, and it was for his converts that Mark, his son in the faith, wrote a Gospel suited in style to the energetic character of their nation, and embodying the teaching of the first apostolic missionary to them, Peter. In exact agreement with the date which this would presume, Eusebius (Chronicle) fixes on the third year of Claudius, A.D. 43, shortly after Cornelius' conversion, a date when certainly Peter was not at Rome notwithstanding Eusebius' statement, to which he probably was led by the early circulation of Mark's Gospel at Rome by Roman converts passing thither from Cæsarea; hence probably originated the story of Peter's visiting Rome. Possibly the last 12 verses of chap. xvi., not found in Sin. and Vat. MSS. but found in Alex. MS., were added at the later date assigned by Irenæus, i.e. A.D. 64. This will agree with ver. 20, "they went forth and preached everywhere," which implies that by this time the apostles had left Judæa and had preached in most lands, though they had not done so before the Gospel itself was written. As Matthew's Gospel, adapted to Jewish readers, and probably written in and for Jerusalem or Judæa, answers to the earliest period (Acts i.—xi.), the Hebrew period ending about A.D. 40, so Mark answers to the second or Judeo-Gentile period, A.D. 40 to 50, and is suited to Gentile converts such as the Roman soldiers concentrated at Cæsarea, their head quarters in Palestine, the second centre of gospel preaching as Jerusalem was the first, and the scene of Cornelius' conversion by Mark's father in the faith, Peter, Sin. and Vat. MSS. omit Mark xvi. 9-20, but Alex. and Beza and Paris MSS. and Vulg. support them, and "they were afraid" would be a strangely abrupt close of the Gospel. Irenæus (iii. 10, § 6) quotes from them. Justin Martyr quotes ix. 44, 46, 48; xii. 30; iii. 17. The motto of this Gospel may be taken from its probable author, Peter (Acts x. 38): "God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power; who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil, for God was with Him."

Market. The bazaar of the East are the resort of the idle and news-mongers. Hence a pöröi, "market frequenters," is another name for "men of the baser sort" (Acts xvii. 5 Gr.).

Maroth. A town in the W. of Judah=bitternesses. M. waited anxiously for good ("is grieved for her goods," Geseñius), but "evil (answering to bitterness, which M. means) came." Micah (i. 12) plays upon the meaning of M.

Marriage. [See ADAM.] The charter of marriage is Gen. ii. 24, reproduced by our Lord with greater distinctness in Matt. xix. 4, 5: "He which made them at the beginning made them male and female, and said, For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife; and they twain shall be one flesh." The LXX. and Samaritan Pentateuch reads "twain" or "two" in Gen. ii. 24; comp. also to this joining in one flesh of husband and wife, the archetype of which is the eternally designed union of Christ and the church, Eph. v. 31, Mark x. 5-9, 1 Cor. vi. 16, vii. 2. In marriage husband and wife combine to form one perfect human being; the one is the complement of the other. So Christ makes the church a necessary adjunct to Himself. He is the Archetype from whom, as the pattern, the church is formed (Rom. vi. 5). He is her Head, as the husband is of the wife (1 Cor. xi. 3, xv. 45). Death severs bridegroom and bride, but cannot separate Christ and His bride (Matt. xix. 6; John x. 28, 29, xiii. 1; Rom. viii. 35-39).

In Eph. v. 32 transl. "this mystery is great," i.e. this truth, hidden once but now revealed, viz. Christ's spiritual union with the church, mystically represented by marriage, is of deep import. Vulg. wrongly transl. "this is a great sacrament," Rome's plea for making marriage a sacrament. Not marriage in general, but the marriage of Christ and the church, is the great mystery, as the following words prove, "I say it in regard to (eis) Christ and in regard to (eis) the church," whereas Gen. ii. 24 refers to literal marriage. Transl. Eph. v. 30, "we are members of His (glorified) body, being (formed) out of (ek) His flesh and of His bones." Adam's deep sleep wherein Eve was formed out of His opened side, symbolises Christ's death which was the birth of the spouse, the church (John xii. 24; xix. 34, 35). As Adam gave Eve a new name, Isha, "woman" or "wife" the counterpart of Ish, "man" or "husband," so Christ gives the church His new name; He the Solomon, she the Shulamite (S. of Sol. vi. 13; Rev. ii. 17, iii. 12). The propagation of the church from Christ, as that of Eve from Adam, is the foundation of the spiritual marriage. Natural marriage rests on the spiritual marriage, whereby Christ left the Father's bosom to woo to Himself the church out of a lost world. His earthly mother as such He holds secondary to His spiritual bride (Luke ii. 48, 49; viii. 19-21; xi. 27, 28). He shall again leave His Father's abode to consummate the union (Matt. xxv. 1-10; Rev. xix. 7).

Marriage is the general rule laid down for most men, as not having continency (1 Cor. vii. 2, 5, etc.). The existing "distress" (ver. 26) was Paul's reason then for recommending celibacy where there was the gift of continency. In all cases his counsel is true, "that they that have wives be as though they had none," viz. in permanent possession, not making idols of them. Scripture teaches the unity of husband and wife; the indissolubleness of marriage save by death or fornication (Matt. v. 32, xix. 9; Rom. vii. 3); monogamy; the equality of both (ish and isha being correlative, and she a "help-met for him," i.e. a helping one in whom as soon as he sees her he may recognise himself, along with the subordination of the wife, consequent on her formation subsequently and out of him, and her having been first to fall (1 Cor. xi. 8, 9; 1 Tim. ii. 13-15) [see ADAM]. Love, honour, and cherishing are his duty; helpful, reverent subjection, a meek and quiet spirit, her part; both together being heirs of the grace of life (1 Pet. iii. 1-7; 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35).

Polygamy began with the Cainites. [See LAMECH, DIVORCE AND CONCUBINE.] The jealousies of Abraham's (Gen. xvi. 6) and Elkanah's wives illustrate the evils of polygamy. Scripture commands monogamy (Ps. cxxviii. 3; Prov. v. 18, xviii. 22, xix. 14, xxxi. 10-29; Eccles. ix. 9). Monogamy superseded polygamy subsequently to the return from Babylon. Public opinion was unfavourable to presbyters and women who exercise holy functions marrying again; for conciliation and expediency sake, therefore, Paul recommended that a candidate should be married only once, not having remarried after a wife's death or divorce (1 Tim. iii. 2, 12, v. 9; Luke ii. 36, 37; 1 Cor. vii. 40); the reverse in the case of young widows (1 Tim. v. 14). Marriage is honourable, but fornication, which among the Gentiles was considered indifferent, is stigmatized (Heb. xiii. 4, Acts xv. 20). Marriage of Israelites with Canaanites was forbidden, lest it should lead God's people into idolatry (Exod. xxiv. 16; Deut. vii. 3, 4). In Lev. xviii. 18 the prohibition is only against taking a wife's sister "beside the other (viz. the wife) in her lifetime." Our Christian reason for prohibiting such marriage after the wife's death is because man and wife are one, and the sister-in-law is to be regarded in the same light as the sister by blood. Marriage with a deceased brother's wife (the Levirate law) was favoured in O. T. times, in order to raise up seed to a brother (Gen. xxxviii. 8, Matt. xxii. 25). The highpriest must marry only an Israelite virgin (Lev. xxi. 13, 14); heiresses must marry in their own tribe, that their property might not pass out of the tribe.

The parents, or confidential friend, of the bridegroom chose the bride (Gen. xxiv., xxi. 21, xxviii. 6). The parents' consent was asked first, then that of the bride (xxiv. 58). The presents to the bride are called mohar, those to the relatives mat-tan. Between betrothal and marriage all communication between the betrothed ones was carried on through "the friend of the bridegroom" (John iii. 29). She was regarded as his wife, so that faithlessness was punished with death (Deut. xxii. 23, 24); the bridegroom having the option of putting her away by a bill of divorce (xxiv. 1; Matt. i. 19). No formal religious ceremony attended the wedding; but a blessing was pronounced, and a "covenant of God" entered into (Ezek. xvi. 8; Mal. ii. 14; Prov. ii. 17; Gen. xxiv. 60; Ruth iv. 11, 12). The essential part of the ceremony was the removal of the bride from her father's house to that of the bridegroom or his father. The bridegroom wore an ornamental turban; Isa. lxi. 10, "ornaments," rather (pe-er) "a magnificent headdress" like that of the highpriest, appropriate to the "kingdom of priests" (Exod. xix. 6); the bride wore "jewels" or "ornaments" in general, trousseau. He had a nuptial garland or crown (S. of Sol. iii. 11, "the crown wherefor His mother [the human race; for He is the Son of man not merely Son of Mary] crowned Him in the day of His espousals"); and was richly perfumed (ver. 6).

The bride took a preparatory bath (Ezek. xxiii. 40). This is the allusion in Eph. v. 25, 27: "Christ loved . . . gave Himself for the church, that He might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, that He might present it to Himself a glorious church not having spot." The veil (ta'iph) [see DRESS] was her distinctive dress, covering the whole person, so that the trick played on Jacob was very possible (Gen. xxiv. 65, xxix. 23); the symbol of her subjection to her husband's power, therefore called "power on her head" (1 Cor. xi. 10). Our "nuptials" is derived from nubo, "to veil one's self." She also wore girdles for the breasts ("attire," kishshurim) which she would not readily forget (Jer. ii. 32). Also a gilded or gold "crown" or chaplet (kallah), a white robe sometimes embroidered with gold thread (Rev. xix. 8, Ps. xlv. 13, 14) and jewels (Isa. lxi. 10). Late in the evening the bridegroom came with his groomsmen ("companions," Jud. xiv. 11; "children of the bride-chamber," Matt. ix. 15), singers and torch or lamp bearers leading the way (Jer. xxv. 10); the bride meantime with her maidens eagerly awaited his coming. Then he led the bride and her party in procession home with gladness to the marriage supper (Matt. xxv. 6, xxii. 1-11; John ii. 2; Ps. xlv. 15). The women of the place flocked out to gaze. The nuptial song was sung; hence in Ps. lxxviii. 63 "their maidens were not praised" in nuptial song (Heb.) is used for "were not given in marriage," marq. The bridegroom having now received the bride, his "friend's joy" (viz. in bringing them together) was fulfilled "in hearing the bridegroom's voice" (John iii. 29). S. of Sol. iii. 11: the feast lasted for seven or even 14 days, and was enlivened by riddles, etc. (Jud. xiv. 12). Wedding garments were provided by the host, not to wear which was an insult to him. Large waterpots for washing the hands and for "purifying" ablutions were provided (Mark vii. 3). These had to be "filled" before a nice propriety in the narrative, the minor circumstances being in keeping with one another; the feast being advanced, the water was previously all emptied out of the waterpots for the guests' ablutions (John ii. 7).

TORCHES BURN IN MARRIAGE PROCESSION.

Jesus changed the water into wine;

Light is thrown upon Egyptian marriages by a translation of an Egyptian contract of marriage, by Eugene Revillout. It is written in the demotic character upon a small sheet of papyrus, No. 2432, Cat. Egyptien, Musée du Louvre. It is dated in the month of Xotax, year 33 of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and the contracting parties are Patma, son of Pehelkhous, and the lady, Ta-outem, the daughter of Rehu. The terms of the deed are singular as to the dowry required on both sides, together with the clauses providing for repudiation. After the actual dowry is recited, the sum being specified in shekels, the rights of the children which may hereafter come from the marriage, as well as the payment of the mother's pin-money, are secured by the following clause: "thy pocket money for one year is besides thy toilet money which I give thee each year, and it is your right to exact the payment of thy toilet money and thy pocket money, which are to be placed to my account, which I give thee. Thy eldest son, my eldest son, shall be the heir of all my property, present and future. I will establish thee as wife." Practising in marriage law in Egypt was one of the priestly functions, for at the conclusion the contract states that "the writer of this act is . . . the priest of Ammon Horpnet, son of Smin" (?).

The bridegroom was exempted from military service for a year (Deut. xx. 7, xxiv. 5). Women in Scripture times were not secluded as now, but went about married and single with faces unveiled (Gen. xii. 14, xxiv. 16, 65). Some were prophetesses, as Miriam, Deborah, Huldah, Anna, and took part in public concerns (Exod. xv. 20, 1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7; Abigail, 1 Sam. xxv. 14-25). The duties of husband and wife are laid down (Eph. v. 22-33; Col. iii. 18, 19; Tit. ii. 4, 5; 1 Pet. iii. 1-7). Brawling wives stand in contrast to the model wife, God's gift (Prov. xix. 13, xxi. 9, 19, xxvii. 15, xxxi. 10-31).

[On the spiritual harlot see BEAST and ANTI-CHRIST.] Woman, harlot, bride, and ultimately wife, i.e. Christ's church in probation, the apostate church, and the glorified church, form the grand theme of the Bible from first to last. Israel had God for her "husband," she became a harlot when she left Him for idols (Isa. i. 21; Jer. ii. 20, iii. 1, 6, 8, 14). Again Jehovah is to reunite Israel to Him as His earthly bride, as the elect church is His heavenly bride (Isa. liv. 5, etc., lxii. 4, 5; Hos. ii. 19; 2 Cor. xi. 2; Rev. xix. 7, xxi. 2, 9, xxii. 17). The Father prepares for His Son the marriage feast (Matt. xxii. 1-14). The apostate church, resting on and conformed to the godless world, is the harlot riding on the beast and attired in scarlet as the beast. God's eternal principle in her case as in Israel's and Judah's shall hold good, and even already is being illustrated in Rome's being stripped by the world power; when the church sins with the world, the world the instrument of her sin shall be the instrument of her punishment (Ezek. xxiii.; Rev. xvii. 1-5, 16-18). [See IDOLATRY.]

Marsena. One of "the seven princes of Persia, wise men who knew the times, saw the king's face, and sat first in the kingdom" (Esth. i. 13, 14).

Martha. Feminine of Marec, "Lord." [See LAZARUS.] Thophylact made her daughter of Simon the leper, others his wife or widow. The undesignated consistency of her character in Luke x. 38, etc., and John xi., xii., confirms the genuineness of both writings. Bethany was the home of M. (probably the eldest), Mary, and Lazarus. M. received Jesus into "her house" there. She was the one that kept the house, managed household affairs, and served (ver. 40). She "was distracted" (periespato, "cumbered") with much serving," whereas God's will is "that we attend upon the Lord without distraction" (aperispastos; 1 Cor. vii. 35). She loved Jesus, and it was to serve Him that she was so bustling. She was secretly vexed with herself as much as with Mary, that the latter enjoyed the privilege of hearing Jesus' word seated at His feet, whilst she could not persuade herself to do the same for fear that a varied enough repast should not be served up to Him. M. came abruptly (epistata) and said, "Lord, dost Thou not care (melei) that my sister hath left me (probably going into another apartment where Jesus was speaking) to serve alone? Bid her therefore that she help me." Jesus answered, "M., M. (the repetition implies reproof), thou art careful (mentally) solicitous, anxious with a divided mind, forbidden in Matt. vi. 22-31, 1 Cor. vii. 32; merimnas, from merizo to 'divide') and troubled (bustling outwardly; turbaze) about many things (many dishes, in the present case, Bengel's Gnomon). But one thing is needful (one dish in the primary sense, secondarily the one 'good portion'; Matt. vi. 22, Phil. iii. 13, John vi. 53, 27), and Mary hath chosen that good portion," etc. Much serving has its right place and time (1 Thess. iv. 11, 2 Thess. iii. 12, 1 Tim. v. 14), but ought to give place to hearing when Jesus speaks, for faith whereby the good and abiding portion is gained cometh by hearing (Rom. x. 17). [On her conduct at the raising of her brother see LAZARUS.] "M. served" at the supper where the raised Lazarus was and where Mary anointed Jesus' feet. Her work is the same, but her spirit in it blessedly changed; no longer "distracted" with much serving, nor mentally anxious and outwardly bustling, but calm, trustful, and sympathizing by silent acquiescence in her sister's act of love (John xii. 2).

Mary of Cleophas, or CLOPAS, or ALPHEUS [see JAMES]. In John xix. 25, "there stood by Jesus' cross His mother, and His mother's sister Mary of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene." In Mark xv. 40, "Mary Magdalene, and Mary of James the Little and of Joses, and Salome." In Matt. xxvii. 56, "Mary Magdalene, and Mary of James and Joses, and the mother of Zebedee's children" (i.e. Salome). Thus "Mary of Cleophas" is the same as "Mary of James the Little and of Joses," and was sister of the Virgin Mary. The names of the two sisters being alike may be explained by the fact that many MSS. distinguish the Virgin Mary as Mariam, Mary of Cleophas and the other Marys as Maria (as we distinguish Mary and Maria); it was a favourite name for mothers to give to children, from the famous Miriam, Moses' sister. Mary was probably the Virgin's elder sister or half sister; she married Cleophas and by him had four sons, James (the apostle), Joses ("Joseph" Vat. MS., "John" Sin. MS.), Jude (the apostle), and Simon, and three daughters. She is first named at the cross, again in the evening of the same day "sitting over against the sepulchre" with Mary Magdalene (Matt. xxvii. 61), having previously "beheld where He was laid" (Mark xv. 47). She, with the women which came with Jesus from Galilee, "prepared spices and ointments" on the sabbath eve (Luke xxiii. 55, 56), and when the sabbath was past "came to see the sepulchre" (Matt. xxvii. 1) and "to anoint Him" with the "sweet spices they had bought" (Mark xvi. 1), and then "saw the vision of angels which said He was alive" (Luke xxiv. 23). Cleophas being mentioned only to designate Mary and James implies he was dead when Jesus' ministry began. Joseph too was dead, for he is never mentioned after Luke ii. The widowed sisters then joined in the one house at Nazareth, and their children came to be regarded as "brethren" (Matt. xii. 47, xiii. 55, 56), there and at Capernaum (John ii. 12). Her retiring disposition may be the cause of the non-mention of "Mary of Cleophas" till the crucifixion. Her sons were certainly older than Jesus, else they would not have dared to interfere with Him by force (Mark iii. 21). John, by our Lord's direction, took His Virgin mother at the crucifixion to his own home in Jerusalem. Further residence with nephews who had so misunderstood her Divine Son would have been less congenial to the bereaved virgin mother than residence with the beloved disciple.

Mary, sister of Lazarus. [See MARtha and LAZARUS.] Still, so delicate, reflective, as Martha was bustling and energetic. She had whole hearted decision for Christ, and no want of energy where her Master called, arising "quickly" when Martha announced the Master's arrival and call (John xi. 28, 29). But ordinarily she was receptive rather than active (Luke x. 39-42), hearing Jesus rather than speaking for Him; her grief for Lazarus was deeper but less demonstrative. The friends who saw her suddenly start up from sitting, and who knew her strong feelings, said "she goeth unto the grave to weep there" (John xi. 31). When "Martha, as soon as she heard Jesus was coming, went and met Him, Mary remained sitting in the house" (ver. 20). Her faith had been wanting when, like Martha, but without her addition of expression of faith in Christ and the resurrection, Mary said as one who had trusted His love and power, and who cannot understand why then He had suffered her brother to die, "Lord, if Thou hadst been here, my brother had not died" (ver. 21-27, 32). But Martha, when she came into Jesus' presence, could at once enter into discourse with Him; Mary, when she saw Him, "fell down at His feet." It was the sight of Mary's tears which drew forth His; Jesus conversed with Martha, "wept" with Mary (23, 33, 35). In xii. 3 she more than makes up for her previous distrust. She too could "serve" and with a higher service than Martha's. She had been heretofore recipient only; now she is lavishly communicative. She brings forth the precious ointment, "kept" treasured for the occasion (John xii. 7). She anoints the Saviour for burial; rising above the Jews' expectation of an immediately reigning Messiah, she is not offended at His crucifixion, burial, and rising again on the third day (Matt. xxvi. 10-12). When JUDAS [see] and the disciples, led by him, objected to the waste of ointment worth 300 pence (about £9 16s. of our money) which might have been given to the poor, Jesus vindicated and richly rewarded her: "why trouble ye the woman? let alone, she hath wrought a good work on Me, she hath done what she could, ye have the poor always with you but Me ye have not always" (see Matt. xxv. 35, 36); she hath come aforehand to anoint My body to the burying; whosoever this gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her." In John xii. 7 Sin. and Vat. MSS. read "let her alone that she may keep this against the day of My burying"; but Alex. MS. supports A.V. She may not have been fully conscious of the significance of her act; but He unfolds it to her praise, and her name has been and ever will be cited as an example of self sacrifice to Christendom; so that when xi. 2 was written it had already become her characteristic designation. Needless waste of the smallest fragment (John vi. 12) is against God's will; but no expenditure is lavish that is for the glory of God. What seems to the world waste proves in the end richly reproductive to the giver, as well as to the human race. Mary "anointed" Him because He was the Christ; "His feet" because it was for His burial, and it was in His "heel" that Satan "bruised" Him; yet those feet were, because of their bruising, to bruise for ever the old serpent's head.

Mary Magdalene, i.e. of Magdala in Naphtali (Josh. xix. 38), now el-Majdel on the W. of the sea of Galilee. Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. Matt. xxvi. 56; Harm. Evan. Luke viii. 3) identifies her with "the woman a sinner" (Luke vii. 37), and explains "Mary of the braided locks" from gadal "to braid" (?). She was one of the women "who ministered to Jesus of their substance." Gratitude moved Mary Magdalene, as Christ had cast out of her seven (the number for completeness, i.e. a "legion" of) demons (comp. Matt. xii. 45, Mark xvi. 9). She, with the rest of the healed women, accompanied Him in one of His tours "throughout every city and village of Galilee, preaching and showing the glad tidings of the kingdom of God, the twelve being with Him" (Luke viii. 1, 2, 3). In His last journey to Jerusalem again they accompanied Him from Galilee (Matt. xxvii. 55; Mark xv. 41; Luke xxiii. 55, xxiv. 10). "They stood afar off beholding these things," viz. the closing agony of the crucifixion (Luke xxiii. 49). Mary the mother of James, and Salome mother of Zebedee's children, were thus grouped with Mary Magdalene (Mark xv. 40), also the Virgin Mary (John xix. 25). Mary Magdalene remained "sitting over against the sepulchre," and "beholding" till Joseph of Arimathea laid the Lord's body in the tomb (Mark xv. 47; Matt. xxvii. 61; Luke xxiii. 55). She, Salome, and Mary mother of James, "when it was yet dark," at early "dawn of the first day of the week," "came to see the sepulchre," "bringing the sweet spices which they had prepared" wherewith to "anoint Him," in a liquid state, since they regarded the use of the powdered spices of Nicodemus wrapped in the swathes as an incomplete and provisional interment (Matt. xxviii. 1; Luke xxiv. 1; Mark xvi. 1, 2). The vision of angels that told her and the rest that Jesus was risen gladdened her at first, then her sorrows returned, she thought it but a vision. She went off to Peter and John (son of Salome, who had been with her) crying "they have taken away the Lord out of the sepulchre, and we (undesignedly implying that other women had been with her at the tomb though she is now alone) know not where they have laid Him" (John xx. 2). She returned to the tomb, where her heart was, following Peter and John, and remained behind when they went away. "She stood without at the sepulchre weeping," and as she wept she stooped down and looked into the sepulchre, and seeth two angels in white sitting, the one at the head and the other at the feet, where the body of Jesus had lain; they say "why weepest thou?" She saith, her one absorbing thought being the absence of Him whom she had designed to lavish her reverential love upon, "because they have taken away my Lord (her phrase to the angels, as it was the Lord to her fellow disciples Peter and John), and I (no longer 'we' as in ver. 2) know not where they have laid Him." Brooding over her one grief in the stupor of hopeless anguish, she, as "turning herself back," failed to recognise Jesus though she saw Him standing. "Woman," said He, "why weepest thou? whom seekest thou?" "Supposing Him to be the gardener she saith, Sir, if thou have borne Him (she, with the natural absence of mind of one absorbed in one object, forgetting to explain whom she meant, as if all must know Him) hence, tell me where thou hast laid Him, and I will take Him away." She never stops to think of her own weakness as a woman; love nerves her to take it for granted she is able for the blessed task; contrast her and the women's former question, "who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre?" (Mark xvi. 3.) One word from Jesus, her own name, in His well remembered familiar tone, revealed to her the Lord, "Mary!" "Rabboni" (the strongest term of reverent love) she exclaimed, turning herself and casting herself at His feet and embracing them. [For fuller details see JESUS CHRIST.] Truly the poet writes:

Not she with traitorous kiss her Master
stung,
Not she denied Him with unfaithful tongue;
She, when apostles fled, could dangers brave, Last at His cross, and earliest at His grave."

He checks her in respect to a love which too much leant on His fleshly presence; she and His disciples need now to rise to a higher and at the same time a nearer, but spiritual, communion with Him. "Be not now touching Me" (comp. 1 John i. 1), for the time of this permanent "seeing" (John xvi. 16, 19, 22) and knowing Me after the Spirit, which is to supersede your past "knowledge of Me after the flesh" (2 Cor. v. 16), is not yet come, "but go to My brethren and say, I am ascending (already My ascension has begun) unto My Father and your Father" (John ii. 10, 11). Her earthly affection needed to be elevated into a heavenly one (John xx. 25-29). It was Thomas's need too; Jesus' condescension in stooping to his weakness and granting him the fleshly touch was to raise him to the higher one of faith. This is the last mention of her, a most graphic one, supplied to us by the son of her old associate, Sabaon.

The seven demons that had possessed her were her misfortune, not the proof that she had been in the common sense "a woman which was a sinner." Luke vii. 37, 39: the A.V. heading of the chapter is wrong, identifying the two. Mary that anointed Jesus was the sister of Martha and Lazarus and distinct from Mary Magdalene. The mention of the anointing in John xi. 2 is evidently John's anticipation of xii. 3, to inform his readers that the Mary in chap. xi. is the same as she whose anointing of the Lord they knew by common tradition. It does not mean that she had already anointed Him and was identical with the woman a sinner whose anointing of Him is recorded in Luke vii.

Mary, mother of Mark. Sister to Barnabas (A. V. Col. iv. 10), or rather aunt, since anepsios means "cousin," not commonly "sister's son." (See MARK.) As Barnabas gave up his hands, so she her house at Jerusalem for the use of the church. Peter's resorting thither immediately upon his release (Acts xii. 12) shows her tried steadfastness and implies a bond of intimacy with her; so that he calls Mark his "son" (1 Pet. v. 13). The house was one of the church's worship rooms (Acts ii. 46, xx. 8, comp. iv. 24, 31); "there many were gathered together praying" for Peter's deliverance, and God "heard, whilst they were yet speaking" (1sa. lxxv. 24). Mark doubtless derived some of the straightforward, decided character which appears in his Gospel from her influence. His attachment to her was probably one cause of his return to Jerusalem from Perga (Acts xiii. 13).

Mary the Virgin. Probably [see GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST] Matthan of Matthew is Matthat of Luke, and Jacob and Heli were brothers; and Heli's son Joseph, and Jacob's daughter Mary, were first cousins. Joseph, as male heir of his uncle Jacob who had one only child Mary, would marry her according to the law (Num. xxxvi. 8). Thus the genealogy of the inheritance or succession to David's throne (Matthew's) and that of natural descent (Luke's) would be primarily Joseph's, then Mary's also (Ps. cxxxii. 11; Luke i. 32; Rom. i. 3). She was sister or half sister to MARY OF CLOPHAS [see] (John xix. 25), and akin to ELISABETH [see] who was of the tribe of Levi (Luke i. 36). In 5 B.C. (Luke i. 24, etc.) Mary was living at Nazareth, by this time betrothed to Joseph, when the angel GABRIEL [see] came from God to her in the sixth month of Elisabeth's pregnancy. He came in no form of overwhelming majesty, but seemingly in human form, as is implied by the expression "he came in," also by the fact that what she was "troubled at" was not his presence but "his saying" (comp. Dan. x. 18, 19). "Hail thou that art highly favoured" (kecharitomenē) cannot mean as Rome teaches in her prayer to the Virgin, "Hail Mary full of grace"; that would be plēris charitos as in John i. 14; the passive of the verb implies, as usually in verbs in -ōs, she was made the object of God's grace, not a fountain whence grace flows to others; as ver. 30 explains it, "thou hast found favour (charin) with God"; so Eph. i. 6, ekcharitosen, "He hath graciously accepted us." "The Lord is (or BE) with thee (Jud. vi. 12), blessed art thou among women"; not among gods and goddesses. As Joel (Jud. v. 24); "blessed" in "believing" (Luke i. 45), more than in conceiving Christ (viii. 19-21, xi. 27, 28); comp. her own practice, ii. 51, Matt. xii. 49, 50. "Her relationship as mother would not at all have profited Mary if she had not borne Christ more happily in the heart than in the flesh" (Augustine, Tom. 4. De Sanct. Virg.). In Luke xi. 27, 28, during His last journey, a month before His crucifixion (A.D. 30), upon a woman of the company exclaiming, "blessed is the womb that bare Thee, and the paps which Thou hast sucked," He said, "yea, rather (men oun ge) blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it"; the blessedness even of Mary is not her motherhood towards Him, but her hearing and obeying Him.

The Spirit's prescience of the abuse of the words Luke i. 28 appears in the precautions taken subsequently in the same Gospel to guard against such abuse. The Virgin's words (i. 48) "all generations shall call me blessed" mean not, shall call me by that name, "the Blessed Virgin," but shall count me blessed, as in Jas. v. 11 (the same Gr.). The nations shall count JESUS, not the Virgin, the fountain of all blessedness (Ps. lxxii. 17).

When in "fear she cast in her mind what might the meaning of the salutation be," the angel reassured her by the promise, "behold thou shalt conceive in thy womb and bring forth a son, and shalt call His name Jesus. He shall be great (not merely as John Baptist 'in the sight of the Lord,' Luke i. 15, but as the Lord Himself), and shall be called (i.e. shall be really what the name means) the Son of the Highest, and the Lord God shall give Him the throne of His father David (not merely His throne in heaven whereon David never sat, but on Zion, Jer. iii. 17), and He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of His kingdom there shall be no end." She asked, not incredulously as Zacharias (Luke i. 18), but in the simplicity of faith which sought instruction, taking for granted it shall be, only asking as to the manner, "how shall this be, seeing I know not a man?" The angel therefore explained, "the Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee (as with a cloud, denoting the mildest, gentlest operation of the Divine power, covering, quickening, but not consuming; Mark ix. 7), therefore also that Holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God" (whence our creed saith, "He was conceived by the Holy Ghost," etc.; comp. Gen. i. 2. "As the world was not created by the Holy Ghost, but by the Son, so the Son was not begotten by the Holy Ghost, but by the Father, and that before the worlds. Christ was made of the substance of the Virgin, not of the substance of the Holy Ghost, whose essence cannot be made. No more is attributed to the Spirit than what was necessary to cause the Virgin to perform the actions of a mother. And because the Holy Ghost did not beget Him by any communication of His essence, He is not the Father of Him." Pearson, Creed, 165, 166.) Gabriel instanced Elisabeth's being six months advanced in pregnancy, who once was barren, to confirm the Virgin's faith that "nothing is impossible with God" (Rom. ix. 17-21); she evinced her faith in the reply, "behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word." Her expression of humble, believing acceptance of and concurrence in the Divine will (ver. 38, 45) was required, and may be with reverence supposed to be recorded to mark the date of our Lord's conception. Mary then went in joyous haste to the hill country of Judah, to a city where Zacharias and Elisabeth lived, whether Jutta (Josh. xxi. 13-16) a priests' city, or Hebron, S. of Jerusalem and much farther S. of Nazareth in Galilee. On Mary's saluting Elisabeth the latter hailed her as "mother of her Lord," inasmuch as at her salutation "the babe leaped in her womb for joy," adding, in contrast to Zacharias whose unbelief had brought it its own punishment, "blessed is she that believed, for there shall be a performance of those things told her from the Lord." Mary then under the Spirit uttered the hymn known as the "Magnificat," based on Hannah's hymn (1 Sam. ii. 2). In it we see a spirit that drank deeply at the wells of Scripture, a humility that "magnified the Lord" not self, that "rejoiced" as a sinner in "her Saviour" (disproving Rome's dogma of the immaculate conception), a lively sense of gratitude at the mighty favour which the Mighty One conferred on one so low, a privilege which countless Jewish mothers had desired (Dan. xi. 37, "the desire of women"), and for which all generations should count ("call") her happy (makariousti, comp. Gen. xxx. 13), and an exemplification of God's eternal principle of alasing "the proud and exalting them of low degree," and a realization of God's faithfulness to His promises "to Abraham of mercy and help to Israel for ever." Mary stayed with her cousin three months, and just before John the Baptist's birth returned to her own house at Nazareth. Then followed JOSEPH'S [see] discovery of the conception and his tender dealing with her, and reception of her by God's command (Matt. i.), as being the virgin foretold who should bring forth Immanuel (Isa. vii. 14, Jer. xxxi. 22).

Augustas' decree (Luke ii.) obliged them to go to Bethlehem, God thereby causing His prophecy (Mic. v. 2) to be fulfilled, Mary there giving birth to the Saviour. The shepherds' account of the angels caused wonder to others, "but Mary kept all these things and pondered them in her heart"; so again Luke ii. 51, not superficial, but reflective and thoughtfully devout. The law regarded her as unclean till the presentation 40 days after the birth (Lev. xii.). Then she was bound to offer a lamb of the first year for a burnt offering, and a young pigeon or turtle dove for a sin offering, to make atonement for her; poverty compelled her to substitute for the lamb a pigeon or turtle. Simeon's hymn followed, at the close of which he foretold, "a sword shall pierce through thy own soul also, that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed"; the anguish of her Son should pierce the mother's heart, and be a testing probation of character to her as well as to all others (John ix. 39, xix. 25; Ps. xlii. 10); that she had misgivings and doubts is implied in her accompanying His brethren afterwards, as if enthusiasm was carrying Him too far (Matt. xii. 46; Mark iii. 21, 31-35; John vii. 5). The flight to Egypt followed; then the return, at first designed to be back to Bethlehem, but through fear of Archelaus to Nazareth of Galilee, their former home. Then the visit to Jerusalem when Jesus was 12 years old. Had she remembered aright the Divine Sonship of Jesus announced by Gabriel, she would have understood His lingering in the temple, and have forgiven the complaint, "Son, why hast Thou thus dealt with us? Thy father and I have sought Thee sorrowing." Still maternal solicitude and human love prompted her words, of which the only fault was her losing sight of His Divine relations. She and Joseph (who is never after mentioned) "understood not Jesus' sayings, but Mary kept them all in her heart."

Four times only does Mary come to view subsequently. (1) At the marriage of Cana (John ii.), in the three months between Christ's baptism and the passover of A.D. 27. As at the finding in the temple He disclaimed Joseph's authority as His father in the highest sense, "wist ye not (thou Mary and Joseph) that I must be about My (Divine) Father's business," so here He disclaims her right as human mother to dictate His Divine acts, "they have no wine." "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" (what is there [in common] to Me and thee?) a rebuke though a gentle one, as in Matt. vii. 29, Mark i. 24, 1 Kings xvii. 18. Mary, when reproved, meekly "saith to the servants, Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it" (2 Chron. xxv. 9). The Christian's allegiance is solely to Him, not to her also; a prescient forewarning of the Holy Ghost against mediæval and modern Mariolatry. (2) Capernaum next was her home (John i. 12). Two passovers had elapsed since the marriage in Cana, and He had twice made the circuit of Galilee. Crowds so thronged Him that He had no time even "to eat bread." Mary and His brethren, anxious for His safety, and fearing He would destroy Himself with self denying zeal, stood outside of the crowds surrounding Him and "sought to speak with Him, and to lay hold on Him, for they said He is beside Himself" (Mark iii. 21, 31-35). Again He denies any authority of earthly relatives, or any privilege from relationship, "who is My mother or My brethren?" and looking round on those sitting about Him, "behold My mother and My brethren," for "whoever shall do the will of My Father which is in heaven the same is My brother, sister, and mother" (Matt. xii. 50). (3) Shortly before three o'clock and His giving up the ghost, He once more recognises His human relationship to her, which He had during His ministry put in the background, that His higher relationship might stand prominent; for "now that which she brought forth was dying" (Augustine). Commending her to John He said to her, "woman, behold thy son," and to John "behold thy mother." John (xix. 26, 27) immediately "from that hour took her to his own home," so that she was spared the pang of witnessing His death. "He needed no helper in redeeming all; He gave human affection to His mother, but sought no help of man" (Augustine). (4) She is last mentioned Acts i. 14, "Mary the mother of Jesus" (not "of God") was one of the women who continued with one accord in prayer and supplication for the Holy Spirit before Pentecost. In all the epistles her name never once occurs. Plainly Scripture negatives the superhuman powers which Rome assigns her. In the ten recorded appearances of the risen Saviour in the 40 days, not one was specially to Mary. John doubtless cherished her with the tender love which he preeminently could give and she most needed. It is remarkable how with prescient caution she never is put forward during Christ's ministry or after His departure. Meek (John ii. 5), and humble, making her model the holy women of old (Luke i. 46), yielding herself in implicit faith up to the Divine will though ignorant how it was to be accomplished (ver. 38), energetic (ver. 39), thankful (ver. 48), and piously reflective (ii. 19, 51), though not faultless, she was the most tender and lovable of women, yet a woman still.

Mary. A Roman Christian greeted in Rom. xvi. 16 as one "who bestowed much labour on you" (so Sin., Vat., and Alex. MSS. read for "as"). The only Jewish name in the list. Christianity binds all in one brotherhood; a Jewish labours much for the good of Rome, Judah's oppressor.

Maschil. Title of Psalms xxxii., xlii., xlv., xlii., lvi., lxxv., lxxviii., lxxviii., lxxxix., cxlii. Instruction is the special design of such psalms, as the Heb. cognate verb (xxxii. 8) aschil-ka, "I will instruct thee" implies. All Scripture is for "instruction" (2 Tim. iii. 16). This title draws attention to the instruction in psalms where this design is not at first sight apparent. Gesenius and Roediger explain "any sacred song relating to Divine things, whose end it is to promote wisdom and piety." Compare the sense of maschil Ps. xlvii. 7, "sing ye praises with understanding," i.e. edification, spiritual "wisdom" (Col. iii. 16). Also Ps. liii. 2, "God looked down . . . to see if there were any that did understand" (maschil). The "instruction" aimed at is to bring reckless man to spiritual understanding, the true wisdom (Ps. cxi. 10, Dan. xii. 10).

Mash. Son of Aram, Shem's son (Gen. x. 23). Josephus (Ant. i. 6) says, "Mash founded the Mesemians," i.e. the inhabitants of Mesene near Bassora where the Tigris and Euphrates fall into the Persian gulf; this however seems too far from the other Aramæan settlements. Gesenius identifies the descendants of Mash with the inhabitants of mount Masina, a range N. of Mesopotamia, above Nisibis. Knobel reconciles this with Josephus by supposing a migration from northern to southern Babylonia, which however is the reverse of the direction which the population usually took, viz. from S. to N.

In 1 Chron. i. 17 the reading is Meshech, which LXX. reads perhaps rightly; also in Gen. x. 23. Meshech occurred in Gen. x. 2, among the sons of Japheth; but here (ver. 23) among Shem's descendants. Cappadocia was the original home of the Moschi (Meshech); its population was a mixed one, and a portion connected with Aram (Syria). Thus the name occurring in Japheth's line and also in Shem's line points to the mixture of Aramaic Moschi with Japhethic Moschi in Cappadocia (G. Rawlinson).

Masrekah=vineyard. The Edomite king Samlaah's country (Gen. xxxvi. 36), where the excellent vine, sorek, abounded. Burckhardt found extensive vineyards in the region of the Idumean mountains N. of Petra along the holy route, made by the Refaya tribe for supplying Gaza and the Mecca pilgrims.

Massa. Son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 14). [See LEMUEL.] The Misani, placed by Ptolemy the geographer E. of Arabia, may have sprung from M.

Massah=temptation. [See MERIBAH.] There Israel tempted Jehovah, saying, Is Jehovah among us or not? (Exod. xvii. 7; Ps. xcv. 8, 9; Heb. iii. 8.)

Matred. Gen. xxxvi. 39.

Matri. 1 Sam. x. 21.

Mattan. 1. Baal's priest slain by Jehoiada "before the altars" judiciously, at the reformation after Athaliah's idolatrous reign (2 Kings i. 18, 2 Chron. xxiii. 17). She probably had brought him from Samaria to introduce the Baal worship of her father Ahab into the court of Jehoram her husband, Jehoshaphat's son (xxi. 6, 13). 2. Jer. xxxviii. 1.

Mattanah. A station on Moab's border between Beer, the well which God gave (M. means a gift) and which is commemorated in Israel's song, and Nahaliel (Num. xxi. 18). Maschana on the Arnon (Eusebius).

Mattaniah=gift of Jehovah. 1. King Zedekiah's (Jehovah's justice) original name, changed when Nebuchadnezzar put him on the throne instead of his nephew Jehoiachin (2 Kings xxiv. 17). 2. 1 Chron. ix. 15, 16, "keeper of the thresholds." Son of Micha or Michaiah (Neh. xi. 17; xii. 8, 28, 29, 25, 35); lived in the Netophathite villages of the singers near Jerusalem. As leader of the temple choir he took part in the music at the dedication of the wall. 3. 2 Chron. xx. 14. 4. Ezra x. 26. 5. Ezra x. 26, 27. 6. Ezra x. 30. 7. Ezra x. 37. 8. Neh. xiii. 13. 9. 1 Chron. xxv. 4, 5, 7, 16. 10. 2 Chron. xxxix. 13.

Mattathia. Luke iii. 21.

Mattathah. Ezra x. 33.

Mattathias. 1. Luke iii. 25. 2. Luke iii. 26.

Mattenai. 1. Ezra x. 33. 2. Ezra x. 37. 3. Neh. xii. 19.

Matthan. 1. Matt. i. 15. MATTHAT, Luke iii. 24. 2. Luke iii. 29.

Matthew. Meaning "the gift of Jehovah," contracted from Mattathias. The evangelist and apostle. Son of Alphæus (not the father of James the Less, for M. and James are never coupled as brothers). Mark (ii. 14, comp. iii. 18) and Luke (v. 27, comp.

with vi. 15) veil his former less honourable occupation of a PUBLICAN [see] under his original name Levi; but M. himself gives it, and humbly puts himself after Thomas, an undesignated mark of genuineness; whereas Mark (iii. 18) and Luke (vi. 15) put M. before Thomas in the list of apostles. As subordinate to the head farmers of the Roman revenues he collected dues at Capernaum on the sea of Galilee, the route by which traffic passed between Damascus and the Phœnician seaports. But M. is not ashamed to own his identity with "the publican" in order to magnify Christ's grace (Matt. ix. 9), and in his catalogue of the apostles (x. 3). Christ called him at "the receipt of custom," and he immediately obeyed the call. Desiring to draw others of his occupation with him to the Saviour he made in His honour a great feast (Matt. ix. 9-13, Luke v. 29, Mark ii. 14). "Many publicans and sinners" thus had the opportunity of hearing the word; and the murmuring of the Pharisee, and the reply of our Lord "they that be whole need not a physician but they that are sick . . . I am not come to call the righteous but sinners to repentance," imply that his effort was crowned with success. With the undesigned propriety which marks genuineness M. talks of Jesus' sitting down in "the house" without telling whose house it was, whereas Mark mentions it as Levi's. He was among those who met in the upper room at Jerusalem after our Lord's ascension (Acts i. 13). Eustathius (H. E. iii. 24) says that after our Lord's ascension M. preached in Judæa and then in foreign nations (Ethiopia, according to Socrates Scholasticus, H. E. i. 19).

Matthew, Gospel of. [See GOSPELS for its aspect of Christ compared with the other evangelists.] Time of writing. As our Lord's words divide Acts (i. 8) into its three parts, ("ye shall be witnesses unto Me in Jerusalem, and all Judæa, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth"): (1) the period in which the church was Jewish, chap. i.-xi.; (2) the period when it was Gentile with strong Jewish admixture; (3) the period when the Gentiles preponderated.) Matthew's Gospel answers to the first or Jewish period, ending about A.D. 41, and was written probably in and for Jerusalem and Judæa. The expression (Matt. xxvii. 7, 8; xxviii. 15) "unto this day" implies some interval after Christ's crucifixion.

Language. Ancient testimony is unanimous that Matthew wrote in Heb. Papias, a disciple of John (the Presbyter) and companion of Polycarp (Euseb. H. E. iii. 39), says, "Matthew wrote his oracles (logia) in Heb., and each interpreted them in Gr. as he could." Perhaps the Gr. for "oracles," logia, expresses that the Heb. Gospel of Matthew was a collection of discourses (as logoi means) rather than a full narrative. Matthew's Gospel is the one of the four which gives most fully the discourses of our Lord. Papias' use of the past tense (aurist) implies that "each interpreting" Matthew's Heb. was in Papias' time a thing of the past, so that as early as the end of the first century or the beginning of the second the need for each to translate the Heb. had ceased, for an authoritative Gr. translation existed. The Hellenists or Greek speaking Jews would from the first need a Gr. version, and Matthew and the church would hardly leave this want unsupplied in his lifetime. Origen, Pantaenus, Eusebius (H. E. vi. 25, v. 10, v. 8), and Irenæus (adv. Hær. iii. 1) state the same. Jerome (de Vir. Illust. iii.) adds, "who translated the Heb. into Gr. is uncertain." He identifies Matthew's Heb. Gospel with "the Gospel of the Nazarenes," which he saw in Pamphilus' library at Cæsarea. Epiphanius (Hær. xxix. § 9) mentions this Nazarene Gospel as written in Heb. (Hebraïkois grammasin). Probably this Nazarene was the original Heb. Gospel of Matthew interpolated and modified, yet not so much so as the Ebionite Gospel. This view will account for the strange fact that nothing of the Heb. Matthew has been preserved. Our Gr. Gospel superseded the Heb., and was designed by the Holy Ghost (as its early acceptance, universal use, and sole preservation prove) to be the more universal canonical Gospel. The Judaizing Nazarenes still clung to the Heb. one; but their heresies and their corruptions of the text brought it into disrepute with the orthodox. Origen (on Prayer, elxi. 150) argues that epiousion, the Gr. word for "daily" in the Lord's prayer, was formed by Matthew himself; Luke adopts the word. Eusebius (Lardner, Cred. viii. note p. 180) remarks that Matthew in quotations of the O. T. does not follow the LXX., but makes his own translation. Quotations in his own narrative (1) pointing out the fulfilment of prophecy Matthew translates from the Heb. Quotations (2) of persons introduced, as Christ, are from the Gr. LXX., even where differing from the Heb., e.g. Matt. iii. 3, xiii. 14. A mere translator would not have done so. An independent writer would do just what Matthew does, viz. in speeches of persons introduced would conform to the apostolic tradition which used the LXX., but in his own narrative would translate the Heb. as he judged best under the Spirit. These are arguments for Matthew's authorship of the Gr. Gospel. Mark apparently alters or explains many passages found in our Matthew, for greater clearness, as if he had the Gr. of Matthew before him (Matt. xviii. 9, xix. 1 with Mark x. 1, ix. 47); and if the Gr. existed so early it must have come from Matthew himself, not a translator. The Latinisms (fragellosos, Matt. xxvii. 26; kedrauten, v. 26) are unlike a transl. from Heb. into Gr., for why not use the Gr. terms as Luke (xii. 59) does, rather than Græcised Latinisms? The Latinisms are natural to Matthew, as a portitor or gatherer of port dues, familiar with the Roman coin quadrens, and likely to quote the Latin for "scourging" (fragellosos from flagellum) used by the Roman governor in sentencing Jesus. Josephus's writing his history both in Gr. and Heb. (B. J. Preface i.) is parallel. The great proof of Matthew's authorship of the Gr. is that the Heb. has left no trace of it except that which may exist in the Nazarene Gospel, whereas our Gr. Matthew is quoted as authentic by the apostolic fathers (Polycarp, Ep. ii. 7; Ignatius, ad Smyr. vi.; Clemens Rom. i. 46; Barnabas, Ep. iv.) and earliest Christians. Paul in writing to the Hebrews, Peter to the Jews of the dispersion, and James to the twelve tribes, write in Gr. not Heb. How unlikely that Matthew's name should be substituted for the lost name of the unknown translator, and this in apostolic times; for St. John lived to see the completion of the canon; he never would have sanctioned as the authentic Gospel of Matthew a fragmentary compilation "in arrangement and selection of events not such as would have proceeded from an apostle and eye witness" (Alford).

The Hebraisms accord with the Jewish character of Matthew's Gospel, and suit the earliest period of the church. At a later date it would have been less applicable to the existing state. Early Christian writers quote the Gr., not the Heb., with implicit confidence in its authority as Matthew's work. The original Heb. of which Papias, etc., speak none of them ever saw. If it had not been so, heretics would have gladly used such a handle against it, which they do not. The Syriac version of the second century is demonstrably made, not from its kindred tongue the Heb., but from the Gr. Matthew; this too in the country next Judea where Matthew wrote, and with which there was the freest communication. The Heb. Matthew having served its local and temporary use was laid aside, just as Paul's temporary epistles (Col. iv. 16, 1 Cor. v. 9) have not been transmitted to us, the Holy Spirit designing them to serve but for a time. Our Gr. Matthew has few, if any, traces of being a translation; it has the general marks of being an independent work. A translator would not have presumed to alter Matthew's original so as to have the air of originality which it has; if he had, his compilation would never have been accepted as the authentic Gospel of the inspired apostle Matthew by the churches which had within them men possessing the gift of "discerning spirits" (1 Cor. xii. 10). As Mark's name designates his Gospel, not that of Peter his apostolic guide, and Luke's name his Gospel not Paul's name, so if a translator had modified Matthew's Heb., his name not Matthew's would have designated it. All is clear if we suppose that, after inaccurate translations of his Heb. by others such as Papias (above) notices, Matthew himself at a later date wrote, or dictated, in Gr. for Greek speaking Jews the Gospel in fuller form than the Heb. His omission of the ascension (as included in the resurrection of which it is the complement) was just what we should expect if he wrote while the event was fresh in men's memory and the witnesses still at Jerusalem. If he had written at a later date he would have surely recorded it.

Aim. There is a want in it of the vivid details found in the others, his aim being to give prominence to the Lord's discourses. Jesus' human aspect as the ROYAL Son of David is mainly dwelt on; but His Divine aspect as Lord of David is also presented in chap. xvii. 45, xvi. 16; proving that Matthew's view accords with that of John, who makes prominent Jesus' Divine claims. From the beginning Matthew introduces Jesus as "Son of David," but Mark i. 1 as "the Son of God," Luke as "the Son of Adam, the son of God" (iii. 38), John as "the Word" who "was God" (i. 4). In the earlier part, down to the Baptist's death, he groups facts and discourses according to the subjects, not according to the times, whereas Mark arranges according to the times, in the places where they differ. Papias' description of the Heb. Matthew as a studied arrangement (suataxis) of our Lord's "discourses" accords with this view.

Style. The Gr. of Matthew is the most Hebraic of the N. T. Hellenistic writers (Hellenistic is Heb. in idiom and thoughts, Gr. in words): for instance mathetewein, taplos sumboulion lambanein, distazein, katapontizesthai, metairein, proskunein with the dative (not the accusative as in Mark and Luke), sunairein logon, omnino eis or en of the thing or person sworn by; akousai for akousomai; pas hostis (but Luke pas hos); brechein to rain (but in Luke to moisten); sunteleia tou aiwnos (elsewhere only in Heb. ix. 26, both scriptures being for Jews); basileia tou ouranou (in the rest of the N. T. basileia tou theou); the phrase "that it might be fulfilled" (ii. 15, i. 22) implies that the prophetic word necessitated the fulfilment (xxiv. 35); "that which was spoken" (to rhoten, erhothe) is the form of quotation 20 times, suitable to the Heb. mode (Mark xiii. 11, the only other instance, is omitted in the two oldest MSS., Sin. and Vat.), comp. Heb. ii. 2. Three peculiar terms are common to Matthew and Mark, angareusai, fragellosas, and kalabasi. So also Hierosolyma (but Hierusalem in Luke mostly). If Mark adopted them from Matthew the Gr. Matthew must be authentic, for it must then have been written in Matthew's lifetime, when none durst have brought out a free translation of the Heb. as Matthew's Gospel. The independence in the mode of O. T. quotations is inconsistent with the notion of a mere transl. "The Son of David" is eight times in Matthew, three times each in Mark and Luke. Jerusalem is "the holy city" (Matt. iv. 5, xxvii. 53), which it ceased to be regarded as by the time that subsequent N. T. writers wrote, when the Jews had continued to harden themselves against the truth.

Canonical authority. Justin Martyr, the epistle to Diognetus, Irenaeus, Tatian, Origen, etc., quote Matthew as of undisputed authority. The genuineness of the first two chapters, disputed by some, is established by their presence in the oldest MSS. and versions. The genealogy was necessary in a Gospel for Jews, to show that Jesus' claim to Messiahship accorded with His descent through king David from Abraham, to both of whom the promise of Messiah was given; while its insertion is proof of early date.

Design. For the Jews; to show Jewish readers (to whom were committed the O. T. "oracles of God") that Jesus is the Messiah of the O. T., fulfilling O. T. prophecies, as born of a virgin in Bethlehem (ii. 6); fleeing to Egypt and called out of it; heralded by John Baptist (iii. 3); labouring in Galilee of the Gentiles (iv. 14-16); healing (viii. 17); teaching in parable (xiii. 14, etc.). Matthew has 65 O. T. quotations, of which 43 are verbal; Luke has 43, of which only 19 are verbal. Matthew takes for granted that his readers, as Jews, know Jewish customs and places; Mark for Gentile readers describes these (Matt. xv. 1, 2 with Mark vii. 1-4, "with defiled, that is, unwashed hands," chap. xxvii. 62 with Mark xv. 42, "the preparation, that is the day before the sabbath," Luke xxiii. 54, John xix. 14, 31, 42). The interpretations of Imanuel, Eli, lama sabachthani, Aedlama (chap. i. 25, xxvii. 8, 46) were designed for Greek speakers. In contrast with Judaic traditions and servility to the dead letter, the law is unfolded in its spirit (chaps. v., xxiii.). The epistle of JAMES [see] answers closely to the sermon on the mount (which Matthew alone gives fully) in its spiritual development of the law (Jas. v. 12, i. 25, ii.); the relation of the gospel to the law is the aspect which Matthew, like James, presents. What James is among the apostolic epistles that Matthew is among the evangelists. It is the Gospel of Jewish-Christianity, setting forth the law in its deep spirituality brought to view by Jesus its fulfiller. Mere Judaic privileges will not avail, for unbelief shall cast the children of the kingdom into outer darkness, whilst the saved shall come from every quarter to sit down with Abraham through faith (chap. viii. 10-12).

Records found only in Matthew. Christ's GENEALOGY [see] from Abraham to Joseph through the male line; the succession to the throne, from Abraham through king David to Joseph, 42 generations, with omissions. Chap. i.; Joseph's dreams. Chap. ii.; Christ worshipped by the wise men, Herod's massacre of the children at Bethlehem, Herod's death, and Christ's return to Nazareth. Divisions. Introduction; Christ's genealogy, birth; visit of the wise men; flight to Egypt; return to Nazareth; John the Baptist's preparatory ministry; Christ's baptism and consecration to His office by the Holy Spirit, with the Father's declared approval (chaps. i.—iii.). Temptation; ministry in Galilee; call of disciples (chap. iv.). Sermon on the mount (chaps. v.—vii.). Events in order, proving His claim to Messiahship by miracles (chaps. viii., ix.). Appointment of apostles; doubts of John's disciples; evils of the Pharisees; on the other hand His loving invitations, miracles, series of parables on the kingdom; effects of His ministry on Herod and various classes; prophecy to His disciples of His coming death (chaps. x.—xviii. 35.). Ministry in Judea and Jerusalem (chaps. xix., xx.). Passion week: entry into Jerusalem; opposition to Him by Herodians, Sadducees, Pharisees; silence them all; denunciation of the Pharisees (chaps. xxi.—xxiii.). Last discourses: His coming as Lord and Judge (chaps. xxiv., xxv.). Passion and resurrection (chaps. xxvi.—xxviii.).

Matthias. Elected to the apostleship instead of Judas the traitor. One "of those which companied with Jesus' disciples all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among them" (Acts i. 21, 26). [See APOSTLES.] The 120 disciples nominated ("appointed") two, JOSEPH BARSABARAS [see] and M., having the requirements. The choice between the two was committed in prayer to the Searcher of hearts; Lots [see] were then cast, in accordance with Lev. xvi. 8, Prov. xvi. 33, and M. chosen. As yet the apostles had not received the full gift of the Holy Ghost. After His descent on pentecost casting of lots was never repeated, as "the discerning of spirits" in the church made it no longer needful. Eusebius (H. E. i. 12) and Epiphanius (i. 20) make M. to have been of the 70 disciples.

Mattithiah. 1. 1 Chron. ix. 31. 2. 1 Chron. xv. 18, 21; xvi. 5; xxv. 3, 21. 3. Ezra x. 43. 4. Neh. viii. 4.

Maul. A hammer: meephitz, mapeetz (Prov. xxv. 18). In Jer. li. 20

BATTLE AXES.

transl. "maul" for "battle axe." So Jer. l. 23 Babylon "the hammer of the whole earth," i.e. the mace or war club; as the king of the Franks was Charles "Martel," i.e. little hammer. (Nah. ii. 1.)

Mauzzim. Marg. Dan. xi. 38, "the god of forces," rather "of fortresses." The reference may be to the fact that Antiochus Epiphanes erected a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus at Antioch, and dedicated Jehovah's temple at Jerusalem to Jupiter Olympius (Livy xli. 20, 2 Mace. vi. 2). First suggests Melkart the Hercules of Tyre, "the fortress" or "stronghold (ma'oz) of the sea." New Tyre was on a rock surrounded by the sea (Isa. xxiii. 4).

Mazzaroth. Job xxxviii. 32, "canst thou bring forth the signs of the zodiac at their respective seasons?" Mazzaroth in 2 Kings xxiii. 5 marg., the 12 lodgings or stopping places (from Arabic menzil "an inn"), in which the sun successively stays or appears to stay in the sky. Gesenius supports marg. Job xxxviii. 32, "the 12 signs," lit. "premonitions," i.e. "stars that give warnings or presages."

Meadow. Gen. xli. 2. Achu: an Egyptian word, akh akh, "verdant," transl. therefore rather "in the reed grass." So Job viii. 11 "rush," the paper reed or papyrus of the Nile; "can the achu grow without water?" The fat kine fed on the reed grass which in the plenteous years grew to the very margin of the water, but the lean stood on the dry "brink" (Gen. xli. 2, 3).

"Out of the meadows of Gibeah" (Jud. xx. 33): ma'areeh; rather, "from the naked (from 'arah 'to strip' of trees) plains of Gibeah." Not that the treeless plain was the hiding place of the ambush, but when the men broke from the ambush they came "from the treeless plain towards the town." The Peshito Syriac reads the vowel points slightly different, me'arah, "the cave."

Meah, Tower of: or "tower of the hundred." Neh. iii. 1. [See JERUSALEM.] N.E. of the city, between the tower of Hananeel and the sheepgate. Meals. The ariston, often transl. "dinner," is rather breakfast or luncheon (Matt. xxii. 4); Luke xiv. 12 "a dinner (breakfast or luncheon) or a supper" (deipnon, a late dinner). The principal Egyptian meal was at noon (Gen. xliii. 16); but the Jews' chief meal at even (Gen. xix. 1-3, Lot; Ruth iii. 7, B. az). Israel ate bread or manna in the morning, flesh in the evening (Exod. xvi. 12); the passover supper in the evening confirms this. The ancient Hebrews sat at meals (Gen. xxvii. 19, Jud. xix. 6), but not necessarily on a chair, which was reserved as a special dignity (2 Kings iv. 10). Reclining on couches was latterly the posture at meals (Amos vi. 4); iii. 12, "dwell in the corner of a bed," i.e. the inner corner where the two sides of the dican meet, the place of dignity (Pusey), "and in Damascus (in) a couch"; not as Gesenius "on a dumask couch," for Damascus was then famed for the raw material "white wool" (Ezek. xxvii. 18), not yet for dumask. Derived from the Syrians, Babylonians, and Persians (Esth. i. 6, vii. 8). For "tables," Mark vii. 4, transl. "couches"; and for "sitting at meat" in N. T. transl. everywhere "reclining." As three were generally on one couch, one lay or "leant" on another's bosom, as John did on Jesus'. Such a close position was chosen by friends, and gave the opportunity of confidential whispering, as when John asked who should betray Jesus (John xiii. 23-25). Ordinarily three couches (the highest, the middle, and the lowest) formed three sides of a square, the fourth being open for the servants to bring the dishes. On each couch there was the highest, the middle, and the lowest guest. "The uppermost room" desired by the Pharisees was the highest seat on the highest couch (Matt. xxiii. 6). Females were not as now in the East secluded from the males at meals, as the cases of Ruth among the reapers (Ruth ii. 14), Elkanah with his wives (1 Sam. i. 4), Job's sons and daughters (i. 4) show. The women served the men (Luke x. 40, John xii. 2). The blessing of the food by thanks to the Giver preceded the meal; the only O. T. instance is 1 Sam. ix. 13. Our Lord always did so (Matt. xv. 36, John vi. 11); so Paul (Acts xxvii. 35), confirming precept (1 Tim. iv. 3, 4) by practice. Deut. viii. 10 implies the duty of grace at the close of a meal. A bread sop held between the thumb and two fingers was dipped into the melted grease in a bowl, or into a dish of meat, and a piece taken out. To hand a friend a delicate morsel was esteemed a kindly act. So Jesus to Judas, treating him as a friend, which aggravates his treachery (John xiii. 18, 26; 1 Ps. xli. 9). Geier, in Poli Synopsis, transl. Prov. xix. 21 "a slothful man hideth his hand in the dish (tzallachath) and will not so much as bring it to his mouth again"; A. V. means the cavity in the bosom like a dish. Great feasts were held at the end of each third year (Deut. xiv. 28), when the Levite, stranger, fatherless, and widow were invited (comp. Luke xiv. 12, 13; Neh. viii. 10-12). After a previous invitation, on the day of the feast a second was issued to intimate all was ready (Esth. v. 8, vi. 14; Matt. xxii. 3, 4). The guests were received with a kiss; water for the feet, ointment for the person, and robes were supplied (Luke vii. 38-45). The washing of hands before meals was indispensable for cleanliness, as the fingers were their knives and forks, and all the guests dipped into the same dish (Matt. xxvi. 23). The Pharisees overlaid this with a minute and burdensome ritual (Mark vii. 1-13). Wreaths were worn on the head: Isa. xxviii. 1, where the beauty of Samaria is the "fading flower on the head of the fat valleys." Its position on the brow of a bill made the comparison appropriate. Hebraism for "woe to the proud crown of the drunkards of Ephraim" (Horsley). Its people were generally drunken revellers literally, and metaphorically like such were rushing on their own ruin (Jer. 7, 8, chap. v. 11, 22; Amos iv. 1, vi. 1-6). The nation would perish as the drunkard's soon fading wreath. A "governor of the feast" (architriclinos, the Gr. sumposiarchos, the Lat. magister convivii) superintended, tasting the food and liquors, and settling the order and rules of the entertainment (John ii. 8). The places were assigned according to the respective rank (Gen. xliii. 33; 1 Sam. ix. 22; Luke xiv. 8; Mark xii. 39). Drinking revells were called nishteh (the kouros of the Greeks, Latin convivatio), 1 Sam. xxv. 36. Condemned by the prophets (Isa. v. 11, Amos vi. 6) and apostles (Rom. xiii. 13, Gal. v. 21, Eph. v. 18, 1 Pet. iv. 3).

Meurah - cave. Josh. xiii. 4. A town "beside (rather belonging to: be) the Sidonians, which Israel failed to take possession of." Keil makes M. "the cave of Jezzin," E. of Sidon, in the steep of Lebanon, a hiding place of the Druses at the present time. But then one would expect the to to precede. Reiland suggests Merath, the limit of Galilee on the W. (Josephus Ant. ii. 20, § 6; iii. 3, § 1.)

Meat. N. 4 in one sense, "flesh."

Thus of the three divisions of offerings "the burnt, the meat, and the peace offerings," the meat offering is a present or oblation (minchah from a root to send or offer), consisting only of flour, corn, and oil, flesh never being in it as in the other two. In Ps. cxi. 5, "He hath given meat (tereph) unto them that fear Him," lit. spoil such as Israel brought out of Egypt (Exod. xii. 36), and which God had covenanted to Abraham, Gen. xv. 14 (Kinchi). Rather, the manna and quails, a heaven-sent "booty" (treasure trove) to the hungry people. Tereph is used for meat in general (Prov. xxxi. 15, Mal. iii. 10). In 1 Cor. xiii. 13, "if meat make my brother to offend," etc., and Rom. xiv. 20, "for meat destroy not the work of God," broma means food in general, not merely flesh.

The minchah denotes generally a gift from an inferior to a superior, whether God or man (Gen. iv. 3-5, xxxii. 13); qurban or corban afterwards expressed this general sense. Minchah then was restricted to the unbloody offering, zelbach to the bloody sacrifice. Nosek, "drink offerings," accompanied the minchah. In Lev. ii. and vi. 14-23 the law of the meat offerings is given. Their ingredients, flour and oil, were the chief vegetable foods of Israel; so in them the Israelites offered his daily bread to the Lord, but in a manner distinct from the merely dedicatory firstfruits of corn and bread (comp. 1 Chron. xxix. 10-14, Deut. xxvi. 5-11). The latter loaves were leavened, and neither they nor the firstfruits sheaf were burned upon the altar (Lev. xxiii. 10, 11, 17, 20). Each meat offering on the contrary was to be prepared without leaven, and a portion given by burning to Jehovah for a sweet savour upon the altar. The rest as a most holy thing was to be eaten in the holy place by the priests alone as the mediators between Jehovah and the people. Therefore the meat offerings did not denote merely the sanctification of earthly food, but symbolised the spiritual food enjoyed by the congregation of the Lord. If even the earthly life is not nourished merely by the daily bread but by the Divine grace which blesses the food as means of preserving life, much less can the spiritual life be nourished by earthly food, but only by the spiritual food which a man partakes of by the Spirit of God from the true bread of life, the word of God. As oil symbolises the Spirit as the principle of all spiritual life, so bread from the seed of the field symbolises the word of God (Luke viii. 11; Deut. xiii. 3). Sanctification consists in the operation of this spiritual food through the right use of the means of grace for growth in holiness (Matt. v. 16, 1 Pet. ii. 12). This inner food fills the inner man with peace, joy, and blessedness in God. This fruit of the spiritual life is shadowed forth in the "meat offerings." They must be free from the "leaven" of hypocrisy (Luke xii. 1) the leaven of the old nature, Kurtz, malice, and wickedness (1 Cor. v. 8), and from the "honey" of carual delights, both being destructive of spiritual life. "The salt of the covenant of God" (i.e. the purifying, strengthening, and quickening power of the covenant, whereby moral corruption is averted) and the incense of prayer were to be added, that the fruit of the spiritual life might be well pleasing to the Lord (Keil). Wine symbolised vigour and refreshment (Ps. civ. 15). The priests' own meat offerings were to be wholly burnt. The sin offering implied atonement for sin; the burnt offering self dedication to God; the meat offering spiritual sustenance through the word and Spirit.

"The prayer to God, Give us this day our daily bread, is accompanied by the demand on God's part, Give Me to-day My daily bread. This demand is answered by the church when it offers to God in good works that for which God has endowed it with strength, benediction, and prosperity." (Hengstenberg, Dissert. on Pentat., ii. 531.) The meat offering was to be for a "memorial" reminding God of His people; so Cornelius' alms and prayers (Acts x. 4). The minchah, as a sacrifice, was something surrendered to God, which was of the greatest value to man as a means of living. It was not merely grain, but grain prepared by man's labour. Hence the minchah expressed a confession that all our good works are wrought in God and are due to Him (Speaker's Comm., Lev. ii. 14).

Mebunnai. 2 Sam. xliii. 27. Elsewhere Sibbechai (xxi. 18), Sibbecai (1 Chron. x. 4, xi. 23, xxvii. 11). An error of transcribers.

Meeherathite. 1 Chron. xi. 36. Kennicot prefers reading "Maachathite," as in the parallel list (2 Sam. xliii. 34).

Medan=strife. Gen. xxv. 2. Son of Abraham and Keturah. Identified with Midian in Gen. xxxvii. 23, 36. The Keturahites early merged into the Ishmaelite tribes.

Medeba. E. of Jordan. The Heb. means "waters of quiet," but, except tank water, none is there. Mesha in the famous Dibon stone writes: "Omri took the land, Medeba, and occupied it (in his days and in) the days of his son 40 years"; no doubt as a fortress to command the surrounding district. At the time of the Exodus the Amorites had dispossessed Moab of part of the land which Moab had wrested from the Emims (Deut. ii. 9-11, Num. xxi. 23-26). Israel in turn wrested from the Amorite Sihon "from Arnon even unto Jabbok." The national lay, ver. 27-29, first describes Sihon's defeat of Moab: "a flame from the city of Sihon . . . hath consumed Ar of Moab, and the lords of the high places of Arnon. Woe unto thee Moab, . . . He hath given . . . his daughters into captivity unto Sihon king of the Amorites (so far the ballad describes Sihon's triumph over Moab; Israel's triumph over Sihon follows) . . . We have shot at them. Heshbon is perished even unto Dibon, and we have laid them waste even unto Nophah, which reacheth (rather with fire) unto M." Heshbon was northernmost, M. now Madeba in the pastoral district of the Belka (called "the plain" or level downs, the mischor "of Moab," Josh. xiii. 9 assigned to Reuben) was four miles S.E. of it. A fortress in David's time (1 Chron. xix. 7-15), before which Joab defeated Ammon and the Syrians of Maachab, Mesopotamia, and Zobah. In Ahaz' time M. was a sanctuary of Moab (Isa. xv. 2).

Medes, Media. From Madai, Japheth's son (Gen. x. 2). They called themselves Mada in the arrow-headed inscriptions, Semitic Madai, Gr. Medoi. S.W. and S. of the Caspian, N.W. and N. of Persia, W. of Parthia and the salt desert of Iram, E. of Armenia and Assyria. Its length was 550 miles, its breadth 300. Coming to Europe in small parties mingled with the Scythians they were the Sarmatians (Sauro-Matæ) of the steppe country between the Euxine and Caspian. Berosus (in Euseb. Chron. i. 4) states that about 2450 B.C. eight Median kings reigned over Babylon for 224 years. Aryans (the name applied to Medes by their neighbours in Herodotus' time; vii. 62) existed very early with Cushites and Shemites in the Mesopotamian population. These Aryans probably became masters for a time, then were driven to the mountains whence they spread E., N., and W. The early Vedic settlers in western Hindostan were Aryans. The Maotæ of the sea of Azov and the Medi of Thrace (see Herodotus, v. 9) attest their progress. Rawlinson (Herodotus, i. 327, Es. iii. 3) thinks that the Medes of Berosus' statement were really Scythians; but Berosus' statements are generally confirmed by recent deciphering of the Babylonian monuments.

A very early Aryan migration probably preceded the one in progress about 880 B.C. Then the Medes appear in the cuneiform inscriptions as Assyria's enemies, inhabiting part of Media. They then consisted of petty chieftains and tribes without central government. Assyria ravaged their lands and exacted tribute. The range of Zagros inhabited by hardy mountaineers intervened between them and Assyria. So, in spite of Sargon's attempt by military colonies to occupy Media permanently, the Medes maintained their nationality and outlived Assyria. Sennacherib and his successor Esarhaddon both profess to conquer Media, which shows it was still unconquered when they came to the throne. In Ahaz' reign, beginning 741 B.C., Kir a Median city was held by Tiglath Pileser (2 Kings xvi. 9). In Sargon's reign the ten tribes were removed to the cities of the Medes (xvii. 6). In the deciphered inscriptions he says he founded in Media cities which he planted with colonists from other parts of his dominions.

As Assyria declined Media rose. Cyaxares subdued the Scythians (those of Zagros range and the kindred tribes invited by the former from the N.) who disputed with the Aryans the possession of the mountain region. Finally he captured NINEVEH (see, and ASSYRIA] 625 B.C. Nabopolassar with the Babylonians helped him in its overthrow (Abydenus), and was therefore made independent king of Babylon. The Median empire then was separated from Babylonia either by the Tigris or by a line half way between the Tigris and Euphrates; Syria, Phœnicia, and Judea falling to Babylon. Cyaxares' predecessors named by Herodotus, Deioeces the first king (a title assumed by all Median kings, from dahak "biter" or "snake"), and Phraortes, are hardly historical persons. Cyaxares after taking Nineveh tried to extend his empire even beyond Assyria's boundary, the Halys, to the Ægean Sea. But after a six years' war in which he had Babylon's help he failed to conquer Lydia, and the three great monarchies concluded a peace (ratified by engagements and intermarriages) which lasted throughout Cyaxares' and his son Astyages' reigns.

Media probably left the native monarchs over the subject nations and required only tribute. Certainly Cambyses and his son Cyrus so held their throne under Media till Cyrus revolted. The latter introduced the system of satraps. Media only lasted as an empire the two reigns of Cyaxares and Astyages, 75 years, down to 558 B.C. (still that there were earlier kings appears from Jer. xxv. 25, "all the kings of the Medes"). Enervated by adopting Assyrian manners the Medes were defeated by the hardy Persian mountaineers under Cyrus, and their king Astyages taken. Both races being of the same Aryan or Iranian source, the same religion and language, naturally all but coalesced. Together they conquered Babylon, as foreseen by Isaiah (xlii. 17): "behold I will stir up the Medes against them, which shall not regard silver, and as for gold they shall not delight in it" (similarly Xenophon, Cyrop. v. 1, § 10, makes Cyrus attribute to the Medes disregard of riches, "and Babylon shall be . . . as when God overthrew Sodom"); so xxi. 2, "go up O Elam (Persia), besiege O Media." Both Medes and Persians were famous in using "bows" and as horsemen. CYRUS [see] made DARIUS [see] the Mede viceroy of BABYLON [see] until he assumed the government (Dan. v. vi.; Ezra i.). The Median capital was a royal residence for part of the year, and Media claimed precedence among the provinces. Achmetha (Ecbatana) "the palace in the province of the Medes" (Ezra vi. 2-5) is where Cyrus' decree is found, an undesigned coincidence of Scripture with the fact that the Median capital was the seat of government under Cyrus, but a royal residence only under Darius and Hystaspes. Discontent however led Media to seek to regain its old ascendancy and to elevate a Phraortes to the throne who claimed descent from Cyaxares. Darius Hystaspes crushed the rebellion with difficulty, and crucified and mutilated Phraortes. Again in vain the Medes rebelled under Darius Nothus. Afterwards they made no further attempt. Herodotus divides the Medes into six tribes, of which the Arizanti (of Aryan descent) seem the first, then the Parotaceni, Struchates, Basse; lastly the Badii (the Putiya of the Persian inscriptions) and Magi (the priest caste, a Scythic tribe incorporated by the Medes with themselves, foreigners admitted into the nation). The two divisions latterly made were Media Magna (now Kurdistan, Turistan, Adelan, and Irak Ajemi) and Media Atropatia (now Azerbaijan, the tract between the Caspian and the mountains running N. from Zagros, N. and W. of Media Magna) or Atropatene. The phrases "the Medes and Persians" and "Media and Persia," even after the Persians got the supremacy (Esth. x. 2), show the original supremacy of Media, which still in legal and religious formularies was retained.

In Dan. viii. 3, of the two horns on the rim the higher came up last, viz. Persia. Herodotus (i. 131) makes their original religion the worship of the elements, fire, etc. Rawlinson however makes dualism (the worship of both a good and an evil principle eternally existing: Ormuzd the good object of trust, Ahurman the object of fear) to have been their original faith as described in the Zendavesta, and that the worship of the elements was subsequently taken from the Scythians (the fire worshippers of Armenia and mount Zagros, among whom Magism existed from of old) and was Magian. Their language belongs to the great Indo Germanic family, which Japheth's sons starting from Armenia spread N., E., and W. In Persia the purer Aryan creed, dualism (Ormuzd however being supreme), prevailed; in Media Magism, the worship of water, air, earth, and above all fire, to which altars (but no temples) on mountain tops were dedicated, on which the fire was never allowed to go out. The usurpation of the Pseudo Smerdis or the Magian Artaxerxes (Ezra iv.) was probably a religious revolution, Median Magism striving against the Persian creed [see DARIUS HYSASPES and ARTAXERXES]. The MAGI [see] performed the sacred rites, and divined the future; from them "magic" takes its name. Fear of polluting the elements gave rise to the superstition of neither burying nor burning their dead, but exposing them to beasts and birds of prey (Hec. i. 110), as do still the Parsees. The Persians copied their dress, the flowing robe seen on the Persian sculptures. Their arms were bows, arrows, shields, short spears, poniards. They delighted in rich colours of dress, as scarlet, and chains and collars of gold.

MEDIAN DRESS.

Mediator. Six times in N. T. (Gal. iii. 19, 20; Heb. viii. 6, ix. 15, xii. 24; also the verb, vi. 17, Gr. "mediated," emesiteusen, "by an oath," "interposed as mediator between Himself and us with an oath"; Jesus is the embodiment of God's mediating oath: Ps. cx. 4). One coming between two parties to remove their differences. The "day-man" (Job ix. 33) who "lays his hand upon both" the litigants, in token of his power to adjudicate between them; mekatch, from yakach to manifest or reprove; there is no umpire to whose authoritative decision both God and I are equally amenable. We Christians know of such a Mediator on a level with both, the God-man Christ Jesus (1 Tim. ii. 5).

In Gal. iii. 20 the argument is, the law had angels and Moses (Deut. v. 5) as its mediators; now "a mediator" in its essential idea (ho mesites, the article is generic) must be of two parties, and cannot be "of one" only; "but God is one," not two. As His own representative He gives the blessing directly, without mediator such as the law had, first by promise to Abraham, then to Christ by actual fulfilment. The conclusion understood is, therefore a mediator cannot appertain to God; the law, with its mediator, therefore cannot be God's normal way of dealing. He acts singly and directly; He would bring man into immediate communion, and not have man separated from Him by a mediator as Israel was by Moses and the legal priesthood (Exod. xix. 12-24, Heb. xii. 19-24). It is no objection to this explanation that the gospel too has a Mediator, for Jesus is not a mediator separating the two parties as Moses did, but at once God having "in Him dwelling all the fulness of the Godhead," and man representing the universal manhood (1 Cor. viii. 6; xv. 22, 28, 45, 47, 24; 2 Cor. v. 19; Col. ii. 14); even this mediatorial office shall cease, when its purpose of reconciling all things to God shall have been accomplished, and God's ONENESS as "all in all" shall be manifested (Zech. xiv. 9).

In 1 Tim. ii. 4, 5, Paul proves that "God will have all men to be saved and (for that purpose) to come to the knowledge of the truth," because "there is one God" common to all (Isa. xlv. 22, Acts xvii. 26). Rom. ix. 29, "there is one Mediator also between God and man (all mankind whom He mediates for potentially), the man (rather 'man' generically) Christ Jesus," at once appointed by God and sympathising with the sinner, whilst untainted by and hating sin. Such a combination could only come from infinite wisdom and love (Heb. i. ii., iv. 15; Eph. i. 8); a Mediator whose mediation could only be effected by His propitiatory sacrifice, as 1 Tim. ii. 5, 6 adds, "who gave Himself a vicarious ransom (antibuton) for all." Not only the Father gave Him (John iii. 16), but He voluntarily gave Himself for us (Phil. ii. 5-8; John x. 15, 17, 18). This is what imparts in the Father's eyes such a value to it (Ps. xl. 6-8, Heb. x. 5). [See PROSTITUTION, RANSOM, ATONEMENT, RECONCILIATION.]

Medicine. The physicians in Gen. i. were Egyptian embalmers. Physic was often associated with superstition; this was Asa's fault, "he sought not unto Jehovah but to the physicians" (2 Chron. xvi. 12). Luke "the beloved physician" practised at Antioch, the centre between the schools of Cilicia (Tarsus) and Alexandria. Ecclesiastes (xii. 6) uses language which under the Spirit (whatever Solomon knew or did not know) expresses scientific truth: "the silver cord" is the spinal marrow, white and precious as silver, attached to the brain, which is "the golden bowl." The "fountain" may mean the right ventricle of the heart, the "cistern" the left, the "pitcher" the veins, the "wheel" the aorta or great artery. The "wheel" however may mean life in its rapid motion, as Jas. iii. 6, "the wheel of nature." The circulation of the blood is apparently expressed. The washings, the restriction in diet to clean animals and the prohibition of pork, the separation of lepers, the laws of marriage and married intercourse (Lev. xv.), the cleanliness of the camp (Deut. xxiii. 12-14), and the comprehension of all varieties of healthful climate in Palestine, account for Israel's general exemption from epidemics and remarkable healthiness. The healing art in the O. T. seems mainly to consist in external applications for wounds, etc. BALM [see] abounded in Gilead, and therefore many physicians settled there. Jer. viii. 22, "is there no balm in Gilead? is there no physician there? why then is not the health (lengthening out) of the daughter of my people gone up (Heb.)?" i.e., why is not the long bandage applied? or why is not the health come up again, as skin coming up over a wound in healing?

Megiddo. On the S. edge of the Esdraelon or Jezreel plain, the frontier of Issachar and MANASSAH [see], commanding a pass from the N. into the hill country. Joshua (xii. 21) defeated its king, with 30 other petty chieftains, W. of Jordan. It was assigned to Manasse, though within Issachar's limit, but they failed to drive out the Canaanites, and could only make them tributary (xvii. 11, 12, 13; Jud. i. 27, 28, v. 19). "The kings of Canaan (Jabin and Sisera his captain) fought in Tannach by the waters of M." (viz. Kishon, or else a copious stream flowing down into Kishon) with Deborah and Barak. They assembled at Tannach and by the waters of M., but the battle was fought at mount Tabor, for they "perished at Endor" (Ps. lxxxiii. 19), near Tabor. Barak would never desert the heights of Tabor to march 15 miles over a boggy plain and attack Sisera strongly placed on the low hills of Tannach. Jehovah "drew unto Barak Sisera, unto the Kishon" (Jud. iv. 7), i.e. unto the pools and springs of the Kishon at El Mijhiych, the "spring head" W. of Tabor. From the high ground of Tabor Barak rushed down on the foe, who first posted themselves at the foot of the conical hill on which Endor is, and thence ventured into the open plain S.W. of Tabor. "The waters of M." are the abundant springs which flow into the nahr Jabul, from what is now the Mu-jadda ruin in the Jordan valley (meaning "the grazing place," "cut down by sheep") at the foot of mount Gilboa. Thus "the valley of M." is that which leads down from Jezreel to Bethshean. The words "in Taanach" (Jud. v. 19) "over (so the Heb. עַל for 'by') the waters of M." must be a district name for all the plain of which Taanach was the capital, or else transl. "in sandy soil" (taanach). Thus the whole of Sisera's flight was only five or six miles from the scene of his defeat, to the plain Zaanaim (Bit-zaanaim, now Bessum) between Ta-chor and Kedesh of Naphtali by the sea of Galilee (Corder, in Pal. Expl. Qy. Stat., Jan. 1877, p. 13-20; Oct., p. 190 192).

At M. was stationed one of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 Kings iv. 12). Solomon "built," i.e. fortified, M. as a commanding military position (ix. 15). Hither Ahaziah fled from Jehu, and died here (2 Kings ix. 27), in the kingdom of Samaria (2 Chron. xxii. 9) [see AHAZIAH]. Here godly JOSHUA [see] fell in conflict with Pharaoh Necho (2 Chron. xxxv. 22-24, Zech. xii. 11). [See HADAD-RIMMON.] M. thus became a component part of ARMAGEDDON [see], the scene of the last conflict with Antichrist (Rev. xvi. 16). Now El Lejjun; in Eusebius and Jerome "Legio," on the caravan route between Egypt and Damascus, "15 miles from Nazareth, four from Taanach." Traces of a Roman road remain, and large "tells" mark the site of the fortresses commanding hill and plain.

MEHETABEEL: Neh. vi. 10.

Mehir. 1 Chron. iv. 11.

Mehujael=smitten of God. Gen. iv. 18.

Mehuman. Esth. i. 10.

Mehunims. Plural of MAON [see] (Ezra ii. 43, 50; Neh. vii. 52); num-bered with the Nethinims.

Mejarkon. A town in Dan;=the yellow waters. Near Joppa.

Mekonah=base. A town with daughter villages, remlabated after the captivity by men of Judah (Neh. xi. 28). Coupled with Ziklag which was in the far S.

Melatiah. Neh. iii. 7.

Melchi. 1. Luke iii. 24. 2. Luke iii. 28.

Melchishua. [See MALCHISHUA.] Saul's son (1 Sam. xiv. 49, xxxi. 2).

Melchizedek=king of righteousness. King of Salem (Jerusalem) and priest of the most high God (Elion); used by Balaam, Num. xxiv. 16. The Phoenicians so named their chief god according to Sanchoniathon in Euseb. Præp. Evanz., doubtless from primitive revelation. After the slaughter of Chedorlaomer M. met Abram in the valley of Shaveh (levah), the king's dale (Gen. xiv. 17-20; 2 Sam. xviii. 18), viz. the valley of the upper Kedron, where Absalom long afterwards reared a pillar; adjoining Jerusalem. Salem was the oldest, the poetic name (Ps. lxxvi. 2), John the next, and Jeru-salem the most recent name. This favours the view that Siddim, Sodom, and Gomorrah were to the S. of the Dead Sea. Abram in returning from Dan to Hebron would naturally take the route by Jerusalem (Thom-son, Land and Book, ii. 31). Adoni-zedek=lord of righteousness corre-sponds; being also the name of a king of Jerusalem (Josh. x. 1). "Brought forth bread and wine" (1 Sam. xxv. 18), hospitably to re-fresh Abram's weary band (which, though not referred to in Hebrews, reminds us of the Lord's supper), probably after sacrificing animals the first fruits of the spoil (as Paul, de Abr., asserts, epinikia ethne); as indeed Heb. viii. 3 proves, for the "blessing" and "tithing," which alone are recorded, are not enough to constitute priesthood. Abram "the friend of God" recognised him (probably having received some Divine intimation) at once as his spiritual superior, and this in a day when every patriarch was the priest of his family. M. disappears as suddenly as he came. Almost a thousand years elapse before the next notice of M. (Ps. ex. 4). "The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thon (Messiah) art a priest for ever after the order (i.e. 'the similitude' Heb. vii. 15, the office) of M.," i.e. (I.) Combining the kingship with the priesthood (Zech. vi. 9-15, especially 13). David cannot be the king priest; he could bring wrath on, but not effect an atonement for, his people (2 Sam. xxiv. 17). Uzziah, heir of his throne, incurred leprosy by usurp-ing the priesthood (2 Chron. xxvi. 16-21). The Divine (Heb. vii. 20) oath accompanying this priesthood, but not the Aaronic, shows its un-paralleled excellency. David died, and the Aaronic priests could not continue by reason of death (Heb. vii. 8). The Aaronic priesthood was "made after the law of a carnal commandment," but the M. priest-hood "after the power of an endless life," as is declared a thousand years later than the psalm (Heb. vii. 1-3, 15, 16-23).

M. was probably of Semitic stock, for Shemites were in Palestine before the immigration of the Canaanites (Hamites). By the time that Abram arrived "the Canaanite was then (already) in the land" (Gen. xii. 6). (II.) M. is introduced "without father, without mother, without descent" being recorded, whereas this was essential in the Aaronic priesthood (see Ezra ii. 62, 63; Exod. xxix. 9, 20, 30; Lev. xxi. 13, 14). This is a second peculiarity of Messiah's priest-hood, that it is not derived from another before Him, and "passeth not to another" after Him (Heb. vii. 24 marg.). The "without father," etc., refers to M. officially not natu-rally. M. was without father, etc., i.e. sacerdotally he was independent of his descent, unlike the Aaronic priests, who forfeited the priesthood if they could not trace their descent (see Neh. vii. 61, 65). M. had no fixed beginning or end of his king-ship, such as the Levitical priests who began at 30 and ended at 50 years of age. Christ as man had "father, mother, beginning of days and end of life, and descent" genea-logically traced (Heb. vii. 3). M. therefore cannot have been absolutely without these; but officially he was without them, even as the antitypi-cal priest Messiah was officially and sacerdotally without them. Messiah was not of Levi, but of Judah, so did not receive His priesthood by inheritance. He did not transmit it to any successor; nay, the term hieruus (sacerdos) is never applied to apostle, presbyter, deacon, or any Christian minister in N. T. Aaron's "end" is recorded, M.'s not. With M. the king priesthood in Canaan ceased; but M.'s priesthood lasts for ever in the Antitype, who is from everlasting to everlasting, and to whom M. was "made like," for the archetype of Messiah's priesthood existed in the Divine mind from everlasting before M. Doubtless M. had father and mother by birth, but as king priest had no predecessor nor successor. (III.) The Aaronic priesthood was local, temporary, and national; the M. priesthood was prior to the Le-vitical temporary law, and so world-wide and everlasting. The Aaronic highpriest claimed no authority over other nations. M. was priest not only to his own city Salem, but is recog-nised as such by Abram the repre-sentative of God's church and people; and the king of Sodom tacitly ac-quiesces in this claim to an universal priesthood. This is the significance of the title, priest of "the Possessor of heaven and earth." M. is the first and the last who by God's appoint-ment, and in God's name, exercised the priesthood for Shemite and Hamite alike, the forerunner of gospel catholicity which joins under Christ all of every race (Gal. iii. 28, Col. iii. 11, Rom. x. 12). (IV.) M. was superior to Abram, in that he blessed and received tithes from him (the giver's token of acknowledgment that all his property is God's), and so was superior to Levi and the Aaronic priesthood which were in Abram's loins. So Messiah is in-finitely above the Aaronic priests. (V.) M. as king of righteousness (tzedeek) and of peace (salem) was "made like unto the Son of God," Messiah, who is both in the highest sense (Isa. ix. 6); the peace He brings is "the fruit of righteousness" (xxxii. 17, Jer. xxiii. 6). As Balaam was a true prophet among the hea-then, so M. was the king priest among them; but at M.'s time the nations had not so far apostatized from the primitive faith as subse-quently. M. is the first designated cohen, "priest." God Himself called him to the office, according to Heb. v. 1-4, Ps. ex. 4. As priest, M. authoritatively mediating between God and man first "blessed Abram" on the part "of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth," who would make Abram heir of the world which is His; next "he blessed the most high God" on the part of Abram for His having delivered his enemies into his hand. Reciprocal blessing, happy exchange; God mak-ing over His gift of the world to Abram, and Abram giving to God all the glory of his victory an earnest of his final universal possession (1 Cor. iii. 22, Rom. ix. 13).

Meleæ. Luke iii. 31.

Melech. 1 Chron. ix. 41.

Melita. The scene of Paul's shipwreck (Acts xxvii., xxviii.). Not the M. now Meleida in the gulf of Venice near Dalmatia; but the M. between Sicily and Africa, Malta, where tradition names the place of the wreck "St. Paul's bay" (Mr. Smith, of Jordan Hill, Shipwreck of St. Paul). After leaving Fair Havens in Crete, and whilst sailing along its S. coast, the wind blew from E.N.E. (Euraquilon, Sin., Vat., Alex. MSS. instead of Euroclydon), carrying them under the lee of the island Canda (or Canda, Vat. MS.), 20 miles to the S.W. The Gr. (xxvii. 15, antophthalmia) is, "when the ship could not keep her eyes to the wind"; either figuratively, or literally eyes were carved or painted on the bows of the ship, an eastern usage still existing. Here, to enable the ship to weather the storm, they hoisted the boat on board, "undergirded the vessel" (frapping it by passing four or five turns of cable round the hull), and "lowered the gear" (chalasantes to skeuos, not "struck sail," which if they had done they would have been driven directly towards the Syrtis or quicksand), i.e. brought down the topsails and heavy yard with sail attached. They then turned the ship's head to the N. on the starboard tack, the only course whereby to escape falling into the Syrtis. Thus for 13 days they drifted through Adria, i.e. the middle of the Mediterranean between Crete and Sicily. If we deduce the ship's course from that of the wind, from the angle of the ship's head with the wind, and from the leeway, she must have drifted nearly W. by N., the precise bearing of the N. of Malta from the S. of Canda. The rate of drift would average a mile and a half an hour, so that in 13 days she would pass over 468 miles; and Malta is from Canda just 476 miles. The striking coincidence at once identifies Malta as the scene, and confirms Luke's accuracy. On the 14th night "the seamen deemed that land was approaching them" (Gr.), probably hearing the surf breaking. A ship entering Paul's bay from E. must pass within a quarter of a mile the point of Koura; but before reaching it the land is too low and too far to be seen in a dark night, but at this distance the breakers may be heard and also, if the night admit, be seen. The "land" then is the point of Koura E. of Paul's bay. A ship drifting W. by N. towards St. Paul's bay would come to it without touching any other part of the island, for the coast trends from this bay to the S.E. On Koura point, the bay's S.E. extremity, there must have been breakers with the wind blowing from N.E. Sounding they first found 20 fathoms, and a little farther 15; and, fearing rocks ahead, cast four anchors from the stern. Parry (Sailing Directions) remarks on the tenaciousness of the bottom in St. Paul's bay, "whilst the cables hold there is no danger, the anchors will never start."

After the frustrated attempt of the shipmen to flee in a boat, they lightened the ship of its wheat (brought from Egypt, the great granary of Italy, ver. 6); they knew not the land (for St. Paul's bay is remote from the great harbour, and has no marked features to enable the Alexandrian seamen to know it), but discovered "a creek having a sandy beach (agialon) into which they determined if possible to strand the ship." They cut the anchor cables, which had been let down at the stern rather than the bow, with the ulterior design of running her aground. Ships were steered by two paddles, one on each quarter. They were lifted out of water during anchorage in a gale, and secured by "radder hands." These now they "loosed" in getting the ship again under weigh. Then "they hoisted up the foresail (not 'mainsail,' artemon) to the wind and made toward shore; and falling into a place where two seas met (Salmonetta, an island at the W. of St. Paul's bay, which from their anchorage they could not have known to be one, is separated from the mainland by a channel 100 yards wide communicating with the outer sea; just in the sound within Salmonetta was probably where two seas met) they ran the ship aground, and the forepart stuck fast, but the hinder was broken with the waves."

The rocks of Malta disintegrate into minute particles of sand and clay, which when acted on by currents form a deposit of tenacious clay; in still water of creeks without currents, at a depth undisturbed by waves, mud is found. A ship, driven by the wind into a creek, would strike a bottom of mud, graduating into tenacious clay; in this the forepart would stick fast, whilst the stern would be exposed to the violence of the waves. Captain Smyth's chart shows that after passing Koura point the ship coming from the E. passes over twenty fathoms, and pursuing the same direction after a short interval fifteen, a quarter of a mile from the shore which is here "girt with mural precipices." The W. side of the bay, whither the ship was driven, is rocky but has two creeks, one of which (Mestara) has still a sandy beach, and the other had one formerly, though now worn away by the sea.

The Castor and Pollux after wintering in M. proceeded with Paul to Puteoli (Acts xxviii. 11-13) by way of Syracuse and Rhegium. Therefore M. lay on the regular route between Alexandria and Puteoli, which Malta does; and Syracense, 80 miles off, and Rhegium would be the natural track from the neighbouring Malta. "They knew the island" (Acts xxviii. 1) when they landed as M. The natives are called "barbarians" (ver. 2) not as savages, but as speaking neither Greek nor Latin (Rom. i. 14), but a Phœnician or Punic dialect corrupted by foreign idioms of the mixed population. The disappearance of vipers now is due to the clearing away of the woods that sheltered them. The "no little kindness" of the natives shows they were no savages. Pablius is called (Acts xxviii. 7) "chief man of the island," not from his "possessions," his father being still alive, but as lieutenant of the praetor of Sicily, to whose province Malta was attached (Cicero, Verr. ii. 4, § 18). Two inscriptions, Greek and Latin, in Civita Vecchia in Malta record the title "the chief" (protos, primus) of the Maltese. Paul healed diseases and received in return "many honours" and "necessaries" (ver. 9, 10). M. was famous for honey, fruit, cotton fabrics, building stone, and a breed of dogs. Shortly before Paul's visit his piratical Cilician countrymen made M. their haunt; but the Christianity which he introduced has continued since, though sadly corrupted by superstition. The knights of St. John flourished here in later times.

Melon. Num. xi. 5: abattchim. The Arabs call the water melon (Cucumis citrullus) batech. Cultivated on the Nile banks after the inundation from May to July. It is meat, drink and physic to the Egyptians. The common melon (C. melo) also grows well in Egypt. The same heat (in God's gracious providence) which dries up the animal frame fills with refrigerant liquid the vegetables and fruits of this class.

Melzar. An official title, for the preceeds Melzar in the Heb. "The steward" or "tutor," superintending the nurture and education of the young, subordinate to "the master of the eunuchs" (Dan. i. 11, 16); from Persian mal cara, "head cup-bearer," or nazar to guard.

Memphis. Capital of Lower Egypt, on the W. or left bank of the Nile. Heb. "Noph" (Isa. xix. 13). "Moph," or Memphis (Hos. ix. 6). Second only as Thebes in all Egypt; the residence of the kings until the Ptolemies moved to Alexandria. Plutarch makes it mean "the port of good things," the sepulchre of Osiris, the necropolis of Egypt, "the haven of the blessed," for the right of burial was given only to the good. Diodorus Siculus (i. 4) observes, the inhabitants value little this brief life, but most highly the name of a virtuous life after death; they call the houses of the living mnas, because they remain in them only a little while, but the sepulchres of the dead everlasting habitations; they are not therefore very careful about their houses, but in beautifying the sepulchres leave nothing undone. "The good" may refer to Osiris, whose sacred animal Apis was here worshipped, and had its burial place the Serapeum, whence the village Busiris is named, viz. "the abode of Osiris," now Abou Ser. "M. shall bury them" is a characteristic description, its burying ground extending 20 miles along the Libyan desert's border. Mena means a foundation or wall, and nephre

"good"; or mam-Phta "the dwelling of Phta" the god answering to the Greek Hephestus, Latin Vulcan; or from Menes its founder. Near the pyramids of Gizeh, and ten miles to the S. of modern Cairo, the court of the idol bull Apis. In hieroglyphics called "the city of pyramids." The monuments of M. are more ancient than those of Thebes. Menes (comp. Minos in Crete, Gen. x. 6; Bochart makes him Mizraim, and thinks M. was called Mezi from him, as the Arabs now call it) its founder dates 2690 B.C. (Sir G. Wilkinson), 2717 B.C. (Poole), 2200 or 2300 according to Eratosthenes comp. with Dicaearchus. Many of Manetho's dynasties were contemporaneous, not successive. "Menes" in hieroglyphics is written as the founder of M. on the roof of the Ramesseum near Gournou in western Thebes, at the head of the ancestors of Rameses the Great; the earliest mention of the name is on a ruined tomb at Gizeh, "the royal governor Menes," a descendant probably of the first Menes, and living under the fifth dynasty. Cavaglia discovered the colossal statue of Rameses II. beautifully sculptured. Before Menes the Nile, emerging from the upper valley, bent W. to the Libyan hills, and was wasted in the sands and stagnant pools. Menes, according to Herodotus, by banking up the river at the bend 100 furlongs S. of M., laid the old channel dry, and dug a new course between the hills, and excavated a lake outside M. to the N. and W., communicating with the river. Thus M. was built in the narrow part of Egypt, on a marsh reclaimed by Menes' dyke and drained by his artificial lake. The dyke began 12 miles S. of M., and deflected the river two miles eastward. At the rise of the Nile a canal still led some of its waters westward through the former bed, irrigating the western plain. The artificial lake at Abou-sir guarded against inundation on that side. M. commanded the Delta on one hand and Upper Egypt on the other; on the W. the Libyan mountains and desert defended it; on the E. the river and its artificial embankments. The climate is equable, judging from Cairo. Menes built the temple of Phta (his deified ancestor Ptah, fourth son of Ham, who settled in Libya, Gen. x. 6), the creative power, represented ordinarily holding the Nilometer or emblem of stability combined with the symbol of life, and a scepter. Meris, Sesostris, Rhampsinitis, Aschis, Psammoticias, and Amosis successively beautified this temple with gateways and colossal statues (including those of summer and winter by Rhampsinitis). In the grand avenue to it fights between bulls (not with men, for the bull was sacred) such as are depicted on the tombs were exhibited.

The temple of Apis also was here with a magnificent edifice supported by colossal Osiride statue pillars; through it on state occasions was led a black bull with peculiarly shaped white spots upon his forehead and right side, the hairs on the tail double, and the scarabeus or sacred beetle marked on his tongue. A gallery, 2000 ft. long by 20 high and 20 wide, was the burial place of the embalmed sacred bulls. Apis was thought the incarnation of Osiris, who with Isis was the universal object of worship in Egypt. Aaron's calf, and Jeroboam's two calves, were in part suggested by the Egyptian sacred bull, in part by the cherubim ox. Jeremiah (xvi. 20) alludes to Apis, "Egypt is like a very fair heifer." Isis had a temple at M., and was buried there. The sacred cubit used in measuring the Nile was in the temple of Serapis. Proteus (a Memphite king), Venus, Ra or Phre ("the sun"), and the Cabeiri too had temples in M. The region of the pyramids (from pyram "the lofty"; Ewald transl. Job iii. 14 "built pyramids for themselves"), 67 (Lepsius) in number, or probably fewer as many of the 67 are doubtful, lies wholly W. of the Nile, from a little N.W. of Cairo to 40 miles S., and thence S.W. 25 miles. The Memphite necropolis ranges about 15 miles to Gizeh, including many pyramids of Egyptian sovereigns; the pyramids at Gizeh are the largest and oldest. See Piazza Smyth, "Our Inheritance in the Great Pyramid," on the scientific bearings of this extraordinary and, in his view, divinely planned monument, which has no idolatrous emblem on it, unlike other Egyptian monuments. The Hyksos or shepherd kings (Gen. xlix. 24), Shofa and Nonshofa, 2500 B.C., he thinks, built the great pyramid under God's guidance, and the cities Salem, of which Melchizedek was shepherd priest-king, and Damascus. Isaiah (xix. 13) foretold, "the princes of Noph are deceived," i.e. the military caste with all the famed "wisdom of Egypt" err in fancying themselves secure, viz. from Sargon, Nebuchadnezzar, and Cambyses, who successively conquered Egypt. Jeremiah (xli. 19), "Noph shall be waste and desolate, without inhabitant" (comp. xliii. 10). Ezekiel, 575 B.C. (xxx. 13, 16), "I will destroy the idols and cause their images to cease out of Noph." Half a century afterwards (525 B.C.) Cambyses fulfilled it, killing Apis, scourging his priests, opening the sepulchres, examining the bodies, making sport of Phta's image, and burning the images of the Cabeiri (Herodotus, iii. 37). M. never recovered. Alexandria succeeded to its importance. So utter was its fall that the very site for a time was unknown. Mariette and Linant brought to light its antiquities, some of which are in the British Museum. Its dykes and canals still are the basis of the irrigation of Lower Egypt. The village Meit Rahemeh now stands where once was its centre.

Memucan. One of the seven princes who "saw the king's face and sat first in the kingdom" (Esth. i. 13, 14); "wise men who knew the times and law and judgment." Abasverus accordingly consulted them, "what shall we do unto Vashti according to law?" M. as president of the council owing to his wisdom and age, or else as an obsequious courtier knowing his master's mind, gave his opinion first, that Vashti should be disgraced; and his counsel the king followed.

Menahem. Son of Gadi. Slew Shallum, and seized the throne of Israel, 772 B.C.; reigned ten years. The words (2 Kings xv. 14, 16) "from Tirzah" imply that M. was a general under Zechariah, stationed at Tirzah (now Tallusa), and that he marched thence with some troops to Samaria, and avenged his master's murder by Shallum. He then, proceeding "from Tirzah" (ver. 16) where Israel's main army was posted, smote Tiphach (Thapsacus on the Euphrates), Israel's northeastern border city under Solomon (1 Kings iv. 24), restored by Jeroboam II. (2 Kings xiv. 25, 28), but having probably revolted again during the anarchy at his death. Situated on the western bank of the Euphrates on the great trade road from Egypt, Syria, and Phoenicia to Mesopotamia, it was important for M. to secure it. With savage cruelty, "because they opened not to him," and to strike terror into all opponents, M. "smote it and ripped up the women with child," copying the unscrupulous Syrian Hazael's cruelty (viii. 12). In religion "he departed not all his days from the sins of Jeroboam who made Israel to sin." Hosea and Amos depict Israel's demoralization at the time.

In his reign first appear the Assyrians as invaders of Israel from the N.E. under Pul. M., at the cost of 1000 talents of silver (£400,000, reckoning the silver talent £400), induced him to "confirm the kingdom in his hand." By exacting 50 shekels a head from 60,000 wealthy men of Israel, M. raised the money. The name Pul appears in an Assyrian inscription as "Phalnakha," who took tribute from "the house of Omri" (Beth Khumri), i.e. Samaria. Tiglath Pileser II., the first monarch of the new dynasty, mentions M. in another inscription. M. died in peace; Pekahiah his son succeeded.

Menan. Luke iii. 31.

Mene = numbered, Chaldee. The first word of the mysterious handwriting (Dan. v. 25, 26), "God hath numbered thy kingdom and finished it," i.e. fixed its number of years, and that number is now complete. The doubling of "M." marks its awful certainty.

Meni. Isa. lxx. 11, "drink offering unto that number," rather to M., an idol worshipped by apostate Jews at Babylon. The goddess Fortune, LXX., answering to the planet Venus, "the lesser good fortune"; the planet Jupiter being the greater, and answering to Gad. Knobel identifies Gad with the sun, Meni with the moon, men, mene in Gr.; "the queen of heaven" (Jer. vii. 18; xlv. 17, 18). The Arabs worshipped an idol Manah, a large stone which a thousand years later Saad demolished, in the eighth year of the Hegira; from manah to "number" or "assign."

Meonenim, the oak of. Elon: not as A. V. "the plain of." In central Palestine; Gad saw Abimelech's men coming by the way that led to it (Jud. ix. 37). M. means "enchanters," "observers of times" (Deut. xviii. 10, 11). These practised some of their magic arts at this oak. The oak of M. was at a distance from Shechem. That whereunder Jacob hid the strange gods and talisman earrings of his household was close by Shechem (Gen. xxxv. 4), the same where Abram built his first altar in Palestine (xii. 6); here also Joshua, alluding to the patriarch Jacob's address and the original idolatry of Israel's forefathers, urges the people similarly to "put away the strange gods," etc. (xxiv. 23). In Jud. ix. 6, "the oak (not 'plain') of memorial" (memorial) is the large memorial stone set up under the oak at Shechem. The inhabitants elected Abimelech king in the very place where Joshua renewed Israel's covenant with Jehovah, the true covenant God. Here was the temple of Baal Berith (Lord of the covenant, ver. 40).

Meonothai = my dwellings. Son of Othniel (1 Chron. iv. 14). "And Meonothai" must be supplied after "Hathath," as a second son of Othniel.

Mephaath = beauty. A town of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 17, 18; xvi. 37); a dependency of Heshbon, N. of Arnon, in the downs (midbar), the modern Bella (Jer. xlviii. 21). Assigned to the Merarite Levites. Retained by Mah.

Mephibosheth. 1. Saul's son by Rizpah (2 Sam. xvi. 8); crucified (gaphath; not balah, which would mean "hanged up") with six others before Jehovah by the Gibeonites to avert the famine; from barley harvest till the rains of October the bodies remained exposed to the sun (comp. Num. xxv. 4), but watched by Rizpah's pious care, and finally were committed to Kish's sepulchre. 2. Saul's grandson, son of Jonathan. Originally Merib-baal, an ancestor being named Baal (1 Chron. viii. 30, 33, 24; ix. 29). See ISHBOSETH, JERUBBAAL. When Saul and Jonathan fell at Gilboa M. was but five years old. His nurse at the sad tidings took him up and fled; in her haste she let him fall from her shoulders (Josephus Ant. vii. 5, § 5), whereon children in the East are carried, and he became lame of both feet (2 Sam. iv. 4, ix. 13). He had been for a considerable time living in obscurity with MAACHIAH [see] in Lodebar beyond Jordan, near Mahanaim; his uncle Ishbosheth's seat of government, when David through Ziba heard of him, and for the sake of Jonathan, and his promise respecting Jonathan's seed (1 Sam. xix. 15, 42), restored to him all the land of Saul and admitted him to eat bread at his table at Jerusalem continually. Ziba, from being a menial of Saul's house, had managed to become master himself of 20 servants; with these and his 15 sons he, by David's command, tilled the land for M., for though M. was henceforth David's guest, and needed no provision, he had a son Michta (1 Sam. ix.; 1 Chron. vii. 34, 35) and a retinue to maintain as a prince. His deformity, added to the depression of Saul's family, produced in him an abject fear and characteristic humility which are expressed in a manner sad to read of when one remembers the bygone greatness of Saul's house. It is a retribution in kind that the representative of Saul's family now calls himself before David by the contemptuous title which once David in self abasement used before Saul, "dead dog" (2 Sam. ix. 8, 1 Sam. xxiv. 14). The same depressed spirit appears in 2 Sam. xix. 26-28. Seventeen years subsequently, in Absalom's rebellion, Ziba rendered important service to David by meeting him as he crossed Olivet, with two strong he asses (hamor) ready saddled for the king's use, bread, raisins, fruits, and wine. With shrewd political forecast, guessing the failure of the rebellion, Ziba gained David's favour at the cost of M., whom he misrepresented as staying at Jerusalem in expectation of regaining the kingdom (2 Sam. xvi. 1-4). David in hasty credulity (Prov. xviii. 18, John vii. 51) on the spot assigned all M.'s property to Ziba. On David's return to Jerusalem M. made known the true state of the case, that Ziba had deceived him when he desired to saddle the ass and go to the king, and had slandered him (2 Sam. xix. 24-30). His squalid appearance, with unwashed feet, unarranged beard, and soiled clothes, indicating the deepest mourning ever since the king departed, attested his truthfulness. David saw his error, but had not the courage to rectify it altogether. Ziba's service to him in his extremity outweighed his perfidy to M. Impatiently for conscience told him he had been unjust to M. and still was only half just David replied, "why speakest thou any more of thy matters? thou and Ziba divide the land." M. had everything to lose and nothing to gain from Absalom's success. A cripple and a Benjamite could never dream of being preferred by Judah to the handsome Absalom; interest and gratitude bound him to David. Ziba had it completely in his power to leave him unable to stir from Jerusalem during the rebellion, by taking away the asses; the king and his friends were gone. So not merely servility, but sincere satisfaction at David's return, prompted his reply: "let Ziba take all, forasmuch as my lord is come again in peace." David's non-mention of M. on his death bed is doubtless because M. had died in the eight years that intervened between David's return and his death.

M. typifies man once son of the King; then having lost his right by the fall, as M. did by Saul's and Jonathan's death at Gilboa. Barring a name of reproach like M., instead of his name of innocence; furnished to the outskirt of the moral wilderness, like M. in Lodebar; liable to perdition by the sword of justice, as Saul's other sons (2 Sam. xxi.); paralysed by original sin, as M. lamed from infancy in both feet; invited by the Lord and Saviour, after having spoiled principalities, to sit down at the royal table (Matt. viii. 11, Rev. xix. 7, 9), as M. was by David after conquering all his foes, on the ground of the everlasting covenant (Jer. xxxi. 3); as David regarded M. because of his covenant with Jonathan (1 Sam. xx. 15, 42). Fear is man's first feeling in the Lord's presence (Luke v. 8); but He reassures the trembling sinner (Isa. xliii. 1, Rev. ii. 7), as David did M., restoring him to a princely estate.

Merab. Saul's eldest daughter (1 Sam. xiv. 49). According to promise to the conqueror of Goliath, Saul betrothed M. to David (xvii. 25, xviii. 17), but with the secret design of inciting him thereby to expose himself to be slain by the Philistines. At the time when M. should have been given to him Saul gave her to Adriel the Meholathite. Her two sons subsequently were crucified to Jehovah by the Gibeonites among the seven, for Saul's bloodthirsty zeal against them (2 Sam. xxi. 9). See EXEL, xxxiv. 7; how Saul's sin recoiled on himself and his! "Michal" is a copyist's error for M. (2 Sam. xxi. 8); reading "Michal" we must understand "brought up," not gave birth to (comp. Ruth iv. 16, 17). [See MICHAL.]

Meraiiah. Neh. xii. 12, 13.

Meraioth. 1. Sprang from Eleazar, Aaron's son; ancestor of Zadok and Ezra (1 Chron. vi. 6). Lightfoot (Temple Serv. iv. 1) thought that he was next before Eli, and that at his death the highpriesthood passed from Eleazar's to Ithamar's line. M. and Ahitub are perhaps transposed in Azariah's genealogy (1 Chron. ix. 11, Neh. xii. 11). 2. Neh. xii. 15; ME-REMOTH in ver. 3.

Merari = sorrowful, because of the anguish attending his birth (Gen. xlvii. 8, 11). [See LEVITES.] Third of Levi's sons, Gershon, Kohath, and M. Born before Jacob's going down to Egypt; of the 70 who accompanied him. The Mahlites and Mishites were the two families of Merarites at the exodus and in the wilderness (1 Chron. vi. 19, 17; Num. iii. 20, 35-37, iv. 29-33, 42-45; vii. 8; x. 17-21). They followed after Judah's standard, and before Reuben's in the march, to set up the tabernacle against the Kohathites' arrival. Their charge was the tabernacle boards, pillars, etc., four wagons and eight oxen being assigned them. Joshua assigned them 12 cities out of Reuben, Gad, and Zabulun (Josh. xxi. 7, 34-40). They shared with the Gershonites and Kohathites the offices of singers, doorkeepers, etc., under David (1 Chron. xv. 1, 6, xxvi. 5, 6, 21, 23, xxvii. 10, 19); in Nehemiah's time also (vi. 15, 16).

Lord A. Harvey (Smith's Diet.) supposes Jeduthun the patronymic title of the house, Ethan the head in David's time, and that Jeduthun was brother of an ancestor of Ethan before Hashabiah (1 Chron. vi. 45, xxv. 3, 19) and son of Hilkiah or Amariah. Thence "sons of Ethan" are distinct from "sons of Jeduthun," and the difficulty is explained how in David's time there could be sons of "sons of Jeduthun" above 30 years of age for they filled offices (xxvi. 10, xvi. 38), at the same time that Jeduthun is said to be "chief of the singers."

Merathaim, the Land of: i.e. of double rebellion, viz. the double captivity inflicted on Israel by Chaldaea (Jer. i. 21); referring also to Babylon's general accumulated rebellions against God (ver. 17-20, especially ver. 18), "Babylon, Assyria," (33; 24, 29) "striven against Jehovah, proud against . . . the Holy One of Israel."

Mercurius. Acts xiv. 12. Mythology represented M. as having once visited Phrygia with Jupiter his father, and having been refused hospitality by all except Baucis and Philemon, two old peasants (Ovid Metam. viii. 620). Hence the simple people of Lystra supposed, from the miracle on the cripple, that Paul and Barnabas were M. and Jupiter. Once more visiting the earth "in the likeness of men," M. being the god of eloquence, they called Paul M., the herald of the gods. M. was usually figured a beardless youth, but there was an old Pelasgic figure of him bearded. Barnabas, the more stately and majestic in men, they called Jupiter (2 Cor. x. 10).

Mercy seat: kapporeth Heb.; hilasterion, epithema, LXX. The propitiatory, the golden cover of the ark. From the piel conjugation of kipper "to cover up," "forgive," or "reconcile," "atone" for offences. Having a distinct significance and designation of its own; not a mere part of the ark. Placed "above up in the ark" (Exod. xxv. 17-22, xxvi. 34, xxx. 6, xxxi. 7, xxxv. 12, xxxvii. 6). Never called "the cover" (kapporeth) merely of the ark, but made a distinct thing. The holy of holies is called "the place of the mercy seat" (1 Chron. xxviii. 11, Lev. xvi. 2), marking that it was not a mere subordinate part of the ark. The kippurim, "atonements," on the day of atonement are inseparably connected with the kapporeth, which was sprinkled with the blood (ver. 13-15). The same hilasterion occurs Heb. ix. 5 "mercy seat," Rom. iii. 25 "propitiation." [See ARK.] The atonement was for the breach of the covenant. Appropriately therefore the mercy seat covered that covenant written on the two tables of stone inside the ark. God, thus reconciled through the blood sprinkled on the mercy seat, could speak to His people "from off the mercy seat that was upon the ark of the testimony" (Num. vii. 89, Ps. lxxx. 1).

Mered. Son of Ezra of Judah; married Pharaoh's daughter BITHIAH [see]. (1 Chron. iv. 17, 18.)

Meremoth. 1. Son of Urijah the priest. He weighed and registered the golden and silver vessels of the temple, which Ezra had brought from Babylon (viii. 24-30, 33; Neh. iii. 4). 2. Ezra x. 36. 3. = MERATHOR [see]; Neh. xii. 3, 15.

Merces. Esth. i. 13, 14. From the Zend meresh, "worthy."

Meribah = chiding. The designation which Moses gave the place at Rephidim where Israel, just before they reached Sinai in the second year after leaving Egypt, did chide with Moses, "give us water that we may drink," and tempted (whence came the other name Massah) Jehovah, saying "is Jehovah among us or not?" (Exod. xvii. 7; comp. as to the sin, Matt. iv. 7.) The severity of Israel's trial, however, is to be remembered; our Lord's own only expression of bodily suffering on the cross was "I thirst." Thirty-eight years afterwards at Kadesh, bordering on the promised land, again, untainted by the severe discipline of the wilderness (Isa. ix. 13), Israel in want of water cried, "would God we had died when our brethren died before the Lord!" God's glory appeared, and the Lord said to Moses and Aaron, "take the rod, and speak unto the rock before their eyes, and it shall give forth his water." But here Moses' old hastiness of spirit, which he had showed in the beginning of his career (Exod. ii.), returned; "they provoked his spirit so that he spake unadvisedly with his lips" (Ps. cvi. 32, 33): "ye rebels, must we (forgetting that the power was that of God alone) fetch you water out of this rock?" Then lifting up his hand he smote twice, whereas God had told him, "speak unto the rock." So Jehovah excluded Moses and Aaron from entering Canaan, for not "sanctifying" Him (Num. xx. 1-13). This repetition of the miracle disproves the notion from 1 Cor. x. 4 that the stream literally "followed" them from Rephidim (Exod. xvii.) to Canaan; all that is meant is a supply of water from time to time was provided naturally or miraculously, so that they never perished from thirst (so Exod. xv. 24, 25; Num. xxi. 16).

Christ is the Rock (John vii. 38); the water flowed, and the people drank, at M. Kadesh. Moses and Aaron typify ministers. The Rock Christ was once for all smitten, never to be so again (Heb. ix. 25-28; x. 10, 14). If Moses was so severely chastised for smiting again in violation of the type, what peril ministers run who pretend to offer Christ the Antitype in the Eucharist again! Ps. xcv. 8, "provocation . . . temptation," alludes to M. Massah. Also Num. xxvii. 14, Deut. xxxii. 51. The Heb. for "rock" in Exod. xvii. at Rephidim is tsur, but in Num. xx. selu at Kadesh, marking undesignedly the distinctness of the miracles.

Merodach. Jer. i. 2. Meaning death (Geseenius) or little lord. Epithet of Bel the Babylonian Jupiter, termed "the senior of the gods," "the judge," and by Nebuchadnezzar in inscriptions "the great lord, the most ancient," and by Nergissar "the firstborn of gods, the hayer up of treasures." M. became a distinct phase of Bel. It forms part of some
